Writing prolifically over thirty years as a justice, Stevens has produced an immense body of opinions that has influenced the development of every major area of law to have come before the Court. To understand Stevens' work and assess its impact, it is perhaps as important if not more so to consider his approach to deciding cases as it is to examine the substance of his decisions. For with Stevens, his method of judging goes far in explaining decades of decisions that resist easy categorization by result or ideology.

Stevens himself has provided what may be the best précis of his method. In a 1956 article on Justice Rutledge, Stevens expressed admiration for many of the characteristics of his former boss' judicial approach that he would later display as a justice. Foremost among these was Rutledge's "habit of understanding before disagreeing," which led to his careful scrutiny of every aspect of a case and bred long opinions stating all of the considerations that informed and qualified his decisions. Relatedly, Stevens underscored Rutledge's aversion to deciding cases broadly based on general principles that fail to account for potential factual and legal distinctions between cases. To Stevens, Rutledge's approach demonstrated both a pragmatic concern against deciding theoretical rather than actual controversies and a great faith in the ability of judges to decide individual cases through their judicial faculties of reason and judgment.

Not surprisingly, Stevens' work on the bench has strongly reflected the characteristics of Rutledge's approach that he most admired. In deciding cases, Stevens has focused on the factual and legal circumstances particular to each controversy, evaluated the competing arguments and interests at stake, and striven to resolve no more than necessary. Of course, this approach did not originate with Rutledge but falls within an established tradition of common law adjudication with such distinguished past practitioners as Justices Louis Brandeis and Oliver Wendell Holmes, whom Stevens has praised as "two of our greatest Justices." It also accords with a seasoned trial lawyer's sensitivity to the significance of facts, as well as with a personality that colleagues and former law clerks have described as modest, conscientious, and open minded.

Stevens' opinions evaluating free speech claims under the First Amendment provide some of the best examples of his method at work. In this area, Stevens has eschewed an absolutist approach, sometimes favored by the Court, that divides speech into "unprotected" and "protected" categories and that prohibits regulations of protected expression based on content. To Stevens, as he wrote in concurrence in R.A.V. v. St. Paul (1992), this all-or-nothing framework "sacrifices subtlety for clarity." Because "the complex reality of expression" cannot fit into simple categories, and because "the meaning of any expression and the legitimacy of its regulation can only be determined in context," Stevens instead has used a balancing approach that assesses and weighs the expressive interests implicated in a particular case against the government interests furthered by regulation.

Under this approach, Stevens has approved of several content-based restrictions on speech. For example, in Young v. American Mini Theatres (1976), Stevens authored an opinion upholding a zoning law limiting the location of adult movie theaters. In his judgment, the regulation furthered a considerable government interest in preserving the character of its neighborhoods, an interest that overcame countervailing considerations, for "few of us would march our sons and daughters off to war to preserve the citizen's right to see 'Specified Sexual Activities' exhibited in the theaters of our choice." In this case, as in FCC v. Pacifica Foundation (1978), which upheld a regulatory order channeling indecent radio broadcasts to hours that minimized exposure to children, Stevens emphasized that indecent speech, although of lesser social value than political speech, nonetheless deserved some First Amendment protection and that differences in the content of the restricted expression and the character of the restriction may warrant a different result. Accordingly, in Reno v. ACLU (1997), Stevens had no difficulty striking down a congressional ban on indecent and patently offensive communications on the Internet, which in the interest of protecting children cut so broadly into expression among adults that Stevens regarded it as “burning the house to roast the pig,” rather than simply removing the animal from the parlor.

As these cases illustrate, Stevens’ decisions often do not line up neatly by results, but they do adhere to his vision of the limited role and ultimate responsibilities of judging. His opinions in other areas affirm that his fidelity to this vision is the common thread that runs through his jurisprudence. Thus, in the Fourth Amendment context, Stevens has rejected categorical rules that certain kinds of government actions, such as entry into homes without knocking and announcing to execute warrants for felony drug crimes (Richards v. Wisconsin, 1997), are always constitutional, whereas other kinds of government actions, such as using sense-enhancing technology to detect information regarding the interior of a home (Kyllo v. United States, 2001), are always unconstitutional. Rather, Stevens generally has heeded what his Kyllo dissent identified as “the tried and true counsel of judicial restraint,” under which it is “far wiser” to limit the questions a court decides to the facts before it and to leave room for other branches and future courts to grapple with emerging issues than “to shackle them with prematurely devised constitutional constraints.”

In cases involving statutory construction, Stevens has advocated as well a restrained role for the judiciary. But rather than finding restraint in relying solely on the text of statutes to ascertain their meaning, as his colleague Justice Antonin Scalia has done, Stevens has sought guidance from “every reliable source,” including legislative history. His belief, articulated in his Circuit City v. Adams (2001) dissent, is that relying on less leaves a court “uninformed, and hence unconstrained,” and thereby risks an interpretation that may be consistent with a court’s own policy preferences, but inconsistent with the purpose for which a legislature enacted a provision.

From Stevens’ opinions, a theme complementary to judicial restraint also appears, and that is respect for other branches and levels of government, at least within their proper spheres. For example, Stevens not only has endeavored to give effect to legislative intent in construing statutes but also has deferred to legislative findings that support the constitutionality of enactments in areas as diverse as civil rights legislation (for example, Tennessee v. Lane [2004]), drug laws (for example, Gonzales v. Raich [2005]), and government takings (for example, Kelo v. City of New London [2005]).

Stevens has accorded such deference partly out of respect for the work of another branch of government and partly out of recognition of its superior capabilities in studying problems requiring legislation. This recognition of institutional competence also underlays one of Stevens’ most important opinions for the Court, Chevron v. Natural Resources Defense Council (1984), a charter for the modern administrative state holding that if a congressional statute is silent or ambiguous on a point that an agency administering it has construed, then a court’s role is not to interpret the statute anew but to determine whether the gap-filling interpretation of the agency more familiar with the law was reasonable.

Beyond institutional respect and competence, Stevens has held an expansive view of congressional power under the commerce clause that has led him to vote consistently to uphold social and economic legislation as constitutionally authorized. As much a nationalist as Chief Justice John Marshall, Stevens has forcefully argued that when the Constitution replaced the Articles of Confederation, it also replaced a loose association of autonomous states with a strong central government that could unify the country politically through leaders directly responsible to the people and economically through a commerce power as vast as the reach of the national economy. Stevens’ majority opinions in cases such as U.S. Term Limits v. Thornton (1995) and Raich represent the triumph of this position. The latter also cabined prior Rehnquist Court decisions limiting the commerce power and, as a result, substantially reassured the fount of constitutional authority for federal civil rights laws.

While believing in the supremacy of national power under the Constitution, Stevens nonetheless has treated states, in their respective spheres, as vital partners in the federal system. Thus, in his Michigan v. Long (1983) dissent, Stevens urged his colleagues to refrain from reviewing state court decisions that do not clearly rest on federal law or that appear to provide greater protection of federal rights than the Court might require. To Stevens, those situations do not pose a threat to federal interests warranting Supreme Court intervention but rather present an opportunity, as envisioned by Brandeis in New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann (1932), for states to experiment in democracy by developing state law or expanding federal liberties.

As strong as has been Stevens' commitment to judicial restraint, he also has obeyed an equally strong sense of duty to "say what the law is" as necessary to decide actual cases. Indeed, it is this sense of duty that has driven Stevens to confront and attempt to effectuate constitutional commands as directly as possible, rather than through the filter of judicially created rules that he has felt at best may obscure the reasoning for decisions and at worse may abdicate them.

In support of this mission, Stevens typically has turned to evaluative standards contained in the text of the Constitution itself or, in his view, reflective of its fundamental purposes. For example, Stevens has rejected the Court's three-tiered scheme for reviewing claims under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Reminding his colleagues in Craig v. Boren (1976) that "[t]here is only one equal protection clause," Stevens instead has advocated careful reasoning to determine whether the government has acted consistent with the provision's central point that it "govern impartially." One significant result of such reasoning has been Stevens' approval of racial diversity as a nondispositive factor in university admissions, which made possible the Court's sanction of a law school affirmative action program in Grutter v. Bollinger (2003).

In addition, in adjudicating claims under the due process clause of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, Stevens has premised his decisions on the fundamental belief that the "liberty" protected by those provisions refers to "one of the cardinal unalienable rights" that the Declaration of Independence considered endowed by the Creator and that the Constitution charged judges to fathom and protect through the exercise of independent judgment in individual cases. Stevens' discharge of this duty in three decades of cases has contributed considerably to the development of the substance and scope of "liberty."

Construing that term in Bowers v. Hardwick (1986), Stevens wrote in dissent that the Constitution protects "intimate choices" by persons whether married or unmarried, whether heterosexual or homosexual, an interpretation embraced by the Court in Lawrence v. Texas (2003). Construing provisions of the Bill of Rights enforced against the states as components of "liberty," Stevens has read the Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial to forbid judge-imposed sentences exceeding the statutory maximum possible under facts found by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt (Apprendi v. New Jersey, 2000). This reading led to the invalidation of the United States Sentencing Guidelines in his majority opinion in United States v. Booker (2005) and of capital schemes in which a judge makes the finding of aggravating factors required to impose the death penalty (Ring v. Arizona, 2002). Also in the death penalty area, Stevens voted in Gregg v. Georgia (1976) to uphold the constitutionality of capital punishment. However, by opinion and vote, he has interpreted the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment to ban the execution of juveniles, a position adopted by the Court in Roper v. Simmons (2005); he has construed the same provision to ban the execution of the mentally retarded, first in dissent and later for a majority in Akins v. Virginia (2002).

Although Stevens often has emerged as a champion of liberty, consistent with his approach to judging, his support has been neither unequivocal nor uncritical. Nevertheless, there is one cause with which Stevens has consistently sided—keeping the doors of the courts open to uphold the rule of law for litigants large and small. Consequently, his opinion in Clinton v. Jones (1997) held that the plaintiff had "a right to an orderly disposition of her claims" of sexual harassment against the President that outweighed considerations for a stay until his term expired, and his opinion in Rasul v. Bush (2004) held that alleged terrorism detainees at the Guantánamo Bay Naval Base could challenge the legality of their detention in federal court. Notably, in another terrorism case, Rumsfeld v. Padilla (2004), which the Court dismissed on jurisdictional grounds, Stevens argued in dissent that the lower court could review the challenge of an American citizen, captured on American soil, to his indefinite military detention as an "enemy combatant." Moreover, Stevens argued that review of the executive's justification for such detention was essential, for "if this Nation is to remain true to the ideals symbolized by its flag, it must not wield the tools of tyrants even to resist an assault by the forces of tyranny."

In the end, the public at large may best remember Stevens not for the previous opinions but for the famous last words of his dissent in Bush v. Gore (2000), the case that effectively decided a presidential election by ending a recount of votes under the supervision of state court judges. Believing that the majority, without foundation, had endorsed "the most cynical appraisal" of the fairness of judges throughout the nation, Stevens wrote with profound sadness: "Although we may never know with complete certainty the identity of the winner of this year's Presidential election, the identity of the loser is perfectly clear. It is the Nation's confidence in the judge as an impartial guardian of the rule of law." It is a testament to Stevens' legacy of judging with independence and integrity that such confidence as remains will long outlast his service on the Court.

JOSEPH T. THAI

References and Further Reading

- Manaster, Kenneth A. Illinois Justice: The Scandal of 1969 and the Rise of John Paul Stevens. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001.
- Sickels, Robert Judd. John Paul Stevens and the Constitution: The Search for Balance. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1988.
- Siskel, Ed, “The Business of Reflection,” The University of Chicago Magazine 94 (August 2002): 28–31.
- Stevens, John Paul, The Freedom of Speech, Yale Law Journal 102 (1993): 1293–1313.
- , Judicial Restraint, San Diego Law Review 22 (1985): 437–452.
- . “Mr. Justice Rutledge,” In Mr. Justice, edited by Allison Dunham and Philip B. Kurland, 177–202. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1956.
- , Some Thoughts on Judicial Restraint, Judicature 66 (1982): 177–183.
- , The Bill of Rights: A Century of Progress, University of Chicago Law Review 59 (1992): 13–38.
- , The Shakespeare Canon of Statutory Construction, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 140 (1992): 1373–1387.
- , The Third Branch of Liberty, University of Miami Law Review 41 (1986): 277–293.
- Symposium: A Tribute to Justice Stevens*, Annual Survey of American Law (1992): ix–liv.
- Symposium: Perspectives on Justice John Paul Stevens*, Rutgers Law Journal 27 (1996): 521–661.
- Symposium: The Jurisprudence of Justice Stevens*, Fordham Law Review 74 (2006).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Aktins v. Virginia*, 536 U.S. 304 (2002)
- Apprendi v. New Jersey*, 530 U.S. 466 (2000)
- Bowers v. Hardwick*, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
- Bush v. Gore*, 531 U.S. 98 (2000)
- Chevron v. Natural Resources Defense Council*, 467 U.S. 837 (1984)
- Circuit City v. Adams*, 532 U.S. 105 (2001)
- Clinton v. Jones*, 520 U.S. 681 (1997)
- Craig v. Boren*, 429 U.S. 190 (1976)
- FCC v. Pacifica Foundation*, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)
- Gonzales v. Raich*, 125 S. Ct. 2195 (2005)
- Gregg v. Georgia*, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
- Grutter v. Bollinger*, 539 U.S. 306 (2003)
- Kelo v. City of New London*, 125 S. Ct. 2655 (2005)
- Kyllo v. United States*, 533 U.S. 27 (2001)
- Lawrence v. Texas*, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)
- Michigan v. Long*, 463 U.S. 1032 (1983)
- New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann*, 285 U.S. 262 (1932)
- Rasul v. Bush*, 542 U.S. 466 (2004)
- R.A.V. v. St. Paul*, 505 U.S. 377 (1992)
- Reno v. ACLU*, 521 U.S. 844 (1997)
- Richards v. Wisconsin*, 520 U.S. 385 (1997)
- Ring v. Arizona*, 536 U.S. 584 (2002)
- Roper v. Simmons*, 543 U.S. 551 (2005)
- Rumsfeld v. Padilla*, 542 U.S. 426 (2004)
- Tennessee v. Lane*, 541 U.S. 509 (2004)
- United States v. Booker*, 543 U.S. 220 (2005)
- U.S. Term Limits v. Thornton*, 514 U.S. 779 (1995)
- Young v. American Mini Theatres*, 427 U.S. 50 (1976)

STEWART, POTTER (1915–1985)

Potter Stewart has confounded constitutional scholars who have sought a jurisprudential ideology in his opinions. This may be because he was the quintessential judicial pragmatist during his career (1959–1981) on the U.S. Supreme Court. He deliberately eschewed labels like “liberal” or “conservative” and insisted that he simply be thought of as “a good lawyer who did his best.” He saw his role as a judge as simply applying objective legal reasoning to the questions before him without reference to his own personal values. When he stepped down from the bench after twenty-two years, journalists and legal scholars still could not find a way to pigeon-hole him.

In terms of civil liberties, Stewart’s record is supportive but not in an easily defined manner. He believed strongly in states’ rights, an almost anachronistic position on the Warren Court and only slightly less so in the Burger years. This tied in to his reluctance in expanding the reach of the Bill of Rights to the states through incorporation. Thus he voted against the incorporation of the privilege against self-incrimination in Malloy v. Hogan (1964), against extending the ban on double jeopardy to the states in Benton v. Maryland (1969), and the right to trial by jury in Duncan v. Louisiana (1968). Similarly, his dissenting votes in Escobedo v. Illinois (1964), Miranda v. Arizona (1966), and Gilbert v. California (1967), all of which defined how police practices had to conform to protections in the Bill of Rights, told less about his concern for the individual than about his commitment to the autonomy of state governments in a federal system.

Despite Stewart’s own commitment to the principles of free speech embodied in the First Amendment, he did not want the Supreme Court limiting the authority of the states in enforcing criminal laws that might impinge on speech. The proper method for resolving the tension between a national standard and the autonomy of states, he believed, lay in case-by-case appellate review and not in broad-scale policymaking by the justices.

This commitment to states rights also explains his limited support for voting rights claims in challenges to poll taxes (Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections, 1966), malapportionment (Reynolds v. Sims, 1964), and the practices of southern states in restricting the voting rights of black citizens (Lassiter v. Northampton County Board of Elections, 1959). Although he joined the majority in a unanimous opinion upholding the 1965 Voting Rights Act (South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 1965) and sustained the jurisdiction of federal courts to hear cases under this and the 1964 Civil Rights Act, he did not support giving either the federal courts or the Justice Department broad authority to govern state electoral systems. To Stewart, a state's election procedures, like its criminal law, constituted an inherent part of its sovereignty. While other justices worried about how to prescribe the correct police procedure in detaining and questioning a suspect or how to ensure that the one-person, one-vote applied at all levels of voting, Stewart worried about why the states should be forced to do either.

One should not think that Stewart supported discriminatory practices or blatant violations of the rights of the accused. Although a believer in judicial restraint, Stewart, unlike Felix Frankfurter, was willing to take on tough issues when properly presented to the Court. Only Stewart, along with William O. Douglas, believed that the Court ought to have heard a challenge to the constitutionality of the Vietnam War (Mora v. McNamara, 1967). To Stewart, however, "the law is a careful profession," and good judging, in his view, required that courts should not try "to see around the next corner." Like Louis Brandeis and other advocates of judicial restraint, Stewart believed that the Court should decide only the case before it and not try to erect some great rule to govern in the future. Thus, although he voted with the majority in Furman v. Georgia (1972) against the death penalty as applied because of what he termed its "freakish" imposition, he refused to go along with William Brennan and Thurgood Marshall when they wanted to expand the ruling to hold the death penalty per se unconstitutional.

Stewart once declared that of all the things he had done as both a circuit court judge and a justice of the Supreme Court, he would probably best be remembered for the comment he made in one of the obscenity cases. The Warren Court, eager to expand the protections of the First Amendment, had found itself in a quandary trying to determine how, if at all, obscene writings and speech came under the umbrella of First Amendment protection. Only Hugo Black and William O. Douglas believed in an absolutist interpretation of the speech clause and would have prohibited the government from interfering with any and all speech. Stewart joined the Court the year after it had heard the case of Roth v. United States (1957), in which Justice Brennan laid down the basis for the modern definition of legal obscenity—"whether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest."

After Stewart joined the Court in 1959, the docket became crowded with cases testing just what Roth meant, and the justices constantly split over how to define and apply it. Then in 1964, in Jacobellis v. Ohio, the Court overturned the conviction of an Ohio theatre owner for showing the French film Les Amants (The Lovers). Brennan, for the majority, added a qualifying phrase to his original definition, that for material to be legally obscene it had to be "utterly without social importance."

In a concurrence, Stewart pointed out that the Court's opinions since 1957 had pointed in the direction of a "hard-core only" test for obscenity, and such a test had evaded the Court and would probably continue to do so. He suggested that any definition would be unworkable and that courts had to deal with the matter on a case-by-case basis. He admitted that he could never come up with a workable definition, "but I know it when I see it, and the motion picture involved in this case is not that."

Although Stewart later complained that people only remembered his "I know it when I see it" test, in fact he had put his finger directly on the central problem of the obscenity issue. He knew what offended him, and this picture did not. Obscenity, like beauty, is in the eye of the beholder, and in an open, tolerant, and pluralistic society, an enormous range of opinion exists over sexually oriented material. Stewart would have preferred leaving this matter to local courts, but the majority of the brethren continued to seek, in vain, a workable general rule. Finally, in Miller v. California (1973), the Court made its last stab at a rule and then in essence washed its hands of the issue, leaving it, as Stewart had suggested, for the lower courts to handle on case-by-case basis.

Perhaps Stewart's greatest contribution to civil liberties came in relation to the press clause, by providing a rationale for why democracy needed a free press. Justice Brandeis, in Whitney v. California (1927), had tied the meaning of the speech clause to the obligation of the citizenry to be well informed on a variety of public issues so they could act intelligently. When it came to the press clause, however, no one could figure out how to explain and then apply the phrase. Did a "free press" merely mean free speech in written form? Did members of the press enjoy any different or greater protections under the First Amendment than did ordinary citizens?

Stewart has been the only justice to attempt to explicate a special constitutional role for the press. He saw the press as serving a structural role in society, helping to expose corruption, and thus keeping the political process honest. In a lecture he explained that:

The Free Press guarantee is, in essence, a structural provision of the Constitution. Most of the other provisions in the Bill of Rights protect specific liberties or specific rights of individuals In contrast, the free press clause extends protection to an institution.

Although this “institutional” or “structural” view has never been accepted by a majority of the Court, it has played an implicit role in a number of decisions. It is at the basis of the decision in Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia (1980), in which the Court found that reporters had a right of access to trials so that they could serve as surrogates of the people in witnessing whether the criminal justice system worked fairly. Stewart did not join the plurality opinion, because in his opinion Chief Justice Burger tried to frame the issue too narrowly and did not give enough weight to the institutional meaning of the press clause. Justice Douglas, in his dissent in Branzburg v. Hayes (1972), also relied on the notion that the press served an institutional role in guaranteeing to people their right to know about important public matters.

Unlike Douglas, Black, or Frankfurter—all of whom served with him during his tenure—Stewart did not leave behind a legacy of a specific jurisprudential ideology. Rather he stood for the common law tradition of flexibility and pragmatism, and although a supporter of civil liberties, did not believe in big rules, such as Miranda, to enforce those rights. Rather, they had to be explicated from the facts and in an evolutionary manner.

Such an approach is extremely lawyer-like, the role Stewart himself preferred, but although it may make the resolution of individual cases easier, it does not provide the guidance that the Supreme Court is supposed to give to state and lower federal courts, a task that rules like Miranda perform well. If the high court takes too narrow an approach, refusing to look beyond the confines of the case before it, it breeds unpredictability in the law. Stewart may not have been too bothered by this, preferring some unpredictability that could be cleared up in the next case to efforts by the Court to determine large policies. For him, judicial restraint meant just that, and he accepted the view well aware of the assets as well as the liabilities it involved.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Binion, Gayle, Justice Potter Stewart on Racial Equality: What It Means to Be a Moderate, Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 6 (1979): 853.
 Borgerson, Ellen, On the Power of Balance: A Remembrance of Justice Potter Stewart, Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 13 (1986): 173.
 Stewart, Potter, Or of the Press, Hastings Law Journal 26 (1975): 631.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Benton v. Maryland*, 395 U.S. 784 (1969)
Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972)
Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968)
Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964)
Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263 (1967)
Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections, 383 U.S. 663 (1966)
Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184 (1964)
Lassiter v. Northampton County Board of Elections, 360 U.S. 45 (1959)
Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964)
Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
Mora v. McNamara, 389 U.S. 934 (1967)
Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964)
Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)
Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)
South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301 (1966)
Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)

STONE COURT (1941–1946)

The Stone Court is often thought to have laid the groundwork in the areas of civil liberties and civil rights for many of the decisions of the Warren Court. Its most significant area of contribution is likely in the realm of individual rights, particularly in cases unrelated to World War II. The individual rights cases of the Stone Court can be divided into those relating to the war and those that were not.

Those religious groups outside the mainstream benefited more from the Court's decisions in the civil liberties area. More often than not the court ruled in favor of free exercise claims, with West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943) as the most prominent of these. In Barnette, the Court overturned a case decided three years earlier and ruled Jehovah Witnesses could not be required to salute the American flag. In 1940, the Court had ruled, on the basis of free exercise grounds, that the statute requiring the flag salute was constitutional, and in Barnette the Court ruled, based on free speech grounds, that students could not be compelled to salute the flag.

Several cases came before the Court involving license taxes (imposed on those distributing or selling) that Witnesses were forced to pay. In Jones v. Opelika, 316 U.S. 584 (1942) and two companion cases, a five-to-four Court had upheld such a tax because it was imposed on all groups, thus being nondiscriminatory. One year later, and with James Byrnes replacing Justice Wiley Rutledge, the Court heard Jones v. Opelika, 319 U.S. 103 (1943) (known as Jones II) and companion cases and this time struck down the license taxes because religious freedom occupies a “preferred position.” That literature was being sold rather than distributed free did not make the evangelism a commercial enterprise.

In two cases similar to each other—Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946) and Tucker v. Texas, 326 U.S. 517 (1946)—the Court ruled that criminal penalties could not be imposed for distributing religious literature in a company town or a village owned by the federal government providing housing for those employed in the defense industry.

The Stone Court was not as protective of speech/expression/picketing rights as it was of free exercise. A majority did not view picketing, as such, as a fully protected constitutional right. In Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942), the Court unanimously upheld a New Hampshire statute prohibiting offensive language from being directed at persons in a public place. In this case it affirmed the conviction of a man who created a public disturbance by a confrontational speech that denounced all religions as rackets and, when threatened with arrest by police, called an officer a “God-damned racketeer” as well as a “damned Fascist.” In Bakery and Pastry Drivers Local v. Wohl, 315 U.S. 769 (1942), the Court struck down an injunction issued by a New York State Court preventing picketing at the site of their employment, but in Carpenters’ and Joiners’ Union v. Ritter’s Café, 315 U.S. 722 (1942), it upheld a Texas state court injunction prohibiting union members from picketing at sites other than the site of the labor dispute. In 1945, the Court ruled in Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516 (1945), that labor-organizing activities could not be subjected to a requirement to obtain a permit to conduct such activities. The Court held that the permit system was an invalid interference with the First Amendment’s free speech and assembly provisions.

In companion cases before the Court in 1941, the Court reversed contempt citations arising from a labor dispute in California. The Court held a Los Angeles Times editorial siding with unions did not present a “clear and present danger,” and a letter to the secretary of labor threatening a strike if a state court decision came down adverse to a union was allowable there being no state law against commenting on pending cases.

The Stone Court had a somewhat mixed record in the area of the rights of the accused. Perhaps best known is Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 769 (1942), in which the Court refused to find that the Constitution’s Sixth Amendment guarantee of counsel applied to the state courts. This ruling was overturned by the Warren Court in Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963). The Court moved toward shortening the period of time prisoners can be held by law enforcement before they appear in court in McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943). There they set aside convictions obtained with statements made by prisoners who had not been promptly taken before a judge, thus denying them their Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial.

Perhaps the most successful method of preventing blacks from voting in the first part of the twentieth century was “white primaries.” In Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944), the Court declared even though political parties are voluntary organizations, they conduct primary elections under state statutory authority and because of this, denying blacks the right to vote in primaries denied them of rights guaranteed by the Fifteenth Amendment.

Oklahoma’s Criminal Sterilization Act allowed the state to sterilize persons who had been convicted three or more times of certain felonies. The Court held in Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942), that because not all felonies were included in this act, there was a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment’s equal protection clause, thus the statute was unconstitutional.

World War II was the catalyst for several cases on the Stone Court’s docket including a couple of the more notorious decisions in the history of the Supreme Court. In 1942, President Franklin D. Roosevelt established a military commission to try eight German saboteurs who had been captured in the United States. While on trial, some of those accused sought leave to file petitions for habeas corpus. The Court—in Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1942)—rejected the petition and later in its opinion held that the prisoners had a right to judicial review, that a military trial was justified, and that they were not entitled to a grand jury or a trial by jury. The Court again upheld the use of a military commission in In re Yamashita, 327 U.S. 1 (1946). The issue making Yamashita slightly different than Quirin was that in this instance the Court upheld the use of a military commission after the war had ended.

The dark days of the Stone Court and civil liberties came as a result of executive orders issued by the president allowing Japanese Americans, for the sake of national security, to be relocated away from “military areas,” as well as subjected to a curfew. In Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81 (1943) and Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944) the Court upheld the constitutionality of these executive orders. In Hirabayashi it dodged the relocation issue and focused on the curfew, which it viewed as a necessary “protective measure.” However, in Korematsu, the Court did not avoid the relocation issue and held that in time of emergency and peril that relocation, although constitutionally suspect, is justified.

Although the Stone Court advanced the causes of several discrete and insular minorities, it will also forever be remembered as the Court that handed down the decisions that adversely affected the condition of Japanese-American citizens.

J. MARK ALCORN

References and Further Reading

Abraham, Henry. Justices, Presidents, and Senators: A History of the U.S. Supreme Court, Appointments from Washington to Clinton. 4th ed. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield Publishers, 1999.

Mason, Alpheus Thomas. Harlan Fiske Stone: Pillar of the Law. New York: Viking Press, 1956.

Renstrom, Peter G. The Stone Court: Justices, Rulings, and Legacy. Santa Barbara, Calif.: ABC-CLIO, 2001.

STONE v. GRAHAM, 449 U.S. 39 (1980)

A 1978 Kentucky statute required that the state superintendent of education (who at the time was James B. Graham) “ensure that a durable, permanent copy of the Ten Commandments shall be displayed on a wall in each public elementary and secondary school classroom in the Commonwealth. The copy shall be sixteen (16) inches wide by twenty (20) inches high.” The law also provided that “in small print below the last commandment shall appear a notation concerning the purpose of the display, as follows: ‘The secular application of the Ten Commandments is clearly seen in its adoption as the fundamental legal code of Western Civilization and the Common Law of the United States.’” The law further required that these copies of the Ten Commandments be “purchased with funds made available through voluntary contributions made to the state treasurer for the purposes of this Act.”

Sydell Stone, a citizen opposed to the mixing of church and state, sued to enjoin the state from posting the Commandments. A trial court in Kentucky found that there was a “secular” purpose in the act and upheld its constitutionality. On appeal the Kentucky Supreme Court was evenly divided, and thus the lower court decision upholding the monument remained undisturbed. Stone then appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. Without hearing arguments in the case, and through a per curiam decision, the Court summarily reversed the initial finding that the displays were constitutional. Chief Justice Warren Burger, along with Justices Harry Blackmun and Potter Stewart dissented, declaring that the case merited a full hearing by the Court. Justice William Rehnquist wrote a long dissent, essentially setting out why such a display did not violate the First Amendment. He also objected because of the lack of deference to the state, to what he called “the cavalier summary reversal, without benefit of oral argument or briefs on the merits, of the highest court of Kentucky.”

The per curiam decision was based on the establishment clause test set out in Lemon v. Kurtzman (the Lemon test). That test had three prongs: “First, the statute must have a secular legislative purpose; second, its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion . . . finally the statute must not foster ‘an excessive government entanglement with religion.’” If a statute or action of a state violated any one of these prongs, it would be unconstitutional. The Court concluded that the Kentucky law “requiring the posting of the Ten Commandments in public schoolrooms had no secular legislative purpose, and is therefore unconstitutional.” Because it reached this conclusion, the Court did not consider whether the law also violated the second and third prongs. Clearly, the Court might have struck down the Kentucky law, and its implementation, on both of the other prongs as well. The law advanced religion because it required the placement of a religious text in public schools. Because the state used the traditional Protestant ordering of the Ten Commandments, with a King James Bible translation, Kentucky in effect was entangled in the religious disputes over how to translate the Bible and whether to endorse the traditional Protestant, the Catholic, the Lutheran, the Orthodox, or Jewish versions of the Ten Commandments. By choosing the King James Bible, the state rejected numerous other Protestant translations, as well as the Catholic and Jewish translations.

The Court rejected Kentucky’s “avowed” assertion that the displays had a secular purpose. The Court noted that “The pre-eminent purpose for posting the Ten Commandments on schoolroom walls is plainly religious in nature. The Ten Commandments are undeniably a sacred text in the Jewish and Christian faiths, and no legislative recitation of a supposed secular purpose can blind us to that fact.” The Court further observed that although some of the commandments were secular, such as the prohibition on stealing, others involved “the religious duties of believers: worshipping the Lord God alone, avoiding idolatry, not using the Lord’s name in vain, and observing the Sabbath Day.” The Court pointed out that it would be constitutionally permissible to teach about the Ten Commandments, as part of a course on religion or history, but that the mere posting of them could not be seen as educational. Rather, it was religious. In reaching this decision the Court also cited the school prayer and Bible reading cases, Engle v. Vitale (1962) and Abington v. Schemp (1963), noting that the Bible could be taught as a text but not read for religious purposes.

Stone remained good law for the next twenty-five years. Although the Court narrowly upheld the right of Texas to maintain a Ten Commandments monument in Van Orden v. Perry (2005), this decision did not undermine Stone, because the circumstances of Van Orden were distinctly different. Indeed, on the same day it upheld the Texas monument, the Court, in McCreary County, Ky. v. ACLU of Kentucky (2005), struck down another Kentucky law that required the posting of the Ten Commandments in state courthouses.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

Finkelman, Paul, The Ten Commandments on the Court-house Lawn and Elsewhere, Fordham Law Review 73 (2005): 1477.

Green, Steven K., The Fount of Everything Just and Right? The Ten Commandments as a Source of American Law, Journal of Law and Religion 14 (1999–2000): 525.

STONE, HARLAN FISKE (1872–1946)

Lawyer, law professor and dean, associate, and then chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, Harlan Fiske Stone provided one of the key jurisprudential underpinnings that lie beneath modern civil liberties and civil rights law. Although normally considered a liberal, Stone's record in civil liberties is mixed.

After graduation from Columbia Law School in 1899, Stone went into private practice in New York but returned to teach at Columbia and serve as dean in 1910. By all reports, an outstanding teacher and a competent administrator, Stone clashed constantly with the university's autocratic president, Nicholas Murray Butler. In 1923, fed up with the battle, Stone returned briefly to private practice. The next year, however, his college friend, President Calvin Coolidge, asked him to become attorney general and to clean up the mess left by the Harding scandals, especially the problems at Justice created by Harry M. Daugherty. Stone succeeded so well in cleaning up the Justice Department and getting rid of Daugherty's cronies that some Democrats believed his appointment in 1925 to the Supreme Court was sparked by the Republican party's desire to have him "kicked upstairs."

Stone joined a bench headed by William Howard Taft, who believed in "massing the Court" and presenting a unified judicial front by discouraging dissenting or concurring opinions. Stone initially followed Taft's lead, and critics quickly labeled him as a "safe Republican" and a cipher for Taft. But Stone, a moderate Republican, soon found the conservatism of the chief justice and the "Four Horsemen" (Pierce Butler, James McReynolds, George Sutherland, and Willis Van Devanter) too much, and he began to vote more and more with the Court's two liberals, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., and Louis D. Brandeis. In the 1920s, although he often voted in dissent with them, Stone rarely wrote the opinions. By the mid-1930s, however, with Holmes gone and Brandeis in decline, Stone found his voice. Although he privately opposed many of the New Deal measures, he believed in judicial restraint and wanted the courts to leave policy making to the elected branches. Stone was loathe to strike down a state or federal regulatory measure, but if the legislatures impinged on civil liberties, Stone thought the courts had a special obligation to protect citizen rights under the Constitution.

After the court-packing crisis of 1937, judicial opposition to the New Deal collapsed, and within a few years Franklin Roosevelt had made enough appointments to the bench so that one could talk about a "Roosevelt Court." Around this time, the Court's agenda changed. The economic regulation and property rights issues that had dominated the Court's docket for a half-century gave way to questions of civil liberties which, it turned out, would prove even more divisive than had economic matters. Although the Roosevelt Court shared the view that in matters of economic regulation the judges should be restrained and defer to the elected bodies, issues such as freedom of expression, separation of church and state, and racial justice proved very hard to resolve.

In examining Stone's civil liberties record by the late 1930s, one would have found him consistently voting for greater constitutional protection of free speech and press, but he had not, as yet, written any opinion or dissent in which he spelled out his views on these matters. The turning point came in an otherwise inconsequential case, United States v. Carolene Products Co. (1938). The case involved a federal law prohibiting the interstate shipment of "filled milk," that is, skimmed milk mixed with animal fats. Stone, writing for the Court, sustained the statute, but then in a footnote—often called the most famous footnote in all Supreme Court history—he announced that although economic regulations of the sort at issue in the case would be subjected to a fairly low level of constitutional review, statutes dealing with civil liberties and racial issues would be subject to a far more searching examination by the Court. In other words, there would be a double standard: low level (or "rational basis") for economic matters, and a higher level ("strict scrutiny") for matters touching on individual rights. The footnote encapsulated the economic self-restraint that had been identified with Holmes, Brandeis, and Stone and pointed the way toward the great civil rights and civil liberties opinions of the 1950s and 1960s.

Some commentators believe that the Carolene Products decision, and not the Court's reversal in West Coast Hotel v. Parrish (1937), marks the great watershed between the "old" and the "new" jurisprudence. Stone himself wrote two opinions, one for the Court and the other a dissent, which epitomized the new jurisprudence. In United States v. Darby Lumber Company (1941), Stone dismissed a challenge to the 1938 Fair Labor Standards Act and essentially said that under the powers of the commerce clause, Congress had a wide range of discretion in which to act and that the courts would not second-guess legislative policy. The year before, Stone penned a dissent in the first flag salute case, Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940) that, although practically overlooked at the time, proved a harbinger of the new jurisprudence.

In an eight-to-one decision written by Felix Frankfurter, the Court upheld a Pennsylvania law requiring the compulsory salute of the American flag at the beginning of each school day. Jehovah's Witnesses had objected, claiming that the salute violated their free exercise of religion in that it forced them to symbolically "bow down to an idol" in defiance of God's command. Stone was the only dissenter, and he finished his opinion late (Douglas later said that he and Black would have voted with Stone if they had had the time to see his opinion). In his dissent Stone wrote: "The guaranties of civil liberty are but guaranties of freedom of the human mind and spirit and of reasonable freedom and opportunity to express them If these guaranties are to have any meaning they must, I think, be deemed to withhold from the state any authority to compel belief or the expression of it where that expression violates religious conviction, whatever may be the legislative view of the desirability of such compulsion."

Stone's argument, as well as the increase in attacks on Jehovah's Witnesses as "unpatriotic," led the Court to take on more Witness cases. In Jones v. City of Opelika (1942), the Witnesses lost a case challenging the constitutionality of a city license on their door-to-door proselytizing, but the vote was five to four. Not only did Stone dissent, but in a separate dissent Douglas, Black, and Frank Murphy announced that they believed their vote in Gobitis had been wrong. The following year the flag salute issue came back before the Court, and this time Stone's dissenting view in Gobitis became the six-to-three majority view in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943). Stone, who by then had been named by Roosevelt to succeed Charles Evans Hughes as chief justice, graciously allowed Robert Jackson to write the opinion, but Jackson's wording, although more eloquent than that of Stone, nonetheless closely followed Stone's reasoning in Gobitis.

Stone's tenure as chief justice proved an unhappy period in his life as he tried to manage an increasingly fractious court. Even if the country had not been at war, the differing views and strong personalities of men like Frankfurter, Douglas, Black, and Jackson would have made it difficult to keep peace within the Court. The war not only exacerbated the problems but brought to the bench cases that in other times might well have been decided differently, especially the Japanese internment cases, in which the Roosevelt administration took 700,000 persons of Japanese ancestry—many of them native-born American citizens—from the West Coast and put them in inland concentration camps. The Court heard three cases on the matter, and in all of them Stone, despite his insistence in Footnote Four about the Court protecting "discrete and insular minorities," backed the government program.

The first case to reach the Court, Hirabayashi v. United States (1943), tested the government's curfew orders directed solely against those of Japanese descent. Stone strongly backed the government and used his influence to try to mass the Court in its behalf. He used the notion of judicial restraint to argue that in wartime the Court had no business second-guessing the civilian and military authorities responsible for the program. With Frankfurter and Black pressuring the brethren, Stone managed to get a unanimous Court to approve the curfew, but there were three concurring opinions, by Douglas, Murphy, and Wiley Rutledge, indicating that it would be harder to get unanimity in the next case.

The second case dealt not with the curfew but with the actual relocation. In Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944), Stone proved unable to get unanimity and found that some of his brethren were taking the lesson of Carolene Products far more seriously than its author. Stone assigned the opinion to Black, who like Stone and Frankfurter would not question the military in wartime, but despite their best efforts to achieve unanimity, three justices dissented, Roberts, Murphy, and Jackson.

The relocation cases have been considered a disaster and an embarrassment for the Court ever since and have done a great deal to tarnish Stone's reputation as a civil libertarian. The third case, Ex parte Endo (1944), unanimously held that a citizen whose loyalty had been proven could not be kept incarcerated. By then the tide of war had significantly changed, nonetheless Stone sat on release of the opinion until after the 1944 election so as not to embarrass the president.

Stone showed similar deference to the government in a series of denaturalization cases in which the government tried to strip citizenship from naturalized citizens whom it considered disloyal. In most of these cases, Stone wound up on the losing side, as in Schneiderman v. United States (1943). The majority held that as a naturalized citizen Schneiderman enjoyed all the rights of citizenship and could not be punished for unpopular views. Stone's dissent sounded very strange coming from the man who had been the sole dissenter in the Gobitis case, for now he said that constitutional rights could be restricted when the government deemed it necessary. Even in the effort to deport West Coast labor leader Harry Bridges (Bridges v. Wixon [1945]), Stone conceded that Congress had attempted to do a "rotten thing," but nonetheless in his dissent held that it had the power to do so.

After the capture of the eight Nazi saboteurs, the president ordered a military tribunal to try them in secret. At first the Court planned not to interfere, but Justices Roberts and Black, after meeting with the defendants appointed counsel, decided that the Court, in the name of the rule of law, had to at least hear the case. It was immediately apparent that all nine of the justices would vote to uphold the military tribunal, but they could not agree on a common reasoning. In Ex parte Quirin (1942), the Court handed down its decision within a few days of hearing oral argument; Stone's written opinion did not come down until four months later. In it he essentially denied any protection of the Constitution to enemy combatants and gave the president broad authority to decide when military tribunals should be established and who should be tried there.

In sum, Harlan Stone's record on civil liberties remains mixed. His Footnote Four provided the basis by which later courts would be able to expand judicial protection of civil liberties and civil rights, yet except for his defense of the Jehovah's Witnesses, Stone himself seems to have ignored the explicit promise of that statement.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

Dunham, Allison. "Mr. Chief Justice Stone." In Mr. Justice, edited by Allison Dunham and Philip B. Kurland, 1964.

Irons, Peter. Justice at War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

Mason, Alpheus T. Harlan Fiske Stone: Pillar of the Law. New York: Viking, 1956.

Pritchett, C. Herman. The Roosevelt Court: A Study in Judicial Politics and Values, 1937–1947. New York: Macmillan, 1948.

Urofsky, Melvin I. Division and Discord: The Supreme Court under Stone and Vinson, 1941–1945. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U.S. 135 (1945)

Ex Parte, Endo, 323 U.S. 283 (1944)

Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81 (1943)

Jones v. City of Opelika, 316 U.S. 584 (1942)

Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944)

Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)

Quirin, ex parte, 317 U.S. 1 (1942)

Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U.S. 119 (1943)

United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938)

United States v. Darby Lumber Company, 312 U.S. 100 (1941)

West Coast Hotel v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379 (1937)

West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

STONEWALL RIOT

In the early hours of Saturday June 28, 1969, New York City Police officers conducted a raid on the Stonewall Inn, a gay bar in the Greenwich Village area of the city. After emptying the club and placing some people under arrest, the patrons of the club began to physically resist the police. Violence ensued and the Tactical Patrol Force, New York's riot control squad, had to be called out to bring the crowd under control. The violent reaction of the crowd was viewed as being unprecedented for gays at the time and is credited as marking the beginning of a more radical gay-lesbian rights movement.

The gay-lesbian rights movement in the United States did not start with the Stonewall riot. In 1924, Henry Gerber launched the Society for Human Rights, although the society was shut down within the year. In 1950, a group of gay men formed the Mattachine Society. Initially they argued for political protest if society failed to recognize homosexuals as a distinct group and respect their rights. However, this approach proved to be too radical for the time, and the group quickly became more concerned with homosexuals assimilating within society and conforming to prevailing social norms. In 1955, a lesbian equivalent, the Daughters of Bilitis, was formed. Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, these groups maintained a low public profile with few public protests principally against rules preventing the federal government from employing homosexuals, although these protests were muted and centered on showing that homosexuals could be otherwise respectable members of society. In the 1960s, a number of smaller more radical homosexual rights groups formed, encouraged by the approaches of the anti-Vietnam War and civil rights movements, although they were disparate and relatively ineffective.

Homosexuality was taboo in New York in the 1960s; in addition to sodomy laws, state laws prevented licensed premises serving alcohol to homosexuals and prohibited individuals from wearing nongender-appropriate clothing in public. Despite this, there were a number of gay bars and clubs operating in the city. Many operated as private clubs whose members were supposed to bring their own alcohol, and the Stonewall Inn was one such unlicensed business. It is alleged that the Stonewall Inn was one of many run by the Mafia with bribes paid to local police to allow its continued operation.

On Friday June 27, 1969, Judy Garland's funeral was held in New York City. More than 20,000 people waited to view the body of the iconic actress, who was particularly popular with the homosexual community. It was later that night police began the raid of the Stonewall Inn. Raids were not uncommon in such bars across the city and the United States; however, the violent reaction of homosexuals to the police action that night was viewed as being unprecedented. A crowd of approximately 400 patrons and passers-by formed outside of the Stone Inn during the raid. When some of the arrested patrons attempted to resist the police, the crowd began to throw objects, and the eight officers on the raid were forced to take refuge within the club and call for back up. It took a few hours to restore order to the streets outside of the Stonewall Inn.

Crowds gathered outside of the Stonewall Inn the following night and again clashed violently with police, as well as engaging in open displays of gay pride. They called for a change to the laws and society sentiments that left gay bars on the fringes of society, run by the Mafia, having to bribe police, and subject to raids. Protests continued until the following Wednesday, although only on the last night did the protests turn into violent confrontations once more.

The Stonewall riots had a great impact on the development of gay and lesbian rights in the United States. They did not end police raids of gay bars or bring about any changes to the laws affecting homosexuals. They did, however, mark the ascendance of the idea of gay pride, that homosexuality was not something to be ashamed of, and that society should recognize the rights of homosexuals. This found its expression in the creation of a number of new, more radical, groups, particularly the Gay Liberation Front, who were visible, vocal, and distinctive in their protests for greater recognition of gay and lesbian rights, including annual parades in New York to commemorate the riots. The symbolic resistance in the riots inspired gays in the United States and abroad to actively and openly campaign for gay and lesbian rights.

GAVIN J. REDDICK

References and Further Reading

D'Emilio, John. Sexual Politics, Sexual Communities: The Making of a Homosexual Minority in the United States, 1940–1970. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
Duberman, Martin. Stonewall. New York: Penguin, 1993.

See also American Civil Liberties Union; Antidiscrimination Laws; Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986); Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000); Don't Ask, Don't Tell Exec. Order 107 Stat. 1670, Section 571 (1993); Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557 (1995); Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund; Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003); National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996)

STOP AND FRISK

In the Constitution, the provision limiting the power of police to search and arrest persons is the Fourth Amendment. Basically, the Fourth Amendment prohibits police conduct that is “unreasonable.” However, the Fourth Amendment, by its terms, applies only to “searches” and “seizures.” If police engage in an activity that does not rise to the level of a “search” or “seizure,” the Fourth Amendment does not apply, and police are free (at least from Fourth Amendment strictures) to pursue that activity. The question arises, does the term search include only full-blown, complete searches of a person, or does it also cover situations where police just do a frisk to check for weapons?

A counterpart to this question arises for seizures. Clearly seizure of a person occurs when police make a formal custodial arrest, but is it also a seizure when police just stop a person in public and detain the person for several minutes for questioning? The legitimacy of police using a “stop and frisk” technique was the issue for the Supreme Court in 1968 in Terry v. Ohio.

In the Terry decision, the Supreme Court established a new category of police activity for intrusions that were less than a full search or arrest but still were covered by the Fourth Amendment. Because the intrusion was less, the activities were authorized by a lower level of grounds than the usual probable cause required for a full search or arrest. The new categories recognized in Terry became a significant exception to traditional Fourth Amendment doctrine, which required probable cause before police could act. The Supreme Court used a balancing analysis to establish these new types of activity and to set the grounds to justify them, balancing the government's need to search or seize against the invasion to the individual. Overall, setting up these new categories has been useful to give police more flexibility in dealing with rapidly unfolding confrontations on the street.

STOP AND FRISK

In Terry, the Court held that police might do a limited seizure of a person if it is justified by reasonable suspicion to believe criminal activity is afoot. Similarly, police may do a limited search of a person (a frisk or pat-down) if it is justified by reason to believe the defendant is armed and dangerous. These more limited intrusions required less ground to justify them. This decision, which created these new categories of police activity, can be usefully represented by the following diagram.

Continuum of Intrusiveness of Police Conduct

Since Terry was decided in 1968, the courts have been fleshing out the contours of stop-and-frisk law.

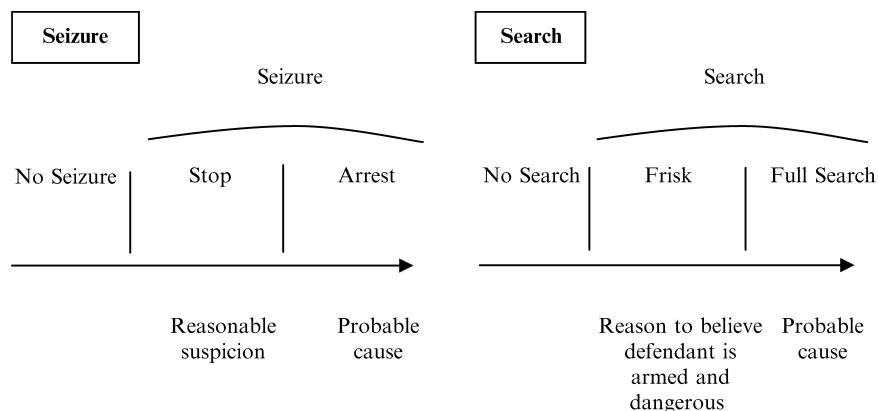

Stops

A stop is an encounter between police and a person that does not amount to an arrest but is intrusive enough to qualify as a seizure and so be subject to Fourth Amendment requirements. Courts have defined stops as beginning when police approach a person and the interaction is such that a reasonable person would not feel free to leave. A stop generally requires some physical force or show of authority by police. For example, a stop can be said to occur if police “blue-light” a car or use their sirens; flash their badges; brandish weapons; or grab a person’s arm and hold on. A variation of this reasonable-person-would-feel-free-to-leave test applies if the police confront a person in a confined area like the passenger seating of a bus or an airplane. Because a seated passenger cannot be said to feel free to leave, the test is whether a reasonable person would feel free to decline the officer’s requests or otherwise terminate the encounter. So if a person is seated on a bus and the police enter the bus and ask for permission to search the person’s luggage, the encounter qualifies as a stop only if a reasonable person would not feel free to decline the officer’s request.

Assuming the police encounter with a person rises to the level of a stop, police must justify the activity, that is, they must have adequate grounds or reasons for the stop. The grounds required for a stop have been defined by the Supreme Court as an articulable suspicion that criminal activity is afoot; more recently the Court refers to this standard as “reasonable suspicion.” Cases indicate that this level of suspicion is “considerably less” than 50 percent certainty and is also less than the standard of probable cause, which is required for an arrest. The Court has declined to set any more specific contours for the level of certainty required by “reasonable suspicion.”

To determine whether reasonable suspicion exists, courts have indicated police should look to all the circumstances. The fact that some factors are innocent in themselves does not mean that those factors must be excluded. So, for example, if a couple flies from Chicago to Florida and turns right around and drives home the next day, this factor can be used as supporting reasonable suspicion that crime is occurring; it need not be excluded from the analysis because it is innocent on its face. Courts have often said that the question of whether reasonable suspicion exists is a common sense judgment not dependent on technicalities or formalities. Law enforcement officers are entitled to use their expertise in calculating whether reasonable suspicion exists. For example, if police find a brick-shaped package wrapped in cellophane and duct tape, based on their street experience police may conclude that the package contains illegal drugs. In Illinois v. Wardlow, the Supreme Court held that officers had reasonable suspicion where they were in a high-crime neighborhood and a person took off in unprovoked flight after seeing them. One controversial line of cases established what grounds were adequate for the police to stop persons in airports based on suspicion they were drug couriers. The Court held that police established reasonable suspicion to allow them to stop the defendant by showing that (1) the defendant paid $2,100 for two airplane tickets from a roll of $20 bills; (2) he traveled under a name that did not match the name under which his telephone was listed; (3) his original destination was Miami, a source city of illicit drugs; (4) he stayed in Miami for only forty-eight hours, even though a round-trip flight from Honolulu to Miami takes twenty hours; (5) he appeared nervous during his trip; and (6) he checked no luggage.

Assuming the encounter rises to the level of a stop and police have adequate grounds (reasonable suspicion) to make the stop, what are the police allowed to do? The content of a stop usually involves police briefly questioning the person about his immediate activities or requesting to see some identification or a license. During stops in airports, police often ask to see the person's ticket.

The stop ends when police let the person go or when the encounter escalates into the more serious type of seizure, an arrest. To define whether a stop has escalated into an arrest, courts have identified several factors. One is the length of time of the stop. Generally stops should be brief, within the twenty-minute range, although courts have steered clear of bright line time limits and have avoided "rigid criteria" in favor of focusing on ordinary human behavior and common sense. Another factor is whether the police moved the person from one location to another. If the police move the defendant, for example, from an airport concourse to a small room, this supports the conclusion that the stop has escalated into an arrest. If the police tell the defendant he is under arrest, again this supports the idea that the stop has become an arrest. (The rationale here is not that police are in charge of characterizing whether the encounter is a stop or an arrest but rather that the impact on the defendant of a police assertion that he is under arrest escalates the encounter from the defendant's point of view.) Other factors courts have identified include whether the defendant is handcuffed, whether the defendant is moved to an isolated or unfamiliar environment, and whether police are diligent in pursuing investigation during the time the person is detained.

If the encounter does not qualify as a stop (and the Supreme Court has made clear that there can be interactions between citizens and police that do not amount to a stop), then the Fourth Amendment does not apply, and police are free to pursue that activity without explanation. If the encounter does rise to the level of a stop, police must justify the activity by showing reasonable suspicion that crime was occurring. If the encounter escalates from a stop to an arrest, the police face a higher burden to justify the activity, that of probable cause.

On the other hand, if the encounter rises to the level of a stop and police cannot demonstrate reasonable suspicion, or the encounter rises to the level of an arrest and the police cannot demonstrate probable cause, Fourth Amendment law is that any evidence that is a product of the encounter cannot be used against the defendant. For example, assume the police pull over a car by using their lights and siren (a stop). Approaching the driver, the police smell marijuana in the car and see an envelope on the floor labeled "weed." The police now have probable cause to search the car for drugs. When they search it and find drugs, the defendant is arrested for possession. However, if the police cannot justify the initial stop of the car by showing reasonable suspicion to believe crime was occurring, the drugs cannot be used against the defendant, because the police violated the Fourth Amendment. This "exclusionary rule" is designed to deter police from violating the Fourth Amendment by removing any reward that might flow from a violation.

The Court has extended the same analysis that applies to seizures of persons to apply to seizures of things. So, if police take a person's baggage in an airport, for example, to expose it to drug-sniffing dogs, the Court will look to whether the seizure of the luggage was brief and nonintrusive enough to qualify as a stop of the luggage or whether the seizure of the baggage was more extensive and commensurate with the type of seizure known as an arrest.

Frisks

A frisk, also known as a pat-down, occurs when police pat the outside of a person's clothing. The point of a frisk is to check for weapons, and weapons only. If police frisk a person and feel an object in a pocket that feels like drugs, police may not look in the pocket or take the package. In contrast, if the police feel an object like a knife or a gun, they may take it.

STOP AND FRISK

The grounds required before police can frisk a person is reason to believe the person is armed and dangerous. This standard differs from probable cause in two ways. First, in quantity, this level of certainty is less than probable cause. The theory is that because a frisk is less intrusive than a full search, it can be justified on lesser grounds than those required for a full search. Second, in quality, the grounds for a frisk (reason to believe the defendant is armed and dangerous) is also more limited in focus than probable cause. Probable cause to search allows police to search for any type of evidence of crime, including weapons. In contrast, as noted previously, the grounds for a frisk allow police only to look for weapons.

To establish the grounds to believe a person is armed and dangerous, police may rely on reasonable inferences. For example, in the Terry case, the Court held that reason to believe the defendants were armed and dangerous was established because police thought the defendants were walking back and forth, casing a store to set up a robbery. The time was 2:30 in the afternoon. A daylight robbery of a store carries with it a risk that the store clerk will be present and a confrontation will ensue, so grounds to fear a daylight robbery give rise to a reasonable inference that the defendant is armed and dangerous.

Based on reason to believe the defendant is armed and dangerous, police cannot go further than a frisk, in other words, a brief patdown of the person's outer clothing. Based on those grounds, for example, the police cannot justify reading the documents in a person's briefcase. In one case, the Court found police conduct to be unconstitutional as exceeding the scope of a permissible frisk when the officers, feeling a small lump in the defendant's front pocket, determined the lump was crack by squeezing, sliding, and otherwise manipulating the outside of the defendant's pocket even after it was clear there was no weapon in the pocket. The Court held that the police conduct overstepped the bounds of the strictly circumscribed search for weapons allowed by Terry.

In this same line of cases, the Court has also authorized what might be called a frisk of an automobile. If police stop a suspect in a car, the police are allowed to search the passenger compartment of the car, limited to areas where a weapon could be found, if the police can show a reasonable belief that the suspect is dangerous and the suspect may gain immediate control of a weapon. The theory here is the same as in frisking a person: because the search of the automobile is limited, it may be justified on grounds more limited than the traditional probable cause (Michigan v. Long).

One current controversy raised by the Terry doctrine centers on whether large amounts of drugs will suffice to establish reason to believe the defendant is armed and dangerous. Law enforcement officers argue that if large quantities of drugs are involved, it is reasonable to infer that the drugs are worth a lot of money, and the defendants will be armed and dangerous. The courts generally reject this argument, concluding that while large amounts of drugs would certainly justify a stop of the defendant based on reasonable suspicion that criminal activity is afoot, large amounts of drugs will not justify a frisk of the defendant because the drugs alone will not establish reason to believe the defendant is armed and dangerous.

Overall, the Terry exception to traditional Fourth Amendment doctrine allows police more flexibility in confronting citizens. It has become a well-established feature of Fourth Amendment jurisprudence.

SARAH N. WELLING

Cases and Statutes Cited

Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429 (1991)
Fourth Amendment, U.S. Constitution
Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. 119 (2000)
Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)
U.S. v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1 (1989)

See also Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. 119 (2000); Race and Criminal Justice; Search (General Definition); Seizures; Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)

STOREY, MOORFIELD (1845–1929)

Born in Roxbury, Massachusetts, in 1845, Moorfield Storey graduated from Harvard College in 1866 and served briefly (1867–1869) as personal secretary to U.S. Senator Charles Sumner, also of Massachusetts. Admitted to the bar in 1869, Storey went on to become a prominent Boston attorney. In the late 1800s, he was a supporter of the Mugwumps, a group of independent Republicans with reformist leanings who generally favored civil service reform, low tariffs, independent politics, and anti-imperialism. As a reformer, Storey also fought political corruption and the mistreatment of Native Americans. By the turn of the century, Storey was an outspoken critic of the mistreatment of African Americans, immigrants, Filipinos, Jews, and other persecuted groups as well.

At the same time, his private legal practice flourished. In 1900, linking together domestic and foreign affairs, Storey unsuccessfully ran for Congress on an anti-imperialist platform. He argued that American imperialism both reflected and continued racial strife at home. Storey later served as president of the Anti-Imperialist League (from 1905–1921), in which capacity he supported independence for the Philippines. Throughout his career, Storey was strongly influenced by Charles Sumner, who argued as early as 1849 that segregation was unconstitutional and that laws should make no racial distinctions. However, Storey was also a supporter of sectional reconciliation until the 1890s, and he only began speaking out against post-Reconstruction southern policies when southerners formalized the Jim Crow system of segregation, disfranchisement, and racial violence. Responding to growing racial violence nationwide, Storey was among the sixty prominent Americans who responded to the call of Mary White Ovington to meet in February 1909 to protest a recent race riot in Springfield, Illinois, Abraham Lincoln's hometown, on the 100th anniversary of Lincoln's birth. This meeting led to the creation of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), and Storey became its first president in 1910, a position he held until his death in 1929. Also in the early 1910s, Storey successfully ended the exclusion of African Americans from the American Bar Association. Based on his knowledge of history and law, Storey argued against the then-prevalent ideas of white racial superiority, and he suggested instead that mistreatment and unequal opportunities explained the lower status of minorities in the United States. Storey also noted that the southern penchant for violence and discriminatory legislation proved that whites were concerned about the possibility of black achievement. As NAACP president, Storey had little to do with the day-to-day functioning of the NAACP, but his legal skills proved invaluable. He strongly promoted the idea that civil rights could be most easily secured through the court. As NAACP legal counsel, he fought against idea that federal government could not prevent private discrimination and argued that segregation was unconstitutional. For support, he used investigations conducted by local NAACP chapters around the nation and preliminary preparation done by local attorneys. In the end, Storey served as NAACP counsel in its first three important cases before the U.S. Supreme Court. In Guinn v. U.S. (1915), Storey argued against the constitutionality of the Oklahoma "grandfather clause." In its ruling, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down the grandfather clause as a violation of the Fifteenth Amendment.

Storey's dedication to civil equality was most apparent in his involvement in the legal preparations of Buchanan v. Warley (1917), a case involving residential segregation. In Buchanan, Storey suggested that racial purity was a myth and that residential segregation was a violation of the equal protection and "privileges and immunities" clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, and also a violation of property rights of black property owners. In its decision, the U.S. Supreme Court held that a Kentucky law could not require residential segregation. Storey compared this important victory with the infamous Dred Scott decision of 1857. Storey also helped prepare the brief for Nixon v. Herndon (1927), against the all-white primary. In this case, the Supreme Court ruled that a 1923 Texas law had unlawfully denied Lawrence Nixon the right to vote in the Democratic primary solely because of his skin color, a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. This case was an integral part of the long-standing NAACP campaign against the white primary, which ended in victory with Smith v. Allwright (1944). Some historians suggest that the NAACP's successful campaign against segregation itself—outlawed by the Brown v. Board of Education U.S. Supreme Court decision of 1954—was significantly strengthened by these victories won by Storey.

BRIAN DAUGHERITY

References and Further Reading

- De Wolfe, Mark Antony. Portrait of an Independent, Moorfield Storey, 1845–1929. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1932.
- Hixson, Jr., William B. Moorfield Storey and the Abolitionist Tradition. New York: Oxford University Press, 1972.
- Kluger, Richard. Simple Justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and Black America's Struggle for Equality. New York: Random House, 1975.
- Storey, Moorfield. Charles Sumner. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1900.
- . The Reform of Legal Procedure. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1912.
- Storey, Moorfield, with Marcial P. Lichauco, The Conquest of the Philippines by the United States, 1898–1925. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1926.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Buchanan v. Warley*, 245 U.S. 60 (1917)
- Guinn & Beal v. United States*, 238 U.S. 347 (1915)
- Nixon v. Herndon*, 273 U.S. 536 (1927)
- Roberts v. City of Boston*, 59 Mass. 198 (1849)
- Scott v. Sandford*, 60 U.S. 393 (1856)
- Smith v. Allwright*, 321 U.S. 649 (1944)

See also Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954); National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); Sumner, Charles

STORY, JOSEPH (1779–1845)

Joseph Story served as a justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1812 to 1845. His tenure spanned much of the Marshall Court (1801–1835) and extended into the Taney Court (1836–1864). He was the youngest member of the Court ever appointed, at age 32.

Story was a great admirer and a jurisprudential adherent of Chief Justice John Marshall. Although Story had served in Congress as a Jeffersonian Republican, his decisions revealed a federalist bent. He consistently voted for a strong central government, against the supremacy of states' rights, and for the power of the Supreme Court to declare the law.

Although most of the great nationalist decisions of the Marshall Court bore Marshall's name, Story is said to have contributed his ideas to some of Marshall's most important opinions. Story has been called "John Marshall's strong right arm on the court."

In one important case, however, Story himself took up the nationalist banner because Marshall had disqualified himself. In Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, Story asserted the Supreme Court's superiority over state courts in interpreting federal law. Although state courts could consider constitutional questions, the Supreme Court had jurisdiction and final authority to decide them.

The Story and Marshall jurisprudence was the foundation for much to come. The Civil War vindicated and confirmed Story's view as the state secessionists were forced to yield to the union. The decisions establishing federal supremacy also presaged later victories of central authority over states' rights, such as the Warren Court's imposition of federal constitutional rights against the states.

Story also ardently opposed slavery. Story wrote the Court's opinion in The Amistad, a case popularized in modern times by the film of that name. In The Amistad, Story held that slaves brought unlawfully to the United States were to be freed.

Yet the power of the central government was a principle rooted in the Constitution and, therefore, even greater to Story than his hatred of slavery. In Prigg v. Pennsylvania, Story upheld the primacy of a federal slavery act against a state law that would have convicted a slave catcher for kidnapping. Story sided with constitutional principle at the expense of painful excoriation by abolitionists.

Story supported not only federal power against the states but also advocated uniform national common and statutory law. To that end, he declared that federal courts would apply a federal common law rather than the laws of the states. His decision, Swift v. Tyson, held sway for nearly a century, when the Court overturned it in Erie Railroad v. Tompkins.

Story is considered to have been one of the great justices. He was at Marshall's right hand as they laid the foundation for American constitutional law. His reputation was enhanced by long and distinguished service as a law professor at Harvard University, a post he held concurrently with his Court service. He also wrote nine highly regarded commentaries on the law, including a three-volume commentary on the Constitution. These works placed him beside James Kent as the foremost legal authors of the day.

JEFFERSON L. LANKFORD

References and Further Reading

- Dunne, Gerald T. Justice Joseph Story and the Rise of the Supreme Court. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1970.
- Friedman, Lawrence M. A History of American Law. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1973.
- Miller, F. Thornton. "Joseph Story's Uniform, Rational Law." In Great Justices of the Supreme Court, edited by William D. Pederson and Norman W. Proviser. New York: Peter Lang, 1994.
- Newmyer, R. Kent. Supreme Court Justice Joseph Story: Statesman of the Old Republic. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1985.
- White, G. Edward. The American Judicial Tradition: Profiles of Leading American Judges. New York: Oxford University Press, 1976.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- The Amistad*, 40 U.S. 518 (1841)
- Erie Railroad v. Tompkins*, 304 U.S. 64 (1938)
- Martin v. Hunter's Lessee*, 14 U.S. 304 (1816)
- Prigg v. Pennsylvania*, 41 U.S. 539 (1842)
- Swift v. Tyson*, 41 U.S. 1 (1842)

See also Abolitionists; Judicial Review; Marshall Court; Marshall, John; Taney Court

STRICT LIABILITY

Strict liability refers to legal responsibility without fault. If a law holds X responsible for an injury she accidentally caused Y, when X could not reasonably have foreseen she would hurt Y, that law imposes "strict liability" on X. In some areas of law, strict liability is commonplace and widely accepted—for example, in civil lawsuits concerning personal injuries caused by defective products. In the criminal law, however, strict liability is a controversial exception to the rule that liability requires a blameworthy state of mind.

A common version of statutory rape, which criminalizes having sex with a person below the age of consent, provides an example of criminal strict liability: the defendant is guilty even if he reasonably (but mistakenly) believed the individual was older than the age of consent. Other examples include felony murder, in which a defendant is guilty of murder for any death that results from the commission of a felony, and so called “public welfare offenses,” which impose strict liability in the business context and criminalize such things as accidentally selling adulterated meat or mislabeled drugs.

Most United States jurisdictions do have some strict liability crimes. Before the latter half of the nineteenth century, strict liability was largely limited to crimes in which the defendant was at least aware that he was doing something wrong, as in the example of felony murder. The strict liability offenses in which the defendant accidentally causes some harm while believing that he was engaging in innocuous conduct are a product of the last 150 years.

Strict liability has endured generations of academic criticism. Critics charge that strict liability is both unjust to those it punishes and ineffective in combating crime. Because the individual, by definition, could not have been expected to realize he might cause harm, the argument runs, he is not morally blameworthy. Moreover, critics reason, the threat of criminal punishment cannot deter a person who could not realize he was causing harm, and imprisonment to prevent future crimes is unnecessary in such circumstances.

Advocates of strict liability counter that strict liability can promote the greatest level of care and that people who commit strict liability crimes “assume the risk” by their conduct, be it engaging in sexual intercourse outside of marriage (in the case of statutory rape) or entering certain businesses involving closely regulated products (in the case of public welfare offenses). Strict liability defenders also contend that prosecutors can be trusted to use their discretion to pursue only those cases in which the defendant “really” deserves to be punished.

The Supreme Court has refused to declare strict liability unconstitutional in the criminal law, striking strict liability statutes only occasionally. The Court’s decisions do, however, follow a consistent pattern: when the legislature could properly criminalize the intentional conduct included in the crime, adding a strict liability element is constitutional. For example, imposing strict liability for selling alcohol to a minor is constitutional because the legislature could prohibit selling alcohol completely. On the other hand, strict liability is unconstitutional when the conduct could not be criminalized without the strict liability element. For example, the Court struck down a statute that criminalized selling books containing obscene material even when the seller reasonably thought the books had no such contents. This result fits the rule, because a statute that criminalized selling books completely would not be constitutional.

ALAN C. MICHAELS

STROSSEN, NADINE (1950–)

Nadine Strossen, current president of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) and constitutional lawyer, received her undergraduate degree from Harvard College in 1972, and she graduated from Harvard Law School in 1975. The ACLU elected Nadine Strossen to head the organization as its president in 1991, a post she still held as of 2004. Her election was seen as a return to the organization’s traditional emphasis on issues of civil liberties such as freedom of speech and freedom of the press. Strossen has repeatedly stressed that the organization’s top priority must be educating the public on these basic issues.

Founded in 1920, the ACLU promotes itself as America’s “guardian of liberty,” with the job of conserving the United States’s original civil values. The organization and Strossen’s presidency emphasized the Bill of Rights and the Constitution, particularly focusing on First Amendment rights, equal protection under the law, due process, and right to privacy. The ACLU works to extend rights to segments of population historically denied them and handles thousands of cases yearly throughout the United States.

When elected, Strossen not only became the youngest person to head the organization at age forty, but she also became the first woman to head the nation’s oldest and largest civil liberties organization. Strossen is also a professor of law at New York University and practices constitutional law with special interests in civil liberties and international human rights. The National Law Journal has twice named Strossen one of its “100 Most Influential Lawyers in America.”

Throughout her career, Strossen has been vocal on such intersecting issues as freedom of speech and women’s rights. In 1995, she wrote Defending Pornography: Free Speech, Sex, and the Fight for Women’s Rights, published by Scribner. The New York Times named it a Notable Book of 1995. In Defending Pornography, Strossen argued against “pro-censorship” feminist scholars such as Catharine MacKinnon and Andrea Dworkin, who call for the censorship of pornography as a violation of women’s rights. Strossen contends that the proponents of pornography’s ensorship deliberately blur any distinction between erotica and pornography, terming all sexually explicit material as the same. Strossen argues that the Dworkin–MacKinnon model law should itself be considered censorship because its intent is ultimately to take material that fits its definition of pornography out of circulation.

Strossen contends that defending the freedom of sexual expression is essential for women’s rights advocates, and that while women need to protect themselves, they most need protection from governmental infringement on their freedom and autonomy, not protection from pornography. By equating sexual expression with gender discrimination, women’s equality is undermined by women being told they must choose between sexuality and a supposed “equality.” In the context of women’s rights, she argues that freedom of speech is consistently the strongest weapon for countering misogynist discrimination and violence. To counter the Dworkin–MacKinnon model, Strossen argues that from a women’s rights point of view, censoring pornography is damaging.

Strossen argues in Defending Pornography that regardless of the content of pornography and women’s opinion of it, it does more harm to women’s rights and free speech to censor pornography. Her argument defends the right of each individual to make one’s own decision about what to see—or what not to see—in the realm of sex. Strossen intended Defending Pornography as a response to her contention that the excessive media attention received by prominent feminists such as Dworkin and MacKinnon led people to believe all feminists must support the censorship of pornography. Ultimately, Strossen articulates that pornography means an expression intended to sexually arouse an individual, be it either print-based or visual, and that the Constitution protects such expression. Strossen also coedited the book Speaking of Race, Speaking of Sex: Hate Speech, Civil Rights, and Civil Liberties, in which her article “Regulating Racist Speech on Campus” appeared. Strossen expands on her argument that it is insulting to women, racial minorities, and ultimately, everyone, to argue that one must choose between freedom of speech and equal opportunity. She posits that the First Amendment’s free speech guarantee offers the greatest protection for women’s and minorities’ rights and safety. Free speech, under this argument, serves as an indispensable method to promote other rights and freedoms, with any regulation of speech potentially undermining both equality and free speech. The First and Fourteenth Amendments work as allies rather than antagonists, and equality is best served by continuing to apply traditional, speech-protective precepts to racist and misogynist speech rather than creating specific legislation to circumscribe it.

MELISSA OOTEN

References and Further Reading

- Gates, Henry Louis, et al. Speaking of Race, Speaking of Sex: Hate Speech, Civil Rights, and Civil Liberties. New York: New York University Press, 1995.
- Harvey, Philip D. The Government vs. Erotica: The Siege of Adam and Eve. New York: Prometheus Books, 2001.
- Strossen, Nadine. Defending Pornography: Free Speech, Sex, and the Fight for Women’s Rights. New York: Scribner, 1995.

See also American Civil Liberties Union; Dworkin, Andrea; MacKinnon, Catharine

STUDENT ACTIVITY FEES AND FREE SPEECH

Most colleges and universities charge their students a mandatory activity fee, which is then used to support various student organizations and events. In Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of University of Virginia (1995), the U.S. Supreme Court held that the University of Virginia’s student activity fee fund constituted a type of “metaphysical” public forum that had been created to encourage diverse extracurricular expression. Having produced this forum, the university was bound by the First Amendment to distribute the funds within it without preferring one viewpoint to another. By funding all student publications except those that were overtly religious, the university in that case was found to have committed unconstitutional Viewpoint Discrimination.

When student activity fees are allocated in a viewpoint-neutral manner, dissenting students at public institutions have no First Amendment right to a rebate of the amount of their fees spent to finance speech they find objectionable. This was the Court’s holding in Board of Regents of the University of Wisconsin System v. Southworth (2000), where some conservative students had complained that the University of Wisconsin’s fee system forced them to support student organizations with which they disagreed. The Court ruled that those fee monies distributed by the student government association had been allocated in a viewpoint-neutral manner, and, therefore, that the dissenting students were not entitled to a rebate. However, the Court warned that funding decisions made pursuant to student referenda probably did not meet the viewpoint neutrality test, stating that “[a]ccess to a public forum . . . does not depend upon majoritarian consent.”

NICOLE B. CÁSAREZ

References and Further Reading

- Calvert, Clay, Where the Right Went Wrong in Southworth: Underestimating the Power of the Marketplace, Maine Law Review 53 (2001): 53–80.
- Cásarez, Nicole B. Public Forums, Selective Subsidies, and Shifting Standards of Viewpoint Discrimination, Albany Law Review 64 (2000): 501–581.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Regents of the University of Wisconsin System v. Southworth*, 529 U.S. 217 (2000)
- Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of University of Virginia*, 515 U.S. 819 (1995)

See also Universities and Public Forums; Viewpoint Discrimination in Free Speech Cases

STUDENT SPEECH IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Overview

Constitutional Sources: The First and Fourteenth Amendments

The First Amendment to the United States Constitution, when applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment, prohibits state action that interferes with freedom of speech. State actors include state and local government entities and officials, such as public schools, school boards, and school administrators.

Constitutional limits on public school authority over students was established as early as 1943, when the United States Supreme Court decided in West Virginia State Bd. of Education v. Barnette that public school children could not be compelled to salute the American flag. Yet, case law also establishes that a public school is entitled to maintain order and accomplish its educational mission and thus may control the speech of its students more broadly than the state may regulate the speech of adults in a public forum away from campus.

Critical Values and Factors

In striking the balance between public school authority and the speech rights of students, the grade level of the student speakers and listeners is relevant. Only students in higher education are deemed to be fully prepared to develop their capacities regarding the values most often advanced as justifications for freedom of speech: the search for truth in a robust marketplace of ideas, the use of speech to shape one's identity as an autonomous individual, and the exchange of ideas necessary for effective participation in community affairs and other democratic self-governance. In contrast, courts recognize that secondary schools, and even more so elementary schools, assume the responsibility of inculcating fundamental social values, a process that often requires stricter control of the style and substance of student speech.

Finally, regulation of speech will less likely conflict with First Amendment values if the regulation operates in a neutral manner, without respect to social, political, religious, or other ideological content or viewpoint. Indeed, religious speech often raises issues under both the First Amendment's free speech clause and its establishment of religion and free exercise clause. Satisfying the mandates of both branches of the religion clause typically requires a public school to adopt a neutral stance toward religious speech, such as by allowing a religious student group the same access to after-school meeting rooms as is available to other student groups, while refraining from sponsoring or providing special support for religious speech such as school prayer.

The Trilogy of Tinker, Bethel, and Hazelwood

Three Supreme Court decisions, issued between 1969 and 1988, provide general standards for the constitutional protection of student speech in public secondary schools, a convenient starting place for analyzing speech at all grade levels. A fourth decision, Board of Education v. Pico, addresses student receipt of information through the school library, an issue closely related to student speech but beyond the scope of this article.

Tinker Protecting Nondisruptive Student Speech

In Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, the Supreme Court ruled that the First Amendment protected the right of high school and middle school students to wear black armbands protesting the Vietnam War so long as this nonverbal speech did not materially and substantially disrupt the school's educational program or interfere with the rights of other students, such as rights to be secure and to avert their eyes from the expression. Tinker is well known for its statement that teachers and students do not “shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate.”

Bethel: Regulation of Indecent Speech in a School-Sponsored Activity

In 1986, in Bethel School District v. Fraser, the Supreme Court found no constitutional violation when public school officials disciplined a high school senior for using humorous sexual innuendos in a speech nominating a classmate for an office in student government. Some argue that this decision represents little more than an application of the first branch of the Tinker standard to new facts: by causing boisterous reactions from some students, the nominating speech disrupted the school's efforts to provide students with a lesson in appropriate modes of communication in an educational program on self-government.

Bethel is better known, however, for its statement that public secondary school officials, in an effort to inculcate socially responsible behavior, can constitutionally regulate indecent student speech that it deems inappropriate, regardless whether the speech actually disrupts the educational program. This might be viewed as an application of the second branch of Tinker if the Court relied mainly on a finding that the speech violated the rights of young students in a captive audience to avoid sexually indecent speech. Many courts and commentators, however, interpret Bethel more broadly to recognize tiers or hierarchies of constitutionally protected speech in public schools, developing a less protective constitutional standard for the sexually indecent speech punished in Bethel than for the nonverbal political protest protected in Tinker.

Hazelwood: Pedagogic Control of School-Sponsored Student Speech

The third case in the trilogy, Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, however, later suggested that the critical factor in Bethel was the school's apparent association with the indecent speech: because the school in Bethel had sponsored the assembly as one of two alternative mandatory activities for students, the school assumed a responsibility to protect the sensibilities of the captive audience of children who attended, and the school might be viewed as having approved the student speech that took place. This language in Hazelwood has led some judges to characterize Bethel's broader references to indecent language as nonbinding dictum and to conclude that the Bethel standards do not apply to independent student speech, not sponsored by the school.

In Hazelwood, decided in 1989, the Supreme Court found no constitutional violation in a high school principal's deleting two pages of a student newspaper that contained articles about divorce and teenage pregnancy. The court based its ruling on findings that the high school had maintained the newspaper as a nonpublic educational forum that presented school-sponsored student speech as a curricular offering. The school could regulate such speech in any manner reasonably related to legitimate pedagogic concerns, without meeting the Tinker test applicable to independent student speech.

Application of the Trilogy

General Standards and Policies

Most judges will be reluctant to engage in wide-ranging First Amendment review of public school decisions regarding curriculum, pedagogy, and the maintenance of order in educational programs. Unless school officials attempt to impose an official orthodoxy while suppressing competing ideas on important questions that warrant debate, courts likely will defer to the judgments of elected and politically accountable school board members and the professionals appointed to administer the schools.

Because of the different educational goals of higher education, however, First Amendment protections for student speech typically will apply with greater force in public colleges and universities than in secondary and, especially, elementary schools. The pedagogic goals of higher education include the development of each student's abilities to challenge or test accepted doctrine, to develop new theories or discover new information, and to critically evaluate and debate ideas on controversial issues. These pedagogic goals, in turn, lead to the maintenance of forums in which the First Amendment operates with significant force.

Elementary school children, on the other hand, are viewed as lacking substantial capacity to critically evaluate competing ideas on provocative topics. Instead, they require foundational instruction on basic skills, fundamental knowledge, and appropriate social values and behavior. Moreover, sensitive children may require protection from the uncivil speech of a few verbally aggressive classmates. These goals and needs justify significant control of student speech in the classroom, on the playground, and in school assemblies.

Drawing strength from language in Bethel, some courts and commentators have treated secondary schools as an extension of elementary schools, emphasizing the continuing need to inculcate fundamental social values, and justifying significant control of student speech. Other commentators, taking strength from Tinker, have argued for broad First Amendment protection of nondisruptive student speech in secondary schools. They point out that freedom of speech is one of the fundamental values that should be inculcated, that high school should provide an effective introduction to the robust marketplace of ideas in higher education, and that secondary education constitutes the final academic instruction in democratic self-governance for students who do not attend college.

Although perfect consensus on the proper balance of values at every grade level is not possible, nearly all will agree that opportunities for constitutionally protected student speech increase with the increasing maturity of students and the sophistication of their course of study, as they progress through grade levels.

Limits to Freedom of Student Speech in the Classroom

The classroom is not an open forum for student speech but is a site reserved for teaching and learning, under the direction and control of the school and the instructor. For example, although the silent, nondisruptive protest in Tinker was constitutionally protected, in no grade level will a student have a constitutional right to disrupt the educational program, such as by loudly protesting United States foreign policy in the Middle East during the instructor's explanation of algebra in a math class or during a musical presentation at a school assembly.

Moreover, in any grade level an instructor may exercise pedagogic discretion to teach students to adopt modes or styles of expression that are appropriate for intellectual or professional discourse. For example, in a third-grade class in social studies or a graduate law school course in trial advocacy, an instructor could require students to state information or arguments in civil language, avoiding bigoted epithets, personal insults, or profanity, and the instructor could interrupt a student for violating this class rule, could lower the student's grade for substantial failure to adhere to the rule, and could even refer the student for disciplinary action for deliberate and repeated infractions that disrupt the educational program. In contrast, speakers in traditional public forums, such as parks and street corners, would enjoy a broader right to use profane or uncivil language in protests or other speech.

Assuming that a student speaks in turn, on a relevant topic, and in a manner that comports with class rules of civility, the extent to which a public school instructor can control the substance of the ideas expressed may vary at different grade levels, partly because of the varying nature of academic inquiry at different ends of the grade spectrum. Although a college instructor could apply politically neutral standards to give a low grade to a student whose work reflected poor research and analysis, the First Amendment would not allow a public school to discipline or silence a student simply for expressing an unpopular viewpoint on a relevant topic, such as an argument against affirmative action in a classroom full of supporters of affirmative action programs. In contrast, it is conceivable that the First Amendment would permit a public elementary school instructor to suppress the relevant but dissenting views of a student if the content or viewpoint of student's views clashed with the instructor's inculcation of fundamental social values. Even there, however, courts are likely to draw a distinction between legitimate inculcation, on the one hand, and constitutionally impermissible indoctrination on matters of conscience.

Designated Open Forums

A public school or academic unit within the school is free to expand speech rights of students by designating a forum to be fully or partially open to speech. A college department of political science, for example, might maintain a "free speech bulletin board" on which the department invites students to post their opinions on any topic while enjoying the full measure of freedom of speech that the Constitution guarantees to adults in traditional public forums such as parks and street corners. The department could maintain complete control over its own official bulletin board, which it could reserve exclusively for its own speech, or it could dedicate a bulletin board to student speech while retaining restrictions on the speech. However, once it dedicated the "free speech" board as an open forum, it could not then censor a student's posting on that board unless the speech fell within a recognized exception to First Amendment protection, such as obscenity.

Similarly, as a means of furthering the intellectual growth, sense of responsibility, and leadership skills of qualified students, a state university may permit the student editorial staff to exercise final discretion over the content of the university's daily student newspaper, allowing the students to follow or reject any guidance offered by their faculty or staff adviser. If it is apparent to all that the articles, editorial opinions, and decisions regarding advertising reflect the final judgments of the student editors and not of the school, the student editors might enjoy the same freedom from state control over the content of each edition as would any newspaper publisher in the community at large. As illustrated by Hazelwood, such designation of the school newspaper as an open forum for student editors would be less common in lower grades, where pedagogic goals more likely would call for greater supervision from faculty or staff; however, if a secondary school exercised pedagogic discretion to adopt the college model described previously, it presumably could surrender control of the editors' speech and could pave the way for a different constitutional outcome than the one reached in Hazelwood.

In addition, many colleges have designated an outdoor space, such as a campus lawn or square, as a suitable open forum for student speech. Other areas on campus, such as sidewalks between buildings, may have all the characteristics of traditional public forums and warrant full constitutional protection for student speech, even though not specifically designated to serve that purpose by school authorities. In such open forums, students presumably are free to voice even views that are offensive to others and even to convey their passion with uncivil language, so long as they avoid a few extreme forms of speech that are excluded from First Amendment protection, such as threats or obscenity, and so long as they avoid obstructing sidewalks, refrain from projecting their voices excessively into nearby buildings, and otherwise respect the rights of others to avoid the speech.

Conceivably, public elementary and secondary schools could likewise designate spaces on campus as open forums, free from the control of school authorities that would otherwise be permitted by the trilogy of Supreme Court cases. In light of the greater need to maintain order, protect the sensibilities of young student, and to inculcate basic social values, however, it is less likely that elementary or even secondary school authorities would designate an area in which student speech, without faculty guidance, would receive the fullest measure of constitutional protection. Moreover, in light of the closed nature of most elementary and secondary school campuses, and the restrictions on location and movement even of students, open spaces on such campuses would not assume the status of public forums absent designation by school authorities or other unusual circumstances.

School Uniforms and Dress Codes

Courts typically have upheld public elementary or secondary school policies that dictate a standard school uniform and are implemented for educational reasons, rather than a desire to suppress expression of ideas, particularly if the school permits students who object to the uniform to transfer to another public school that does not require a uniform. If students are permitted variation in clothing, however, dress codes that more selectively target the content or viewpoint of messages conveyed by garments, like the armband in Tinker or a T-shirt displaying a written slogan, raise more serious First Amendment issues.

Many courts have invoked language in Bethel to uphold public school policies that forbid lewd, vulgar, or otherwise indecent or plainly offensive speech, even though the speech is not school sponsored, and although such speech would be constitutionally protected in public areas off campus. On the other hand, if a T-shirt slogan conveys a political point without indecency or vulgarity, as did the arm band in Tinker, public school policies that seek to regulate the T-shirt will be governed by the Tinker standards and will be protected by the First Amendment unless the shirt would disrupt the educational program or violate the rights of other students to be secure or to avoid the speech.

These two generalizations, however, leave ample room for uncertainty and disagreement. Judges have disagreed, for example, about which standard—either an expansive interpretation of Bethel and Hazelwood or the more speech-protective rule of Tinker—applies to suppression of a T-shirt slogan that is neither indecent nor highly political but is simply inconsistent with the social values that the public school seeks to inculcate, such as respect for others or avoidance of under-age consumption of alcohol. Under one possible approach, courts would lean toward upholding such regulations in the lower grades, where the school's responsibility for inculcation is the strongest, and courts would apply the Tinker standard in the higher grades, where inculcation gives way to training in critical inquiry. At the college level, where the need to protect students from indecency is diminished, and the task of inculcating basic social values has largely been accomplished, the Tinker standard should apply and presumably would rarely justify suppression of silent messages conveyed on articles of clothing. Middle school and high school represent the transition points between the extreme ends of the spectrum, and they likely will continue to generate continued debate on the precise standards to apply to independent student speech such as expressive clothing.

College Hate Speech Codes

In the two decades after the mid 1980s, many universities adopted hate speech policies that prohibited certain hurtful speech associated with personal characteristics such as race, national origin, gender, sexual orientation, religion, age, and disability. When applied to speech in certain contexts at state colleges and universities, such as in open forums or relevant classroom discussion, the policies were typically found to violate the First Amendment if they regulated student speech on the basis of the ideological content or viewpoint of the speech or if they reached speech that was merely offensive to others. Such suppression of controversial views is not justified by constitutional or statutory mandates to provide equal educational opportunities.

On the other hand, a public university policy likely will be upheld if it (1) prohibits only speech that is generally subject to regulation under the First Amendment in the relevant context, including the public school contexts discussed previously, and (2) the policy either prohibits all such speech, regardless of its relationship to matters of personal identity or other ideological content or viewpoint, or it prohibits a subset of such speech, based not on its content or viewpoint but on the speaker's act of selectively directing the speech to members of defined groups. Thus, the First Amendment will permit a public school policy to prohibit students from selectively conveying credible threats of harm to members of a particular racial group.

CHARLES R. CALLEROS

References and Further Reading

- Calleros, Charles R. Reconciliation of Civil Rights and Civil Liberties after R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul: Free Speech, Antiharassment Policies, Multicultural Education, and Political Correctness at Arizona State University, Utah Law Review 1992 (1992): 1205–1333.
- Dienes, C., Thomas Connolly, and Annemargaret Connolly. When Students Speak: Judicial Review in the Academic Marketplace, Yale Law and Policy Review 7 (1989): 343–395.
- Ingber, Stanley. Socialization, Indoctrination, or the 'Pall of Orthodoxy': Value Training in the Public Schools, University of Illinois Law Review 1987 (1987): 15–93.
- McCarthy, Martha. Anti-Harassment Policies in Public Schools: How Vulnerable Are They? Journal of Law and Education 31 (2002): 52–70.
- Pedzich, Joan. Student Dress Codes in Public Schools: A Selective Annotated Bibliography, Law Library Journal 94 (2002): 41–57.
- Pyle, Jonathan. Speech in Public Schools: Different Context or Different Rights? University of Pennsylvania Journal of Constitutional Law 4 (2002): 586–635.

Richards, Robert D., and Clay Calvert. Columbine Fallout: The Long-Term Effects on Free Expression Take Hold in Public Schools, Boston University Law Review 83 (2002): 1089–1140.

Symposium: Do Children Have the Same First Amendment Rights as Adults? Chicago-Kent Law Review 79 (2004) 3–313.

Weinstein, James A., Constitutional Roadmap to the Regulation of Campus Hate Speech, The Wayne Law Review 38 (1991): 163–247.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bethel School District v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675 (1986)

Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988)

Board of Education v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982)

Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969)

West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

See also Civil Rights Laws and Free Speech; Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Limited Public Forums; Low Value Speech; Marketplace of Ideas Theory; R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992); Speech and Education; Threats and Free Speech; Time, Place, and Manner Rule; Wisconsin v. Mitchell, 508 U.S. 476 (1993)

SUBPOENAS TO REPORTERS

“It is axiomatic, and a principle fundamental to our constitutional way of life, that where the press remains free so too will a people remain free” Baker v. F & F Investment, 470 F.2d 778 (2d Cir. 1972).

Although there are currently forty-nine states and the District of Columbia that recognize some type of privilege in which journalists are protected from disclosing information they receive, there is no explicit protection for reporters under federal law. The United States Supreme Court's decision in Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972), declined to quash grand jury subpoenas issued to journalists with a ruling that a reporter does not have a First Amendment protection to refuse a grand jury subpoena in an investigation.

However, the Court did state that Congress and states were free within First Amendment limits to determine whether a newsman's privilege is necessary. Subsequently courts in almost every jurisdiction around the country interpreted the Courts' opinion in establishing a balancing test in the protection of a free press under the First Amendment. As governmental policy has evolved since Branzburg, the guidance regarding the issuance of subpoenas to members of the news media, for telephone records of the news media, or the indictment or arrest of members of the news media are now set forth in section 50.10 of title 28 of the Code of Federal Regulations.

ROBERT DON GIFFORD

References and Further Reading

United States Attorney's Manual, Section 9-11.255—Grand Jury Subpoenas to Lawyers and Members of the News Media.

Cases and Statutes Cited

28 C.F.R. § 50.10

Baker v. F & F Investment, 470 F.2d 778 (2d Cir. 1972)

Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972)

SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS

Substantive due process is a phrase describing constitutional limitations on the government, usually to secure rights not elsewhere identified in the Constitution. Coined in the mid-twentieth century in debates concerning the proper role of the courts, the phrase originally encoded a criticism of perceived judicial overreaching and even today is not always merely descriptive. Substantive due process is contrasted with “procedural due process,” the correlative phrase describing proper legal procedures. By the late twentieth century, substantive due process was divided into economic substantive due process, largely inactive, and noneconomic (or social) substantive due process, which although not uncontested is steadily expanding. All are rooted in the due process clauses of state and federal constitutions. The Fifth Amendment in the Bill of Rights prohibits the federal government from depriving any person of “life, liberty, or property, without due process of law,” and the Fourteenth Amendment, adopted after the Civil War, extends the same prohibition to the states. State constitutions contain similar limitations, sometimes using the older phrase “law of the land.” The current North Carolina Constitution, for example, carrying forward wording from the Declaration of Rights in the North Carolina Constitution of 1776, provides that “No person shall be . . . in any manner deprived of his life, liberty, or property, but by the law of the land.” The present New York Constitution actually has both due process and law-of-the-land clauses. Although suggestive, the constitutional phrases themselves are hardly self-explanatory, and a long history lies behind the current understandings.

Historical Background

Every legal system that deserves the name has some concept of proper procedure (“due process”), procedure according to settled legal forms (“the law of the land”), but the specific concept that eventually gained constitutional footing in the American legal system is deeply rooted in the English legal tradition. In Magna Carta (1215) the tyrannical King John was compelled by his rebellious barons to promise that “no free man shall be taken or imprisoned or disseised or outlawed or exiled, or in any way ruined, nor shall we go or send against him, except by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.” At the time, the common law courts were still in the process of formation, and legislative and executive functions of government were not yet clearly distinguished; the concept of separation of powers lay in the distant future. Five hundred years later, when parliament and the courts were well established and English liberties were again threatened by an overreaching king, opponents of royal power took a renewed interest in medieval restraints on the government. Commenting on Magna Carta, Sir Edward Coke related the requirement to proceed only according to “the law of the land” to a phrase in a fourteenth-century statute requiring “due process according to the common law.” A zealot for the English legal tradition, Coke saw in due process a judicial restraint on king and parliament alike. By the eighteenth century, constitutional theorists like John Locke and lawyers like Sir William Blackstone had translated the medieval language of Magna Carta into the memorable trinity of “life, liberty, and property.” All the necessary ingredients were now at hand for the American constitution makers. Ironically, “law of the land” and “due process” eventually lost their currency in England, limited by the doctrine of parliamentary supremacy and superseded by the vaguer phrase “rule of law,” but they have flourished ever after in their new home.

Not only was due process a common law concept long before any American constitution, its jurisprudence was developed by American judges schooled in the common law way of doing things. Case by case, as the nation developed economically and socially, content was given to due process and to the rights it safeguarded: life and property, but above all liberty. The requisites of proper procedure, particularly criminal procedure from arrest and detention through trial and final punishment, were detailed in other constitutional provisions of considerable specificity, but the general guarantee of due process remained for abuses not specifically provided for; for example, a state statute that gave a magistrate a share of the fines imposed in case of conviction. In Tumey v. Ohio (1928) a unanimous Supreme Court held that for a judge to have a financial interest in the outcome of a case “certainly violates the Fourteenth Amendment, and deprives a defendant in a criminal case of due process of law.” Characteristic of the time, the court did not bother to define the violation as either “procedural” or “substantive,” although by then the dichotomy (but not the labels) had emerged.

Economic Substantive Due Process: Liberty of Contract

Only a few years before Tumey, the Supreme Court had categorically declared in Adkins v. Children's Hospital (1923) that under the constitution “freedom of contract is the general rule and restraint the exception,” and invalidated a minimum wage law for working women in the District of Columbia. Statutes that imposed restrictions on freedom of contract were presumed unconstitutional unless proven otherwise. The authority for this remarkable constitutional doctrine was also the due process clause; this time, because federal law was involved, the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. Two developments had made it possible: first, liberty had been given an expansive definition to include not only freedom from illegal confinement (freedom of motion), but also freedom to engage in economic activity (freedom of contract); second, the demands of due process had been enlarged to include not only how the government proceeded but also what it did. Just as important as what was taken—life or property or some version of liberty—was that nothing be taken without good cause. Even with proper procedures, the government had not only to seek constitutional ends but also to demonstrate to the judges, if necessary, that the chosen means were reasonably related to those ends. In this sense, due process had acquired substance.

The origins of substantive due process can be traced to the middle of the nineteenth century. There were scattered references in Supreme Court opinions, including the notorious Dred Scott Case (1857), but these incunabula were not themselves the source of later developments, rather an indication of what determined judges could do with the due process clause. More fruitful seedbeds were the state courts, particularly their decisions in the troublesome cases generated by state prohibition statutes. In Wynehamer v. People (1856), for example, New York's highest court found that a statute violated due process as applied to liquor in stock at adoption. In the Supreme Court itself more obvious sources were the dissenting opinions of Justices Joseph P. Bradley and Stephen J. Field in the Slaughterhouse Cases (1873), listing a series of individual economic liberties supposedly protected from government interference. Although originally claimed to be incidents of American citizenship and protected by the privileges and immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the rights eventually found a home in the due process clause. In Allgeyer v. Louisiana (1897), the court first recognized freedom of contract as an aspect of liberty and held that no state could deprive any person of that freedom “without due process of law,” that is, unless it could show that the restriction was reasonably related to an acceptable government purpose. Because the court had earlier decided that a corporation was a “person” within the meaning of the due process clause, the result was to transform that clause into a virtual “Magna Carta for American business,” a particularly ironic result because the Fourteenth Amendment had originally been adopted to overturn the Dred Scott Case and secure the civil rights of newly freed slaves. The impact of substantive due process extended far beyond the relatively small number of statutes actually invalidated; the legitimacy of regulatory legislation in general was called into question and, by raising the threat of an eventual judicial veto, the difficulty of securing legislative passage was greatly increased.

Although applicable to restraints on all commercial activity, freedom of contract found its most contentious application in cases of attempted regulation of labor. The most notorious example, giving its name to an entire era of due process jurisprudence, was undoubtedly Lochner v. New York (1905), in which the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional a state statute limiting the working hours of bakers. The Lochner question, “Is this a fair, reasonable and appropriate exercise of the police power of the State, or is it an unreasonable, unnecessary and arbitrary interference with the right of the individual to his personal liberty to enter into those contracts in relation to labor?” meant that much labor law was subject to searching judicial inquiry. Freedom of contract as protected by the due process clauses meant, for example, that neither the federal nor the state government could outlaw the so-called yellow dog contract, by which certain employers required their workers as a condition of employment to agree not to join a labor union. State courts, too, invoked the due process clauses to invalidate popular legislation. In Ives v. South Buffalo Railway Co. (1911), for example, New York's highest court held the state's new worker's compensation statute, one of the nation's first, unconstitutional.

Just as procedural and substantive due process are occasionally difficult to distinguish, so the line between economic and noneconomic substantive due process is sometimes difficult to draw. In Meyer v. Nebraska (1923), the Supreme Court held that a state statute forbidding the teaching of foreign languages in primary schools violated due process, and in Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925) it held that due process prevented a state from denying the right to operate private schools. Although at the time of their decision it was possible to analogize these cases to interference with the free market, it is also possible to see in them an emerging recognition of aspects of liberty other than freedom of contract: freedom of speech and association, freedom to acquire information, parental rights in educational decisions, and—of most consequence for the later development of the law of due process—“the right to be let alone,” better known today as the right to privacy.

Although tolerable during economic boom times and under pro-business political leadership, a constitutional guarantee of freedom of contract was to lead the Supreme Court into conflict with the new political leadership called forth by the economic depression of the 1930s. The result was a humiliation for the court, which belatedly acknowledged in West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish (1937) that, in fact, “the Constitution does not speak of freedom of contract.” The next year in United States v. Carolene Products Co. (1938) the court executed a volte-face and announced that it would henceforth presume the constitutionality of “regulatory legislation affecting ordinary commercial transactions,” but at the same time warned that it would not extend the presumption to restrictions on civil rights, thereby implicitly splitting the judicial concept of liberty into economic and noneconomic components. Thus was born the doctrine of “preferred freedoms,” the notion that some rights are entitled to more judicial protection than others.

Noneconomic Substantive Due Process: Liberty

Many who today acclaim the expansion of due process to protect privacy prefer not to recognize the relationship of modern law to the now discredited doctrine of freedom of contract, but noneconomic (or social) substantive due process is organically connected to its economic precursor. Case by case, the liberty protected by due process became successively liberty (or freedom) of contract and then a growing array of civil liberties, collectively described as the right to privacy. The connection is obscured by the fact that the Supreme Court, in keeping with its constitutional about-face in the 1930s, acted for some time as if substantive due process had lost its vitality. In Ferguson v. Skrupa (1963), for example, the justices declared: “We emphatically refuse to go back to the time when courts used the due process clause ‘to strike down state laws, regulatory of business and industrial conditions, because they may be unwise, improvident, or out of harmony with a particular school of thought.’” So it is not surprising that two years later when the court in Griswold v. Connecticut (1965) invalidated state statutes outlawing the distribution of birth control materials to married persons, now recognized as a substantive due process decision, rationalized its holding instead by a complicated theory of privacy protected by the “penumbras,” or shadows, cast by a variety of rights enumerated in the Bill of Rights—notably not including the due process guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment.

A further complicating factor is illustrated by the use made in Griswold of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Because the Bill of Rights applies only to action by the federal government and because it specifies a number of rights not included in the text of the Fourteenth Amendment, which applies only to state action, the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment has become a vehicle through which most of the Bill of Rights is applied to the states. The Fourteenth Amendment is said to “incorporate” the Bill of Rights, a doctrine that may be seen as a judicial response to the criticism that substantive due process is vague and standardless: reference to the rights enumerated in the Bill of Rights adds a degree of specificity. The decision in Rochin v. California (1952), for example, that use by state law enforcement officers of incriminating evidence obtained by pumping the stomach of an unwilling suspect violated due process because it “shocks the conscience” could now be explained more straightforwardly as a violation of the privilege against self-incrimination in the Fifth Amendment, applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. When the only role of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment is to incorporate parts of the Bill of Rights, due process is not substantive in the usual sense of that word; that is, it is not itself the source of the constitutional limitations. The incorporation doctrine has led to the rapid development of rights once protected by an undifferentiated due process; for example, the takings clause of the Fifth Amendment, prohibiting the government from taking private property for public purposes without just compensation, has been invoked in challenges to state regulations that would formerly have been scrutinized for deprivations of property without due process of law. Indeed, it may be that emptying due process of much of what once was considered its content and leaving it as a residual category, invoked in only the most controversial cases, explains many of the difficulties surrounding its current use.

When a few years after Griswold its holding was extended to unmarried persons in Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972), now also recognized as a substantive due process decision, the result was technically justified as an application of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The same law, it was held, must be applied to married and unmarried couples alike, but in explaining the court's decision, Justice William J. Brennan implicated issues beyond equality of treatment: "If the right of privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child." Thus was the stage set for the abortion decision that soon followed—and for a more self-conscious development of substantive due process as a guarantee of the individual's noneconomic (or social) interests. All that was required for the latter was for the right of privacy to emerge from the shadows and be recognized as an aspect of liberty and for due process to recover its role not only as a guarantee of procedural fairness but also as a safeguard against "unwarranted" government action.

The year after Eisenstadt, in Roe v. Wade (1973), the court summarily held state laws banning almost all abortions "violative of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment." A more comprehensive statement was attempted two decades later in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992), largely reaffirming Roe and explaining that the liberty protected by due process included "personal decisions relating to marriage, procreation, contraception, family relationships, child rearing, and education." To intrude into such personal decisions the state needed a compelling reason. An invitation to extend the list to include homosexual sexual activity ("gay rights") had been rejected in Bowers v. Hardwick in 1986, only to be accepted later in Lawrence v. Texas (2003), which overruled Bowers and held state sodomy laws unconstitutional. The guarantee of due process is not found only in the federal constitution nor is the development of substantive due process a monopoly of federal courts. In Goodridge v. Department of Public Health (2003), the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, extending the reasoning in Lawrence, held that the state's refusal to recognize the marriage of same-sex couples was a violation of the due process protected by the state constitution's law-of-the-land clause. Due process, in the nineteenth century the watchdog of the free market, when freedom of contract had created a zone around the individual of what we would today call, if not privacy, at least autonomy, had become in the twentieth century the guardian of autonomy in intimate relations.

Whether the liberty protected by due process will be extended to other personal matters remains to be seen. In 1977 in Whalen v. Roe, the Supreme Court rejected a challenge to state collection and storage of confidential medical information as not a violation of privacy where the state had reasonable grounds for creating the databank and took adequate measures to secure it from misuse, and twenty years later in Washington v. Glucksberg (1997) an argument to recognize the right of the terminally ill to physician assistance in the commission of suicide ("the right to die") was narrowly rejected. Economic interests retain some residual due process protections. In BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore (1996) the court rejected excessive punitive damages, ostensibly because of a failure to give adequate notice, a violation of procedural due process, although some observers, including two dissenting justices, thought the case was better understood as a revival of economic substantive due process.

Objections to the latest iteration of substantive due process resemble those once voiced against freedom of contract. To textualists the results seem remote from the bare words of the constitution, as indeed they are. Due process encoded a whole tradition of constitutionalism, as well as a common law dynamic of development; the phrase has always required considerable judicial explication. More serious is the complaint that using due process to fill gaps left by enumerated rights, justifiable in the case of obvious procedural abuses like the self-interested judge, becomes, when extended to the recognition of unenumerated rights, an invitation to a judicial majority to write its own preferences into the constitution. Freedom of contract was to one generation of judges what the right to privacy is to another. The response must be to emphasize the cautious and incremental nature of the judicial development: from case to case the linkages are reasonably sound. The disagreement may depend on the exact point of departure. Relevant here is Justice Antonin Scalia's insistence, vehemently voiced in his dissenting opinion in Lawrence, that judges should be guided in their development of substantive due process by "history and tradition," rather than by "law-profession culture" with its tendency to "carry things to their logical conclusion." The disagreement, in other words, is not about whether there are unenumerated rights protected from arbitrary government action by the requirement of due process—constitutional democracy means limits on government, and rights enumerated in written constitutions can never be comprehensive—but what exactly they are or should be.

JOHN V. ORTH

References and Further Reading

- Orth, John V. Due Process of Law: A Brief History. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.
- Phillips, Michael J. The Lochner Court, Myth and Reality: Substantive Due Process from the 1890s to the 1930s. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001.
- Strong, Frank R. Substantive Due Process of Law: A Dichotomy of Sense and Nonsense. Durham: Carolina Academic Press, 1986.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adkins v. Children's Hospital*, 261 U.S. 525 (1923)
- Allgeyer v. Louisiana*, 165 U.S. 578 (1897)
- BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore*, 517 U.S. 559 (1996)
- Bowers v. Hardwick*, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
- Dred Scott Case*, 60 U.S. 393 (1857)
- Eisenstadt v. Baird*, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)
- Ferguson v. Skrupa*, 372 U.S. 726 (1963)
- Goodridge v. Department of Public Health*, __ N.E.2d __ (Mass. 2003)
- Ives v. South Buffalo Railway Co.*, 194 N.E. 431 (N.Y. 1911)
- Lawrence v. Texas*, __ U.S. __ (2003)
- Lochner v. New York*, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
- Meyer v. Nebraska*, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)
- Pierce v. Society of Sisters*, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
- Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey*, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
- Rochin v. California*, 342 U.S. 165 (1952)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Slaughterhouse Cases*, 83 U.S. 36 (1873)
- Tumey v. Ohio*, 273 U.S. 510 (1928)
- United States v. Carolene Products Co.*, 304 U.S. 144 (1938)
- Washington v. Glucksberg*, 521 U.S. 702 (1997)
- West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish*, 300 U.S. 379 (1937)
- Whalen v. Roe*, 429 U.S. 589 (1977)
- Wynehamer v. People*, 12 N.Y. 378 (1856)

SUMNER, CHARLES (1811–1874)

Charles Sumner—legendary Senator from Massachusetts, antislavery leader, and civil rights activist—was born in Boston on January 6, 1811. His parents, Charles Pinckney Sumner, a graduate of Harvard College who studied law under Josiah Quincy and became sheriff of Suffolk County in 1826, and Relief Jacob, a seamstress, were both descendants of Puritan settlers who arrived in Massachusetts Bay in the 1630s. They had nine children, including Charles and his twin sister Matilda. Sumner remained a bachelor until 1866 when he married Alice Mason Hooper, a wealthy young widow. The childless couple separated within a year and divorced in 1873.

Charles received his early education from an aunt who taught the Sumner children in their home. At the age of ten, he entered the Boston Latin School where he delighted in reading the classics. He attended Harvard College from 1826 to 1830. He was an average student and never ranked in the top third of his class. He had difficulty in mathematics but enjoyed public speaking. In 1831, Sumner entered Harvard Law School. He studied under Joseph Story and became the Supreme Court Associate Justice's favorite pupil. Completing his coursework in 1833, Sumner received his Bachelor of Laws and was admitted to the bar in 1834. In the same year, he visited the South for the first time and remarked on the harsh treatment of African Americans held in bondage in the nation's capital. During the next three years, he practiced law with his friend and associate George S. Hilliard, acted as a Federal Circuit Court Reporter, lectured at Harvard Law School, and edited The American Jurist. In late 1837, Sumner embarked on a twenty-month European tour.

Returning to America in 1840, Sumner signed a contract to edit twenty volumes of Francis Veysey's chancery reports and plunged into a wide range of civic activities. He joined forces with William Ellery Channing, the untiring Boston reformer, and became an outspoken advocate of penal reform and a leader in the city's antislavery movement. Sumner demanded that the federal government outlaw slavery in the District of Columbia and the territories, eliminate the coastal and interstate slave trade, and repeal the Fugitive Slave Law. He joined the Emigration Society, supported Horace Mann's drive for educational reform, and became involved in the American Peace Society. In 1845, he delivered a Fourth of July oration entitled "The True Grandeur of Nations" in which he called for international peace and the moral elevation of man.

In the mid-1840s, Sumner became an outspoken Conscience Whig and attacked fellow Whigs with ties to textile manufacturing, who failed to support the antislavery cause. He railed against alliances between "the lords of the lash" and "the lords of the loom." He denounced the annexation of Texas as a scheme to expand the power of slaveholders, and he opposed the Mexican War. As the leader of the Conscience Whigs in the late 1840s, he was instrumental in forging an alliance with Free Soilers and antislavery Democrats, which later contributed to his election to the United States Senate.

In 1849, Sumner pleaded his most famous legal case. In Roberts v. City of Boston (1849), he represented the parents of a five-year black student, Sarah Roberts, and challenged racial segregation in Boston's schools. Arguing that separate could not be equal and emphasizing the adverse effects of segregated schools on both black and white children, Sumner presented arguments that were developed more than a century later in the landmark case of Brown v. Board of Education (1954).

In the early 1850s, Sumner took his antislavery campaign to the national stage. He attacked the constitutionality of the Compromise of 1850, including the new Fugitive Slave Law, which he considered a violation of the Fifth and Seventh Amendments guaranteeing life and liberty and the right to trial by jury. Elected to the United States Senate as a Free Soil senator in 1851, Sumner stepped up his attack on slavery by calling for the nullification of the Fugitive Slave Law. He emerged as a strong voice against any compromise on slaveholding, rejecting Stephen Douglas's "popular sovereignty" and the Crittenden proposal. Sumner's "Freedom National," "Crime Against Kansas," and "Barbarism of Slavery" speeches fueled an emotionally charged discourse against slavery. His branding of Senator Butler as the Don Quixote of slavery precipitated the infamous assault on him in the Senate by Senator Preston Brooks, Butler's cousin and fellow South Carolinian. Brook's caning of Sumner produced the campaign rhetoric "Bleeding Kansas Bleeding Sumner" in 1856. Despite an extended vacation, including time in Europe, Sumner never fully recovered from the physical and psychological effects of the attack by Brooks.

Appointed Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in early 1861, Sumner became a strong proponent of emancipation during the Civil War, arguing that freeing the slaves would mobilize support for the North in England and ensure peaceful relations with European powers. After President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, he joined with Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony to push for a complete abolition of slavery through constitutional amendment. He headed the Senate Committee on Slavery and Freedmen and supported the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments, although he did not have a hand in drafting them. Embracing a political philosophy of "equality before the law," he sought to remove restrictions on black testimony in federal courts and overturn the Supreme Court's Dred Scott decision. He protested against the segregation of streetcars in Washington, D.C., and demanded equal pay for African-American troops. An outspoken Radical Republican, Sumner opposed President Johnson's Reconstruction program and deplored the emergence of Black Codes in the South. He advocated congressional control of Reconstruction, advanced black suffrage as a condition for the reentry of seceded states, and sought to secure freedmen access to education and homesteads. He called for the enfranchisement of African Americans in the North and as a condition for the entry of new states.

Sumner's stand on the "Alabama claims" against Britain and his opposition to President Grant's proposed annexation of the Dominican Republic led to his alienation from the administration and most Republicans. Removed as chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in 1871, he devoted the remainder of his career to civil rights. After his fourth failed attempt to push a comprehensive civil rights bill through Congress, he left the Republican Party and supported Horace Greely in the 1872 presidential election, distancing himself from many long-time supporters, including African Americans. After an unsuccessful attempt to mend fences with Republicans in 1873, he tabled his "battle flags resolution" calling for the removal of the names of battles with fellow citizens from the Army's register, which resulted in his further alienation and a censure by the Massachusetts legislature. In his final years, he failed to obtain support for his civil rights bill, which he reintroduced in the Senate for the last time in December 1873. He demonstrated increasing sympathy for the political rights of women and supported Susan B. Anthony's call for extending the vote to women. One hour before his death in Washington on March 11, 1874, he urged onlookers, including Frederick Douglass, to work for the passage of his civil rights bill.

GORDON S. BARKER

References and Further Reading

- Donald, David Herbert. Charles Sumner. New York: Da Capo Press, 1996.
- Pierce, Edward Lillie. Memoirs and Letters of Charles Sumner. Miami, FL: Mnemosyne Pub. Co., 1969.
- Sumner, Charles. The Selected Letters of Charles Sumner, edited by Beverly Wilson Palmer. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1990.
- . The Works of Charles Sumner. Boston: Lee and Shepard, 1870–1873.
- Taylor, Anne-Marie. Young Charles Sumner and the Legacy of the American Enlightenment, 1811–1851. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2001.

SUNDAY CLOSING CASES AND LAWS

Introduction

Sunday Closing Laws, also called "Blue Laws," regulate public and private conduct on Sundays. The legal and cultural significance of Blue Laws peaked in early American history, when they mandated church attendance and prohibited activities including working, making contracts, playing sports, and traveling on Sundays. Vestiges of Sunday Closing Laws remain part of American law in many communities, commonly requiring businesses to close or otherwise refrain from selling alcoholic beverages or other products on Sundays.

Development of Sunday Closing Laws

Sunday Closing Laws are rooted in the Judeo-Christian religious commandment to keep the Sabbath day holy. The Christian Sabbath shifted from Saturday to Sunday during the reign of the Roman emperor Constantine, who was also the first to codify a Sunday Closing Law in A.D. 321. England instituted Sunday Closing Laws as early as the thirteenth century, from which early American Sunday Closing Laws drew their inspiration.

American colonists enacted Blue Laws soon after settlement. For example, beginning in 1650, the Plymouth Colony proscribed servile work, unnecessary travel, and the sale of alcoholic beverages on the “Lord’s day.” By the time of the Constitution’s adoption, each of the states had laws restricting activities on Sunday, many of which expressly stated their purpose was to promote Christian worship. After the Constitution’s ratification, Blue Laws took on a more secular tone. For example, a 1788 New York Blue Law omitted “Lord’s day” and substituted “the first day of the week commonly called Sunday.” In the nineteenth and early twentieth century, Blue Laws remained part of statutory law in every state but became decreasingly enforced.

Incorporation Doctrine and Sunday Closing Laws

Until the middle of the twentieth century, when the Bill of Rights became applicable to the states through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, courts deciding the legality of cases challenging Blue Laws were not obligated to address conflicts between state laws and the Constitution. However, the incorporation of the federal constitution to individual states changed the manner in which courts reviewed Sunday Closing Laws and resulted in the Supreme Court overturning state laws that violated the First Amendment. The first post-incorporation challenges to Blue Laws were heard in a series of cases decided by the United States Supreme Court in 1961.

Sunday Closing Laws and the Supreme Court: Establishment Clause Cases

In the leading 1961 case, McGowan v. Maryland, the Supreme Court reviewed a Maryland statute that restricted the sale of some products on Sunday. The appellants were employees of a department store indicted for Sunday sales of items forbidden by the Maryland Law. The employees contended that the Maryland statute violated the First Amendment’s establishment clause, which forbids the government from making any law establishing a state religion (or, under some interpretations, it forbids preferential treatment of one religion over another). The McGowan appellants alleged the statute violated the establishment clause by promoting religions that celebrated a Sunday Sabbath over those that did not. The Court rejected this argument, reasoning that although historically Blue Laws had a religious motivation to effectuate concepts of Christian theology, “[i]n light of the evolution of our Sunday Closing Laws through the centuries, and of their more or less recent emphasis upon secular considerations, it is not difficult to discern that as presently written and administered, most of them, at least, are of a secular rather than of a religious character, and that presently they bear no relationship to establishment of religion . . .” The Supreme Court further reasoned that “the fact that this [prescribed day of rest] is Sunday, a day of particular significance for the dominant Christian sects, does not bar the State from achieving its secular goals. To say that the States cannot prescribe Sunday as a day of rest for these purposes solely because centuries ago such laws had their genesis in religion would give a constitutional interpretation of hostility to the public welfare rather than one of mere separation of church and State.” The reasoning from McGowan—that Sunday Closing Laws are valid protections of a secular interest in creating a universal day of rest—received support in a more recent case, Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, Inc. In that case, a state statute requiring employers to honor the Sabbath day of the employee’s choice, even if that day were not Sunday, was held invalid as having the primary effect of promoting religion by weighing the employee’s Sabbath choice over all other interests and therefore violated the establishment clause.

Sunday Closing Laws and the Supreme Court: Free Exercise Cases

In two cases decided on the same day in 1961 as McGowan, the Supreme Court also upheld Sunday Closing Laws as constitutional under the free exercise clause of the First Amendment, which requires a compelling government interest to restrict religious activities. In both Braunfeld v. Brown and Gallagher v. Crown Kosher Market, the adverse effect of the challenged Sunday Closing Laws were to force individuals who did not celebrate a Sunday Sabbath to keep their businesses closed on Sundays. In both cases, the Court held that the challenged Blue Laws were valid because they used the least restrictive means to meet the compelling government interest of creating a universal day of rest. The Court reasoned that because the fact that a person also opted to close their business on Saturdays for religious reasons is an economic disadvantage that was “solely an indirect burden on the observance of religion” and not a government regulation that restricted anyone’s ability to celebrate their religion.

Conclusion

Blue Laws were enacted in the United States as religiously based statutes designed to promote the Christian Sabbath. Despite the initially religious motivation behind Blue Laws, the United States Supreme Court has modernly upheld Sunday Closing Laws as constitutional because they support a valid secular purpose under the First Amendment’s free exercise clause by encouraging a universal day of rest. Likewise, the Supreme Court has also upheld Blue Laws on establishment clause grounds because the laws do not promote one religion over another.

GABRIEL H. TENINBAUM

References and Further Reading

- Harris, George. E. A Treatise on Sunday Laws: The Sabbath—the Lord’s Day, Its History and Observance: Civil and Criminal. Rochester: Lawyers’ Co-operative Publishing Co., 1892 (reprinted 1980).
- Johns, Warren L. Dateline Sunday, U.S.A.: The Story of Three and a Half Centuries of Sunday-law Battles in America. Mountain View: Pacific Press Publishers Association, 1967.
- McCrosen, Alexis. Holy Day, Holiday: The American Sunday. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Braunfeld v. Brown*, 366 U.S. 599 (1961) (plurality opinion)
- Estate of Thornton v. Calder, Inc.*, 472 U.S. 703 (1985)
- Gallagher v. Crown Kosher Market*, 366 U.S. 617 (May 29, 1961)
- McGowan v. Maryland*, 366 U.S. 420 (1961)
- Two Guys v. McGinley*, 366 U.S. 582 (1961)

See also Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Incorporation Doctrine; Religion in the Workplace

SUNDAY MAIL (1810–1830)

The opening of post offices on Sunday for the sorting and collection of mail led to a national debate about the relationship of the federal government to the Sabbath day. The argument, which raged from 1810 to 1830, involved whether the national government would exist as a secular commercial republic committed to a separation of church and state or as a Christian commonwealth.

The battle over Sunday mail began in Washington, Pennsylvania, in 1809. The town postmaster, Hugh Wylie, followed the widespread custom of sorting the mail and keeping the post office open on Sunday to allow churchgoers from neighboring towns to pick up their mail after attending church. In this day of primitive transportation and poor roads, many families only came to town on Sunday for church services. For keeping the post office open, the Pittsburgh synod of the Presbyterian Church expelled Wylie. The U.S. postmaster general, Gideon Granger, responded by persuading Congress in 1810 to pass legislation that opened all 2,300 post offices for seven days a week and moved mail every day.

Congress immediately began to receive petitions urging repeal of the law from Presbyterians, Lutherans, Episcopalians, Baptists, Congregationalists, and Unitarians. Granger and his successor, Return J. Meigs, were less committed to the post offices remaining open on Sunday than to the transportation of the mail on Sunday. However, the petitioners were unwilling to separate the two issues of Sunday opening and Sunday transportation.

To suspend mail movement on Sunday would damage commerce, as both Granger and Meigs argued. Merchants relied on the rapid, consistent transmission of market information from city to city that could only be provided through the mails. In addition, relations with Great Britain, France, and Spain were strained at this time, and both men raised the national security argument. Granger and Meigs argued that public officials needed to be notified as quickly as possible about events that might affect their constituents. Foreign agents might outrace the federal government with sensitive news if Sunday mail transportation was stopped. Last, both postmasters mentioned the cost issue. Mail coaches often carried passengers with paid fares subsidizing mail transportation. If coaches were forced to stop on Sundays, passengers might find other transportation, and postal rates would therefore increase. The arguments convinced Congress to refuse repeal. All of the bills supporting repeal died by 1817 with no bill even coming to a vote.

In 1828, the General Union for the Promotion of the Christian Sabbath (GUPCS) launched a well-organized attack on the Postal Act of 1810. The group mobilized merchants to challenge the commercial argument for Sunday mail. It circulated more than 100,000 copies of an anti-Sunday mail talk delivered by the Reverend Lyman Beecher, a founder of the Union. GUPCS boycotted all companies that ran coaches, boats, or canal packets on Sunday, with New Jersey members once stopping a mail coach and forcing the driver to stay in town until Monday morning. Members also circulated petitions. By 1831, GUPCS supporters had sent 900 petitions to Congress with most containing twenty to fifty signatures.

The GUPCS members chiefly argued that moving and delivering the mail on Sunday violated God's will and that such sinful behavior threatened the future of the nation. The right of states to regulate their own affairs without federal interference was also raised, because religious issues were left in other respects to the states. Other GUPCS members insisted that the federal government lacked the constitutional power to authorize the violation of the Sabbath.

Defenders of Sunday mail repeated the commercial arguments in petitions to Congress. Many merchants, especially those far removed from the major seaports, wrote about delays in receiving the latest information on market fluctuations. They wanted to have an equal advantage with Boston and New York merchants. They argued that government should properly be concerned with worldly goods and not with otherworldly salvation.

Under strong pressure from the public, House and Senate committees formed to study the postal law. While the chairman of the House committee waffled on the subject, the head of the Senate committee swayed Congress to keep the law. General Richard

M. Johnson of Kentucky, a devout Baptist, wrote in the committee's 1829 report that congressional action to stop Sunday mail would be unconstitutional. Johnson reminded Americans that they had religious freedom and that government had no right to coerce the religious homage of anyone.

The invention of the telegraph in 1844 ultimately spelled the end of Sunday mail. It was now possible to get market information without using the mails. By the 1850s, postmaster generals were eliminating most Sunday movement of mail.

CARYN E. NEUMANN

References and Further Reading

Kramnick, Isaac, and R. Laurence Moore. The Godless Constitution: The Case against Religious Correctness. New York: W.W. Norton, 1996.

See also Religion in "Public Square" Debate

SUPREMACY CLAUSE IN ARTICLE VI OF THE CONSTITUTION

The supremacy clause is found in Article VI, clause 2, of the United States Constitution. It states: "This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, of which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding."

Under the supremacy clause, any state law that conflicts with the Constitution or with a federal law or treaty made in pursuance of the Constitution is void. It also binds state judges to federal law.

During the debates over the Constitution, the supremacy clause stood at the forefront of the battles over federalism—the distribution of power between the federal and state governments. At issue, how the authority of the national government would be enforced against state interference. One proposal was premised on coercion, whereas another gave the national government a veto on state laws, both not easy sells to the states who were losing power. A third proposal was premised on the judiciary enforcing state laws, but there was a debate over whether it would be the sole responsibility of the federal courts or whether it would be split between the federal and state courts. Allowing state judges to have a role in enforcing federal law would help assuage some of the controversy of having a domineering federal judiciary enforcing national supremacy.

During the ratification debates, critics of the Constitution pointed to the supremacy clause as enhancing the powers of an omnipotent Congress. Critics cited Article I, Section 8, of the Constitution, which gave Congress the power to “make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution” its powers. Congress was free to pass any law, claim it was “necessary and proper,” and couch it in the supremacy clause as something “in pursuance” of the Constitution. The absence of a Bill of Rights confounded the problem, because Congress could deny the people their rights and freedoms contained in the state constitutions and bills of rights. Congress would be the sole judge of its own powers, and the supremacy clause would result in the annihilation of the states.

After ratification, Chief Justice John Marshall used the supremacy clause as a means to enhance national supremacy by means of the Supreme Court. In McCulloch v. Maryland (1819), the Court argued that the federal government had the constitutional right to create a Bank of the United States, which could not be subject to taxation by the states. In Gibbons v. Ogden (1824), the Court invoked the supremacy clause to chastise the states for not yielding to the supremacy of Congress’ power over interstate commerce. In Worcester v. Georgia (1832), the Court voided all of Georgia’s laws that were repugnant to the supremacy of the laws and treaties enacted by Congress in relation to the Cherokee Indians. When the Fugitive Slave Act was before the Court in Ableman v. Booth (1858), Chief Justice Roger Taney upheld the constitutionality of the Act and condemned the Wisconsin Supreme Court for interfering with the enforcement of federal laws.

The supremacy clause is at the heart of the Court’s recent federalism decisions denouncing Congress for ordering the states to enforce federal laws not made in pursuance of the Constitution. In New York v. United States (1992), the Court found the Low Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments of 1985, which commanded the states to enforce a federal regulatory program, unconstitutional. In United States v. Lopez (1995), the Court found that Gun-Free School Zones Act (1990), which forbade the possession of a firearm in a school zone, violated interstate commerce. In Printz v. United States (1997), the Court ruled that Congress could not force states to enforce the Brady Handgun Violence Protection Act by performing background checks on potential buyers. In City of Boerne v. Flores (1997), the Court struck down the Religious Freedom Restoration Act on the grounds that Congress had exceeded its powers to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment against the states.

The supremacy clause established the supremacy of federal laws and gave the courts the power to determine whether the federal and state governments were acting in accordance with the Constitution. In the early Republic, the Supreme Court used it as a means to promote national supremacy. The Court’s recent federalism cases show a different trend, which have the effect of promoting state supremacy.

RANDA CAROLYN ISSA

References and Further Reading

- Bailyn, Bernard, ed. The Debate on the Constitution: Federalist and Antifederalist Speeches, Articles, and Letters During the Struggle Over Ratification. 2 vols. New York: Literary Classics of the United States, 1993.
- Rakove, Jack. Original Meanings: Politics and Ideas in the Making of the Constitution. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Ableman v. Booth*, 21 Howard 506 (1858)
- City of Boerne v. Flores*, 117 St. Ct. 2157 (1997)
- Gibbons v. Ogden*, 9 Wheaton (U.S.) 1 (1824)
- McCulloch v. Maryland*, 4 Wheaton 316 (1819)
- New York v. United States*, 505 U.S. 144 (1992)
- Printz v. United States*, 521 U.S. 898 (1997)
- United States v. Lopez*, 514 U.S. 549 (1995)
- Worcester v. Georgia*, 31 U.S. 515 (1832)

SUSPENDED RIGHT OF HABEAS CORPUS

Despite limitations placed on its availability by more recent legislation, the “Great Writ” remains our system’s fundamental safeguard for the individual’s protection against imprisonment without legal cause. The restriction on the suspension of the writ found in Article I, section 9, clause 2, of the Constitution of the United States provides that “[t]he privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion if the public safety may require it.” Although this provision applies only to the federal government, similar limitations on suspension of the writ now exist in state constitutions.

The inclusion of this provision within the limitations on the powers of the legislature would seem to suggest any authority to suspend the writ rests with Congress, not the executive. This logic is also consistent with the fact the writ typically issues to address unlawful detentions by the crown or executive. However, President Lincoln suspended the writ by executive order in several jurisdictions during the Civil War. Chief Justice Taney, sitting as Circuit Justice in Ex parte Merryman, 17 Fed. Cas. 144 (no. 9487) (Cir. Ct. D. Md. 1861), held that if the executive acting alone could suspend the writ, it would undermine the writ's very purpose. Lincoln's action was ratified with limitations by an act of Congress in 1863. More than a hundred years later President Roosevelt approved suspension of the writ in Hawaii after the attack on Pearl Harbor. When the legality of the suspension reached the Supreme Court in Duncan v. Kahanamoku, 327 U.S. 304 (1946), the privilege had been restored two years earlier, and the court found this issue moot. Thus, this question has not been clearly resolved, and other precedents involving restrictions on liberty by the executive in time of war have been offered to support the executive's authority to suspend the writ. See, for example, Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944).

In Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 2 (1866), the Supreme Court stated, "The suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus does not suspend the writ itself." Under this interpretation the individual may petition for the writ, the writ can issue, and the court then decide whether the individual is allowed to proceed further. This approach seems to provide some safeguards for the individual in custody, but it must be noted it would only be available if the civil courts were open and operating.

VANCE L. COWDEN

References and Further Reading

- Duker, William F. A Constitutional History of Habeas Corpus. Westport: Greenwood Press, 1980.
 Jackson, Jeffrey, The Power to Suspend Habeas Corpus: An Answer from the Arguments Surrounding Ex parte Merryman, 34 U. Baltimore Law Review 11 (2004).
 Rehnquist, William H. All the Laws but One. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1998.
 Sokol, Richard P. Federal Habeas Corpus. 2nd ed. Charlottesville: Michie, 1969.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Duncan v. Kahanamoku*, 327 U.S. 304 (1946)
Ex parte Merryman, 17 Fed. Cas., 144 (no. 9487) (Cir. Ct. D. Md. 1861)
Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 2 (1866)
Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944)

SWAIN v. ALABAMA, 380 U.S. 202 (1965)

In Swain v. Alabama, the U.S. Supreme Court addressed the question whether a conviction of a Negro by an all-white jury violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. At issue:

did the state's systematic exclusion of persons from juries solely on the basis of race and color constitute a denial of the equal protection of the laws under the Constitution? Robert Swain was convicted and sentenced to death for rape by an all-white Alabama jury. In a five-to-four decision, the Court ruled (1) a criminal defendant is not constitutionally entitled to a proportionate number of his race on the jury or on the pool of potential jurors; (2) a prosecutor's use of preemptory challenges to exclude black jurors without cause was permissible, because the original intent of the challenge was to allow both the prosecution and the defense the opportunity to remove any juror regardless of race so as to constitute an impartial jury; (3) the fact that a Negro had never served on a criminal or civil jury in Talladega County was not indicative of invidious discrimination. Although the Court recognized that the exclusion of Negroes from this county was suspicious and subject to judicial scrutiny under the Fourteenth Amendment, the record was silent on whether the prosecutor alone was responsible for striking Negroes from the jury or whether defendants themselves invoked the preemptory challenge to exclude Negroes. This decision was overturned by the Court in Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986).

RANDA CAROLYN ISSA

See also Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986); Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Jury Trial; Jury Trial Right; Race and Criminal Justice

S. WARREN AND L. BRANDEIS, "THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY," 4 HARVARD L. REV. 193 (1890)

Samuel Warren and Louis Brandeis attempted to define a right to privacy long before the Supreme Court or other judicial bodies in the United States offered the concept any credibility. They defined privacy variously: the right to "an inviolate personality," the "immunity of the person," the right to "one's personality," "rights as against the world," or "the privacy of a private life." All of these were summed up in their simple label, "the right to be let alone." Warren and Brandeis conceived of a right to privacy that protected individuals from intrusion by other people or organizations. However, when their words began to be echoed in Supreme Court decisions, the right to privacy was treated as a bar to governmental intrusion. In that form, the right to privacy was eventually acknowledged by the Court in 1965 in Griswold v. Connecticut. It was, according to the Court, implied by provisions of various limitations on government listed in the Bill of Rights. This Warren and Brandeis article is generally regarded as originating the concept in American common law, although Judge Thomas Cooley had also discussed a "right to be left alone" in civil law enforcement in his 1888 The Law of Torts.

Although the right to privacy would later become associated with aspects of family, education, marriage, procreation, sexual intimacy, and aspects of personal autonomy, in their article Warren and Brandeis argued for protection from publication of gossip in newspapers and unauthorized circulation of a person's portrait. Notably, their interest in writing this article derived from a perceived invasion of the privacy of Samuel Warren's family. Although no "right to privacy" was specifically authorized by Constitution or by statute, Warren and Brandeis argued that "liberty," as addressed in the Constitution, subsumed the "right to enjoy life," "to be let alone," and that the elasticity and adaptability of the common law could and should recognize the right to privacy in light of new technologies that progressively threatened one's solitude and private life.

Warren and Brandeis considered the viability of using existing legal concepts, such as defamation, libel, and slander or property rights, breach of trust, confidence or contract and trade secrets. All were found lacking the ability to protect, for example, from publication notes written in a personal diary, letters sent to friends, artistic works or photographs taken without one's knowledge. The law of defamation was found wanting, because it only addressed material value of, for example, loss of one's reputation. It could not, however, provide redress for a spiritual loss, for the loss of how one feels about oneself; it could not comprehend the anxiety that something might be published or the sense of relief when it was not. Similarly, property laws focused on material, rather than emotional, damages. Publication of one's private writing or artistic works or photographs could not properly be addressed under the law governing breach of trust, confidence, or contract, because it could not be applied to a stranger who has made no contract or accepted any trust. Nor could trade secret law apply, because that would require the assumption that confidence had been placed in the person who may have trespassed to obtain the exposed work.

Interestingly, Warren and Brandeis drew heavily on English court decisions, where various questions of publication of private materials without the consent of the author or artist had been raised and decided. A principle case on which they relied was that of Prince Albert v. Strange treating an instance when a catalog of etchings made for the personal enjoyment of the Prince and Queen Victoria had been published. The English judges applied the common law principle of property law to protect the etchings from unauthorized publication. The difficulty lay, however, in the assessment of value to unpublished works by people of lesser note than the Queen of England and her husband. Indeed, very few examples were drawn from U.S. courts, primarily because there was no acknowledged right to privacy. Warren and Brandeis even reached beyond common law to note that France had passed a law according a limited right to privacy in 1868.

Warren and Brandeis proposed that American common law should likewise recognize a right to privacy as the "principle which protects personal writing and any other production of the intellect or the emotions." They asserted this right, but they also recognized limitations and prohibitions on it. The limits they listed were: (1) the publication did not involve a matter of public or general interest, (2) the publication would be privileged under the law of libel or slander, (3) privacy did not extend to oral publication in the absence of special damages, (4) privacy right ceased on publication, (5) the veracity of a statement is not a defense, and (6) the absence of malice is not a defense. They proposed that remedies for violations of the right to privacy would be through normal tort procedures or, when appropriate, the use of an injunction.

One year after publication of "The Right to Privacy," Justice Horace Gray of the U.S. Supreme Court cited the "inviolability of the person" to conclude that an alleged victim of an accident could not be forced to undergo surgical examination of her brain to determine the extent the head injuries that she had sustained. Later, when Louis Brandeis was himself a Supreme Court Justice, he relied on the "right to be let alone" in his dissenting opinion in Olmstead v. U.S. In that case of government wiretapping in connection with a criminal investigation, Brandeis argued that both Amendment Four's protection against illegal searches and seizures and Amendment Five's guarantee against self-incrimination implied a right to privacy, "the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized man."

The Warren and Brandeis conception of a right to privacy survived in a broad sense of a sense of a "right to be let alone," but decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court adopted the term, first, in the context of search and seizure cases and, later, in matters of marriage, family, and procreation. The thrust of the Warren and Brandeis formulation was to protect individuals from intrusions by other private entities, whereas the Supreme Court has turned the concept to protect the individual from governmental invasions.

MARY L. VOLCANSEK

References and Further Reading

Emerson, Thomas I., Nine Justices in Search of a Doctrine, Michigan Law Review 64 (1965): 219–234.
O'Brien, David M. Privacy, Law and Public Policy. New York: Praeger, 1979.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Griswold v. Connecticut, 318 U.S. 479 (1965)
Olmstead v. U.S., 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
Prince Albert v. Strange, 1 McN. & G. 23 (1849)

SWEARINGER v. UNITED STATES, 161 U.S. 446 (1896)

The Supreme Court reversed the conviction of Dan K. Swearingen, editor and publisher of the Kansas Burlington Courier, who ran afoul a federal law, strengthened in 1873 at the urgings of the newly formed Committee (later Society) for the Suppression of Vice as well as the Young Men's Christian Association, prohibiting the mailing of "every obscene, lewd, lascivious, or filthy book, pamphlet, picture, paper, letter writing, print, or other publication of an indecent character." Swearingen was indicted under this law, which became known as the Comstock Act (named after its author, Anthony Comstock) and charged with depositing in the post office copies of the Courier that contained an allegedly obscene article. The trial judge had instructed the jury that the newspaper article was obscene and thus not mailable under federal law; he then charged the jury to consider only whether there was evidence that Swearingen tried to use the post office to mail the newspaper with the offending article.

This case, although ostensibly about obscenity, also reflected the use of the law to squelch political opponents. Political turmoil and hard-hitting politics were common during the 1890s. In Kansas and throughout much of the West and South, farmers and their agrarian allies created "populist movements" and the new Populist Party, pitting themselves against the railroads. Throughout the decade the reformers, who were often successful at the polls, sought restrictions on intrastate rail operations, primarily in the form of maximum freight rates. Against this tumultuous backdrop, Swearingen, a populist, published an article attacking a foe.

This "red-headed mental and physical bastard," according to the Courier's article, had "slandered and maligned every Populist in the State, from the Governor down to the humblest voter." The article, among other things, went to say that the culprit "is known to every decent man, woman, and child in the community as a liar, perjurer, and slanderer, who would sell a mother's honor with less hesitancy and for much less silver than Judas betrayed the Saviour . . . He is a contemptible scoundrel . . . pretending to serve Democracy and is at the same time in the pay of the Republican party. He has been known as the companion of negro strumpets . . . The sooner Populists and Populist newspapers snub him, quit him cold, ignore him entirely, the sooner will he cease to be thought of only as a pimp that any man can buy for $1 or less."

The Supreme Court, by a five-to-four margin, disagreed the article was obscene. According to the majority, the article's "language is exceedingly coarse and vulgar, and, as applied to an individual person, plainly libelous" and then added, echoing the Hicklin Rule, "but we cannot perceive in it anything of a lewd, lascivious, and obscene tendency, calculated to corrupt and debauch the minds and morals of those into whose hands it might fall." In other words, crude language was not necessarily obscene. More specifically, the majority clarified that "obscene," "lewd," and "lascivious" in the federal statute referred to immorality and "sexual impurity" and that these words should be interpreted according to the common law offense for obscene libel. Blasphemous words or phrases were no longer considered obscene. Finally, the majority concluded that the words "obscene, lewd or lascivious" in the statute described one and the same offense, not different and distinct offenses.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

Bates, Anna Louise. Weeder in the Garden of the Lord: Anthony Comstock's Life and Career. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1995.
Beisel, Nicola Kay. Imperiled Innocents: Anthony Comstock and Family Reproduction in Victorian America. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Swearingen v. United States, 161 U.S. 446 (1896)

SYMBOLIC SPEECH

Symbolic speech has developed as a separate category of speech under the First Amendment. The category can take many different forms, some of which are akin to "pure speech," such as when protestors tape a peace sign to a United States flag. Symbolic speech can also include forms of speech that verge into "conduct." For example, when an individual burns a United States flag (or, for that matter, a draft card) in protest of governmental policies, the burning can constitute speech (in that it makes a statement regarding United States policies), but it can also involve “conduct” in the sense that the protestor is engaged in the “conduct” of burning the flag. Or, to take a more extreme example, if a protestor decides to blow up the White House to show his contempt for the president’s policies, the act of blowing up the White House involves conduct but can be done for speech purposes.

In applying the First Amendment’s speech protections to symbolic speech, the U.S. Supreme Court has been less inclined to sustain governmentally imposed restrictions on pure speech are more difficult to sustain and has generally been inclined to apply a stricter level of review to such speech. The United States Supreme Court’s approach to symbolic speech is revealed by its landmark decision in Tinker v. Des Moines Independent School District, 393 U.S. 503, 508 (1969). In that case, high school students wore black armbands to school to protest United States involvement in the Vietnam War. The Court viewed the armbands as symbolic speech and treated it as pure speech rather than conduct. As a result, the Court held that the students could not be disciplined for wearing the armbands absent proof that the wearing had caused substantial disruption to school activities. The Court found inadequate evidence of disruption.

By contrast, when symbolic speech tends toward conduct rather than pure speech, the Court has been somewhat more inclined to allow governmental restrictions. The prevailing test for evaluating restrictions on symbolic speech was announced in United States v. O’Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968). O’Brien applied a four-part test to evaluate the legality of restrictions on expressive conduct. Under that test, a governmental regulation is sufficiently justified, despite its incidental impact upon First Amendment interests, “if it is within the constitutional power of the Government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on . . . First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest.”

A number of governmental restrictions have failed under the third prong of the O’Brien test—the requirement that the governmental interest in restricting speech must be “unrelated to the suppression of free expression.” In Texas v. Johnson, 491 U. S. 397 (1989), Johnson burned a United States flag outside the Republican National Convention to protest the policies of the Reagan administration and the policies of certain Dallas-based corporations. Johnson was convicted of desecrating a venerated object and fined

$2,000. The prosecution was based on a statute which read as follows: “A person commits an offense if he intentionally or knowingly desecrates [a] state or national flag; ‘desecrate’ means deface, damage, or otherwise physically mistreat in a way that the actor knows will seriously offend one or more persons likely to observe or discover his action.” The Court ultimately overturned Johnson’s conviction finding that the restriction was related to speech. By prohibiting “desecration” of the flag, the state was trying to particular viewpoints and conduct relating to the flag.

Even though the Court is more inclined to invalidate speech restrictions that are related to the suppression of free expression, the Court has not been overly inclined to inquire into governmental motives. For example, in the O’Brien case itself, Congress passed a law prohibiting the mutilation or destruction of Selective Service registration cards (aka, draft cards). The Court readily accepted Congress’ assertion that the motive underlying the prohibition was unrelated to expression and was instead motivated by a need to protect registration cards as part of the draft process. Although there was some evidence suggesting that Congress had passed the prohibition in an effort to prohibit protests (draft card burning protests), the Court refused to inquire into congressional motive.

Assuming that a speech restriction is unrelated to the suppression of free expression, the O’Brien test requires consideration of whether there is a “substantial” or “important” governmental interest underlying the restriction and whether the restriction is essential to that interest. In many cases, because the O’Brien test imposes less rigorous review than strict scrutiny (which requires that the governmental interest be “compelling” or “overriding” and that the governmental prohibition be the “least restrictive” means available to vindicate that interest), the test can often be met. In the case of the hypothetical protestor who wants to blow up the White House to show his contempt for the president’s policies, there is an “important” or “substantial” governmental interest in preventing the bombing, and the prohibition is essential to the vindication of that interest.

In Texas v. Johnson, the flag burning case, depending on how the governmental interest is characterized, it might be possible to satisfy the O’Brien standard. For example, if the governmental interest had been simply to prevent “arson,” and had it been articulated as part of a content-neutral ban on open fires in the city, the conviction might have been sustained. The government has an “important” or “substantial” interest in preventing open fires within the city limits of a city, that is unrelated to the suppression of free expression, and the ban on open fires is justified as part of that interest. In the actual case, the government's case foundered, because the government was trying to protect the flag as a symbol and was actively trying to prevent it from being burned as part of speech protests.

SYMBOLIC SPEECH

Clark v. Community for Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288 (1984), further illustrates how the O'Brien test applies. In that case, the Community for Creative Non-Violence wanted to erect a tent city in a park in front of the White House. Although the United States Park Service was willing to permit the erection of the city, it was unwilling to allow the protestors to spend the night in the park. The Park Service claimed that overnight campers caused greater stress and degradation to the park. The Court upheld the Park Service's position, noting that it was unrelated to the suppression of speech, that the position was undergirded by an important or substantial governmental interest (the protection of parks), and that the ban on overnight camping served that interest.

RUSSELL L. WEAVER

References and Further Reading

Weaver, Russell L., and Donald E. Lively. Understanding the First Amendment. LexisNexis, 2003, pp. 180, 200.

Weaver, Russell L., and Arthur E. Hellman. The First Amendment: Cases, Materials & Problems. LexisNexis, 2002, pp. 375–396, 664–680.

T

TAFT COURT (1921–1930)

In dealing with the jurisprudential legacy of the Taft Court, one is struck by great incongruities. On the one hand, the conservative nature of the Court's majority tended to favor business against government regulation, the status quo, and property rights, while opposing labor unions. On the other hand, the Court sustained national power, restricted property rights to accommodate the new idea of zoning, took a broad view of interstate commerce, and began the revolution in civil liberties through the process of incorporation.

The conservative, indeed the reactionary label often applied to the Taft Court stems in large measure from its treatment of labor and of state reform legislation. There is no question that the majority of the Taft Court justices held definite antilabor prejudices.

Labor leaders thought that they had won a major victory in the Clayton Act of 1914. Section 6 had explicitly declared that labor did not constitute a commodity or an article of commerce and that consequently the antitrust laws should not be interpreted to forbid unions from seeking their legitimate objectives. Section 20 prohibited federal courts from issuing injunctions or restraining orders in labor disputes unless necessary to prevent damage to property, and also forbade injunctions against peaceful picketing or primary boycotts.

The Supreme Court ruled on these sections in Duplex Printing Press Company v. Deering (254 U.S. 443, 1921). The case had arisen when unions boycotted a manufacturer's products in New York to enforce a strike in Michigan. Justice Mahlon Pitney ruled that the law had not legitimized such secondary boycotts and that Section 6 had not provided a blanket exemption from the antitrust laws. Its wording only protected unions in lawfully carrying out their legitimate objectives; since secondary boycotts were unlawful, neither Section 6 nor Section 20 applied. Moreover, Pitney interpreted Section 20 to mean that injunctions could be issued not only against the immediate parties—the employer and his striking workers—but also to restrain another union from supporting the strikers.

The Duplex case came down immediately after Truax v. Corrigan (257 U.S. 312, 1921), in which the Court struck down a state anti-injunction statute. In this case, an Arizona restaurant owner had sought an injunction in state court against peaceful pickets, claiming the state law that denied him that injunction had deprived him of his property rights without due process of law. Chief Justice Taft agreed and declared the law unconstitutional as an arbitrary and capricious exercise of power and a highly injurious invasion of property rights.

Labor's supposed protection under the Clayton act suffered further erosion in the two Coronado Coal cases in 1925 (Coronado Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 268 U.S. 295). The United Mine Workers had been trying to unionize southern coal fields to prevent the ruination of northern mines by the cheaper southern coal. Following the standard set out in U.S. v. E.C. Knight, Chief Justice Taft ruled that coal mining did not constitute interstate commerce. A strike, as the simple withholding of labor, could not be enjoined under the Clayton act. But a strike that aimed at stopping the interstate shipment of nonunion coal certainly fell within the proscriptions of the Sherman Act. Therefore, any labor activity that had the intent, and not just an incidental result, of interfering with interstate commerce violated the antitrust laws.

Two years later, in Bedford Cut Stone Company v. Journeymen Stone Cutters Association, the Court again showed how it could manipulate definitions to restrict labor. In conformity with their union's constitution, a handful of peaceful stonecutters refused to work on limestone cut by nonunion workers in the unorganized Bedford Cut Stone Company. The firm sought an injunction, but in order to enjoin the strikers, the lower court had to rely on the Sherman Act's restriction on secondary boycotts. The Supreme Court agreed with this approach and then justified it by turning a very local and limited strike into a burden on the stream of interstate commerce. Reasonable restrictions on trade caused by industry would be tolerated by the Court under the rule of reason, but the bench would disregard its own rule when asked to apply it to the clearly reasonable activities of a labor union.

Protective legislation also fell on judicial hard times, but even some conservatives protested when the majority resurrected the Lochner doctrine (Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45, 1905) in Adkins v. Children's Hospital (261 U.S. 525, 1923). In striking down a federal statute establishing minimum wages for women in the District of Columbia, Justice Sutherland reaffirmed the paramount position of freedom of contract in economic affairs. Freedom, he declared, "is the general rule and restraint the exception; and the exercise of legislative authority to abridge it can be justified only by the existence of exceptional circumstances." Emancipated by the Nineteenth Amendment, women no longer had need for protective laws, but could work for whatever amount they freely chose to contract for, just like men.

The decision shocked the nation for the holding as well as for the reasoning behind it. Most people had assumed that after Muller v. Oregon (208 U.S. 412, 1908) and Bunting v. Oregon (243 U.S. 426, 1917), the Court had accepted the need to protect certain classes of society through the state's police power. Justice Sutherland ignored a decade of cases and went back to Lochner; even in the conservative 1920s, his opinion seemed overly reactionary. He launched into a vigorous attack on minimum wage legislation of any sort. Wages constituted the "heart of the contract" and could never be fixed by legislative fiat. Human necessities could never take precedence over economic rights, for "the good of society as a whole cannot be better served than by the preservation of the liberties of its constituent members."

But this court, one most protective of property rights, also handed down the landmark ruling in Euclid v. Ambler Realty (272 U.S. 365, 1926). Among conservatives, property had always held a nearly sacred status, and the core of substantive due process had been the almost unlimited right of an owner to use and dispose of property. In 1917, the Court had struck down a local ordinance prohibiting blacks from living in certain areas but had done so not on equal protection grounds, but rather because the rule deprived people of their right to buy and sell property (Buchanan v. Warley, 254 U.S. 600, 1917).

During the first quarter of the twentieth century many municipalities enacted comprehensive land use or zoning plans in an effort to manage growth and sustain the aesthetic nature of the community. The codes varied, but nearly all of them included some limits on land use in certain areas and placed limits on the type and size of buildings that could be erected. A commercial establishment, for example, could not be built in an area designated for residential use. Land owners and developers challenged these codes on a variety of constitutional grounds, but state courts disagreed on their legitimacy. Eventually the challenge to the zoning ordinance of Euclid, Ohio, reached the high court in 1926.

The author of the six-to-three majority opinion upholding the zoning ordinance was George Sutherland, the same justice who had written Adkins. Justice Sutherland's opinion described the zoning act not as a deprivation of property but as an enhancement. Common law had long allowed for the abatement of nuisances even if doing so restricted property rights, since the end result would be the enhancement of value in all adjoining property. The fact that Euclid was undergoing rapid expansion could not be denied, and overcrowding as well as chaotic development would be harmful to all property owners. The justice may also have been influenced by the fact that when Ambler had bought the property the zoning ordinance had already been in effect, and this undermined the company's claim that its property had been taken without due process; he might have thought differently had the ordinance been passed after Ambler had purchased the land.

Ever since Barron v. Baltimore (7 Pet. 243, 1833), the Bill of Rights had been held to apply only to the federal government; although some people argued that the Fourteenth Amendment had extended those guarantees to the states, that view had not yet gained Court approval. In Prudential Insurance Company v. Cheek (259 U.S. 530, 1922), the Court reaffirmed that state infringement of civil liberties remained beyond the control of the federal government or its courts. The Fourteenth Amendment, according to Justice Pitney, had not extended the Bill of Rights to the states. He thus denied Justice Brandeis's argument, made three years earlier in his dissent in Gilbert v. Minnesota (254 U.S. 325, 1920), that the liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment went beyond property rights to include personal freedoms as well.

The first fruits of that dissent appeared in 1922, when the Court struck down a state statute that forbade the teaching of foreign languages in elementary schools. In Meyer v. Nebraska (262 U.S. 390, 1922), Justice McReynolds applied the Lochner doctrine, declaring that liberty denotes:

not merely freedom from bodily restraint but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, to establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men.

To be sure, Justice McReynolds found property rights involved in the case, since the Nebraska law “materially” interfered “with the calling of modern language teachers.” But he also found the measure a violation of free speech. The goal of the legislature to foster “a homogeneous people with American ideals” was understandable in light of the recent war, but now “peace and domestic tranquility” reigned, and he could find no adequate justification for the restraints on liberty. Without using the exact words, the justice in effect applied the clear and present danger test and found the statute lacking.

Two years later, Justice McReynolds spoke for a unanimous Court in Pierce v. Society of Sisters (268 U.S. 510, 1925). The Ku Klux Klan had pushed through a law in Oregon requiring children to attend public schools, with the clear intent of driving the Catholic schools out of existence. Again, the justice found “no peculiar circumstances or present emergencies” to justify such an extraordinary measure. The law interfered with personal and property rights. “The child is not the mere creature of the State,” he wrote; “those who nurture him and direct his destiny have the right, coupled with the high duty, to prepare him for additional obligations.” Moreover, the law directly attacked the vested property rights of private and parochial schools. Justice McReynolds had only hinted at the constitutional foundation for parochial education in Meyer; he firmly established it in Pierce.

Justice McReynolds found the justification for Meyer and Pierce totally within the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment; he applied the Lochner doctrine but intimated that other than property rights might be protected as well. Civil Liberties Union attorneys picked up on the justice's two school opinions and Justice Brandeis's Gilbert dissent and decided to challenge directly the traditional doctrine that the Bill of Rights did not apply to the states. Their opportunity came in Gitlow v. New York (268 U.S. 562, 1925).

The Gitlow case posed a challenge to New York's 1902 Criminal Anarchy Act. Benjamin Gitlow, a leading figure in the American Communist Party, had been convicted for publishing a radical newspaper, a “Left-Wing Manifesto,” and other allegedly subversive materials. If Fourteenth Amendment liberty reached as far as Justice McReynolds had suggested, his lawyer argued, then surely it would include the protection of the press and speech. Although the Court affirmed the conviction, Justice Sanford noted that “for present purposes we may and do assume that freedom of speech and of the press—which are protected by the First Amendment from abridgement by Congress—are among the fundamental personal rights protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from impairment by the States.” Thus, for the first time, the Supreme Court put forward what came to be known as the doctrine of incorporation, by which the Fourteenth Amendment “incorporated” the liberties protected in the Bill of Rights and applied them to the states.

In its dealings with free speech—even after agreeing that the First Amendment applied to the states as well—the Taft Court nonetheless continued to use the test of “clear and present danger” that Justice Holmes had enunciated in Schenck v. United States (249 U.S. 47, 1919). Although Holmes had tried in his dissent in Abrams v. United States (250 U.S. 616, 1919) later that year to make the test more speech protective, a majority of the Court always managed to find danger in the writings and speech of those on the Left. It remained for Louis Brandeis, in Whitney v. California (274 U.S. 357, 1927), to express what has become the bedrock principle of First Amendment jurisprudence: freedom of speech is a necessary component of democratic society.

Charlotte Anita Whitney, a niece of Justice Stephen J. Field and “a woman nearing sixty, a Wellesley graduate long distinguished in philanthropic work,” had been convicted under the California Criminal Syndicalism Act of 1919 for helping to organize the Communist Labor Party there. The law made it a felony to organize or knowingly become a member of an organization founded to advocate the commission of crimes, sabotage, or acts of violence as a means of bringing about political or industrial change. Miss Whitney denied that it had ever been intended for the Communist Labor Party to become an instrument of crime or violence; nor was there any proof that it had ever engaged in violent acts. Nevertheless, the conservative majority, led by Justice Sanford, upheld the act as a legitimate decision by the California legislature to prevent the violent overthrow of society. The due process clause did not protect one's liberty to destroy the social and political order.

Because of technical issues, Justice Brandeis chose not to dissent; however, his concurring opinion, joined by Justice Holmes, provided an eloquent defense of intellectual freedom unmatched for its powerful reasoning in the annals of the Court. The majority, Justice Brandeis claimed, not only here but also in other speech cases, was operating on a totally inappropriate set of assumptions. They had measured the limits of free speech against potential danger to property, thus ignoring the benefits that free exchange of ideas conferred on society as a whole. He agreed that under certain circumstances a legislature could limit speech, but the proper test for exercising that power would be whether the words posed a clear and imminent danger to society, not just to property interests. Suppression of ideas worked a great hardship on society, and before that could be allowed, the Court had the responsibility of developing objective standards, a responsibility that it had thus far failed to meet. The justice made it quite clear that, like Justice Holmes, he did not fear ideas, and Americans need not do so either. Moreover, Justice Brandeis set out what would become the basis for first American jurisprudence.

Justice Brandeis saw free speech as an essential aspect of citizenship. Men and women had the duty in a democracy to be good citizens, which meant being informed on the issues confronting them. How could they make intelligent decisions about these matters if they lacked basic information about them? How could they judge whether one side or the other had the better argument unless they could hear both sides and then join in the debate? The fact that some viewpoints ran against the grain or disturbed popular sensibilities made no difference; history was replete with examples of unpopular ideas that had eventually gained public acceptance. The justice thus provided a positive justification for protection of speech: the necessity for the citizenry to be fully informed about issues and to be aware of all viewpoints. But he would not limit First Amendment protection to political speech alone; his opinion in Whitney clearly values speech as a cultural, social, and educational as well as a political value in a free society.

The criminal law provisions of the Bill of Rights, found in the Fourth through Eighth Amendments, had also never been applied to the states, although many states had written some of these guarantees into their constitutions. In the 1920s, the Court for the most part preferred to leave the control of criminal justice in the hands of the states, although in the face of outright abuse of fair procedures, it was willing to extend federal standards and authority.

The decade had started with the Silverthorne Lumber decision (Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385, 1920), in which an outraged Justice Holmes had chastised the Department of Justice for seizing books and papers from the suspects' office "without a shadow of authority." Six other members of the Court had joined in his expansion of the exclusionary rule, ensuring that the government could not benefit from illegally secured evidence. But the flood of cases in state and federal courts growing out of efforts to enforce the Nineteenth Amendment (Prohibition) led to some retreat from this position. In Byars v. United States (273 U.S. 28) and Gambino v. United States (275 U.S. 310) in 1927, the Court developed what came to be known as the "silver platter" doctrine: evidence obtained in an illegal state search would be admissible in a federal court so long as there had been no federal participation. The doctrine invited the abuses that followed; state law enforcement officials blatantly violated fair procedures (often in violation of their state laws) and then turned the evidence over to federal officers, who secretly knew about, and had often instigated, the illegal search. Not until 1960 did the Court abolish the silver platter doctrine in Elkins v. United States (364 U.S. 206, 1960).

Prohibition, in fact, became a law enforcement nightmare. Many Americans deliberately violated the law, and bootleggers applied the latest technology to their efforts to give a thirsty citizenry what it wanted. They used a relatively new invention, the automobile, to run illegal liquor into the country from Canada or from country stills into the cities. In December 1921, federal agents stopped a car outside Detroit, which, because of its proximity to Ontario, Canada, had become a major entrepot for imported liquor. The agents searched the car without a warrant and found sixty-eight quarts of whiskey and gin behind the upholstery. After conviction for violation of the Volstead Act, the defendants appealed to the Supreme Court, claiming that their Fourth Amendment rights had been violated.

By a seven-to-two vote, the Court upheld the conviction in Carroll v. United States (267 U.S. 132, 1925). Chief Justice Taft found the search reasonable because the agents had had probable cause; the defendants, all suspected of previous bootlegging operations, had been traveling on a road frequently used by smugglers. Because of time constraints, the officers had been unable to get a warrant; if they had applied for one, the car would have been gone by the time it arrived. Thus, the Court carved the automobile exception out of the Fourth Amendment's requirement that no search or seizure take place without a warrant. When a warrant could be reasonably secured, Taft urged, it should be; otherwise, police did not need warrants to stop and search automobiles. The decision generated much criticism from legal scholars, but the Carroll doctrine is still the law.

Technology also gave the government new means to prosecute its fight against crime, including the ability to pry into the private affairs of a suspect without actually entering the premises. By a bare majority, the Court gave its blessing to the wire tapping of telephones in Olmstead v. United States (277 U.S. 438, 1928). Chief Justice Taft took a formalistic view of wire tapping that completely ignored the Fourth Amendment's intent. There had been no actual entry, but only the use of an enhanced sense of hearing, he claimed, and to pay too much attention to "nice ethical conduct by government officials would make society suffer and give criminals greater immunity than has been known heretofore."

The Taft opinion elicited dissents from Justices Butler, Holmes, and Brandeis. In a well-reasoned historical analysis, the generally conservative Justice Butler repudiated Taft's sterile interpretation of what the Fourth Amendment meant. Justice Holmes, in a comment that soon caught the liberal imagination, condemned wiretapping as "a dirty business." But the most impressive opinion came from Justice Brandeis, who forthrightly declared that he considered it "less evil that some criminals should escape than that the government should play an ignoble part.... If government becomes a lawbreaker, it breeds contempt for law."

The most noted and influential part of Justice Brandeis's dissent dealt with the question of privacy. The framers of the Constitution, Brandeis wrote, "sought to protect Americans in their beliefs, their thoughts, their emotions and their sensations. They conferred, as against the Government, the right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights, and the right most valued by civilized man." That passage would be picked up and elaborated on until finally, in Griswold v. Connecticut (381 U.S. 419, 1965), the Court recognized privacy as a constitutionally protected liberty. Wiretapping remained legally permissible for many years, although Congress in 1934 prohibited admitting wiretapping evidence in federal courts. Not until 1967, in Berger v. New York (388 U.S. 41), did the Court finally bring wiretapping within the reach of the Fourth Amendment.

Although the Taft Court preferred to leave criminal matters to the states, occasionally it did interfere. One case is notable because it affected race relations, an area that the Court considered wholly within state authority. The racial tensions following World War I had led to a series of urban riots in the North and triggered a wave of lynchings in southern states. Lynching offended the Court as nonviolent forms of discrimination did not. In Moore v. Dempsey (261 U.S. 86, 1923), Justice Holmes ruled that a federal court should hear the appeal of five Negroes, convicted of first-degree murder by an Arkansas state court, where the constant threat of mob violence had dominated the proceedings. Such an atmosphere, he held, amounted to little more than judicially sanctioned lynching, and when state courts could not provide minimal procedural fairness, the federal courts had a clear duty to "secure to the petitioners their constitutional rights."

The Taft Court generally showed very little concern over issues of racial prejudice, whether it applied to African Americans or to Asians, and in several cases, such as Ozawa v. United States (260 U.S. 178, 1923) and United States v. Bhagat Singh Thind (261 U.S. 204, 1923), interpreted the Constitution as giving Congress full plenary power over who could immigrate and become an American citizen.

The superpatriotism of the decade manifested itself in the Court's denial of citizenship to aliens who, despite many exemplary qualities, happened to be pacifists. In a noted case, United States v. Schwimmer (279 U.S. 644, 1929), an older Quaker woman of unblemished character had refused to promise to bear arms in defense of the country and had denied naturalization as a result. The Court upheld the ruling and drew from Justice Holmes one of his most eloquent dissents. "If there is any principle of the Constitution," he declared, "that more imperatively calls for attachment than any other it is the principle of free thought—not free thought for those who agree with us but freedom for the thought we hate." He failed to see how the country would suffer by taking as citizens people "who believe more than some of us do in the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount."

The indifference to the lack of fair procedure for aliens reflected in part the Taft Court's general attitude toward civil liberties and in part the growing public animus toward aliens and all things foreign. Few voices protested the Court decisions, for even the liberals of the time recognized a distinction between the rights of an American citizen and the privileges accorded to an alien. Civil liberties jurisprudence, as well as popular ideas on this subject, had not yet fully developed. It is not so surprising, then, that the Supreme Court showed a minimal concern in this area.

One case from this time that shocks the modern conscience and displays in full the Taft Court's indifference to individual liberties, dealt not with people of color or aliens or pacifists, but with a white southern girl, Carrie Buck. The eugenics movement that spread across the United States in the early twentieth century led a number of states to enact involuntary sterilization laws in efforts to "improve" the race. Virginia enacted such a law, and the superintendent of the State Colony for Epileptics and Feeble-Minded at Lynchburg decided to test its constitutionality.

The person he chose for his test case was eighteen-year-old Carrie Buck. A victim of rape, Buck had become pregnant, and the family with which she was living had her committed to the Lynchburg institution. There a relatively primitive IQ test showed her to have the intelligence of a nine-year-old. Her mother, Emma, also confined to the colony, tested out at eight years. After Buck gave birth to her daughter, an administrative panel recommended that she be sterilized. Her attorney, paid for by the institution, put on a weak defense, since he admittedly agreed with the sterilization policy. Nonetheless, he carried an appeal to the Supreme Court and there offered an equal protection argument; the law, he claimed, discriminated against people confined to institutions and denied them their "full bodily integrity." Justice Holmes, speaking for an eight-to-one Court in Buck v. Bell (274 U.S. 200, 1927), dismissed all of these arguments in a short, five-paragraph opinion, three paragraphs of which described the facts of the case. He dismissed the equal protection claim as "the usual last resort of constitutional arguments" and declared that "three generations of imbeciles are enough." Only Justice Butler dissented without opinion.

The case has had a bad odor about it ever since, but the worst aspect is that years later it turned out that Buck had not been feeble minded. She had advanced with her class grade by grade in public school until taken out to work in her foster home. Her final report card rated her as "very good—deportment and lessons." In her later years she had been active in reading groups and dramatics and, despite her very hard life, a social worker described her as an "alert and pleasant lady." There were no imbeciles at all among the three generations of Buck women.

The Court over which William Howard Taft presided from 1921 until 1930 left a mixed legacy. Its pro-business, anti-labor decisions have been for the most part discredited, with the exception of the broad stream-of-commerce interpretation it gave to congressional power under the commerce clause. The decisions involving substantive due process and freedom of contract that it used to justify these decisions led to a popular interpretation that the Court, like the other branches of government in the 1920s, favored big business above all other interests. Following the Depression, however, liberal groups won control of the Congress and the White House, but the Four Horsemen clung to an outmoded legal classicism that eventually led to the constitutional crisis of 1937.

Yet even while protecting business interests, the Court slowly began the process of incorporation by which the Fourteenth Amendment "incorporated" the protections of the Bill of Rights and applied them to the states. Although the process did not progress very far in the 1920s, it laid the foundation for the great revolution in civil liberties that culminated during the Warren Court (1953–1969). The concern for individual liberties has been a major part of the Court's docket ever since.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Blasi, Vincent, The First Amendment and the Ideal of Civil Courage: The Brandeis Opinion in Whitney v. California, William & Mary Law Review 29 (1988): 653.
- Bodenhamer, David J. Fair Trial: Rights of the Accused in American History. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Cortner, Richard C. The Supreme Court and the Second Bill of Rights. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1981.
- Post, Robert, Defending the Life World: Substantive Due Process in the Taft Court Era, Boston University Law Review 78 (1998): 1489.
- Ross, William G. Forging New Freedoms: Nativism, Education, and the Constitution, 1921–1927. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1994.
- Wiecek, William M. The Lost World of Classical Legal Thought: Law and Ideology in America, 1886–1937. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. United States*, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
- Adkins v. Children's Hospital*, 261 U.S. 525 (1923)
- Barron v. Baltimore*, 7 Pet. 243 (1833)
- Berger v. New York*, 388 U.S. 41 (1967)
- Buchanan v. Worley*, 254 U.S. 600 (1917)
- Buck v. Bell*, 274 U.S. 200 (1927)
- Bunting v. Oregon*, 243 U.S. 426 (1917)
- Byars v. United States*, 273 U.S. 28 (1927)
- Carroll v. United States*, 267 U.S. 132 (1925)
- Coronado Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers*, 268 U.S. 295 (1925)
- Duplex Printing Press Company v. Deering*, 254 U.S. 443 (1921)
- Elkins v. United States*, 364 U.S. 206 (1960)
- Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co.*, 272 U.S. 365 (1926)
- Gambino v. United States*, 275 U.S. 310 (1927)
- Gilbert v. Minnesota*, 254 U.S. 325 (1920)
- Gitlow v. New York*, 268 U.S. 562 (1925)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 419 (1965)
- Lochner v. New York*, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
- Meyer v. Nebraska*, 262 U.S. 390 (1922)

Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U.S. 86 (1923)
Muller v. Oregon, 208 U.S. 412 (1908)
Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
Ozawa v. United States, 260 U.S. 178 (1923)
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
Prudential Insurance Co. v. Cheek, 259 U.S. 530 (1922)
Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385 (1920)
Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U.S. 312 (1921)
United States v. Bhagat Singh Thind, 261 U.S. 204 (1923)
United States v. E. C. Knight Co.
United States v. Schwimmer, 279 U.S. 644 (1929)
Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)

TAFT, WILLIAM HOWARD (1857–1930)

William Howard Taft, the twenty-seventh president of the United States and chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, was born to Alphonso Taft and Louisa Maria Torrey in Cincinnati, Ohio. Taft, the only person to have been U.S. president and Supreme Court chief justice came from a politically involved family; Alphonso Taft served as secretary of war and attorney general during Ulysses S. Grant's presidency. Taft graduated second in his class from Yale University in 1878 and then graduated from the Cincinnati Law School in 1880. Shortly thereafter, he was admitted to the Ohio bar, began practicing law, and became involved in politics. In 1886, Taft married Helen Herron; the couple had three children.

Prior to his presidency and chief justice positions, Taft held numerous public offices. He served as collector for the internal revenue service; judge for the superior court of Ohio; federal circuit judge; solicitor general during Benjamin Harrison's presidency; president of the Philippine Commission; and secretary of war during Theodore Roosevelt's presidency. Taft and Roosevelt had a strong friendship that led to Roosevelt's support of Taft running in the 1908 presidential election against Democratic nominee William Jennings Bryan. Roosevelt had decided not to run, but expected Taft to continue reforms similar to his own. The Republican successor, however, changed the cabinet, and it soon became obvious that Taft and Roosevelt had different views of the scope of presidential power. Roosevelt believed in expanding the powers of the president, while Taft thought presidential authority, as granted in the Constitution, should be interpreted more narrowly.

This fundamental difference in constitutional interpretation of the presidential office caused the two to clash. Although Taft was committed to some of Roosevelt's reforms, such as conservation and regulatory changes, he did not expand his executive powers to accomplish the revisions. Overall, he was a hard worker and had multiple accomplishments as president, such as the Mann–Elkins Act, passed in 1910, which regulated railroads, and he encouraged strong enforcement of antitrust laws. His foreign policy called for “dollar diplomacy,” which promoted American business to invest in Latin America and Asia, in order to foster the development of stable governments in those areas. Despite his efforts, the 1910 elections resulted in a Democratic majority in the House and a smaller Republican majority in the Senate. As time passed, Taft and Roosevelt became even more polarized from each other; a split in the Republican Party occurred when Roosevelt formed the Progressive Party in 1912. Taft lost the 1912 election to Democratic candidate Woodrow Wilson.

After his term as U.S. president, Taft taught at Yale as the Kent Professor of Constitutional Law, and wrote and lectured about his presidency and his views of presidential authority, which culminated in his 1916 book Our Chief Magistrate and His Powers. Staying active in politics, he became joint chairman of the National War Labor Board and was committed to the League to Enforce Peace. The former president also was active in the effort to ratify the Versailles Treaty.

Throughout his career, Taft possessed conservative views and held a deep regard for the separation of powers among the three branches of government and for federalism. This would become even more apparent when he served as chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court from July 11, 1921, to February 3, 1930. The Taft Court was known for reorganizing the Court system with the passage of the Judges Act of 1922 and the Judges Act of 1925; favoring the protection of property rights, in American Steel Foundries v. Tri-City Central Trades Council (1921), Truax v. Corrigan (257 U.S. 312, 1921), and United Mine Workers of America v. Coronado Coal Company (268 U.S. 295, 1922); and favoring a broad application of the Interstate Commerce Clause in Stafford v. Wallace (1922) and City of Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen (1923). In Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Company (1922), Taft and the court recognized limits of congressional authority when it overturned a law that taxed interstate commerce goods manufactured by children. Taft dissented, however, in the Court's ruling to overturn a minimum wage law for women in Adkins v. Children's Hospital (261 U.S. 525, 1923). In Myers v. United States (1926), the chief justice wrote the majority opinion, sanctioning the president's right to fire employees of the executive branch.

The Taft court ruled conservatively in civil liberty cases such as Buck v. Bell (274 US 200, 1927), which upheld a statute that enforced sterilization of the mentally handicapped, and Olmstead v. United States (277 U.S. 438, 1928), which permitted the tapping of telephone lines of suspected violators of the National Prohibition Law. Particularly, Taft's majority opinion in Olmstead demonstrated his perception of the Fourth Amendment. The Olmstead case arose during Prohibition when authorities suspected Roy Olmstead of bootlegging. To gather evidence, federal agents placed wiretaps on telephone lines in the basement of Olmstead's office and on nearby streets. The information obtained from the taps served as evidence to convict Olmstead; the case went to the Supreme Court as possible violations of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments.

Relying on earlier Supreme Court rulings, Taft wrote that the wiretap did not violate the defendant's rights. He claimed that Olmstead voluntarily had phone discussions and therefore an infringement of the Fifth Amendment did not occur. Taft also believed in a strict understanding of the Fourth Amendment, in which an unlawful search and seizure could not be applied to information gathered solely from sight or hearing. Rather, a violation came from an unwarranted search and seizure of the body or physical property, which did not include phone lines. Although Taft acknowledged the ethical concerns of wiretaps, he declared that Congress could pass a law regarding such issues; until then the Supreme Court would follow the common law that accepted evidence even if it was obtained unethically. A 1967 ruling in Katz v. United States (389 U.S. 347, 1967) reversed the Olmstead decision.

Taft's most personally fulfilling years were when he was Supreme Court chief justice, but he retired from the position in part because of his ill health. A month after his retirement, he died in Washington, D.C., ending an impressive career as a public servant.

HEIDI SCOTT GIUSTO

References and Further Reading

- Anderson, Donald F. William Howard Taft: A Conservative's Conception of the Presidency. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1973.
- Burton, David H. Taft, Holmes, and the 1920s Court. Madison, WI: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1998.
- Burton, David H., ed. The Collected Works of William Howard Taft, 8 vols. Athens: Ohio University Press, 2001–2004.
- . William Howard Taft: Confident Peacemaker. Philadelphia: Saint Joseph's University Press, 2004.
- . Taft, Roosevelt, and the Limits of Friendship. Madison, WI: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2005.
- Coletta, Paolo E. The Presidency of William Howard Taft. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1973.
- Katz v. United States*, 389 U.S. 347 (1967).
- Olmstead v. United States*, 277 U.S. 438 (1928).
- Pringle, Henry F. The Life and Times of William Howard Taft. New York, Toronto: Farrar & Rinehart, Inc., 1939.

Taft, William Howard. Present Day Problems. New York, Dodd, Mead & Company, 1908.

———. Four Aspects of Civic Duty. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1911.

———. The Anti-Trust Act and the Supreme Court. New York: Harper, 1914.

———. The President and His Powers. New York: Columbia University Press, 1967, 1916.

See also Bryan, William Jennings; Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200 (1927); Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967); Olmstead v. U.S., 277 U.S. 438 (1928); Wilson, Woodrow

TAFT–HARTLEY ACT OF 1947

Under the protections of the Wagner (National Labor Relations) Act of 1935 and its predecessor, the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933, labor union membership soared from less than 3 million workers in 1932 to approximately 14.5 million by the end of World War II. These 14.5 million members composed over 35 percent of the nonagricultural civilian workforce—an all-time high in the history of American organized labor.

But the end of the war and the accompanying decreased demand for war-time goods precipitated sharp cuts to manufacturing wages and increased prices. Frustrated and resentful, America's workers turned to their unions for protection against inflation. The unions delivered. By November 1945, America began to experience one of the largest waves of strikes in its history. But the 1945 and 1946 strikes, in turn, fueled anti-union sentiments. Organized labor's enemies in the media and in Congress used the strike wave to blame the labor movement for the wage–price spiral plaguing the national economy.

Riding this sentiment, on June 23, 1947, Congress passed the Taft–Hartley Act over President Harry Truman's veto. Whereas the central purpose of the Wagner Act had been to encourage workers to form or join unions, Taft–Hartley marked a shift away from this policy to a more neutral posture. For example, the Act amended Sections 2 and 9b of the Wagner Act to exclude supervisors from the definition of “employee” and require separate representation for plant guards and the option of separate representation for professional employees. Particularly controversial provisions limited the right to strike by amending Section 8 of the Wagner act to prohibit secondary boycotts, jurisdictional strikes over work assignments, and strikes to force an employer to discharge an employee because of the refusal to join the union.

Other disputed provisions required union officials to sign affidavits attesting that they were not communists and permitted states to forbid, through what is commonly known today as “right to work” legislation, agreements requiring union membership. Finally, the act separated the investigatory and prosecutorial functions of the National Labor Relations Board’s general counsel from the adjudicatory functions of the board and made collective bargaining agreements enforceable in federal district court.

JEAN-CLAUDE ANDRÉ

References and Further Reading

- Comment, Developments in the Law: The Taft–Hartley Act*, Harvard Law Review 64 (March 1951): 781–852.
- Hardin, Patrick, et al., eds. The Developing Labor Law: The Board, the Courts, and the National Labor Relations Act. 4th ed. Washington, D.C.: BNA Books, 2002.
- Taft–Hartley Symposium: The First Fifty Years, Catholic University Law Review 47 (Spring 1998): 763–1007.
- Zieger, Robert H., and Gilbert J. Gall. American Workers, American Unions. 3rd ed. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- National Industrial Recovery Act* of June 16, 1933, c. 90, 48 Stat. 195
- Taft–Hartley (Labor–Management Relations) Act* of June 23, 1947, c. 120, 61 Stat. 136
- Wagner (National Labor Relations) Act* of July 5, 1935, c. 372, 49 Stat. 449

TAKINGS CLAUSE (V)

The notion that property ownership is essential for the enjoyment of political liberty has long been a fundamental tenet of Anglo-American constitutional thought. Reflecting this sentiment, many provisions of the Constitution and Bill of Rights pertain to the protection of the rights of property owners. Among the most important of these provisions is the Fifth Amendment, which provides in part: “nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.”

The origins of the takings clause can be traced to the English common law tradition. Magna Carta (1215) contained a prohibition on the king taking personal property without payment. Parliament also early recognized the compensation principle when property was taken for public use. William Blackstone, in his influential Commentaries on the Laws of England (1765–1769) stressed that private property could not be acquired for public use without the payment of full compensation.

Colonial Americans were strongly influenced by the English common law experience. Although their record was somewhat checkered, most colonies acknowledged the right of landowners to receive compensation when government took property. During the Revolutionary era several states, notably Massachusetts, elevated the common law compensation principle to a constitutional norm in their state constitutions. The takings clause of the Fifth Amendment was also foreshadowed by legislation at the national level. The Northwest Ordinance of 1787 required that full compensation should be made when property was taken for public use. Thus, the takings clause did not break new ground, but gave constitutional status to a long-settled common law principle. Its place in the Fifth Amendment, coupled with guarantees of criminal procedure, underscores the close association of property rights with personal liberty in the minds of the framers.

Significantly, the Fifth Amendment takings clause became a model for later state constitutions. Similar language is contained in nearly every state constitution, and some require compensation when property is “damaged” as well as “taken” by governmental action. The takings clause and its state counterparts clearly reject the uncompensated confiscation of property as a legitimate exercise of governmental authority. Indeed, in Gardner v. Village of Newburgh (12 Johns, Ch. 162, N.Y. 1816) the distinguished jurist James Kent declared that the payment of compensation when private property was taken for public use was an indispensable principle derived from natural equity.

Eminent Domain

Eminent domain is the power of government to compel the owners of real or personal property to transfer such property to the government. It is among the most intrusive governmental powers because it entails taking property from persons against their will. Parliament in England long exercised the power of eminent domain for public projects. Following suit, governments in colonial America utilized eminent domain to facilitate the construction of roadways and public buildings through the acquisition of real and personal property. Moreover, colonial governments delegated eminent domain to private parties, such as gristmill operators, whose activities were viewed as encouraging economic growth.

The Constitution does not expressly grant the power of eminent domain to Congress. As early as Vanhorne’s Lessee v. Dorrance (2 U.S. 304, 1775), however, a federal circuit court insisted that eminent domain was an inherent power of government as an aspect of sovereignty. The Supreme Court expressly acknowledged in Kohl v. United States (91 U.S. 367, 1875) that state and federal governments could exercise the power of eminent domain in order to perform governmental functions. The takings clause of the Fifth Amendment implicitly recognized the existence of eminent domain by placing limits on its exercise. It mandates that government must acquire property for “public use” and then only upon the payment of “just compensation.”

Public Use

A vexing issue concerning the exercise of eminent domain is the requirement of the Fifth Amendment that private property must be taken for “public use.” Courts have repeatedly held that eminent domain does not empower government simply to take the property of one person and transfer it to a private party, even with the payment of compensation. Nonetheless, the public use limitation steadily eroded during the twentieth century by judicial deference to legislative determinations that a particular acquisition of property served the public interest. In Berman v. Parker (348 U.S. 26, 1954), for example, the Supreme Court sustained the taking of land for redevelopment by a private agency as part of the urban renewal project and equated the public use requirement with the police power.

The justices were also highly deferential to legislative assessments in Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff (467 U.S. 229, 1984), which ruled that a state could authorize the transfer of land titles from landlords to tenants to alleviate the perceived evil of concentrated land ownership. As this indicates, the federal courts have largely treated the reasons for the exercise of eminent domain as a matter for legislative judgment. Such a permissive judicial attitude has virtually eliminated “public use” as a meaningful constraint on eminent domain at the federal level. Some state courts, however, have been more inclined to scrutinize the exercise of eminent domain. They occasionally strike down reliance on eminent domain on grounds that the planned acquisition is primarily for private gain not public benefit. The use of eminent domain to transfer property to private parties remains a highly contentious issue.

Emergence of Takings Jurisprudence

In Barron v. Baltimore (32 U.S. 243, 1833), the Supreme Court ruled that the Bill of Rights, including the takings clause, applied only to the national government and did not bind the states. Before the Civil War, therefore, state courts, governed by state constitutional guarantees, took the lead in fashioning takings jurisprudence. During the antebellum era, the states regularly utilized eminent domain to foster economic development through improved internal transportation. Courts repeatedly sustained the delegation of eminent domain power to canal and railroad companies. Judges reasoned that such privately owned corporations were carrying out the public purpose of bettering transportation, thereby encouraging an open-ended definition of “public use.”

In the late nineteenth century, the Supreme Court began to address issues arising under the takings clause and, in the process, strengthened the constitutional protection afforded property owners. The justices held in Pumpelly v. Green Bay Company (80 U.S. 166, 1871) that the flooding of land as a result of governmental action constituted a taking even without a formal eminent domain proceeding to acquire title. This established the basis for the doctrine of inverse condemnation, which holds that a physical invasion of land by governmental action constitutes a compensable taking.

Drawing upon this concept, the Supreme Court in the twentieth century amplified the protection afforded owners against physical intrusion by government. In United States v. Causby (328 U.S. 256, 1946), the justices ruled that frequent military flights at low altitude over a farm destroyed its value and in effect appropriated the land. Furthermore, the justices declared in Loretto v. Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp. (458 U.S. 419, 1982) that any permanent physical occupation of private property authorized by government constituted a taking.

The Supreme Court gave a broad interpretation to the just compensation requirement in the leading case of Monongahela Navigation Company v. United States (148 U.S. 312, 1893), declaring that the compensation paid to owners must be a full and perfect equivalent for the property taken. In most situations this means that the measure of compensation is determined by the market value of the property. Of even greater significance was the seminal case of Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company v. Chicago (166 U.S. 226, 1897), in which the justices unanimously held that the payment of just compensation when private property was taken for public use was an essential element of due process guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. Accordingly, the just compensation norm became the first provision of the federal Bill of Rights to be applied against the states.

Regulatory Takings

By the late nineteenth century, property was increasingly understood to encompass not just title to a physical object but such beneficial characteristics as the right to possess, transfer, use, and derive profit. This understanding highlighted the question of the extent to which governmental actions, short of outright acquisition of title or physical invasion, might effectuate a taking for which compensation was constitutionally required. In particular, the spread of land use regulations posed the issue of whether a regulation could so diminish the value or usefulness of property as to be tantamount to a taking.

During the 1890s prominent commentators and jurists, such as David J. Brewer and Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., suggested that regulation of the use of property might so destroy its value as to constitute the practical equivalent of outright appropriation. These contentions anticipated the emergence of the regulatory takings doctrine, which achieved constitutional status in the famous case Pennsylvania Coal Company v. Mahon (260 U.S. 393, 1922). Speaking for the Supreme Court, Justice Holmes agreed that property could be regulated to some extent under the police power. But he cautioned that controls on land use that went “too far” would be treated as a taking of property.

It remained difficult to distinguish between appropriate restrictions on use and an unconstitutional taking. For decades after Mahon the Court was reluctant to apply the regulatory takings doctrine. For instance, the Court brushed aside takings objections and upheld the validity of comprehensive zoning ordinances in Village of Euclid v. Ambler Realty Company (272 U.S. 365, 1925). In the same vein, the justices in Penn Central Transportation v. New York (438 U.S. 104, 1978) validated the designation of Grand Central Terminal as a historic landmark by a six-to-three vote, despite the fact that this action caused a drastic drop in the value of the building. Establishing a framework for subsequent regulatory takings challenges, the Court in Penn Central engaged in an ad hoc inquiry, balancing the economic harm to the owner’s “investment-backed expectations” against the purpose served by the government’s action. This resulted in a muddled regulatory taking doctrine with no clear standards.

Starting in the 1980s, however, the Supreme Court took a fresh look at the question of regulatory takings and rendered a number of decisions that put some teeth into the doctrine. In the landmark case of Nollan

v. California Coastal Commission (483 U.S. 825, 1987) the Supreme Court, for the first time since the 1920s, invalidated a land use regulation. It held that a state agency could not impose conditions on the grant of a building permit when such conditions were unrelated to any problem caused by the proposed development. In Dolan v. City of Tigart (512 U.S. 374, 1994) the Court went a step further, insisting that there must be a rough proportionality between imposed building conditions and the burdens anticipated from the development. Moreover, Chief Justice William Rehnquist, writing for the Court, pointedly remarked that the takings clause of the Fifth Amendment was as much a part of the Bill of Rights as the First or Fourth Amendments.

The Supreme Court has also shown heightened concern about land use restrictions that dramatically diminished the value of property. In Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council (1992) the Court held that regulations that denied an owner all economically productive use of land constituted a taking notwithstanding the public interest advanced to justify the restraint. The Court treated a total deprivation of economic use as the practical equivalent of a physical appropriation of the land. The regulatory takings doctrine continues to evolve. For example, in Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel (524 U.S. 498, 1998) a plurality of the Court found that a congressional act that retroactively imposed financial liability on an employer effectuated a taking.

Purpose of Takings Clause

Like other provisions of the Bill of Rights, the takings clause serves as a vital guarantee of the rights of individuals against abuses of government power. As the Supreme Court explained in Armstrong v. United States (364 U.S. 40, 1960), the purpose behind the takings clause was “to bar Government from forcing some people alone to bear public burdens which, in all fairness and justice, should be borne by the public as a whole” (p. 49). In other words, the takings clause prevents government from singling out individual owners to share a disproportionate burden of the cost of furnishing public goods. It reinforces the security of property ownership as a means to encourage economic growth as well as to provide a practical basis on which to safeguard other individual rights. It also attests to the important role of private property in the American constitutional order.

JAMES W. ELY, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Eagle, Steven J. Regulatory Takings. 2nd ed. Charlottesville, VA: Lexis Publishing, 2001.
- Ely, James W., Jr. "That Due Satisfaction May Be Made": The Fifth Amendment and the Origins of the Compensation Principle." American Journal of Legal History 36 (1992): 1–18.
- . The Guardian of Every Other Right: A Constitutional History of Property Rights. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Epstein, Richard A. Takings: Private Property and the Power of Eminent Domain. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1985.
- Fischel, William A. Regulatory Takings: Law, Economics and Politics. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Gold, Andrew S., Regulatory Takings and Original Intent: The Direct, Physical Takings Thesis "Goes Too Far," American University Law Review 49 (1999): 181–242.
- Treanor, William Michael, The Origins and Original Significance of the Just Compensation Clause of the Fifth Amendment, Yale Law Journal 94 (1985): 694–716.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Armstrong v. United States*, 364 U.S. 40 (1960)
- Barron v. Baltimore*, 32 U.S. 243 (1833)
- Berman v. Parker*, 348 U.S. 26 (1956)
- Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company v. Chicago*, 166 U.S. 226 (1897)
- Dolan v. City of Tigart*, 512 U.S. 374 (1994)
- Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel*, 524 U.S. 498 (1998)
- Gardner v. Village of Newburgh*, 12 Johns. Ch. 162 (N.Y. 1816)
- Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff*, 467 U.S. 229 (1984)
- Kohl v. United States*, 91 U.S. 367 (1875)
- Loretto v. Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp.*, 458 U.S. 419 (1982)
- Monongahela Navigation Company v. United States*, 148 U.S. 312 (1893)
- Nollan v. California Coastal Commission*, 483 U.S. 825 (1987)
- Penn Central Transportation v. New York*, 438 U.S. 104 (1978)
- Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon*, 260 U.S. 393 (1922)
- Pumpelly v. Green Bay Company*, 80 U.S. 166 (1871)
- United States v. Causby*, 328 U.S. 256 (1946)
- Vanhorne's Lessee v. Dorrance*, 2 U.S. 304 (1795)
- Village of Euclid v. Ambler Realty Company*, 272 U.S. 365 (1926)

TANEY COURT (1837–1864)

Roger Brooke Taney served as chief justice from 1837 to 1864. In that period the court heard relatively few cases that would be categorized as “civil liberties” cases today. The Bill of Rights did not apply to the states at this time and the federal government rarely interfered in the day-to-day lives of most people. Nevertheless, civil liberties issues reached the Court in a few significant cases, mostly, but not exclusively, involving slavery and the Civil War.

In Justice Taney’s first term as chief justice, the Court decided two cases that had civil liberties implications, although at the time they were not discussed in that way. New York v. Miln (1837) involved a New York statute that required every ship entering that state from abroad to provide the state with a list of all passengers, including their names, ages, and country of origin. In addition, the law required:

from every master of such vessel that he be bound with sureties in such sum as the mayor, &c., shall think proper, in a sum not to exceed 300 dollars, for every passenger, to indemnify and save harmless the mayor, &c., of the city of New York, and the overseers of the poor of the city from all expenses of the maintenance of such person, or of the child or children of such person, born after such importation; in case such person, child or children, shall become chargeable to the city within two years.

This law was aimed at regulating immigrants and the poor. Miln, the master of a ship that docked in New York, refused to comply with the law, arguing it violated the commerce clause. The Court upheld the law as a legitimate regulation of local “police powers” and ignored its implications for commerce. The case is usually seen as a modification of the commerce clause. However, the case also allowed for the local regulation of immigrants and, by implication, the exclusion of undesirable people. Counsel in the case argued that this law was consistent with state laws that prohibited free blacks from entering southern ports. In Charles River Bridge Co. v. Warren Bridge Co. (1837) the Court allowed Massachusetts to charter the Warren Bridge Company to construct a bridge that would compete with the existing Charles River Bridge. This case is usually seen as one involving the contracts clause of the Constitution. But, it can also be understood as an aspect of “takings” jurisprudence, in the sense that the Court did not see the construction of a competing bridge as “taking” property.

In Permoli v. First Municipality of New Orleans (1845) the Supreme Court reaffirmed that the First Amendment did not apply to the states. This case involved a local regulation in New Orleans that limited which churches could be used for funerals. Permoli, a Catholic priest, challenged the law on First Amendment grounds, but the Court refused to interfere, arguing that the amendment did not limit the states, but only the national government. This would remain the rule until the Fourteenth Amendment altered the Constitution after the Civil War.

Cases involving slavery raised a series of civil liberties questions for the Court. In United States v. Amistad (1841) the Court upheld the district court’s ruling that Africans illegally brought to the New World as slaves had a right to revolt, and even kill those enslaving them, in order to gain their freedom. The Court's ultimate decision in the Amistad case turned on the interpretation of various treaties and had little impact on slavery or civil liberties. But, the case did stand for the principle that people had the right to vindicate their liberty if they were illegally held as slaves.

The implications of the Amistad ruling were not directed at American slavery. The Taney Court consistently upheld the rights of masters to recover fugitive slaves and denied the rights of alleged fugitive slaves to a due process hearing to determine their status. In Prigg v. Pennsylvania (41 U.S., 16 Pet., 539, 1842) the Court held that Fugitive Slave Law of 1793 was constitutional and that alleged slaves were not entitled to a jury trial or any due process protections when being returned to a slave state. In addition, the Court held that the states were precluded from protecting the civil liberties and due process rights of fugitive slaves.

In Jones v. Van Zandt (1847) the Court held that whites did not need official "notice" to be liable for civil penalties if they helped a fugitive slave escape. In this case, an Ohio Quaker, John Van Zandt, had offered a ride to a group of slaves walking on a road in Ohio. Van Zandt claimed that he had no notice that these were slaves and thus he could not be liable for the value of the one slave who was never captured and returned to bondage. The Court disagreed and in effect nationalized the southern presumption that all blacks were slaves unless they could prove otherwise, even if found in a free state.

In Dred Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. (60 U.S.) 393 (1857), the Taney Court held that the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution prevented Congress from banning slavery in the federal territories because this amounted to an unconstitutional "taking" of private property. In his majority opinion Chief Justice Taney asserted that the Bill of Rights was applicable to all of the federal territories. The U.S. Supreme court would back away from this position in the Insular Cases, decided between 1901 and 1920.

The Supreme Court never attempted to interfere with President Lincoln's prosecution of the Civil War. In Ex parte Merryman (1862) Chief Justice Taney, acting in his capacity as circuit justice, issued a writ of habeas corpus, ordering that Merryman, a civilian, be released from military custody. By this time Lincoln has suspended habeas corpus in Maryland and the commanding general at Fort McHenry (where Merryman was in the brig) ignored Taney's order. The full Supreme Court never heard the case. In Ex parte Vallandigham (1864) the Court refused to hear the case of Clement Vallandigham, a Confederate sympathizer in Ohio who was convicted by a military court for antiwar speeches. The Court claimed it had no jurisdiction to review the military trial. After the war, in Ex parte Milligan (1866) the Court would reverse this position, overturning the military conviction of Lambdin Milligan.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Curtis, Michael Kent. Free Speech, "The People's Darling Privilege": Struggles for Freedom of Expression in American History. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2001.
- Hyman, Harold M., and William M. Wiecek. Equal Justice Under Law: Constitutional Development, 1835-1875. New York: Harper and Row, 1982.
- Neely, Mark E. The Fate of Liberty: Abraham Lincoln and Civil Liberties. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

TAX EXEMPTIONS FOR RELIGIOUS GROUPS AND CLERGY

Every federal income tax law since 1894 has contained an exemption for religious organizations. The policy behind such tax breaks was the benefit to the general welfare provided by such charitable organizations. The current federal regulation concerning tax-exempt status is Internal Revenue Code § 501. Under this statute, religious organizations are treated similarly to charitable, scientific, or educational institutions.

An important aspect of the discussion of tax exemption and religious groups concerns the free exercise and establishment clauses of the First Amendment. The provision of a tax benefit to religious organizations raises the issue of whether this benefit violates the doctrine of separation of church and state. The U.S. Supreme Court in Walz v. Commissioner (397 U.S. 664, 1970) considered the implications of tax exemption for religious groups and concluded that the First Amendment neither requires tax exemptions for religious organizations nor forbids them. The only requirement in order to avoid violation of the establishment clause is the neutral administration of benefits to religious and secular organizations. Incidental benefit to a religious group is acceptable in the administration of a secular governmental interest. In Texas Monthly v. Bullock (109 S. Ct. 890, 1989) the Supreme Court reiterated this position when it held that exemption of religious publications from sales or use taxes violates the establishment clause because it was not applied equally to secular groups and the exemption was not founded on a valid state secular interest.

Numerous state and local governments have also established tax exemptions for religious organizations. Taxes from which groups may be exempt include sales and use taxes and property taxes. Religious groups in general receive a number of tax benefits from the federal, state, and local governments. The fundamental benefit to the organizations is the financial benefit of tax exemption. The Internal Revenue Code § 501 provides religious organizations with an exemption from income taxes. Since income is derived by the organization, it cannot be extended to other individuals, groups, or contractors associated with the organization. On the other hand, other taxes—such as use or sales taxes—may transfer to individuals acting on behalf of the organization.

Besides sales and use taxes, some states also exempt taxes for property owned by religious groups. Because not all religious organizations own property, the further limitation of tax exemption to churches acts as an additional criterion. While individual states differ on the extent of property tax exemption, some common requirements include incorporation, nature and use of the property, composition of religious group, and activities of the religious group.

Beyond financial benefits, religious organizations also receive numerous procedural benefits associated with their status as religious organizations. The majority of procedural benefits provided to religious organizations are limited to “churches,” a distinction referenced in numerous tax statutes. For example, churches are allowed to deduct property intended to be used for tax-exempt purposes within fifteen years as non-debt-financed property from otherwise unrelated business income subject to taxation. This is distinguished from other tax-exempt organizations, which are limited to a ten-year period. Notably, Congress and the Supreme Court have each refused to provide a useful definition of “church” with regard to the tax code. The Treasury Department has provided certain guidelines for a religious organization to qualify as a church; it restricts the “church” designation to religious groups whose duties include “the ministration of sacerdotal functions and the conduct of worship.” This definition, however, has not been universally applied by courts interpreting the federal tax regulations.

Likewise, clergy and other employees of religious groups are provided numerous substantive and procedural tax benefits under the federal tax code. These benefits are dissimilar from tax effects on members of other charitable organizations, even organization heads. Among the substantive benefits received by clergy are the exemption of the value of rental allowances or rental value of homes provided as part of their compensation and exemption from social security.

Church employees also receive numerous procedural benefits related to retirement plan requirements. Church retirement plans, for example, are exempted from normal minimum participation standards, vesting standards, or funding standards.

A major limitation on religious organizations regards political participation. Political activity can jeopardize a religious organization’s tax-exempt status. The Internal Revenue Code § 501(c)(3) states that “no substantial part of the activities” may be involved in influencing legislation and the organization may not participate in “any political campaign on behalf of (or in opposition to) any candidate.” This portion of the statute significantly limits religious organizations from engaging in protected free speech, though the Supreme Court in Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Washington (461 U.S. 540, 1983), held that free speech was not violated by the political limitations of § 501(c)(3).

As a practical matter, however, the Internal Revenue Service prefers not to revoke an organization’s tax-exempt status, but rather focuses on correction. An organization’s tax exemption is revoked only when there is a case of clear and unambiguous political activity and the organization fails to correct the error and safeguard against further political activity.

MICHAEL KOBY

References and Further Reading

- Brunner, Taxation: Exemption of Parsonage or Residence of Minister, Priest, Rabbi, or Other Church Personnel, 55 A.L.R.3d 356.
- Zitter, What Constitutes Church, Religious Society, or Institution Exempt From Property Tax under State Constitutional or Statutory Provisions, 28 A.L.R.4th 344.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Washington*, 461 U.S. 540 (1983)
- Texas Monthly v. Bullock*, 109 S. Ct. 890 (1989)
- Walz v. Commissioner*, 397 U.S. 664 (1970)

TAXPAYER STANDING TO CHALLENGE ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE VIOLATIONS

Ever since the famed decision of Marbury v. Madison in 1821, the Supreme Court and lower federal courts have exercised the power of judicial review—the power to review the actions of federal and state governments, and invalidate ones inconsistent with the Constitution. Yet lawyers know that the judiciary is not some roving arbiter free to invalidate any government action found to be contrary to the Constitution. Instead, there are significant limits on the courts' ability to check the actions of the other organs of government. These limits come with quite different names—sovereign immunity, abstention, the political-question doctrine, the bar on advisory opinions—but they all have roots in the idea that the role of the courts in our constitutional system is limited.

One of this idea's more important manifestations lies in the doctrine of standing. The essence of standing is that only people who are personally injured by government action should have the right to challenge it in court. By contrast, plaintiffs cannot generally sue if the injury they are complaining about is a "generalized grievance." The Supreme Court first put flesh on this idea in the 1923 case of Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447. There, a plaintiff sued to stop the federal government from providing monetary grants to the states to reduce maternal and infant mortality. The grants were given pursuant to the Federal Maternity Act of 1921, which the plaintiff alleged to be unconstitutional under the Tenth Amendment. The plaintiff was a federal taxpayer and her taxes were being used to support this allegedly unconstitutional grant. But beyond that, she was largely unaffected by the grant program. The Court dismissed the case, stating that plaintiffs whose only injuries are shared generally by all citizens or all taxpayers do not have standing.

The general rule then is that taxpayer standing (or citizen standing) does not exist. But the establishment clause creates an exception to that general rule. This was the holding of the Supreme Court's 1968 decision in Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83. Flast was a challenge, brought by a taxpayer, to the federal government's provision of funds to private schools, religious and secular, under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. The Court created a two-part test for taxpayer standing and explained why it was satisfied. First, there was in Flast (as there had been in Frothingham) a nexus between taxpayer status and the legislation challenged: in both cases, taxpayers were challenging Congress's use of their taxes under its Article I power to tax and spend for the general welfare. Second, there was in Flast (unlike Frothingham) a nexus between taxpayer status and the right being alleged. The Tenth Amendment, when it was passed, was not concerned with the rights of taxpayers. But the establishment clause, the Court reasoned, was. Indeed, one of the main purposes of the establishment clause was to prevent the government from forcing dissenting taxpayers to fund religious activity. Because both of those nexuses were shown, the Flast court thought standing established.

At the time, the Flast decision was seen as greatly expanding standing. But Flast was considerably narrowed in the 1982 case, Valley Forge College v. Americans United, 454 U.S. 464. The United States Department of Health, Education, and Welfare had given a seventy-seven acre tract of land to Valley Forge Christian College. A lawsuit was brought by taxpayer plaintiffs to stop the transfer as violating the establishment clause. In some respects, the facts of Valley Forge and Flast were quite similar; both involved government resources going to private religious groups. But the claims in Valley Forge were different in one key way, the Court reasoned. The plaintiffs in Valley Forge were not challenging the disposition of funds, but rather the disposition of property. Thus, the action was taken pursuant to Congress's power to dispose of government property in Article IV, § 3 of the Constitution, rather than Congress's power to tax and spend in Article I, § 8. The difference, the Court reasoned, meant that the taxpayers had not shown that first Flast nexus—the nexus between taxpayer status and the legislation challenged.

Many have taken issue with the logic of Valley Forge, questioning whether the distinction drawn in Valley Forge was sensible or self-serving. But no one doubts that Valley Forge was a marked departure from Flast in attitude and result. After Valley Forge, the rule now seems to be that taxpayer standing is allowed only when a taxpayer is challenging, under the establishment clause, a grant of government funds. Yet this exception should not be minimized. Narrow though it may be, it is still the reason why standing existed in the twenty-odd Supreme Court cases challenging government funds going to religious schools and organizations. Yet, the broader intimations of Flast—the suggestion that taxpayer standing might eventually be recognized for constitutional violations more generally—have been quieted, apparently for good.

One last point should be made. All the foregoing relates to the doctrine of federal taxpayer standing—that is, the rights of citizens to challenge actions of the federal government by virtue of their status as federal taxpayers. We have not yet said anything about state taxpayer standing doctrine—that is, the rights of citizens to challenge actions of state governments by virtue of their status as state taxpayers. These two doctrines are separate and distinct, even though courts and commentators often confuse them. The rules regarding state taxpayer standing are less articulated and more uncertain. The leading case is Doremus v. Board of Education, 342 U.S. 429, a 1952 case that denied state taxpayer standing to challenge a state statute requiring Bible readings in public schools because the readings did not involve the expenditure of any funds. Although Doremus seems slightly more permissive than Valley Forge as regards standing, it may just be a matter of time before the two standards are unified.

CHRISTOPHER C. LUND

References and Further Reading

- Berg, Thomas C. The State and Religion in a Nutshell. 2nd ed., West Publishing Group, 2004.
- Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. New York: Aspen Law and Business, 1997, § 2.5.
- Staudt, Nancy C., Taxpayers in Court: A Systematic Study of a (Misunderstood) Standing Doctrine, Emory Law Journal 52 (2003): 6:771–847.
- Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. 3rd ed. Minneapolis, MN: West Publishing Company, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Doremus v. Bd. of Educ.*, 342 U.S. 429 (1952)
- Flast v. Cohen*, 392 U.S. 83 (1968)
- Frothingham v. Mellon*, 262 U.S. 447 (1923)
- Valley Forge College v. Americans United for Separation of Church and State*, 454 U.S. 464 (1982)

See also Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83 (1968)

TAYLOR v. ILLINOIS, 484 U.S. 400 (1988)

In Taylor, the Supreme Court held that a criminal defendant's rights to present a defense and to compulsory process could be forfeited by his attorney's failure to follow procedural rules.

During Taylor's trial for attempted murder, the prosecution presented several witnesses who testified that Taylor shot the victim, Bridges, during a brawl; Taylor called two witnesses who testified that Bridges's brother accidentally fired the shot. Midway through the trial, Taylor's attorney announced that he would call another witness, Wormley, who would testify that Bridges and his brother carried guns just before the incident. The judge refused to allow Wormley to testify because Taylor's attorney knew of Wormley before trial but had not listed him as a potential witness. Taylor was subsequently convicted.

The U.S. Supreme Court affirmed Taylor's conviction by a vote of six to three. The Court agreed, as it had in Washington v. Texas (388 U.S. 14, 1967) and Chambers v. Mississippi (410 U.S. 284, 1973), that Taylor had a constitutional right to present defense witnesses. However, the Court concluded that the trial judge acted reasonably in excluding Wormley's testimony as a sanction for defense counsel's deliberate failure to disclose Wormley's existence until midtrial. The majority responded to the dissenters' complaint that it was unfair to punish Taylor for his attorney's misconduct by pointing out that defendants are often bound by their attorneys' tactical decisions. Taylor thus recognizes that a defendant's constitutional right to present a defense may be limited by reasonable procedural rules designed to assure the fairness of the trial process.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

- Westen, Peter, Confrontation and Compulsory Process: A Unified Theory of Evidence for Criminal Cases, Harvard Law Review 91 (1978): 567.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Chambers v. Mississippi*, 410 U.S. 284 (1973)
- Washington v. Texas*, 388 U.S. 14 (1967)

See also Chambers v. Mississippi*, 410 U.S. 284 (1973); Defense, Right to Present; Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967)

TAYLOR v. LOUISIANA, 419 U.S. 522 (1975)

The Sixth Amendment guarantees individuals the right to trial by a jury of their peers. Historically, however, individuals have been excluded from juries because of race, ethnicity, religion, gender, and other demographic attributes. In fact, it was not until 1975 in the case Taylor v. Louisiana that the Supreme Court declared that the exclusion of women on juries was unconstitutional.

Until Taylor, it was common for women to be excluded from jury service. In rare instances when women were included in jury pools, they were likely not chosen to serve. Opponents argued that grisly case details would corrupt women, that jury duty would interfere with their obligations as wives and mothers, and that they were too sympathetic and emotional to judge others' actions. Although the Civil Rights Act of 1957 mandated gender equality in federal jury systems, the Supreme Court upheld Florida's voluntary jury duty law in Hoyt v. Florida, 368 U.S. 57 (1961). The Court concluded that Florida's classification by gender in jury statutes was reasonable because of women's social status and duties as wives and mothers.

In the 1975 Taylor case, the male appellant was convicted by a jury selected from a pool without any women, pursuant to Louisiana's requirement that women not be selected for jury service unless they filed a written declaration of their desire to serve. The Supreme Court held, however, that individuals could not be excluded from jury service or given automatic exemptions based solely on sex, thus overruling the prior Hoyt decision.

LEE R. REMINGTON

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Larry, Robert P. George, and Frederick Schauer, eds., Developments in the Law: The Civil Jury, Harvard Law Review 110 (1997).
- Garcia, Alfredo. "The Sixth Amendment in Modern American Jurisprudence: A Critical Perspective." In Contributions in Legal Studies, vol. 67. New York: Greenwood Press, 1992.
- Hinchcliff, Carole L., American Women Jurors: A Selected Bibliography, Georgia Law Review 20 (1986).
- Matthews, Burnita S., The Woman Juror, Women Lawyers Journal 15 (1927).
- Women Jurors in Federal Courts: Hearings before the Subcomm. No. 1 of the Comm. on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives*. 75th Cong, 1st Sess. 1–9, 24–26 (1937).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Hoyt v. Florida*, 368 U.S. 57 (1961)
- Taylor v. Louisiana*, 419 U.S. 522 (1975)

See also Jury Trial; Jury Trial Right; Sex and Criminal Justice

TEACHER SPEECH IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

It is a point of pride among residents of the United States that they have substantial freedom from governmental interference in matters involving speech and expression. When it comes to politics, economics, religion, the arts, social issues, general affairs of state, and most other topics, there are not many views that individuals are prohibited from expressing. Nor are there many constraints on the methods that individuals may employ to do that expressing. However, in some contexts the government has greater latitude to engage in actions that impose restrictions on the person's right to speak. One of these areas is that which encompasses speech by governmental employees—a group that the courts have concluded can be subjected to quite rigorous speech-curtailling policies. Teachers who work in public schools constitute a subgroup of governmental employees that, perhaps more often than others, feel the pinch imposed by the squeeze of these government policies.

The authors of a prominent textbook on American public school law offer a concise explanation of the rationale behind this "government employee" exception to free speech rights (Alexander and Alexander, 2005). They write (p. 721):

Governmental agencies (or school districts) are charged by law with the responsibility for conducting governmental business. State agencies employ workers to perform assigned tasks as effectively and efficiently as possible. The precedent is well established that when an employee is paid a salary to work and contribute to an agency's effective operation and thereafter begins to do or say things that detract from the agency's effective operation, the government employer must have the power to prevent or restrain the employee from such acts or utterances.

The United States Supreme Court has decided a number of cases in which it has embedded this perspective into First Amendment free speech doctrine. This essay analyzes those cases pertaining to public school teachers and provides a thorough exposition of the carefully balanced and nuanced rules that they contain.

Historical Antecedents and General Principles

One of the earliest threats to the free speech interests of public school teachers were the loyalty oaths that many states imposed on government employees during the "red scare" and early "cold war" years of American history. Ever fearful of communist conspiracies to overthrow the U.S. government by force and violence—or by the more subtle and sinister means of indoctrinating American youth—public officials required that individuals occupying sensitive governmental positions swear that they were not affiliated with the Communist Party or any other subversive organization. Given their (presumed) ability to influence the impressionable young students in their charge, teachers were a prime target for such oaths.

However, the courts did not sit idly by and let state authorities run riot with loyalty oaths. For example, the Supreme Court intervened in several instances to protect teachers from oaths that failed the void-for-vagueness doctrine of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments' due process clauses (see Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360, 1964; Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction, 368 U.S. 278, 1961; Keyishian v. Board of Education, 385 U.S. 589, 1967). Due process requires that laws be written with that minimum level of clarity necessary to allow individuals to make reasonably accurate assessments about what is legally permissible behavior. Moreover, the minimum level of clarity is generally ratcheted up if the laws touch upon fundamental constitutional rights—such as freedom of speech. Vague laws have many problems, but one of their most commonly encountered criticisms is that they impart chilling effects on individuals contemplating the exercise of fundamental rights. For these reasons, among others, the Supreme Court declared several loyalty oath schemes to be unconstitutional during the mid-twentieth century.

The Court also required government officials to tailor loyalty oath policies so that only those individuals who presented true threats to the public were excluded from government employment. For example, in Weiman v. Updegraff (1952), the Court declared a loyalty oath unconstitutional because it did not draw a distinction between actively involved members of a subversive organization, who knew that the group advocated the overthrow of the nation by force and violence, from inactive members who did not know what the group advocated and did not possess the intent to accomplish the group's subversive goals (also see Elfbrandt v. Russell, 384 U.S. 11, 1966). In contrast, the Court upheld loyalty oath programs that prohibited only knowing members of subversive organizations from serving as public school teachers (Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U.S. 485, 1952). The loyalty oath involved in Adler, however, was subsequently reconsidered and declared unconstitutional because it was unduly vague and did not limit its reach only to active members of subversive organizations who had the specific intent to overthrow the government (Keyishian v. Board of Education).

Even though the Supreme Court prevented school boards from imposing poorly designed loyalty oaths on teachers in some of the cases discussed earlier, it has never held that such oaths constitute per se violations of the Constitution. Moreover, the Court has long held the view that the administration of K through 12 public schools is something that should predominantly reside under the dominion of local authorities. Primary and secondary education is, for the most part, funded by local sources of revenue, and it has traditionally been a government service that residents of the community have structured to fit their needs. Indeed, few aspects of local politics have been more prominent, salient, and prone to conflict than those touching upon the education policy of communities.

The Supreme Court's recognition of the nation's long tradition of maintaining local control over the operation of K through 12 education has been clearly articulated in extant case law. The best statement—and the perspective employed today in cases involving K through 12 public education—can be found in Epperson v. Arkansas (393 U.S. 97, 1968). In Epperson, the Court declared unconstitutional a state law that prohibited teachers in any state-supported school (including colleges and universities) from teaching or assigning books on the theory that humans evolved from “lower order” animals. In announcing its decision, the Court explained:

Judicial interposition in the operation of the public school system of the Nation raises problems requiring care and restraint.... By and large, public education in our Nation is committed to the control of state and local authorities. Courts do not and cannot intervene in the resolution of conflicts which arise in the daily operation of school systems and which do not directly and sharply implicate basic constitutional values.

Justice Black, concurring in Epperson, explained that “[h]owever wise this Court may be or may become hereafter, it is doubtful that, sitting in Washington, it can successfully supervise and censor the curriculum of every public school in every hamlet and city in the United States.” Thus, cases brought to the courts by K through 12 public school teachers challenging school board actions on the grounds that they damage their free speech rights will, all things being equal, face greater hurdles to their success than will other government employees bringing free-speech-based challenges against their employers.

This judicial deference toward K through 12 institutions is frequently visible in cases involving teachers who assert that their First Amendment rights were violated when school administrators imposed punishments on them for engaging—while they taught their classes—in some form of expressive activity that the administrators disapproved. For example, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that a teacher could be reprimanded (in this case transferred) because she sponsored the performance of a play that school authorities subsequently deemed inappropriate for her students (Boring v. Buncombe County Board of Education, 136 F.3d 364, 4th Cir., 1998). The majority in Boring explained:

Someone must fix the curriculum of any school, public or private. In the case of a public school, in our opinion, it is far better public policy, absent a valid statutory directive on the subject, that the makeup of the curriculum be entrusted to the local school authorities who are in some sense responsible, rather than to the teachers, who would be responsible only to the judges, had they a First Amendment right to participate in the makeup of the curriculum.

Similarly, in Kirkland v. Northside Independent School District, 890 F.2d 794 (5th Cir. 1989), the fifth circuit held that a teacher could be dismissed because he failed to use an approved reading list in his high school history class. In short, courts have been unwilling to prevent school administrators from adopting a common curriculum or from punishing teachers who deviate from that curriculum while performing their teaching duties.

However, the First Circuit Court of Appeals has concluded that teachers are protected by the First Amendment when they employ teaching methods that they believe will best convey the approved curriculum. In Keefe v. Geanakos (1969), the first circuit concluded that a teacher could use an expletive as part of his classroom instruction because it was integrally related to the assigned reading (which had been selected by the teacher) and because the word could be found in several books in the school's library.

Nevertheless, other courts have been careful not to overextend the degree to which the First Amendment protects teachers who employ controversial teaching methods (Mailloux v. Kiley, 323 F. Supp. 1387, D. Mass., 1971). Because children are required by law to attend school, judges have been sensitive to the argument that students constitute a captive audience that teachers should not have the right to exploit for their own ideological purposes (Mailloux v. Kiley). Although courts have expressed concern with efforts by school boards to "cast a pall of orthodoxy over the classroom" (Keyishian v. Board of Regents), they are equally concerned with similar attempts made by teachers. To the extent that the Supreme Court has weighed in on these issues, it has concluded that administrators may generally adopt school policies that are "reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns" (Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260, 1988).

The Modern Approach

In Epperson, the Court declared the antievolution law unconstitutional because it was deemed to violate the establishment clause of the First Amendment. The Court did not reach the free speech issues that the case presented. That same year, however, the Court decided what is now widely considered the seminal case involving the scope of free speech rights of public school teachers: Pickering v. Board of Education (391 U.S. 563, 1968). Marvin Pickering was an Illinois school teacher who had sent a letter to a local newspaper that, in addition to containing some factual inaccuracies, was critical of the financial and budgetary decisions of his school district's board of education and superintendent. The school board quickly dismissed Pickering and, at a subsequent hearing (required by state law), concluded that its decision was justifiable because his action was damaging to the smooth and efficient operation of the district's schools.

In overturning the school board's action, the Supreme Court concluded that teachers are, like other citizens, entitled to significant freedom from governmental regulation of their speech activities—even when the views expressed touch upon matters related to their employment. As the Court would note one year later, teachers—like students—do not forfeit their First Amendment rights when they enter the "schoolhouse gates" (Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503, 1969). Nevertheless, Justice Marshall, writing for the Court in Pickering, explained that First Amendment cases present unique issues when they involve the employment related speech of government employees:

[T]he State has interests as an employer in regulating the speech of its employees that differ significantly from those it possesses in connection with regulation of the speech of the citizenry in general. The problem in any case is to arrive at a balance between the interests of the teacher, as a citizen, in commenting upon matters of public concern and the interest of the State, as an employer, in promoting the efficiency of the public services it performs through its employees.

The Court concluded that Pickering's letter to the newspaper addressed matters of abiding public concern. As such, the Court argued that the proper resolution of the matter would be to balance the free speech rights of Pickering against the school board's interest in the efficient operation of the local public schools.

The Court argued that Pickering did not have a personal, intimate working relationship with the school board or the superintendent. Therefore, although his speech might have upset school administrators, it would not likely lead to the type of intra- or interoffice conflicts and disputes that could understandably hinder the efficient operation of the district's schools. Pickering's duties were in the classroom, not in the offices of the school board or superintendent. The outcome might have been different if Pickering had been a lower level policy-making administrator who worked directly for the board or the superintendent (see Wilbur v. Mahan, 3 F.3d 214, 7th Cir., 1993).

In addition, the Court rejected the school board's argument that Pickering could be dismissed because several inaccuracies in his editorial were damaging to the integrity and reputations of the superintendent and members of the school board. The administrators argued that the damage to their public esteem would hinder their ability to govern the district's schools effectively. The Court was not convinced and instead held that Pickering's dismissal could only be justified if the district could demonstrate that he knew his statements were false or that he acted in reckless disregard of the truth (see New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 1964). Justice Marshall explained that the Court "unequivocally reject[s]" the idea that a teacher can be dismissed solely because he spoke publicly about a school-related matter of public concern in a manner that administrators considered too "critical in tone."

In its final analysis, the majority concluded that the free speech interests of Pickering substantially outweighed the administrative interests of the school district. Obviously, Pickering had significant interests (e.g., his job) that were threatened by the school board. But the Court also noted that the local community had a stake in giving Pickering ample latitude to express his views. Writing in Pickering, Justice Marshall explained that "[t]eachers are, as a class, the members of the community most likely to have informed and definite opinions as to how [schools should be run]. Accordingly, it is essential that they be able to speak out freely on such questions without fear of retaliatory dismissal."

In subsequent cases the Supreme Court expounded on the law pertaining to the free speech rights of teachers by addressing questions that were not directly considered in Pickering. One of the most important of these was its decision in Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle (429 U.S. 274, 1977). In Mt. Healthy, a unanimous Court held that a public school teacher has the burden of proving two things when he claims that a school board has imposed negative consequences (e.g., dismissal, demotion, reprimands, etc.) on him because of his expressive acts. First, the teacher must demonstrate that his speech is constitutionally protected and, second, that it was a "substantial" or "motivating factor" in the school board's decision to impose the negative consequences. If the teacher meets this burden, the school board must then be given the opportunity to demonstrate, based on the preponderance of the evidence, that it would have imposed the negative consequences on the teacher even if it had not included the teacher's expressive activity in its decision calculus.

Thus, Mt. Healthy represents the Court's conclusion that it is not enough simply to balance the free speech interests of the teacher against those of the school board. Instead, trial courts must engage in a systematic examination of the facts to determine whether the teacher's speech was the "but for" cause of the school board's actions. While the teacher has to show that his expression was a "motivating factor" in the school board's decision to punish, the school board may be absolved if it can demonstrate that it did not constitute the motivating factor—the factor that, when added to the equation after all other factors had been incorporated, tipped the scale in favor of imposing negative consequences on the teacher. If the school board would have done what it did in the absence of the speech (i.e., the scale was tipped against the teacher before the speech factor was added to the equation), then there has not been a First Amendment violation.

One animating concern hovering over the Mt. Healthy Court's deliberations was the possibility that, under the Pickering balancing approach, a marginal employee who fears dismissal (or some other negative consequence from school administrators) could—in an effort to inoculate himself or herself constitutionally from negative treatment by administrators—engage in expression pertaining to an issue of public concern that was likely to anger school authorities. In other words, such an employee could attempt to use the First Amendment as a shield to deflect deserved negative personnel actions. Chief Justice Rehnquist, writing in Mt. Healthy, explained:

A borderline or marginal candidate should not have the employment question resolved against him because of constitutionally protected conduct. But that same candidate ought not be able, by engaging in such conduct, to prevent his employer from assessing his performance record and reaching a decision not to rehire on the basis of that record, simply because the protected conduct makes the employer more certain of the correctness of its decision.

After Mt. Healthy the Court continued to clarify First Amendment law regarding free speech rights of public school teachers. Recall that in Pickering the Court had implied that teachers could bring First Amendment free speech challenges against their employers only if the teacher's speech touched upon issues of public concern. In Connick v. Myers (461 U.S. 138, 1983) the Court delineated between speech acts of public employees that are of public concern and those that are of private concern. In this case five members of the Court upheld the dismissal of an assistant district attorney who distributed a questionnaire to other attorneys working in her office. The Court concluded that the questionnaire did not address questions of public concern, but instead was directed at assessing the internal affairs of the district attorney's office. Because Connick's superiors considered the questionnaire an act of insubordination bordering on a "mini-insurrection," the Court concluded that her dismissal was legitimate.

The majority in Connick explained that, to be considered of public concern, a public employee’s speech must address something other than internal office disputes, conflicts, and other matters of employment that are predominantly of a personal nature. Justice White, writing for the majority, offered the following summary of the Court’s conclusion:

We hold only that when a public employee speaks not as a citizen upon matters of public concern, but instead as an employee upon matters only of personal interest, absent the most unusual circumstances, a federal court is not the appropriate forum in which to review the wisdom of a personnel decision taken by a public agency allegedly in reaction to the employee’s behavior.

The standard announced in Connick has general applicability to all free speech cases involving public employees. Therefore, the decision is of immediate relevance to the free speech rights of teachers (see Seemuller v. Fairfax County School Board, 878 F.2d 1578, 4th Cir., 1989; Stroman v. Colleton County School District, 981 F.2d 152, 4th Cir., 1993). It is clear, then, that after Connick the following four-part sequence should be followed in cases involving public school teachers who allege that they suffered adverse consequences at the hands of school administrators upset by their expressive acts (see Daniels v. Quinn, 801 F.2d 687, 4th Cir., 1986):

The teacher must demonstrate that the speech is of public concern (Connick) and that it is protected by the First Amendment (Mt. Healthy).

The teacher must demonstrate that the speech act was a “substantial” or “motivating factor” in the administration’s decision to treat the teacher in an adverse manner (Mt. Healthy).

The school board must be given the opportunity to demonstrate, based on the preponderance of the evidence, that the teacher’s speech act was not the “but for” cause of the negative consequences imposed on the teacher by the school board (Mt. Healthy). (If the school is successful at this stage in the four-part sequence, then there has not been a First Amendment violation and the court should rule in favor of the school board.)

If the school board is unsuccessful in step three, then (and only then) the court should employ the Pickering balancing test. As such, it should ask whether the free speech interests of the public school teacher outweigh the administrative interests of the school’s administration. The court should rule in favor of that party whose interests are most weighty.

MARK KEMPER

References and Further Reading

Alexander, Kern, and M. David Alexander. American Public School Law. 6th ed. Belmont, CA: Thomson West Publishing, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Adler v. Board Education, 342 U.S. 485 (1952)
Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360 (1964)
Boring v. Buncombe County Board of Education, 136 F.3d 364 (4th Cir. 1998)
Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138 (1983)
Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction, 368 U.S. 278 (1961)
Daniels v. Quinn, 801 F.2d 687 (4th Cir. 1986)
Elfbrandt v. Russell, 384 U.S. 11 (1966)
Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)
Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988)
Keyishian v. Board of Education, 385 U.S. 589 (1967)
Kirkland v. Northside Independent School District, 890 F.2d 794 (5th Cir. 1989)
Mailloux v. Kiley, 323 F. Supp. 1387 (D. Mass. 1971)
Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274 (1977)
New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968)
Seemuller v. Fairfax County School Board, 878 F.2d 1578 (4th Cir. 1989)
Stroman v. Colleton County School District, 981 F.2d 152 (4th Cir. 1993)
Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969)
Wilbur v. Mahan, 3 F.3d 214 (7th Cir. 1993)

TEACHING “CREATION SCIENCE” IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Although the matter admits of some lingering dissent, it is nevertheless fairly well settled that the First Amendment’s establishment clause prohibits the presentation of any religion-based ideas or theories about life sciences in the science curriculum of public schools. In Epperson v. Arkansas (393 U.S. 97, 1968) and Edwards v. Aguillard (482 U.S. 578, 1987), the U.S. Supreme Court has disapproved of attempts to present various versions of creationism in the arena of teaching life sciences, leaving the field open to a doctrine universally known as the theory of evolution.

In the minds of many, the term “creationism” is usually associated with the belief that the account of the creation in Genesis is literally true. But the term has a much broader application. Creationism includes anyone who believes that God is responsible for making and sustaining the universe and all it contains, whether through myriad natural laws and agencies that He created and set in operation, through direct omnipotent intervention, or a combination of both. In its widest definition, all those who believe in the existence of a Creator God are properly labeled creationists. Accordingly, creationists can be categorized into three general camps (of which there are many subcategories): (1) fundamentalist creationism; (2) generalist creationism; and (3) theistic evolutionism.

Fundamentalist creationism is known by many names to include “young Earth creationism” (holding that the age of the Earth is measured in thousands of years, not billions), “biblical creationism” (holding that the Bible is literally true), etc. Those who advocate the fundamentalist view claim scriptural literalism as the basis for their belief and attempt to transform the broad outline styled creation passages into a specific and detailed catechism. The general principles include the belief that the laws of nature, the galaxies, stars, planets, and all life were created directly by God in six 24-hour days, and that all living things have remained largely unchanged since that time. By far, fundamentalists are largest and most well organized of the creationist camps.

Generalist creationism takes a far more pragmatic view of the biblical passages on creation. Noting that Bible creation passages are sharply focused on the results of various broadly painted creation events and not on the mechanics of how things were done, generalists do not bind themselves to any particular view of how God created or developed life forms. To support this viewpoint, they point out the lack of specific scientifically styled details and that much of what is revealed is set out in thumbnail sketches of general events framed in accommodating anthropomorphisms and anthropopathisms—language understandable to the peoples of the ancient world.

Theistic evolutionism expands on the generalist view and holds that God uses the process of evolution to create and develop life forms. For theists, even if life came about as a step-by-step evolution of nature on God’s behalf, the so-called theory of evolution cannot ultimately rule out God or his sustaining activity as many evolutionists proclaim.

In terms of the creation/evolution controversy, the Supreme Court has only addressed the issue on two occasions. Its first application of the establishment clause did not occur until 1968, when the issue before the Court turned on what public schools could or could not include in their curriculum. In Epperson the Court weighed the constitutionality of a forty-year-old Arkansas state statute that made it unlawful to teach in public schools “the theory or doctrine that mankind ascended or descended from a lower order of animals” or “to adopt or use in any such institution a textbook that teaches [the theory of evolution].”

To better navigate the swiftly moving waters of the establishment clause, the Court has entertained a number of analytical standards. The most well-known is the Lemon test set forth in Lemon v. Kurtzman (403 U.S. 602, 1971). Lemon established a three-pronged approach to assess the validity of a legislative statute or governmental action as related to the establishment clause: (1) The statute or governmental action must have a secular purpose; (2) the primary or principal effect of the statute or governmental action must neither advance nor inhibit religion; and (3) the statute or governmental action must not foster an excessive governmental entanglement with religion. All three prongs of the Lemon test must be met to hold the law constitutional.

The Lemon Court agreed that the establishment clause was intended to prevent “three main evils”—“sponsorship, financial support, and active involvement of the sovereign in religious activity.” Although the Lemon test has never been overturned by the Court, its fealty to the standard has waxed and waned over the years—sometimes as a function of ideological inclinations of the justices and sometimes simply in an effort to decide better where the line between church and state should be drawn or redrawn.

With little effort, the Supreme Court determined that the Arkansas Supreme Court was in error when it ruled that the state of Arkansas had the right to exclude the teaching of the theory of evolution as a constitutional “exercise of [a] state’s power[s] to specify the curriculum in its public schools.” Reversing the Arkansas Supreme Court, the Court specifically found that the real goal of the Arkansas statute was to protect a particular religious view by prohibiting the teaching of the theory of evolution. Accordingly, the Court easily struck down the antievolution statute as blatantly unconstitutional. Under the Lemon test, the purpose and effect of the statute clearly provided preference to a particular sectarian religious view contrary to the establishment clause’s requirement of neutrality.

As expected, the group that greeted Epperson with the most disdain was the fundamentalists. Their strategy to blunt Epperson was to promote a “balanced treatment” approach in the public classroom where their interpretation of the biblical story of creation, now renamed “creation science,” would be taught in conjunction with the theory of evolution. The misguided hope was that such a balanced treatment would provide equal time in the curriculum to both ideas and hence pass constitutional muster. This notion led a number of states to adopt so-called “balanced treatment” statutes.

In 1987, the Supreme Court considered balanced treatment in Edwards. In a rather straightforward seven-to-two decision, the Court ruled that the Louisiana statute forbidding the teaching of the theory of evolution in public schools unless accompanied by instruction in creation science violated the first prong of the Lemon test; hence, the statute was unconstitutional under the establishment clause. Interestingly, the ruling did not turn on a determination of the actual merits of the theory of evolution versus creationism. Instead, the Court decided that, since the position that a supernatural being directly created humankind was a central belief of a “particular religious doctrine by those responsible for the passage of the Creationism Act,” the Louisiana act violated the secular purpose prong of the Lemon test.

Amplifying the pragmatism of Epperson, the Edwards majority went to great lengths to uncover the so-called religious motivations of the state legislators who enacted the statute, claiming that “we need not be blind in this case to the legislature’s preeminent religious purpose in enacting this statute.” The Court further indicated that the act would also fail the second prong of the Lemon test because its purpose “was to clearly advance the religious viewpoint that a supernatural being created humankind.”

In conclusion, if the goal of public education is to develop critical thinking apart from the dogma of religious beliefs, few can argue with the inherent soundness of the Supreme Court’s rulings. Indeed, no public school district teaches creationism. Not only should students be presented with the full flow of available knowledge based on objective reasoning, whether it is fact or theory, but it also is certainly not the function of the state to promote or indoctrinate students in a particular religious view. On the other hand, it remains to be seen whether the emerging idea of “intelligent design” will meet a similar judicial result. Without identifying any particular God of religion, intelligent design asserts that scientific studies clearly demonstrate the workings of a superior being—that is, God—in the creation and fabric of living things.

JEFFREY F. ADDICOTT

References and Further Reading

- House, Wayne H., Darwinism and the Law: Can Non-Naturalistic Scientific Theories Survive Constitutional Challenge? Regent University Law Review 13 (2001).
 Morris, Henry M. Biblical Creationism: What Each Book of the Bible Teaches about Creation and the Flood. Green Forest, AR: Master Books, 2000.
 Ray, John. The Wisdom of God Manifested in the Works of the Creation. 1691.
 Bird, Wendell R., Freedom of Religion and Science Instruction in Public Schools, Yale Law Journal 87 (1978).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Edwards v. Aguillard*, 482 U.S. 578 (1987)
Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)

TEACHING EVOLUTION IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS

In Walz v. Tax Comm’n, 397 U.S. 664, 674 (1970), the Supreme Court signaled that the development of case law in the evolution/creationism debate would ensure that public science education would be protected from being “[entangled] with religion.” Interestingly, however, the developing case law in the debate has also apparently proven to be a tremendous boon for those who wish to hold inviolable the teaching of the theory of evolution to the total exclusion of all other ideas—scientific or otherwise—about the appearance and function of living things. Indeed, coupling the powerful influence exerted by the Darwinian paradigm with the inescapable religious history of the creationist movement, many are strongly persuaded that all future jurisprudence in this area will demonstrate an intransigent preference in favor of keeping the theory of evolution on its throne. With the recent development of the doctrine of intelligent design, this view is probably incorrect.

Although ideas excluding God from the creation and function of the universe and life have been proposed in philosophical settings from the time of Plato, it was not until the nineteenth century that the idea was encapsulated in a scientific cloak of respectability, particularly as it applied to living things. This first occurred in 1859, when the English naturalist Charles Darwin proposed his thought-provoking theory of evolution in a book entitled The Origin of Species.

The basic tenets of evolution are well known by scientists and laymen alike. Darwin’s theory of evolution has undergone some modifications over the years, but it essentially consists of two intertwined factors that, working together, purport to account for the appearance, interrelationship, and purposefulness of all living things. These two factors are (1) the random existence of favorable genetic mutations in life forms—that is, chance—and (2) the operation of a process called natural selection, or the survival of the fittest—that is, necessity. As incredible as it might seem, this simplistic formula has been used to account for absolutely every aspect of life one can imagine, ranging from such things as the shape of a bird’s wing to why people smile.

There is no doubt that Darwin’s theory of evolution is the most revolutionary scientific idea of the modern era. Not only has it become the mantra for the profession of science, but concepts washed in “evolution speak” have pushed their way into the fabric of Western thinking. In the lexicon of scientific jargon the word can be used to acknowledge the phenomenon of change and to describe the mechanism for that change. On the mechanical side of this duality, the word “evolution” means that matter is self-developing through a material or natural process. Most evolutionists therefore conclude that an intelligent being (God) has nothing to do on any level with the development of living things. Since the time of Darwin, this is the way that the word has been used by evolutionists.

Paradoxically, the reading segment of America is now generally aware of the laundry list of reasons that the theory of evolution is currently under siege from inside and outside the scientific community; the greatest challenge, of course, is the fossil record. In the law, interpretation stops when the text is clear—interpretation cessat in claris. If one applies this maxim to the theory of evolution in the most generous light, the truth of the matter is that the text—that is, the fossil record—will never approach clarity, meaning that interpretation will never cease. But, if solid empirical evidence for Darwin’s claim is lacking, thoughtful students can hardly fail to pose the question, “What makes the theory of evolution such a successful idea?” Perhaps the best way to capture the power of evolution’s Weltanschauung (worldview) is to view the matter as a function of three interrelated factors.

The first reason that Darwinian thinking has been able to dominate the scene hinges on the fact that, to a degree, the theory of evolution is certainly correct and very provable under the strict criteria of the scientific method. There is no question that plants and animals can make gradual changes in form and function over time so that living things undergo limited degrees of modification under the agencies of mutation and natural selection. This process of limited change is commonly known as microevolution and objective studies have conclusively demonstrated it to be a fact of science. The real question is just how far the principle of microevolution can be stretched in order to justify the all-encompassing theory of evolution—that is, macroevolution. A general search of the literature reveals that attempts to answer that question through objective observation have fallen short.

The second reason that the theory of evolution maintains its hegemony is that it has been institutionalized as the dominant paradigm in the scientific community. Many eminent scientists complain that Darwinian evolution is so powerful a premise that newer information that has become available has not yet been able to affect the paradigm much, let alone point the way to a new and more accurate dialectic. This situation is further exacerbated by the fact that the theory of evolution is generally presented as an unchangeable fact in classrooms, museum displays, books, academic journals, newspapers, radio, and television. Thus, since all information is heavily influenced by this paradigm, the theory of evolution is constantly reinforced by endless repetition. For example, the widely respected astrophysicist Sir Fred Hoyle (1915–2001) aggressively argued that education in the school system of any Western nation meant baptism into Darwinism as the way of thinking about life sciences. Furthermore, no alternative or modes of investigation outside the Darwinian paradigm are tolerated. If permitted at all, academic discussions are strictly limited to arguments between the various schools within Darwinian thought.

The final reason for evolution’s dominance revolves around the uncompromising attitude and, in many instances, “theological” fervor exhibited by some of its leading advocates. For lack of a better term, one might call them “Darwinian activists.” For this particular brand of Darwinist, it is not a matter of separating religious beliefs from the province of the natural sciences; for them it is taking the scientific idea, known as the theory of evolution, and making it the basis for an entire philosophy of life. Since their perception of reality demands that God does not exist, belief in the existence of God and acceptance of the theory of evolution are presented as mutually exclusive positions. Simply put, the argument proclaims that evolution excludes God; therefore, God does not exist. This movement is most commonly known as “evolutionism,” a materialistic philosophy totally antagonistic to the idea of God.

British zoologist Richard Dawkins of Oxford, perhaps the best known modern-day proponent of evolution, typifies this antireligious view where evolution is embraced as the central linchpin to a metaphysical philosophy antagonistic to God. Dawkins readily describes himself as an unapologetic atheist who desires to stamp out any notion that God is responsible for the design of life. In the name of evolutionism, he leads an unrelenting assault against all who question the theory of evolution. Dawkins writes: “The universe we observe has precisely the properties we should expect if there is, at bottom, no design, no purpose, no evil and no good, nothing but blind, pitiless indifference.”

In a very real sense, evolutionism is established in the minds of Darwinian activists as a new pseudo-religion, albeit in a secular and ideological form, with the theory of evolution serving as the creative centerpiece. Even if evolutionism is not a religion in the most common sense of the word, it clearly has parallel dimensions: the claim to the absolute ultimate, the requirement of commitment by its followers, the fear of apostasy, the cadre of missionaries, and its role as providing the sole interpretation of the meaning of life.

On the one side, the theory of evolution attempts to explain life sciences only; on the other side, it exhibits all the components of a religion or, alternatively, an antireligion, causing many to question whether teaching the theory of evolution is a violation of the establishment clause. Questioning whether evolutionism has impermissibly violated the establishment clause's principle of neutrality in the sphere of public education is an issue that has been raised in the lower courts but never entertained by the Supreme Court.

The demands of evolutionism may also prove to be extremely counterproductive from a legal perspective; touting such an antireligious agenda clearly opens the door to judicial scrutiny under the establishment clause. The argument that the theory of evolution might one day qualify as a religious belief or an anti-religion (since it is not religiously neutral), as Justice Black put it in Epperson v. Arkansas (482 U.S. 578, 1987), is certainly a real possibility.

The starting point for assessing this challenge begins with the Court's struggle to articulate a legal definition of religion. A survey of Supreme Court cases regarding the definition of religion reveals that the Court uses the term to mean different things in different contexts. In Torcaso v. Watkins (367 U.S. 488, 1961), for instance, the Supreme Court recognized that some religions need not be based in a belief in the existence of a personal God when it said that neither a state nor the federal government can "aid those religions based on a belief in the existence of God as against those religions founded on different beliefs." Indeed, in a footnote, the Torcaso Court wrote: "Among religions in this country which do not teach what would generally be considered a belief in the existence of God are Buddhism, Taoism, Ethical Culture, Secular Humanism and others" (emphasis added).

In School District of Abington Township v. Schempp (374 U.S. 203, 1963), the Supreme Court affirmatively included secular humanism as a religion, stating that "[t]he State may not establish a 'religion of secularism' in the sense of affirmatively opposing or showing hostility to religion, thus 'preferring those who believe in no religion over those who do believe.'" Then, in Welsh v. United States (398 U.S. 333, 1970), the Court stretched the definition of religious belief to the farthest reaches by stating that Congress "cannot draw the line between theistic or nontheistic religious beliefs on the one hand and secular beliefs on the other."

Thus, if secular humanism qualifies as a religion in the Supreme Court's broadly staked constitutional definition of religious beliefs, a fortiori, the argument can surely be made that the theory of evolution also qualifies as a religion since Darwinian activists brazenly tout the theory of evolution as the central principle of evolutionism or secular humanism.

Perhaps recognizing the problems associated with its expanded definition of religion, the Supreme Court has seemingly heeded the advice of Justice Black and simply refused to address the dilemma vis-à-vis the theory of evolution and the establishment clause. The lower federal courts have greeted this silence as a green light to halt any attacks on the theory of evolution.

Peloza v. Capistrano Unified School District (37 F.3d 517, 9th Circuit, 1994) best illustrates the concern. Peloza, a public high school biology teacher, sued his school district asserting that, because he was obliged to teach evolutionism to his students, he was engaged in an unconstitutional establishment of religion. In weighing Peloza's claim, the court found that evolution and evolutionism were synonyms to describe a scientifically accepted "biological concept" that related strictly to "higher life forms evol[ing] from lower ones." "Charitably read," the court concluded, "Peloza's complaint at most makes this claim: the school district's actions establish a state-supported religion of evolutionism, or more generally of 'secular humanism.'" Finding that neither the Supreme Court nor the ninth circuit had ever held that "evolutionism or secular humanism are 'religions' for Establishment Clause purposes," the court dismissed Peloza's complaint. Curiously, the court specifically acknowledged that an actionable claim might be made if one defined "'evolution' and 'evolutionism' as does [Mr.] Peloza as a concept that embraces the belief that the universe came into existence without a Creator ..." (emphasis added).

In Wright v. Houston Independent School District (366 F. Supp. 1208, S.D. Tex. 1972, affirmed per curiam, 486 F.2d 137, 5th Cir. 1973), high school students alleged that the school district and the State Board of Education violated the establishment clause because the teaching of evolutionary theory was tantamount to "lending official support to the religion of secularism." The Court rejected the claim, refusing to recognize secular humanism as a religion under the establishment clause. Similarly, in Smith v. Bd. of Sch. Commissioners of Mobile County (827 F.2d 684, 11th Cir. 1987), plaintiffs alleged that the school district was in violation of the establishment clause because it promoted secular humanism. The eleventh circuit refused to accept the district court's finding that secular humanism qualified as a religion for these purposes.

In McLean v. Ark. Board of Education (529 F. Supp. 1255, D.C. Ark. 1982), the federal district court also refused the argument, noting that “it is clearly established in the case law, and perhaps in common sense, that evolution is not a religion and that teaching evolution does not violate the establishment clause.”

Despite the holdings in the lower federal courts refusing to equate the theory of evolution as a religion or as a doctrine hostile to religion, the Supreme Court has never squarely addressed the issue and the argument continues to be advanced. Interestingly, in light of the continuing drum beat of Darwinian activists that the theory of evolution dismisses all religious beliefs and answers ultimate realities, the Supreme Court may ultimately be forced to fashion a remedy to protect neutrality in the public science class. Such actions might require excluding certain educational materials that advance atheistic interpretations, mandating that classes on the theory of evolution explicitly inform students that evolution cannot be used to discredit religious beliefs, or even allowing—in the words of one legal commentator—for “creationist positions” to be presented as a counterbalance.

In order to advance the argument that evolutionism is part and parcel of the theory of evolution, future legal challenges must clearly spell out and define what evolutionism entails. For certain, it is not difficult to show that evolutionism is not restricted to the quest to understand biological origins no matter where the truth will lead. Darwinian activists have provided an abundance of ammunition to those who would characterize it as a religion or an antireligion. Per Peloza’s guidance, evolutionism is a metaphysical concept that wholeheartedly embraces the belief that “the universe came into existence without a Creator.”

JEFFREY F. ADDICOTT

References and Further Reading

- Ardrey, Robert. The Hunting Hypothesis. New York: Atheneum, 1976.
- Barton, David. A Death-Struggle between Two Civilizations. Regent University Law Review 13 (2001).
- Campbell, John A. “Intelligent Design, Darwinism, and the Philosophy of Public Education.” Rhetoric and Public Affairs 1 (1998).
- Crick, Francis. The Astonishing Hypothesis. New York: Simon, 1995.
- Darwin, Charles. The Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection. New York: Random House, 1993.
- Dawkins, Richard. River Out of Eden: A Darwinian View of Life. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.
- Dennett, Daniel. Darwin’s Dangerous Idea: Evolution and the Meanings of Life. New York: Simon, 1995.
- Futuyma, Douglas J. Science on Trial. Sunderland, MA: Sinauer, 1995.

- Grant, Peter, and Rosemary Grant. “Natural Selection and Darwin’s Finches.” Scientific American (October 1991).
- Horgan, John. The End of Science. New York: Broadway, 1996.
- Hoyle, Fred. The Origin of the Universe and the Origin of Religion. Kingston, RI: Moyer Bell, 1993.
- Jaeger, Werner. The Theology of the Early Greek Philosophers. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Kuhn, Thomas S. The Structure of Scientific Revolutions, 3rd ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Margenau, Henry, and Roy Abraham Varghese, eds. Cosmos, Bios, Theos: Scientists Reflect on Science, God, and the Origins of the Universe, Life and Homo Sapiens. Peru, IL: Open Court, 1992.
- Miller, Kenneth R. Finding Darwin’s God: A Scientist’s Search for Common Ground between God and Evolution. New York: HarperCollins, 1999.
- Purves, William K. Life: The Science of Biology. 5th ed. Sunderland, MA: Sinauer, 1998.
- Sagan, Carl. The Demon Haunted World. New York: Random House, 1995.
- Weiner, John. The Beak of the Finch. New York: Random House, 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Epperson v. Arkansas*, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)
- McLean v. Arkansas Board of Education*, 529 F. Supp. 1255 (D.C. Ark. 1982)
- Peloza v. Capistrano Unified School District*, 37 F.3d 517 (9th Cir. 1994)
- School District of Abington Township v. Schempp*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
- Smith v. Board of School Commissioners of Mobile County*, 827 F.2d 684 (11th Cir. 1987)
- Torcaso v. Watkins*, 367 U.S. 488 (1961)
- Walz v. Tax Commission*, 397 U.S. 664 (1970)
- Welsh v. United States*, 398 U.S. 333 (1970)
- Wright v. Houston Independent School District*, 366 F. Supp. 1208 (S.D. Tex. 1972), affirmed per curiam, 486 F.2d 137 (5th Cir. 1973)

TEN COMMANDMENTS ON DISPLAY IN PUBLIC BUILDINGS

There are hundreds of monuments and plaques with the Ten Commandments on them scattered around the United States. Many have been posted by government; others have been posted by private groups with government sanction. In the 1950s and 1960s the Fraternal Order of the Eagles (FOE), with the financial backing of the movie producer Cecil B. DeMille, erected hundreds of Ten Commandments monuments throughout the nation, usually on public land. The FOE did this to combat juvenile delinquency on the theory that placing these monuments on courthouse lawns would help young kids avoid criminal behavior. DeMille used the monuments to promote his movie,

The Ten Commandments, and sent the stars of the movie, Charlton Heston and Yul Brenner, to dedicate the monuments in various cities.

The issue of the posting of the Ten Commandments has been before the U.S. Supreme Court in three cases: Stone v. Graham (449 U.S. 39, 1981), McCreary County, Kentucky v. American Civil Liberties Union of Kentucky (125 S.Ct. 2722, 2005), and Van Orden v. Perry (125 S.Ct. 2854, 2005). In the first two cases the Court ordered the removal of Ten Commandments displays from public space. In the third case the court allowed a Ten Commandments monument to remain on a public space. In addition to these Supreme Court cases, there have been a number of lower court cases involving monuments and displays of the Ten Commandments.

In Stone v. Graham the Court summarily struck down a Kentucky statute that required the posting of the Ten Commandments in every classroom of every public school in the state. The copies of the Ten Commandments were purchased with private funds, but placed in public schools. In order to avoid the allegation that posting the Ten Commandments was an establishment of religion, the state placed below each plaque the following statement: "The secular application of the Ten Commandments is clearly seen in its adoption as the fundamental legal code of Western Civilization and the Common Law of the United States." The state used the King James Bible translation of the Ten Commandments, which of course reflected Protestant theology.

In striking down this law the Supreme Court rejected Kentucky's claims of posting the commandments as secular and also rejected the assertion that the Ten Commandments are in fact the basis of Western legal codes or the common law. In a per curiam decision the Court held:

The pre-eminent purpose for posting the Ten Commandments on schoolroom walls is plainly religious in nature. The Ten Commandments are undeniably a sacred text in the Jewish and Christian faiths, and no legislative recitation of a supposed secular purpose can blind us to that fact. The Commandments do not confine themselves to arguably secular matters, such as honoring one's parents, killing or murder, adultery, stealing, false witness, and covetousness. See Exodus 20: 12-17; Deuteronomy 5: 16-21. Rather, the first part of the Commandments concerns the religious duties of believers: worshipping the Lord God alone, avoiding idolatry, not using the Lord's name in vain, and observing the Sabbath Day. See Exodus 20: 1-11; Deuteronomy 5:6- 15.

The Court noted that it would be permissible to teach about the Ten Commandments as part of a history, comparative religion, or ethics course in school but that posting the commandments amounted to an endorsement of them for religious purposes. The Court cited its decisions prohibiting prayer in public schools in summarily striking down the law. The Court did not order full arguments in the case because, for a majority of the justices, placing a religious text in a public school was obviously unconstitutional.

Justices Steward and Blackmun and Chief Justice Burger dissented, with a short statement, from the refusal of the Court to give the case a full hearing. It is not clear how they would have voted had there been a full hearing. The newest member of the Court at that time, Associate Justice William Rehnquist, wrote a longer opinion, essentially arguing that the Ten Commandments plaque did not violate the Constitution.

In 2005, the Court heard two more Ten Commandments cases. By this time only Chief Justice Rehnquist still remained from the Court that decided Stone v. Graham, and he was not chief justice. The result was a somewhat confusing pair of decisions. In McCreary County the Court considered the actions of county executives in Kentucky who, as the opinion of the Court noted, put up in their respective courthouses large, gold-framed copies of an abridged text of the King James version of the Ten Commandments, including a citation to the Book of Exodus. In McCreary County, the placement of the Commandments responded to an order of the county legislative body requiring "the display [to] be posted in a very high traffic area of the courthouse."

The Court also noted that the impetus for these displays was a resolution of the state legislature, "in remembrance and honor of Jesus Christ, the Prince of Ethics." While the displays also included various patriotic documents, such as the Declaration of Independence and the preamble to the Kentucky Constitution, these documents were smaller in size than the Ten Commandments, and not central to the displays. By a five-to-four vote, the Court ordered the removal of the Kentucky displays.

On the same day the Court decided Van Orden v. Perry, which involved an FOE Ten Commandments monument on the grounds of the Texas State Legislature. In this case Justice Stephen Breyer changed his vote, to uphold the monument. The justice noted that the Texas monument was surrounded by numerous other statues and monuments and that it was not "sacred." He pointed out that, in addition to the text of the Ten Commandments, the Texas monument had various symbols, such as a Jewish star, a Catholic Chi-Rho, a pyramid with an eye in it, and an American eagle. Justice Breyer found this to be a “borderline case” but allowed the monument to remain because of the circumstances where it is found—surrounded by other monuments (but it really is not) and not in any way “sacred.” The other four justices in the majority—Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Kennedy, Scalia, and Thomas—accepted the argument that the Ten Commandments did not offend the establishment clause because it was the source of American law.

The four justices who joined Justice Breyer in Van Orden ignored the fact that Protestants, Catholics, orthodox Christians, and Jews all use different organizational schemes and translations for the Ten Commandments. For example, the Protestant second commandment prohibits “graven images” while the Roman Catholic first commandment prohibits “idols.” Similarly, the Catholic fifth commandment says you shall not “kill,” while the Jewish sixth commandment says you shall not “murder.” The King James Bible, which was used for the monuments in McCreary and Van Orden, also used the term “kill,” but other modern Protestant translations used the word “murder.”

Similar differences occur throughout the commandments as they are organized and translated by different faiths. Thus, any Ten Commandments display must in effect endorse one faith or one religion and reject others. In addition, of course, the majority in Van Orden ignored the fact that an increasing number of Americans do not accept the Old Testament as a sacred text and thus for them the Ten Commandments have no religious value. The majority similarly ignored overwhelming evidence that the commandments are not the foundation of American law or common law, and that most of them could not be enacted into law under the U.S. Constitution. Indeed, many of the commandments are simply inapplicable to American law. It is hard to imagine, for example, how a law could require someone to “honor your father and mother” or how a law could prohibit someone from “coveting your neighbor’s house.”

The push for public displays of the Ten Commandments comes from fundamentalist religious groups and leaders who want the government to endorse their religious values. Such displays tend to polarize communities in an increasingly religiously diverse society.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

Finkelman, Paul, The Ten Commandments on the Court-house Lawn and Elsewhere, Fordham Law Review 73 (2005): 1477–1520.

TENNESSEE v. GARNER, 471 U.S. 1 (1985)

Can the police shoot an unarmed, fleeing felon and, if so, under what circumstances?

On October 3, 1974, around 10:45 p.m., a Memphis police officer encountered a suspect fleeing from the scene of a burglary. The suspect attempted to escape by climbing over a six-foot fence. Although it was dark, the officer, by using his flashlight, could see the suspect’s hands and was “reasonably sure” that the suspect was unarmed. The suspect failed to stop after the officer called out, “Halt, police.” Believing that the suspect would get away if he made it over the fence, the officer shot and killed the unarmed man.

The Court ruled that, unless the suspect poses an immediate threat to the officer or the public, a police officer cannot use deadly force to seize the suspect. The Court held that using deadly force to seize “an unarmed, nondangerous suspect” violates the Fourth Amendment. The Court expressly rejected the assertion that it must apply the common-law rule that allowed the use of whatever force was necessary to effect the arrest of a fleeing felon.

Three justices dissented, stating that the Fourth Amendment did not support the right of a burglary suspect to “flee unimpeded from a police officer who has probable cause to arrest, who has ordered the suspect to halt, and who has no means short of firing his weapon to prevent escape.”

MARC M. HARROLD

References and Further Reading

LaFave, Israel, and King, Criminal Procedure, 4th ed., Hornbook Series. Minneapolis, MN: Thompson/West, 2004, at § 2.9; § 2.9, n.5; § 3.1, n.41; § 3.5; § 3.5, n. 23.

Smith, Michael R., Police Use of Deadly Force: How Courts and Policy-Makers Have Misapplied Tennessee v. Garner, Kansas Journal of Law and Public Policy (Spring 1998) (7 SPG Kan. J.L. & Pub. Pol’y 100).

See also Arrest; Seizures

TERRORISM AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

Between 1993 and 2001, three major terrorist incidents in the United States resulted in government action with potentially significant impact on civil liberties. On February 26, 1993, Ramzi Yousef and others set off a truck bomb inside the World Trade Center, killing one person and injuring seven others; the attack caused much less damage than had been planned. On April 16, 1995, Timothy McVeigh, a Gulf War veteran, and Terry Nichols destroyed the Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City with a massive truck bomb, killing 168 people. Finally, on September 11, 2001, nineteen terrorists hijacked four jet airplanes, killed the pilots, took over the controls, and crashed three of the planes into the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C. Passengers on the fourth plane fought back and forced the hijackers to crash that plane in Pennsylvania, short of its target, which was believed to have been the White House or the U.S. Capitol. Nearly three thousand people were killed, and thousands more were injured. The Federal Aviation Administration grounded all flights for the first time ever, the Dow Jones Industrial Index dropped 7 percent when it reopened after four days of being closed, and economic losses due to the attacks have been estimated at over $100 billion.

Terrorism, particularly on the scale of the 9/11 attacks, can force the government and the people to reevaluate the balance between civil liberties and national security. It is commonly believed that in times of crisis the government, with the acquiescence of the courts, contracts civil liberties and that the lost liberties sometimes remain lost, even when the crisis has passed. Some dispute this account, pointing out that some crises have resulted in the expansion of civil liberties, such as the Civil War and World War II, which integrated the military.

The United States responded to these terrorist attacks in a number of ways, notably, by enacting the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 and the USA PATRIOT Act of 2001. These acts created new federal crimes aimed at preventing terrorism but that have also raised concerns that they infringe First Amendment rights. In addition, the government has taken actions that may infringe the right to equal protection, to assistance of counsel in criminal prosecutions, and to open access to court hearings.

Racial Profiling

The Constitution generally forbids the government from discriminating on the basis on race. Yet, because all nineteen of the 9/11 hijackers were citizens of four Middle Eastern nations (Saudi Arabia, Egypt, United Arab Emirates, and Lebanon) and Al Qaeda, the terrorist organization responsible for plotting the attacks, is believed to be made up of mostly Arab men, in the days immediately after the 9/11 attacks, a majority of Americans supported the use of racial profiling of Arab ancestry at airport security checkpoints and in other situations, though such support did drop off somewhat with the passage of time.

Pre-9/11 law allowed limited law enforcement use of race in traffic stops and border stops. Typical is United States v. Brignoni-Ponce (422 U.S. 873, 1975), in which the Supreme Court invalidated a traffic stop near the border that had been initiated solely because the defendants appeared to be of Mexican ancestry. The Court did conclude, however, that racial appearance might be one relevant factor among many because “[t]he likelihood that any given person of Mexican ancestry is an alien is high enough to make Mexican appearance a relevant factor, but standing alone it does not justify stopping all Mexican Americans to ask if they are aliens.” Just one year later, in United States v. Martinez-Fuerte (428 U.S. 543, 1976), the Court upheld a border checkpoint stop initiated solely on the basis of the driver’s apparent Mexican ancestry. The difference between the two cases, the Court explained, was that the checkpoint stop was minimally intrusive and less likely to be threatening to drivers than being pulled over by a pursuing police car.

The use of race as a factor for airport searches would obviously implicate the civil liberties rights of those whose race is singled out—in this instance, those of Arab descent. Randall Kennedy analogizes this sort of racial profiling to “a type of racial tax” to be paid by a subset of persons for the benefit of the entire society. The sordid treatment of Japanese Americans during World War II, when over seventy thousand American citizens were first excluded from the West Coast and then interned at detention camps due to their race, serves as a reminder of the threat to civil liberties posed by racial classifications in the name of national security. Korematsu v. United States (323 U.S. 244, 1944), which upheld the exclusion order, is generally regarded as one of the worst decisions in Supreme Court history.

Of course, the government has yet to take any actions approaching the World War II exclusion and internment in responding to terrorism. Still, its actions do raise civil liberties concerns. First, the government instituted a registration program whereby visitors from specified countries must be photographed and fingerprinted upon entry to the United States and provide updated information to the government about their addresses and schooling or employment. The overwhelming majority of the specified countries are in the Middle East. Second, the FBI has, on a number of occasions since the 9/11 attacks, sought to conduct mass interviews of Arab Americans and Arab aliens in the country. While targeted interviews of such persons may be effective, a dragnet of persons based on their ethnicity without regard for more particularized facts may do nothing more than feed harmful stereotypes and waste government resources.

Freedom of Association

One of the civil rights guaranteed by the First Amendment is the right of free association—that is, freedom to choose with whom to associate. Because terrorists often attempt to blend in with civilians, there is a tendency for the government to respond to terrorism by cracking down on people who associate with causes seen as sympathetic to the terrorists.

In response to the 1993 attack on the World Trade Center and the 1995 bombing of the Murrah Federal Building, Congress enacted federal laws prohibiting the material support of terrorism. For example, 18 U.S.C. section 2339A makes it a federal crime for anyone to “provide material support or resources or conceal or disguise the nature, location, source, or ownership of material support or resources, knowing or intending that they are to be used in preparation for, or in carrying out,” an act of terrorism. 18 U.S.C. section 2339B makes it a federal crime to “provide material support or resources to a foreign terrorist organization.”

The material support prohibitions undoubtedly help the government in fighting terrorism in a number of ways. First, they may be used for what Robert Chesney calls “preventive prosecution” to charge and convict persons who may be plotting terrorist acts without having to wait for the terrorist plot to develop to the point where it might be too late to stop. Second, the statutes deprive foreign terrorist organizations of funding and other resources and thus make it more difficult for such organizations to carry out future terrorism.

However, the same malleability of these statutes also raises civil liberty concerns. The term “material support or resources” is broad enough that it might arguably criminalize the mere fact of association, thereby depriving individuals of the right to be judged on their own culpability. This concern is especially acute when one considers that some of the designated foreign terrorist organizations do not limit themselves to engaging in terrorist activity, but also provide social services. Yet, a person who donates to such an organization, hoping to further its humanitarian ends, may be guilty of violating the material support prohibitions. Faced with such a possibility, people may choose to forgo making such donations, thereby censoring their association with groups whose nonviolent goals they would otherwise support.

Thus far, however, lower federal courts have generally not been persuaded that the material support prohibitions threaten First Amendment interests enough to rule those laws unconstitutional. One reason is that courts have tried to interpret the material support prohibition laws narrowly, thus reducing the likelihood that persons will be convicted merely for unwitting association with a terrorist organization. On the other hand, there may still be an infringement of civil liberties, given that some people may choose to forgo associating with questionable organizations rather than risk prosecution.

Privacy

Although the Bill of Rights does not speak explicitly of the right to privacy, one way in which a right to privacy has been enshrined is in the Fourth Amendment, which, with exceptions, requires that government officials obtain a search warrant in order to conduct electronic surveillance (such as wiretaps) of persons. However, until 1978, there were no practical limits on the government’s ability to spy domestically on foreign powers.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (FISA) was the culmination of Congress’s effort to balance the government’s national security needs against the individual’s privacy rights. FISA established a Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court that was empowered to handle applications for foreign surveillance warrants.

If the targets of foreign intelligence surveillance are purely foreign powers, FISA does not impose a warrant requirement on the government. If the target may be a U.S. citizen, however, the government must seek a warrant from the FISA court. Unlike traditional criminal investigation warrants, which required a showing of probable cause to believe that a crime had been or was being committed, a FISA warrant only required a showing of probable cause that the target of the surveillance was a foreign agent. However, the government official seeking the FISA warrant also had to certify that the purpose of the surveillance was to gather foreign intelligence information. Because this information could thus be obtained without a showing of probable cause that a crime has been or will be committed (which is the standard for obtaining a criminal search warrant), FISA warrants raised a concern that they might be used improperly by domestic law enforcement officers to obtain evidence that they would not be able to get using a criminal search warrant. What arose in the 1980s to address this perceived concern was often described as “the wall.” FISA warrants were limited to federal agents who were gathering foreign intelligence, not those working on criminal prosecutions.

After the 9/11 attacks, however, Congress determined that the wall unduly restricted necessary sharing of information between government agencies. This perception was reinforced when the national 9/11 Commission issued its report, finding among other things that FBI counterintelligence agents and criminal investigation agents each had pieces of the 9/11 conspiracy but had not apprised one another of what they knew. The consequence was that no one put together all the pieces of the information, which might have led to an opportunity to capture one of the 9/11 hijackers and thereby unravel the plot.

The USA PATRIOT Act, among other things, “lowered” the wall by changing the required showing from “the purpose” to “a significant purpose” to gather foreign intelligence information. The government might have a significant purpose of gathering foreign intelligence information even as it has a primary purpose of gathering evidence for use in criminal prosecution; under the revision of FISA, such a dual purpose would not be prohibited. The government has argued in a July 2004 Report from the Field: The USA PATRIOT Act at Work that the lowering of the wall has enabled it to disrupt numerous terrorist plots and convict various persons of terrorism-related crimes (as well as nonterrorism criminals such as child pornographers) that it would not have been able to do in the past. At the same time, the lowering of the wall has again raised the possibility that criminal investigators may circumvent the traditional warrant requirement, thereby infringing to some degree the individual’s right against unreasonable searches.

Right to Counsel

The Sixth Amendment guarantees criminal defendants the right to assistance of counsel, which the Supreme Court has interpreted to mean effective assistance of counsel. Although sometimes seen derisively by the public as helping guilty defendants go free, defense attorneys play an important role in protecting civil liberties by holding prosecutors to their burden of proving guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

One of the key tools for a defense attorney is the attorney–client privilege, which facilitates the attorney’s ability to represent the client by ensuring the client that any statements made with the purpose of seeking legal advice are protected from disclosure. The client can feel more at ease in admitting past crimes if he or she knows that no court can force the lawyer to testify as to such admissions.

In 1996, the federal Bureau of Prisons issued a regulation (28 C.F.R. section 501.3) titled “Prevention of Acts of Violence and Terrorism” that had an indirect impact on the right to counsel. Under this regulation, the attorney general may direct a prison warden to implement “special administrative measures” that include potential monitoring of communications between the inmate and his or her attorneys. The monitoring is to be performed by government lawyers separate from the prosecution team so that the prosecutors will not have access to all communications between inmate and defense counsel, only (theoretically) those that involve potential future crimes or terrorism, which are not protected by the privilege.

Still, the prospect of having one’s communications with defense counsel monitored may have a chilling effect on those communications, leading inmates to censor themselves. In turn, that self-censorship may impair the quality of the legal advice the inmate receives.

A second way in which antiterrorism efforts can interfere with the right to counsel occurs when the government prosecutes a criminal defense attorney who represents terrorists on the theory that the attorney has conspired with his or her clients. In 2005, a jury convicted New York defense attorney Lynne Stewart of, among other things, helping her client, a convicted terrorist, communicate with his terrorist organization, the Islamic Jihad. Stewart may have merely been a zealous advocate for her client, or she may have crossed the line into criminal conduct by helping conceal the fact that he was passing instructions to his terrorist organization through Stewart’s translator; the jury believed the latter. Other defense attorneys representing suspected terrorists may tread more warily rather than risk prison time if they mistakenly cross the blurry line between zealous advocate and terrorism coconspirator. Yet, efforts by defense attorneys to make clear which side of the line they are on will likely impair the quality of the legal defense that they provide.

Open Courts

One of the principles of an open society is presumptively open access to court proceedings. As the Supreme Court explained in Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980), open trial proceedings assure the public that “proceedings [are] conducted fairly to all concerned.”

After the 9/11 attacks, the federal government detained thousands of aliens, mostly from Middle Eastern nations, on suspected immigration violations. A few were charged with crimes unrelated to the 9/11 attacks or even terrorism generally. Many more were sent to deportation hearings. Shortly thereafter, the chief U.S. immigration judge issued a directive that closed deportation hearings in so-called “special interest” cases to the public and the press. Not only were visitors and family barred from the hearings, but the immigration judges also were forbidden even from “confirming or denying whether such a case is on the docket or scheduled for a hearing.”

In North Jersey Media Group, Inc. v. Ashcroft (308 F.3d 198, 3d Cir. 2002), the third circuit decided that deportation hearings could be closed to the public because there was no clear history of public access to such proceedings, unlike criminal trials; soon after, in Detroit Free Press v. Ashcroft (303 F.3d 681, 6th Cir., 2002), the sixth circuit reached the opposite conclusion. As of 2005, the Supreme Court had not considered the constitutionality of the closure of the deportation hearings. It is worth noting, however, that the special Alien Terrorist Removal Court created by Congress in 1996 to handle the deportation of suspected alien terrorists (but that has not been used as of 2005) has hearings that are open to the public.

In any event, immigration courts may not have had a clear history of open public access, but federal courts do. Yet, in the 2003 case of M.K.B. v. Warden, a district court and then an appellate court handled the entire matter in secret. Had the clerk of the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeal not made a clerical mistake that disclosed the existence of the case, the public would not have learned about it. Ultimately, the Supreme Court declined to hear the case, so all that can be said about this case is that four judges (the trial judge and three appellate judges) were comfortable with concealing the existence of the case from the public. As Judge Keith wrote in the Detroit Free Press case, “Democracies die behind closed doors.”

Conclusion

Terrorism directed at a liberal democracy often uses the openness of society against itself; the temptation is to respond by reducing that openness so as to provide more security. Because the threat to national security, as exemplified by the megaterrorism of 9/11, can be palpable compared to the etherealness of “civil liberties,” we might expect the latter to lose out every time. The various issues discussed here do suggest that the government has attempted to make inroads on civil liberties in an effort to fight terrorism. At the same time, however, the record is not entirely one sided. Courts have narrowed the reach of the material support prohibition statutes, Congress added sunset provisions to parts of the USA PATRIOT Act (ensuring that those parts will need to be renewed), and the government has not engaged in wholesale detentions of Arab Americans the way that it interned Japanese Americans during World War II.

TUNG YIN

References and Further Reading

- Chang, Nancy. Silencing Political Dissent: How Post-September 11 Anti-Terrorism Measures Threaten Our Civil Liberties. New York: Seven Stories Press, 2002.
- Chesney, Robert M., The Sleeper Scenario: Terrorism Support Laws and the Demands of Prevention, Harvard Journal on Legislation 42 (2005): 1–89.
- Cole, David, and James X. Dempsey. Terrorism and the Constitution: Sacrificing Civil Liberties in the Name of National Security. 2nd ed. New York: The New Press, 2002.
- Etzioni, Amitai. How Patriotic Is the Patriot Act? Freedom Versus Security in the Age of Terrorism. New York: Routledge, 2005.
- Heymann, Philip B. Terrorism, Freedom, and Security: Winning without War. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2003.
- Kennedy, Randall. Race, Crime, and the Law. New York: Vintage, 1997.
- Miroff, Bruce, et al. Debating Democracy: A Reader in American Politics. 5th ed. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 2005: 118–141.
- The 9/11 Commission Report: Final Report of the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks upon the United States*. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Offices, 2004.
- Tushnet, Mark, ed. The Constitution in Wartime: Beyond Alarmism and Complacency. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2005.
- U.S. Department of Justice, Report from the Field: The USA PATRIOT Act at Work, available at http://www.lifeandliberty.gov/docs/071304_report_from_the_field.pdf (July 2004).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Detroit Free Press v. Ashcroft*, 303 F.3d 681 (6th Cir. 2002)
- Korematsu v. United States*, 323 U.S. 244 (1944)
- North Jersey Media Group, Inc. v. Ashcroft*, 308 F.3d 198 (3d Cir. 2002)
- United States v. Brignoni-Ponce*, 422 U.S. 873 (1975)
- United States v. Martinez-Fuerte*, 428 U.S. 543 (1976)
- Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978*, Act of Oct. 25, 1978, 92 Stat. 1796
- Prevention of Acts of Violence and Terrorism*, May 17, 1996, 61 Fed. Reg. 25120-01
- Terrorism (USA PATRIOT) Act of 2001*, Act of Oct. 26, 2001, 115 Stat. 272
- Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Requiring to Intercept and Obstruct Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996*, Act of Apr. 24, 1996, 110 Stat. 1215

See also Airport Searches; Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Freedom of Association; Japanese Internment Cases; National Security; 9/11 and the War on Terrorism; Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980); Right to Counsel; Right to Counsel (VI);

United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975);
United States v. United States District Court, 407 U.S.
 297 (1972); Wiretapping Laws

TERRY v. OHIO, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)

In Terry v. Ohio, the Supreme Court addressed the role the Fourth Amendment plays in street contacts between police officers and civilians. A police officer observed Terry and two other men acting suspiciously in a commercial area of Cleveland. Although the officer admittedly witnessed no crime, he believed that the men were “casing” a location for a robbery. He detained the men and patted them down for weapons. After he felt a firearm through Terry’s clothing, the officer removed Terry’s jacket in order to recover the gun. The trial court found the officer’s conduct permissible despite the plain absence of probable cause, given that it involved a mere “frisk” rather than a full-blown search.

The Supreme Court affirmed the ruling, ultimately finding the police conduct reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The Court first recognized that a “stop and frisk” scenario is indeed a “seizure” under the Fourth Amendment and soundly rejected the argument that such an encounter is only minimally intrusive. In an attempt to balance the government’s interest in crime detection and officer safety against individual privacy interests, the Court carved out a narrow exception to the probable cause requirement when a “stop and frisk” is involved.

In what has since been coined a “Terry stop,” the Court held that when an officer can point to “specific and articulable facts” that support a reasonable belief that the suspect is armed and dangerous and that “criminal activity may be afoot,” a brief detention and pat-down are permissible. The lynchpin of the Terry Court’s analysis is reasonableness, and the Court emphasized that the officer’s conduct must be justified at its inception and reasonable in its scope. As the lone dissenter, Justice Douglas criticized the majority’s “water[ing] down of constitutional guarantees” in relaxing the Fourth Amendment’s requirement of probable cause.

STEPHANIE ROBERTS HARTUNG

References and Further Reading

- Schwartz, Adina, “Just Take Away Their Guns”: The Hidden Racism of Terry v. Ohio, Fordham Urb. L. J. 23 (1996): 317.
 Weaver, Russell L., Investigation and Discretion: The Terry Revolution at Forty (Almost), Penn. St. L. Rev. 109 (2005): 1205.

Williams, Gregory Howard, The Supreme Court and Broken Promises: The Gradual but Continual Erosion of Terry v. Ohio, How. L. J. 34 (1991): 567.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Beck v. Ohio*, 379 U.S. 89 (1964)
Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1964)
Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
Preston v. United States, 376 U.S. 364 (1964)
Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914)

See also Arrest; Exclusionary Rule; Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Seizures; Warrantless Search

TEST OATH CASES

In 1862, the U.S. Congress passed a law requiring that all federal office holders take an oath declaring that they had “never voluntarily borne arms against the United States” or “voluntarily given ... aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement” to those making war against the United States. After the Civil War, Congress extended the statute to cover lawyers practicing in federal courts. In 1865, Missouri amended its constitution to require that office holders, teachers, lawyers, officers of corporations, college professors, and even clergymen take a similar oath. The Missouri law was broader than the federal law and required that the oath taker swear that he or she had never expressed sympathy for the rebellion.

In Cummings v. Missouri (1867) the Supreme Court struck down the Missouri law as an ex post facto law, in violation of the Constitution; the same day, and on the same reasoning, the Court struck down the revised federal law in Ex parte Garland (1867). In both cases Justice Stephen Field spoke for a five-to-four majority, arguing that the laws were ex post facto because they punished actions after they had been taken that were not prohibited at the time they were taken. These test oaths were also seen as violating basic civil liberties because the law went into effect without a jury trial—or any trial at all—and the law required that the oath taker incriminate himself. For the federal law this was clearly a violation of the Fifth Amendment protection against self-incrimination. The majority in each case consisted of the four pre-Civil War Democrats still on the Court (Justices Wayne, Nelson, Grier, and Clifford) as well as Justice Field, who while appointed by Lincoln was increasingly at odds with the Republican Party on the nature and purpose of the war. The four dissenters in both cases were Lincoln appointees sympathetic to the union cause.

Cummings involved a Catholic priest who refused to take a test oath and was fined $500 for acting performing his priestly functions. It is not clear whether he had in fact been a Confederate sympathizer. Garland, on the other hand, had been an attorney before the war, but then became a member of the Confederate Congress. At the end of the war he wanted to resume his law practice in federal court.

In his opinion in Cummings Justice Field asserted that the “disabilities created by the Constitution of Missouri must be regarded as penalties—they constitute punishment.” The same reasoning applied to the federal law with equal force. If the laws were “punishments,” then they were clearly ex post facto and unconstitutional because they were passed after the war ended and after the acts in question took place. The Missouri law, which barred oath takers who had expressed sympathies to the Confederate cause but not actually acted on those sympathies, was also problematic because it in effect made “thought” rather than “speech” or “action” a crime.

But were these “penalties” that “constitute punishment”? The four dissenters argued they were not. The test oaths did not lead to fines or jail time. They did not prohibit people from voting, as conviction for a felony would. The dissenters also understood that many of those who did want to take the test oath could have been tried for treason because they had made war against the United States. The dissenters saw the oaths not as a punishment, but as a way of preventing traitors from participating in the government.

These cases are generally seen as victories for civil liberties over vindictive legislatures. However, especially in the Ex parte Garland, an alternative analysis might suggest the case should have gone the other way. Before the war Garland had been a lawyer admitted to argue before the U.S. Supreme Court. He abandoned the United States and accepted a position in the Confederate government, which then proceeded to make war on the United States. Having taken an oath to support the U.S. Constitution, he then made war on that Constitution. Garland was not a conscript who fought in the Confederate army. He was Confederate by choice and a Confederate policymaker. As such, it might have been reasonable for Congress to conclude that his improper behavior, while not illegal, nevertheless made him unfit to practice law before the U.S. courts. In this way, the test oath could have been seen as a new measure of character and fitness similar to other character and fitness requirements of modern law practice. Similarly, since Garland had taken an oath to support the Constitution before the war, it could be argued that prohibiting his later law practice was not an ex post facto rule, but rather the logical result of his violating the oath he took before the war.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Hyman, Harold M. The Era of the Oath: Northern Loyalty Tests during the Civil War and Reconstruction. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1954.
 ———. To Try Men's Soul: Loyalty Tests in American History. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1959.

TEXAS MONTHLY, INC. v. BULLOCK, 489 U.S. 1 (1989)

Governments at all levels—federal, state, and local—exempt from time to time charitable organizations from the obligation of paying taxes. Churches, for example, are often exempted from paying property taxes with respect to property they own. Since these exemptions arguably amount to a benefit conferred by governments on religious organizations, they have been the basis for challenges under the establishment clause of the first amendment. Texas Monthly involved one such challenge. In the mid-1980s, Texas passed a law exempting religious periodicals from sales and use taxes. A nonreligious magazine, Texas Monthly, argued that the exemption violated the establishment clause. Justice William Brennan, writing for the Court's plurality, agreed that the exemption amounted to an unconstitutional establishment of religion. Justices Harry Blackmun and Sandra Day O'Connor concurred in this judgment.

As a preliminary matter, the Court considered whether Texas Monthly had standing to challenge the tax exemption. The state of Texas argued that it did not, since any relief that might plausibly be granted in the case would not amount to a refund of tax payments to the magazine. The Supreme Court, though, declined to rule on the issue of what remedy might follow a declaration that the tax exemption was unconstitutional. It was enough for standing that a live controversy existed concerning the magazine's claim for a refund.

After concluding that Texas Monthly magazine had standing to argue the unconstitutionality of the Texas statute, Justice Brennan turned to the establishment clause issue. According to his opinion, the constitutional defect in the Texas law did not reside in the mere fact of the tax exemption being awarded a religious publisher. Previously, in Walz v. Tax Commission (397 U.S. 664, 1970), the Court had upheld a property tax exemption as applied to church property. But unlike the exemption at issue in Walz, which applied to a variety of charitable uses, the exemption in Texas Monthly applied only to religious periodicals. The law's defect was that it accorded favorable tax treatment to religious periodicals and only those.

The state of Texas argued in the case that the tax exemption was intended to accommodate the free exercise of religion, but the Court rejected this contention. Such exemptions require, at a minimum, according to the Court, a demonstration that a particular law actually burdens the free exercise of religion. In this case, the Court found no evidence that any believers had religiously based scruples against the payment of sales or use taxes for religious periodicals. Accordingly, it concluded that the tax exemption was not a permissible accommodation of religious belief or practice, but an impermissible form of favoritism toward religion not allowed by the establishment clause.

Justice Brennan explained on behalf of the plurality that the decision in the case was not intended to suggest that only accommodations of religion required by the free exercise clause were permitted by the establishment clause. Accommodation of religion would generally be permissible if aid provided to religious believers was also provided to a broad range of secular and religious recipients. Moreover, accommodation would be permitted when it removed an obstacle created by government to an individual's choice to engage in conduct protected by the free exercise clause. However, an accommodation might be prohibited if it required the imposition of a substantial burden on others as the cost of accommodating religious believers.

Justice Scalia, in an opinion joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Kennedy, dissented from the judgment in the case. He argued that tax exemptions for religious entities were a long-standing practice and that nothing in the text of the Constitution, the decisions of the Court, or "the traditions of our people" supported the majority's conclusion.

In a subsequent decision, the Supreme Court revisited the issue of tax exemptions for religious organizations. In Swaggart Ministries v. California Board of Equalization (493 U.S. 378, 1990), Justice O'Connor wrote for a now unanimous Court. This time, relying in part on the Texas Monthly decision, the Court held that a California law taxing retailers for the sale and use of certain personal property did not violate the free exercise rights of a religious organization involved in such sales or amount to an impermissible establishment of religion.

TIMOTHY L. HALL

References and Further Reading

- Choper, Jesse H. Securing Religious Liberty: Principles for Judicial Interpretation of the Religion Clauses. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995, pp. 121–133.
- McConnell, Michael W., Accommodation of Religion: An Update and Response to the Critics, George Washington Law Review 60 (1992): 695–712.
- Nowak, John E., and Ronald D. Rotunda. Constitutional Law. 7th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thompson-West, 2004, pp. 1408–1411.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. California Board of Equalization*, 493 U.S. 378 (1990)
- Walz v. Tax Commission*, 397 U.S. 664 (1970)
- See also Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Sherbert v. Verner*, 374 U.S. 398 (1963); Tax Exemptions for Religious Groups and Clergy; Walz v. Tax Commission of City of New York, 397 U.S. 664 (1970)

TEXAS v. JOHNSON, 491 U.S. 397 (1989)

See Flag Burning

THEORIES OF CIVIL LIBERTIES

In the words of English jurist and professor of common law Sir William Blackstone, "Civil liberty, the great end of all human society and government, is that state in which each individual has the power to pursue his own happiness according to his own views and interest, and the dictates of his conscience, unrestrained, except by equal, just, and impartial laws." Justice Louis D. Brandeis, in dissent in Olmstead v. U.S., 277 U.S. 438 (1928), while criticizing the majority's narrow interpretation of the Fourth Amendment, similarly declared that "the makers of our Constitution undertook to secure conditions favorable to the pursuit of happiness. They recognized the significance of man's spiritual nature, of his feelings and of his intellect.... They sought to protect Americans in their beliefs, their thoughts, their emotions, and their sensations. They conferred, as against the government, the right to be let alone."

Civil liberties are defined as freedoms from improper government action; they create a personal sphere of liberty around the individual citizen in which the individual is free from governmental restrictions. These restraints on government's power can be substantive (restraints on what the government shall and shall not have the power to do) or procedural (restraints on how the government is to act). In other words, substantive restrictions limit the ends of government, whereas procedural restrictions limit the means of government.

While there may be general agreement as to the importance of civil liberties in a free society, the questions of where to draw the line between individual rights and the needs of the community are often difficult to resolve in specific (and controversial) cases. In the words of philosopher John Stuart Mill, "... though the proposition is not likely to be contested in general terms, the practical question, where to place the limits—how to make the fitting adjustment between individual independence and social control—is a subject on which nearly everything remains to be done" (Mill, 16).

The Role of Civil Liberties in a Free Society

The framers established a government of limited and enumerated powers that provided for majority rule while protecting minority rights. The American constitutional tradition was influenced by British philosopher John Locke, who, in his Two Treatises of Government, argued that individuals leave the state of nature and form a civil society in order to protect their life, liberty, and property, and that people have the right to dissolve government if it no longer meets their legitimate expectations. Justice William Brennan believed that the end of constitutional democracy is the promotion of human dignity and respect for the individual: "As augmented by the Bill of Rights and the Civil War Amendments, [the Constitution] is a sparkling vision of the human dignity of every individual. This vision is reflected in the very choice of democratic self-governance: the supreme value of a democracy is the presumed worth of each individual" (Brennan, "The Constitution of the United States: Contemporary Ratification").

An essential element of this constitutional democracy is the right to freedom of expression, especially political speech. Alexander Meiklejohn has argued persuasively that the First Amendment gives absolute protection to political speech (Meiklejohn, Political Freedom). Indeed, the freedom to speak, to publish, and to assemble with others for the purpose of expressing a point of view are at the core of what most Americans conceive as a democratic political system (Casper, 17).

Freedom of expression is necessary to promote individual liberty and human dignity. As Charles Fried explained:

Freedom of expression is properly based on autonomy: the Kantian right of each individual to be treated as an end in himself, an equal sovereign citizen of the kingdom of ends with a right to the greatest liberty compatible with the like liberties of all others. Autonomy is the foundation of all basic liberties, including liberty of expression.... Our ability to deliberate, to reach conclusions about our good, and to act on those conclusions is the foundation of our status as free and rational persons" (Fried, in Stone et al., 233).

Moreover, freedom of expression is seen as the best way to expand human knowledge and to seek the truth in political debate. John Stuart Mill described a "marketplace of ideas," in which the free exchange and competition among ideas would best ensure that the truth would emerge. According to Mill, "The only way in which a human being can make some approach to knowing the whole of a subject is by hearing what can be said about it by persons of every variety of opinion and studying all modes in which it can be looked at by every character of mind. No wise man ever acquired his wisdom in any mode but this."

The idea that democracy is a means to an end rather than an end in itself and that majority rule must recognize minority rights is, perhaps, most eloquently articulated in the compulsory flag salute cases. In these cases, involving Jehovah's Witnesses and their religious objection to saluting the flag, the Court emphatically declared the importance of protecting individual liberty.

Justice Harlan Fiske Stone, dissenting in Minersville School District v. Gobitis (310 U.S. 586, 1940, at 602-3, 606-7), in which the majority of the Court upheld the Pennsylvania town's 1914 ordinance compelling students to salute the flag, declared:

The very fact that we have constitutional guarantees of civil liberties and the specificity of their command where freedom of speech and religion are concerned require some accommodation of the powers which government normally exercises, when no question of civil liberty is involved, to the constitutional demand that these liberties be protected against the action of the government itself.... The Constitution expresses more than the conviction of the people that democratic processes must be preserved at all costs. It also is an expression of faith and a command that freedom of mind and spirit must be preserved, which government must obey, if it is to adhere to that justice and moderation without which no free government can exist.

Justice Robert H. Jackson in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (319 U.S. 624 at 638, 642, 1943), speaking for the majority in holding that West Virginia may not compel school children to salute the flag against their beliefs, explained:

If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein.... The very purpose of a Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote, [for] they depend on the outcome of no elections.

Civil liberties play an essential role in protecting minority rights from the "tyranny of the majority."

Negative vs. Positive Rights

The distinction between negative and positive rights is often described as "freedom from" versus "freedom to." In other words, negative rights imply freedom from government interference, whereas positive rights imply affirmative obligations on the part of government to fulfill the right (such as entitlement programs, welfare, housing, and nutrition). The differences between negative and positive rights have been classically expounded by Charles Fried (Fabre, 40):

A positive right is a claim to something—a share of material goods, or some particular good like the attention of a lawyer or a doctor, or perhaps the claim to a result like health or enlightenment—while a negative right is a right that something not be done to one, that some particular imposition be withheld. Positive rights are inevitably asserted to scarce goods, and consequently scarcity implies a limit to the claim. Negative rights, however, the rights not to be interfered with in forbidden ways, do not appear to have such natural, such inevitable limitation. (Fried, 110)

Cecile Fabre argues that individuals have social rights to adequate minimum income, housing, health care, and education, and that those rights must be included in the constitution of a democratic state. Moreover, Fabre argues that a democratic majority should not be able to repeal these rights and that certain institutions, such as the judiciary, should be given the power to strike down laws passed by the legislature that are in breach of those rights (Fabre, Social Rights under the Constitution).

President Franklin Roosevelt's "Second Bill of Rights," set forth in his 1944 State of the Union message, includes the following examples of what could be deemed "positive rights":

the right to a useful and remunerative job in the industries or shops or farms or mines of the Nation; the right to earn enough to provide adequate food and clothing and recreation; the right of every family to a decent home; the right to adequate medical care and the opportunity to achieve and enjoy good health; the right to adequate protection from the economic fears of old age, sickness, accident, and unemployment; the right to a good education. (Glendon, in Stone et al., 528)

The U.S. Supreme Court, however, has consistently declined to recognize constitutional welfare rights (Glendon, in Stone et al., 525). For example, in Lindsey v. Normet, 405 U.S. 56, 74 (1972), the Court ruled that there is no constitutional right to housing, and in San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 30-31 (1973), the Court ruled that there is no constitutional right to education. Indeed, Judge Richard Posner of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit noted that the U.S. Constitution is a charter of negative rather than positive liberties.... The men who wrote the Bill of Rights were not concerned that Government might do too little for the people but that it might do too much to them. The Fourteenth Amendment, adopted in 1868, at the height of laissez-faire thinking, sought to protect Americans from oppression by state government, not to secure them basic governmental services. (Jackson v. City of Joliet, 715 F.2d 1200, 1203, 7th Cir.1983)

However, David P. Currie points out that the U.S. Supreme Court has found "duties that can in some sense be described as positive" in negatively phrased provisions of the Bill of Rights (Currie, 872–880). For example, the Sixth Amendment guarantees the right to counsel, and, despite the fact that this appears to be a negative right (namely, that the government may not prevent a criminal defendant from having a lawyer), the Supreme Court has held that the Sixth Amendment imposes an affirmative duty on the part of government to provide legal assistance if the defendant cannot afford it (Currie, 874; Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 1963).

The Constitutional Basis for Civil Liberties in the United States

American revolutionary Thomas Paine declared that a constitution is "to liberty what a grammar is to language" (Pritchett, 1). The framers believed that a written constitution was necessary to guarantee a limited government and, therefore, to protect civil liberties. Indeed, the source of civil liberties is the Constitution, especially the first ten amendments, the Bill of Rights.

The lack of a Bill of Rights was seen by the Anti-Federalists to be a major defect of the original Constitution. In Antifederalist Paper No. 84, “Brutus” argued that a Bill of Rights was as necessary for the federal constitution as it was for the states. Thomas Jefferson, writing to James Madison on the subject of the proposed Constitution, criticized the omission of a Bill of Rights. After listing the rights he thought should be included, Jefferson challenged the Federalists’ rationale for their omission and concluded that “a bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth, general or particular, and what no just government should refuse, or resist on inference” (Levy, 26).

The Federalists countered that the Constitution was a Bill of Rights unto itself. It provided for the protection of specific liberties and the federal government that was created was one of limited and enumerated powers. Alexander Hamilton, in Federalist No. 84, explained that “the Constitution is itself, in every rational sense and to every useful purpose, a Bill of Rights.” Hamilton argued that the addition of a Bill of Rights would be “dangerous” as well as unnecessary because it “would contain various exceptions to powers not granted; and, on this very account, would afford a colorable pretext to claim more than were granted. For why declare that things shall not be done which there is no power to do? Why, for instance, should it be said that the liberty of the press shall not be restrained, when no power is given by which restrictions may be imposed?”

Despite the Federalists’ claim that there was no need for a Bill of Rights to be added to the Constitution, the original document did include provisions to protect selected civil liberties. For example, Article I, §9, provides that the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended and that Congress shall not pass any bills of attainder or ex post facto laws. Article III guarantees a jury trial in the state in which the crime was committed and limits treason to the life of the person convicted and not to the person’s heirs. Article VI, §3, bans religious tests as qualification for public office, and Article IV, §2, guarantees to citizens of each state of all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states.

The Bill of Rights was adopted by the First Congress as a concession to the strong objections that the Anti-Federalists raised during the ratifying conventions. James Madison’s speech to the House of Representatives admonished Congress to “conform to their wishes, and expressly declare the great rights of mankind secured under this Constitution” (speech before the U.S. House of Representatives, 8 June 1789).

The Bill of Rights was originally interpreted to apply only to the federal government. State governments were believed to be closer to the people, and the state constitutions included their own bills of rights (see Schwartz, 87–90, for a table listing the civil liberties expressly protected in the revolutionary declarations and constitutions of each state). In Barron v. Mayor and Council of Baltimore, 7 Pet. (32 U.S.) 243 (1833), Chief Justice John Marshall held that the Bill of Rights was applicable only to the federal government and that its provisions did not serve to limit the power of the state governments.

However, the passage of the Civil War amendments (the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments) radically changed the protection of fundamental liberties. The Fourteenth Amendment declares: “No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.”

There is a long-standing debate regarding whether the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment intended that it would apply the Bill of Rights’ provisions to the states. In the Slaughterhouse Cases, 16 Wall. (83 U.S.) 36 (1873), the Supreme Court rejected the argument that the privileges or immunities clause was designed to apply the Bill of Rights to the states. However, through a gradual process of “selective incorporation,” the Supreme Court has held various provisions of the Bill of Rights applicable to the states through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319, 1937).

The first time the Supreme Court “incorporated” a provision of the Bill of Rights was in the case of Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company v. Chicago, 166 U.S. 226 (1897), in which the property protection of the Fifth Amendment was held applicable to the states. No further expansion of civil liberties through the Fourteenth Amendment occurred until 1925, when the Court held that the freedom of speech was “among the fundamental and personal rights and ‘liberties’ protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from impairment by the states” (Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 1925). Most of the provisions of the Bill of Rights have been applied to the states in this way.

Even after the Court held that provisions of the Bill of Rights could be made applicable to the state governments, the Justices differed in their understanding of the nature and the extent to which these amendments would be “incorporated.” Justice John Marshall Harlan I (dissent in Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516, 1884) and Justice Hugo Black (dissent in Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46, 1946) were advocates of “total incorporation”—the idea that all provisions of the Bill of Rights should be made applicable to the states. Justice Benjamin Cardozo, in Palko v. Connecticut, articulated the theory of “selective incorporation,” namely, that only those liberties in the Bill of Rights that are “so rooted in the history and conscience of our people as to be ranked fundamental” and “implicit in the concept of ordered liberty” should be incorporated. Other justices argued for “incorporation plus”—that even more rights and liberties than those expressly recognized in the Bill of Rights should be held applicable to the states, such as the unenumerated right to privacy. Some have called for “total incorporation plus,” such as Justices Frank Murphy and Wiley Rutledge (dissenting in Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46, 1946) while others have advocated “selective incorporation plus,” such as Justice Arthur Goldberg, Chief Justice Earl Warren, and Justice William Brennan (concurring in Griswold v. Connecticut, 391 U.S. 145, 1965).

Those few provisions that have not been incorporated include the Second Amendment protection of the “right of the people to keep and bear arms,” the Third Amendment limitation on the quartering of soldiers in private homes, the Fifth Amendment right to indictment by grand jury, the Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial in civil cases, and the Eighth Amendment right against excessive fines and bail.

Economic and Noneconomic Rights

The protection of economic rights is usually thought of in terms of “substantive due process,” a doctrine that prevailed during the Lochner era.

The origin of due process of law in the Anglo-American legal tradition dates back to the Magna Carta (1215), when King John consented to the barons’ demands for certain rights, such as the right to a trial by a jury of one’s peers. Americans are guaranteed due process of law in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. The Fifth Amendment guarantees that “No person shall be ... deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.” The Fourteenth Amendment guarantees “... nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.”

The principle behind “due process” is that government is forbidden to limit a person’s personal or property rights unless the government has done so through proper procedures. Initially conceived of as a procedural restriction on government’s authority, the concept of “procedural due process” can be thought of in terms of criminal procedure, or the rights of the accused. “Substantive due process” is the doctrine used by the Court to strike down economic regulation, such as the right of a worker to offer his services to an employer without governmental restrictions upon the conditions of employment and the inviolability of an individual’s property from governmental regulation (Casper, 219).

The first time the Court struck down a state law on substantive due process grounds was in the case of Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U.S. 578 (1897). Justice Rufus Peckham, in an opinion for a unanimous court, laid out a broad articulation of the “liberty of contract” that gave the case its special significance in the development of “substantive due process” (Sullivan and Gunther, 457). Justice Peckham explained:

The liberty mentioned in that amendment means not only the right of the citizen to be free from the mere physical restraint of his person, as by incarceration, but the term is deemed to embrace the right of the citizen to be free in the enjoyment of all his faculties; to be free to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work where he will; to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling; to pursue any livelihood or avocation; and for that purpose to enter into all contracts which may be proper, necessary, and essential to his carrying out to a successful conclusion the purposes above mentioned.

The seminal case of this era was Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905). At issue in the case was a New York law that limited the hours of employment in bakeries and confectionary establishments to ten hours a day and sixty hours a week. Justice Peckham again announced the opinion of the Court and held that the statute interfered with the liberty of contract between employers and employees: “the general right to make a contract in relation to ... business is part of the liberty of the individual protected by the Fourteenth Amendment.”

Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., in dissent, accused the majority of deciding the case based on an economic theory that a large part of the country did not entertain: “the Fourteenth Amendment does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer’s Social Statics.” Holmes declared that “a constitution is not intended to embody a particular economic theory, whether of paternalism and the organic relation of the citizen to the state, or of laissez-faire. It is made for people of fundamentally differing views, and the accident of our finding certain opinions natural and familiar or novel and even shocking ought not to conclude our judgment upon the question whether statutes embodying them conflict with the [Constitution].”

From the Lochner decision in 1905 to the mid-1930s, the Court invalidated a considerable number of laws on substantive due process grounds, such as regulations of prices, labor relations (including wages and hours), and conditions for entry into business (Sullivan and Gunther, 466). The Court eventually repudiated Lochner and its progeny, and its name became synonymous with inappropriate judicial intervention in the legislative process (Sullivan and Gunther, 463).

However, there is a contemporary debate about whether the Court continues to adhere to the doctrine of “substantive due process” in the context of announcing unenumerated rights, such as the right to privacy (particularly in the area of reproductive freedom and abortion rights). The Court declared that the right to privacy, while not specifically provided for in the Bill of Rights, can be found in the “penumbras” of the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Ninth Amendments (Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 1965). Justice William H. Rehnquist, in dissent in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), in which the majority ruled that the constitutional right to privacy extended to a woman’s right to have an abortion, criticized the majority for espousing substantive due process in the Lochner tradition of passing on the wisdom of legislative policies and for engaging in “judicial legislation” by breaking up pregnancies into three trimesters with varying permissible restrictions (Pritchett, 320).

The Role of the U.S. Supreme Court in Protecting Civil Liberties

In the post-New Deal era, the Supreme Court has given more attention to the Bill of Rights and to the protection of civil liberties. Professor Robert G. McCloskey, in his seminal work, The American Supreme Court, defined three periods of the Supreme Court’s history: (1) from the founding of the Constitution through the Civil War, in which questions of federalism were predominant (e.g., nullification, slavery, and the national bank); (2) from the Civil War through 1937, in which questions of the relationship between business and government were predominant; and (3) from 1937 to the present, in which the Court indicated there would be a shift in emphasis from strict scrutiny of economic legislation to a strict scrutiny of regulations that touch on the Bill of Rights. “The Court, which had once been primarily occupied with the nation–state relationship, and some time later, with the business–government relationship, now became more and more concerned with the relationship between the individual and government” (McCloskey, 122).

The turning point for the Court was signaled by Justice Stone in Footnote Four in U.S. v. Carolene Products, 304 U.S. 144, 152 (1938). Since 1937, the Supreme Court has relinquished its role as a socioeconomic review board and has assumed a new role, one more energetic in the protection of civil liberties. Civil liberties now occupy a “preferred position.” This phrase was first used by Chief Justice Stone in dissent in Jones v. Opelika, 316 U.S. 584 (1942):

The First Amendment is not confined to safeguarding freedom of speech and freedom of religion against discriminatory attempts to wipe them out. On the contrary, the Constitution, by virtue of the First and Fourteenth Amendments, has put those freedoms in a preferred position. Their commands are not restricted to cases where the protected privilege is sought out for attack. They extend at least to every form of taxation which, because it is a condition of the exercise of their privilege, is capable of being used to control or suppress it.”

The doctrine that civil liberties occupy a preferred position means that there would be a presumption of unconstitutionality instead of a presumption of constitutionality when dealing with liberties essential to the democratic process. The burden of proof would fall on the legislature to prove why the statute passes constitutional muster. This has also been called the “double standard,” insofar as the Court indicated that it would apply a stricter standard to laws challenged as infringing on individual rights than it used for those attacked as abridging economic rights (Biskupic and Witt, 7).

There is ample justification for granting civil liberties a “preferred position.” First, protection of civil liberties is in accordance with the Constitution and the tradition of Western civilization. The purpose of a written constitution is to prescribe what government can and cannot do and to limit the exercise of the government’s power in order to protect the liberty of the people. Civil liberties are vital in the maintenance of a democratic system of government. Second, the text of the Constitution implies that they will occupy such a preferred position. In particular, the language of the First Amendment declares in no uncertain terms: “Congress shall make no law ...” Finally, the Supreme Court is uniquely qualified to serve as the guardian of civil rights and liberties (see also Abraham, 22–28):

While there may be agreement that civil liberties occupy a preferred position, there are, nevertheless, competing approaches to the interpretation of provisions included in the Bill of Rights. Justice Hugo Black is known for his absolutist and literalist approach to the First Amendment. As Justice Black explained in Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959): “I read ‘no law abridging’ to mean no law abridging. The First Amendment, which is the supreme law of the land, has thus fixed its own value on freedom of speech and press by putting those freedoms wholly ‘beyond the reach’ of federal power to abridge.

No other provision of the Constitution purports to dilute the scope of these unequivocal commands of the First Amendment. Consequently, I do not believe that any federal agencies, including Congress and this Court, have power or authority to subordinate speech and press to what they think are 'more important interests.'" Black argued that the "balance" sought by other justices in dealing with issues of expression was struck by the framers of the First Amendment in the eighteenth century. In declaring that "Congress shall make no law ... " the question of limits upon speech was answered once and for all: No laws infringing on the right to speak are consonant with the Constitution. (Casper, 29)

Black's absolutist-literalist position is in stark contrast to the balancing test favored by justices who believe that the case for freedom must be balanced against the case for order and security (Pritchett, 30–32). The clear and present danger test was a form of balancing. A balancing approach was also employed by the Court when upholding the power of congressional investigation of communist activity in Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959), in which Justice John Marshall Harlan II explained that there must be a "balancing by the courts of the competing private and public interests at stake in the particular circumstances shown."

While Carolene's "Footnote Four" ushered in a new era of jurisprudence more attuned to the protection of civil liberties, especially during the Warren Court, justices have held contrasting positions regarding the role of the Supreme Court in protecting civil liberties. Two competing conceptions of the judicial role are "judicial activism"—the Supreme Court must play an activist role in protecting civil liberties from government interference—and "judicial self-restraint"—the unelected, politically unaccountable justices should play a restrained role in socioeconomic legislation as well as legislation infringing on civil liberties and must not set aside government action unless that action is unreasonable.

The Supreme Court plays a unique role as a bulwark in the protection of individual rights and liberties. Alexander Hamilton, in Federalist No. 78, believed that the courts would serve as "bulwarks of a limited constitution, against legislative encroachments" and that they would ensure the enforcement of the Constitution as the supreme law of the land. Likewise, James Madison, in his speech presenting the Bill of Rights to the First Congress argued that "If they are incorporated into the Constitution, independent tribunals of justice will consider themselves in a peculiar manner the guardians of those rights; they will be an impenetrable bulwark against every assumption of power in the legislative or executive; they will be naturally led to resist every encroachment upon rights expressly stipulated for in the Constitution by the declaration of rights" (speech before the U.S. House of Representatives, June 8, 1789).

Modern Challenges to Civil Liberties and the Bill of Rights

There is a need always to be vigilant in the protection of civil liberties. Even though the guarantees are written in the Constitution, the provisions must be interpreted and enforced by the courts. Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes is reported to have said when he was governor of New York, "We are under a Constitution; but the Constitution is what the courts say it is" (Meiklejohn, 32).

The Supreme Court, in interpreting the Constitution, has not always lived up to its role as the "bulwark" of individual rights and liberties. For example, in the notorious Dred Scott decision (Dred Scott v. Sandford, 19 How., 60 U.S., 393, 1857), Chief Justice Roger Brooke Taney held that persons of African descent were "not included and were not intended to be included, under the word 'citizen' in the Constitution, and can therefore claim none of the rights and privileges which that instrument provides for and secures to citizens of the United States." In Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944), the Court upheld the internment of Japanese Americans during World War II.

Moreover, a shift in personnel on the Court can limit or overturn prior rulings that provided for more expansive protection of civil liberties. For example, the right of a woman to choose whether to terminate her pregnancy that was announced in Roe v. Wade has been upheld by the Rehnquist Court only by the slimmest of majorities. With the appointments of new justices, Roe could be overturned. Indeed, the National Abortion Rights Action League (NARAL) made Supreme Court composition an issue in the 2000 presidential campaign, putting the slogan "It's the Supreme Court, Stupid" on signs and bumper stickers in order to remind voters that the next president might have the opportunity to appoint a Supreme Court justice who could in turn decide the fate of the Roe precedent. Other scholars have argued that even when the Court hands down well-intentioned pronouncements, it is ineffective in producing significant social reform (Rosenberg, The Hollow Hope).

Moreover, each generation faces new challenges and setbacks in the effort to protect civil liberties. Throughout American history there are numerous examples of restrictions on civil liberties, especially during times of war: the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798; censorship of the press, suspension of habeas corpus, and expropriation of property during the Civil War; the Espionage and Sedition Acts during World War I (see also Civil Liberties in World War I); the Smith Act; the actions of the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC); Japanese internment during World War II (see also Civil Liberties in World War II); the treatment of antiwar demonstrators during the Vietnam War; and security concerns in the aftermath of 9/11 and the War on Terror (see also Civil Liberties in Wartime). For obvious reasons, it has been said that “civil liberties and individual freedoms are one of the first casualties of war” (Linfield, 4).

Justice Thurgood Marshall noted that “history teaches us that grave threats to liberty often come in times of urgency, when constitutional rights seem too extravagant to endure” (Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives Association, 489 U.S. 602, 1989). In balancing the need for national security against the protection of civil liberties, the Court has tended to side with the government in restricting individual liberty. For example, regarding the freedom of speech, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., explained that “when a nation is at war many things that might be said in time of peace are such a hindrance to its effort that their utterance will not be endured so long as men fight and that no Court could regard them as protected by any constitutional right” (Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 247, 1919).

Chief Justice Rehnquist, in All the Laws but One: Civil Liberties in Wartime, explained that it would not be reasonable to believe that future wartime presidents would act differently than Presidents Lincoln, Wilson, or Roosevelt or that future Supreme Court justices would decide cases any differently than past justices had (Rehnquist, 224). In the post-9/11 era, national security concerns and the War on Terror are used to justify infringement on civil liberties. Consider, for example, the controversial enforcement of the Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism (USA PATRIOT Act) Act of 2001 (115 Stat. 272) and the detention of enemy combatants at Guantánamo Bay (see also Terrorism and Civil Liberties).

James Madison, in Federalist No. 48, expressed skepticism of the value of “parchment barriers” against “overbearing majorities.” American history has shown that we must be always on guard against infringements on individual rights and liberty, lest the Bill of Rights’ provisions become “mere parchment barriers.”

JUDITHANNE SCOURFIELD McLAUCHLAN

References and Further Reading

- Abraham, Henry J., and Barbara A. Perry. Freedom and the Court: Civil Rights and Liberties in the United States. 7th ed. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Brennan, William J. “The Constitution of the United States: Contemporary Ratification,” speech delivered at Georgetown University, 12 October 1985.
- Casper, Jonathan D. The Politics of Civil Liberties. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.
- Currie, David P., Positive and Negative Constitutional Rights, University of Chicago Law Review 53 (Summer 1986): 864.
- Fabre, Cecile. Social Rights under the Constitution: Government and the Decent Life. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Fried, Charles. Right and Wrong. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1978.
- Hoffman, Ronald, and Peter J. Albert. The Bill of Rights: Government Proscribed. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1997.
- Levy, Leonard W. Origins of the Bill of Rights. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Linfield, Michael. Freedom Under Fire: U.S. Civil Liberties in Times of War. Boston: South End Press, 1990.
- McCloskey, Robert G., and Sanford Levinson. The American Supreme Court. 2nd ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press (1960), 1994.
- Meiklejohn, Alexander. Political Freedom. New York: Oxford University Press, 1965.
- Mill, John Stuart. On Liberty and the Subjugation of Women. New York: Henry Holt, 1898.
- Pritchett, C. Herman. Constitutional Civil Liberties. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1984.
- Rehnquist, William H. All the Laws but One: Civil Liberties in Wartime. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1998.
- Rosenberg, Gerald N. The Hollow Hope: Can Courts Bring about Social Change? Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Schwartz, Bernard. The Great Rights of Mankind: A History of the American Bill of Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.
- Stone, Geoffrey R., Richard A. Epstein, and Cass R. Sunstein, eds. The Bill of Rights in the Modern State. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992.
- Storing, Herbert J. What the Anti-Federalists Were For. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981.
- Sullivan, Kathleen M., and Gerald Gunther. Constitutional Law. 14th ed. New York: Foundation Press, 2001.
- Urofsky, Melvin I. The Continuity of Change: The Supreme Court and Individual Liberties, 1953–1986. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth Publishing Co., 1991.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adamson v. California*, 332 U.S. 46 (1946)
- Allgeyer v. Louisiana*, 165 U.S. 578 (1897)
- Barenblatt v. United States*, 360 U.S. 109 (1959)
- Barron v. Mayor and Council of Baltimore*, 7 Pet. (32 U.S.) 243 (1833)
- Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company v. Chicago*, 166 U.S. 226 (1897)
- Dennis v. United States*, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
- Dred Scott v. Sandford*, 19 How. (60 U.S.) 393 (1857)

Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)
Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81 (1943)
Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884)
Jackson v. City of Joliet, 715 F.2d 1200, 1203 (7th Cir.1983)
Jones v. Opelika, 316 U.S. 584 (1942)
Korematsu v. U.S., 323 U.S. 214 (1944)
Lindsey v. Normet, 405 U.S. 56, 74 (1972)
Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)
Olmstead v. U.S., 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1 (1973)
Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives Association, 489 U.S. 602 (1989)
Slaughterhouse Cases, 16 Wall. (83 U.S.) 36 (1873)
Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959)
U.S. v. Carolene Products, 304 U.S. 144 (1938)
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

See also: Absolutism and Free Speech; Alien and Sedition Acts (1798); Balancing Approach to Free Speech; Balancing Test; Barron v. Baltimore, 32 U.S. 243 (1833); Bill of Attainder; Bill of Rights: Structure; Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Cardozo, Benjamin; Carolene Products v. U.S., 304 U.S. 144, 152 (1938); Clear and Present Danger Test; Constitution of 1787; Douglas, William Orville; Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857); Due Process; Due Process of Law (V and XIX); Ex Post Facto Clause; First Amendment and PACs; Fourteenth Amendment; Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963); Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925); Goldberg, Arthur J.; Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); Guantánamo Bay, Enemy Combatants, Post 9/11; Hamilton, Alexander; Harlan, John Marshall, the Elder; Harlan, John Marshall II; Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; House Un-American Activities Committee; Hughes, Charles Evans; Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884); Incorporation Doctrine; Jackson, Robert H.; Japanese Internment Cases; Jefferson, Thomas; Jehovah's Witnesses and Religious Liberty; Jury Trial; Locke, John; Madison, James; Magna Carta; Marketplace of Ideas Theory; Marshall, John; Marshall, Thurgood; Meiklejohn, Alexander; Mill, John Stuart; Murphy, Frank; National Abortion Rights Action League (NARAL); 9/11 and the War on Terrorism; Olmstead v. U.S., 277 U.S. 438 (1928); Paine, Thomas; Penumbra; Preferred Position; Privacy; Privacy, Theories of; Privileges and Immunities (XIV); Rehnquist, William H.; Religious Tests for Officeholding (Article VI, Cl. 3); Right of Privacy; Right to Counsel; Right to Counsel (VI); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Roosevelt, Franklin Delano; Rutledge, Wiley Blount, Jr.; Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919); Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association, 489 U.S. 602 (1989); Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873); Smith Act; State Constitutions and Civil Liberties; Stone, Harlan Fiske; Substantive Due Process; Taney Court; Terrorism and Civil Liberties; Thirteenth Amendment; Treason; Warren Court; Warren, Earl; West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943) World War I, Civil Liberties in; World War II, Civil Liberties in

THEORIES OF CIVIL LIBERTIES, INTERNATIONAL

Comparing American perspectives on civil liberties with their international counterparts presents numerous problems. First, most American commentators understand civil liberties in terms of civil rights as identified in the American Bill of Rights. The relatively recent shift toward defining these issues as civil liberties reflects the influence of critiques of rights, many of which originate or are strongly grounded in international politics and law. Second, the idea of organizing a polity around a limited set of political or social liberties is largely an American construct. Internationally, civil liberties exist within the larger framework of international human rights, a conceptual system that powerfully shapes and informs the content of those liberties. Moreover, the theory of international human rights has largely absorbed a variety of theories about rights useful in understanding civil liberties. While these theories developed over the course of history, each contributing something to our understanding of civil liberties, they no longer stand as independent bases for political thought or action. Thus, in describing international theories on civil liberties, we are in some sense parsing the historic development of human rights of which American civil liberties are a significant part.

In identifying historically grounded theories of civil liberties, one might proceed through a careful study of the emergence of specific civil liberties. That would, however, limit the discussion of theoretical perspectives to those that already inhere within a specific set of identified civil liberties. This would also miss efforts to expand our definition of civil liberties to include liberties and rights recognized internationally. A better approach attempts to identify theories based upon a broader understanding that civil liberties reflect particular understandings of the relationship between the citizen and the state. Here, we can very briefly identify five significant approaches, each affecting civil liberties in particular ways. We start with an Aristotelian understanding of the human as a political animal, successively move through a Lockean libertarianism, Montesquian fraternité, Marxist materialism, and international interests and then end with the rights of peoples.

The Right to Govern: Aristotle and the Political Animal

Among the oldest understandings of civil liberties stands the idea that the citizen should exercise the right of self-governance. As articulated by thinkers such as Aristotle in Politics, this original understanding of citizenship was extraordinarily limited: male property owners of the dominant ethnic group. It was not universalist in scope and was not strictly rights oriented, though some thinkers attempt to link it with modern human rights movements. Nonetheless, it moved beyond simple ideas of governance through force or power to rest upon an understanding of the state grounded in human nature (i.e., that “man is a political animal”) and structured by reason. As defined by Aristotle, a proper citizen is one who may participate in giving judgment and holding office, a position predicated upon the assumption that the individual possesses or is given the capacities and skills necessary to exercise those tasks (Bk III).

Under this approach, the state will protect certain civil interests insofar as they advance the goals of effective government. Thus, rights in private property are not protected because of any intrinsic interest of the individual property owner, but rather because protecting private property facilitates social coexistence and contributes to the creation of citizens capable of exercising the skills of self-governance. Under this approach, civil liberties such as free speech, freedom of conscience, and freedom of travel would be emphasized for their character-building features consonant with the development of a politically responsible individual. The right of free speech, the right of public assembly, the right to vote and equality (limited to the privileged “citizen”) would be protected as fundamentals necessary for self-governance.

The Libertarian Privilege: Locke and the American Revolution

A second approach to civil liberties, particularly identified with John Locke and the American Revolution, views government with suspicion and elevates attention on the individual. Specifically, Locke and the American Revolution reflect efforts to counterbalance the totalitarian state through an enhanced understanding of the individual as a rights holder as against the state. Instead of focusing upon the social utility of a claimed civil liberty, this approach seeks to protect those rights possessed by individuals simply because they are human (i.e., natural rights.) Thus, the American Declaration of Independence (1776) speaks of “all men” being created equal and “endowed with certain inalienable Rights [including] Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness.”

While this approach would protect some of the same civil rights as the Aristotelian, such as rights to private property, it is based upon an empowerment of the individual as against the state. Indeed, as argued in the Declaration of Independence, the state “derive [ed it’s] just powers from the consent of the governed,” whose rights predate and stand independent of the state.

In practice, this approach to civil liberties focuses on what Isaiah Berlin labeled the “negative” rights: protections of liberties such as due process of law, rights of counsel, and rights of equality and/or voting insofar as the right protects the interests of the individual.

L’Esprit: Rousseau and the French Revolution

Growing out of the same revolutionary ferment as that of the Americans, the French Revolution took a slightly different tack. While appreciative of the expanding liberties of the American Revolution, the French chose to focus not just on the individual, but upon the community. Liberté, Égalité, Fraternité reflects an approach to liberty grounded within the citizenry as social beings with individual and collective interests. Rather than simply viewing the individual in opposition to the state, Rousseau and other French thinkers urged the virtues of the collective wisdom (“l’esprit”) and authority of the people.

In some ways this represents a blending of the Aristotelian and Lockean approaches, balancing the Lockean focus on the individual with the Aristotelian concern with the political collective leavened with the belief in the affinity of the people. Thus, the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen (1789) not only talks in terms of “the preservation of the natural and imprescriptible rights of man,” but also highlights the sovereignty of the nation, the idea of law as “an expression of the general will” and the idea that citizens possess “rights and duties.”

This latter perspective, of rights and duties, over the years took on significant meaning as a challenge to the perceived selfishness of rights talk that focused only upon the individual. It was adopted by the Organization of American States as the focus of the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man (1948).

This approach would continue the emphasis upon the civil liberties of the individual. What would change would be the understanding on how those liberties may be limited by the collective interests of the people. For example, while the United States tends to support a relatively absolutist position on free speech, limiting any restrictions on free speech to those that arise out of a clear and present danger, most countries allow limitations based on threats to social order, including restrictions on types of speech like hate speech.

Dialectic Materialism: Marx and the Industrial Revolution

Marx and the industrial revolution represented the first major challenge to the three foregoing theories of civil liberties by radically altering the terms of the argument. Specifically, Marx challenged the idea that governance and the relationship between the state and the citizen is or could ever be separate domains. At the simplest level, Marxists ask the question of whether an individual who lacks adequate food, health care, or housing could ever be deemed to possess or exercise any meaningful liberties. The need for necessities would compel these individuals to withdraw from political engagement or make them subject to easy manipulation by those able to provide them with those necessities.

Taking the analysis a step further, the lack of necessities and the subjection of the individual to the economic demands of capitalism not only disempowers, but also weakens the character of the common citizen identified as the working class. Following the Aristotelian approach, Marxism predicts that the political system will ultimately fail in molding individuals for the successful maintenance of the polity.

This Marxist challenge has forced the United States to grapple with the nature of the relationship between the individual and the state and the extent of state obligations to the individual. Specifically, if the task of civil liberties is to protect the individual in the role as citizen participating in the self-governance of the state, then to what extent does the state have an obligation to address the economic rights of the individual? Some economic rights fit relatively easily within traditional Lockean understandings of civil liberties. The rights of workers to organize share libertarian and Aristotelian characteristics (i.e., supporting the negative rights of the individual to be left alone to manage his or her life along with the positive character enforcement of the individual seeking to organize as a way of asserting control over economics). Affirmative rights (what Berlin refers to as positive rights) to an adequate job and income are more difficult to fit within traditional understandings.

How is the state to address these affirmative rights or liberties? Affirmative rights require the state to act—to expend public resources for the benefit of individuals. Are these expenditures obligatory or are they political? That is, are they to be compelled by the individual (in the nature of an individual right) or are they simply the subject of political process, answering the demands of the majority? If so, how?

International Human Rights: The World War II Revolution

Throughout history, the relationship between a state and its citizens (including the issue of civil liberties) was exclusively a domestic concern. The horrors of the Holocaust caused a major reassessment of this position based upon the conviction that a state's mistreatment of its citizens represented a threat to international peace and security. This idea led to the inclusion of human rights within the United Nations Charter (1945) (e.g., Preamble, Art. 1 (3), etc.) and to the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) (UDHR), the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights (1966) (ICCPR), and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1966).

The second innovation of this internationalist movement was the conception of human rights in the UDHR, of which civil liberties may be considered a part, as a unitary field—that the protection of civil liberties must also include the protection of the so-called economic, social, and cultural rights. As demonstrated by the subsequent promulgation and ratification of the ICCPR, the United States and a number of liberal Western states were able to resist this effort. Nonetheless, the UDHR provides strong intellectual support for expanding civil liberties to embrace a larger range of human rights.

People's Rights: The Postcolonial Revolution

The final major theoretical enhancement to civil liberties emerged in the postcolonial world of the 1960s as expressed in the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (1981), though it was foreshadowed in the League of Nations mandate system and the UDHR. Specifically, civil liberties had traditionally focused upon the relationship between the individual and the state. This postcolonial movement demanded that attention be paid to social collectives within the borders of the state or distinguishable from the state. The movement provides recognition of the rights of aboriginal peoples—as a people—within the border of a state, including their right to maintain their language and culture.

Clearly, the recognition of peoples' rights presents an enormous challenge to traditional civil liberties, which focus upon the rights of an individual in terms of how to conceptualize peoples' rights as a civil right (if applicable), but more importantly, how to coordinate the protection of civil liberties and peoples' rights. The former issue, conceptualizing peoples' rights, raises significant questions about who is the appropriate rights holder. Are peoples' rights vested within the collective or may the individual assert a personal interest in the peoples' right? If the right is limited to the collective, what if the collective does not have a collective leadership or organization?

Coordinating civil liberties and peoples' rights is potentially even more troubling. A peoples' right to maintain its culture or identity necessarily involves legislating or regulating the behavior of the collective to sustain that identity. For example, one cannot maintain a language unless one can assure its continued use in education, local government, etc. However, what happens when the exercise of a peoples' right, insofar as it exercises a state-like right, conflicts with the civil rights of a member of that community? This problem commonly arises out of conflicts between the protection of traditional culture and the rights of women to be free of sexual discrimination.

In the United States, issues surrounding peoples' rights not only arise in connection with aboriginal peoples, but may also arise around religious communities with strong ethnic identities. Given the strong bias toward protecting the individual, these latter protections are generally very weak, if recognized at all.

Summary

The United States has a very strong tradition of civil liberties that is quite distinct from international approaches to this subject. Indeed, the United States often adopts an isolationist approach to international law and takes great pride in claiming the independence of its understanding of civil liberties and offering them as the progenitors of civil liberties for the rest of the world. Nonetheless, international theories have played a significant role in the recognition and development of civil liberties before their emergence in the United States and as they have evolved and continue to develop. Early theories, the Aristotelian and Lockean, contributed to their creation and how they were originally understood. The Rousseauists challenged the interpretation of civil liberties as rights and emphasized the aspect of a concomitant duty arising in connection with rights. Subsequent theories produced pressure to expand the types of rights to be protected to include social, economic, cultural, and peoples' rights.

DAVID E. GUINN

References and Further Reading

- African [Banjul] Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, adopted June 27, 1981, OAU Doc. CAB/LEG/67/3 rev. 5, 21 I.L.M. 58 (1982).
- American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, O.A.S. Res. XXX, adopted by the Ninth International Conference of American States (1948), reprinted in Basic Documents Pertaining to Human Rights in the Inter-American System, OEA/Ser.L.V/II.82 doc.6 rev.1 at 17 (1992).
- Aristotle, Politics (c. 335–323 BCE).
- Berlin, Isaiah. Four Essays on Liberty. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Charter of the United Nations, 59 Stat. 1031, T.S. 993, 3 Bevans 1153 (1945).
- Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen (1789).
- International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, G.A. res. 2200A (XXI), 21 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 16) at 52, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966).
- International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, G.A. res. 2200A (XXI), 21 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 16) at 49, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966).
- Locke, John. Two Treatises on Government (1688).
- Rousseau, Jean-Jacques. The Social Contract (1762).
- Legal Instruments*
- Universal Declaration of Human Rights, G.A. res. 217A (III), U.N. Doc A/810 at 71 (1948).
- U.S. Declaration of Independence (1776).

THEORIES OF FREE SPEECH PROTECTION

Perhaps more than any other area of American constitutional law, the First Amendment's protection of "the freedom of speech" has been dominated by theory. Specifically, it has been dominated by differing theoretical conceptions of what a well-functioning system of free expression should protect, what it should not protect, what evils it should guard against, and which institution (courts or legislatures) should generally decide these matters. Why has theory dominated free-speech controversies? Part of the answer surely lies in the fact that two other standard sources of constitutional meaning—text and history—offer so little guidance.

The text of the First Amendment is deceptively straightforward. It provides, "Congress shall make no law ... abridging the freedom of speech ..." Justice Hugo Black, who served on the Supreme Court from 1937 to 1971, famously viewed the First Amendment as an absolute command forbidding all government restrictions on speech. For Black, "no law" meant "no law." He explicitly rejected any approach that would "balance" free speech rights against government interests in speech regulation. "I believe that the First Amendment's unequivocal command that there shall be no abridgment of free speech and assembly shows that the men who drafted our Bill of Rights did all the 'balancing' that was to be done," he wrote in dissent in Konigsberg v. State Bar of California (366 U.S. 36, 1961). Yet even Justice Black did not rule in favor of all free-speech litigants; for example, he defined "speech" narrowly to mean spoken words.

The absolutist position has never prevailed for textual as well as practical reasons. As a matter of the text, neither the word "abridging" nor the phrase "the freedom of speech" is self-defining. They are terms of art that require interpretation. Does the government "abridge" speech when it selectively funds causes it favors? Or when it conditions the receipt of funds on the recipient's agreement not to speak? Is it within "the freedom of speech" to burn a flag or draft card? To dance in the nude at a commercial establishment? To libel another person? To commit perjury? These are not questions that can be answered authoritatively simply by reading the words of the First Amendment.

For practical reasons, too, the absolutist position has been unattractive. As Justice Felix Frankfurter, who served from 1939 to 1962, wrote in Dennis v. United States (341 U.S. 494, 1951): "Absolute rules would inevitably lead to absolute exceptions, and such exceptions would eventually corrode the rules." Free speech is not the only value in the Constitution, and weighty public interests sometimes counsel in favor of restricting "speech." Once something is defined as within the freedom of speech, perhaps then it is protected. But whether it is defined that way requires some judgment beyond reciting the text.

That judgment could be informed by history—specifically by the intentions of those who drafted and ratified the First Amendment. Yet, perhaps surprisingly, history offers little guidance about what the First Amendment is supposed to mean. At a minimum, the Framers wanted to forbid the practice of censorship by government licensing. When the printing press was first developed, the Crown in England claimed a right to own and control it; any printed material had to be submitted beforehand to a royal censor for approval. It was criminal to publish without the king's imprimatur. This scheme remained in effect in England until 1694 and in the American colonies until 1725. Perhaps this was all that the First Amendment was meant to accomplish. On the other hand, why would Congress enact an amendment only to prevent an evil that had ceased to exist in the colonies sixty-five years before?

Another possible target of the Framers' concern was laws against "seditious libel." English criminal law had punished criticism of the king and government and had even punished speech that had a "seditious tendency." Some scholars have argued that the First Amendment was intended to abolish the common law of seditious libel in addition to barring licensing laws. Evidence against this view is the congressional passage of the Sedition Act of 1798, which banned "false, scandalous, and malicious writing" against the government. Those who objected to the act usually did so on federalism grounds, not free-speech grounds.

Almost no aspect of free-speech jurisprudence is based on the original meaning of the First Amendment. No justice on the Supreme Court has adopted an originalist understanding of free speech. Instead, decision making in free-speech cases has overwhelmingly relied on theorizing about what kinds of speech should enjoy protection in a free and democratic society. Several theories have dominated the development of First Amendment doctrine.

The first dominant theory is that the First Amendment is about the search for truth, political and otherwise, in a marketplace of ideas. The basic theory is that airing competing views will help society arrive at the truth on any given issue. Major early proponents of this "truth" theory were John Milton and John Stuart Mill. Milton argued that truth would win in any contest with falsehood. Mill argued that suppressing opinion was wrong, no matter whether the opinion was true or false. If the suppressed opinion were true, Mill noted, society would lose the advantage of hearing it. If the suppressed opinion were false, he added, society would lose the advantage of the more complete view of truth that would come from its encounter with falsity.

The truth theory and its accompanying metaphor of a “marketplace of ideas” were enormously influential in the development of free-speech jurisprudence in the early twentieth century. In their classic First Amendment opinions, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., and Justice Louis Brandeis leaned heavily on the truth conception. Justice Holmes wrote in Abrams v. United States (250 U.S. 616, 1919):

[W]hen men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out. That is at any rate the theory of our constitution.

Eight years later, in Whitney v. California (274 U.S. 357, 1927), Justice Brandeis added his view that “freedom to think as you will and to speak as you think are means indispensable to the discovery and spread of political truth.”

Critics of the truth theory have pointed out that truth may not always win in the marketplace of ideas. Even when it does win, it may take a long time, during which a lot of harm will be done. Other critics have noted that the marketplace of ideas, like the marketplace of goods, may be flawed. It may suffer imperfections—like domination by monopolists or by wealthy and entrenched interests—that require government intervention and correction.

Judge Frank Easterbrook of the seventh circuit has rejected these criticisms of the truth conception as a basis for speech regulation. In American Booksellers Ass’n v. Hudnut (771 F.2d 323, 1986), a case in which Indianapolis argued that its antipornography ordinance was justified because pornography was effectively “unanswerable” in the marketplace of ideas, Easterbrook also rejected the truth conception. Citing Milton’s and Mill’s views, he wrote:

The metaphor [of the marketplace of ideas] is honored. The Framers undoubtedly believed it. As a general matter it is true. But the Constitution does not make the dominance of truth a necessary condition of freedom of speech.... A power to limit speech on the ground that truth has not yet prevailed and is not likely to prevail implies the power to declare truth.... Under the First Amendment, however, there is no such thing as a false idea, so the government may not restrict speech on the ground that in a free exchange truth is not yet dominant.

Perhaps the leading theory of free speech in jurisprudence and in academic writing has been the self-government theory. Under this theory, free speech exists to help representative democracy function well by focusing on issues of public importance, including criticism of public policy and public officials. The role of free speech, in this view, is to inform democratic deliberation and decision making; it helps make citizens responsible and the republic better. The self-government theory might give less or no protection to perjury, libel, criminal solicitation or incitement, pornography, commercial advertising, and possibly hate speech that denigrates some groups. It has been advocated by many scholars on the Left (for example, Cass Sunstein) and the Right (for example, Robert Bork).

Under this view, political speech—speech intended to contribute to debate about public issues—should enjoy the highest level of First Amendment protection. Regulation of political speech is most harmful because it impairs the ordinary channels for political change. For example, if there are controls on commercial activity, it remains possible to argue that the controls should be lifted or changed. If government closes political argument, on the other hand, the democratic corrective is unavailable. Political deliberation is a precondition for debate about all other matters, like economics.

The self-government theory suffuses the case law on the freedom of speech. Judge Learned Hand, then a federal district judge, argued in Masses Publishing v. Patten (244 Fed. 535, S.D. N.Y. 1917) that “tolerance of all methods of political agitation” is “a safeguard of free government.” Justice Brandeis in Whitney argued that in government “the deliberative forces should prevail over the arbitrary”; that free speech is “indispensable to the discovery and spread of political truth”; that “public discussion is a political duty”; that such discussion “should be a fundamental principle of the American government”; that the key to “stable government ... lies in the opportunity to discuss freely supposed grievances and proposed remedies”; and that protecting speech involves believing in “the power of reason as applied through public discussion.”

In Schneider v. State (308 U.S. 147, 1939), a case striking down an antilittering ordinance that banned distributing leaflets, the Court held that public convenience was “insufficient to justify such as diminishes the exercise of rights so vital to the maintenance of democratic institutions.” In New York Times v. Sullivan (376 U.S. 254, 1964), which announced new restrictions on libel actions by public officials for criticism of their official behavior, the Supreme Court observed that “debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials.” The Court even used a self-government rationale for its extension of free-speech protection to advertising in Virginia State Pharmacy Board v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council (425 U.S. 748, 1976). The free flow of commercial information, argued the Court, is “indispensable to the formation of intelligent opinions as to how [the free enterprise system] ought to be regulated or altered.” Thus, “even if the First Amendment were thought to be primarily an instrument to enlighten public decision making in a democracy, we could not say that the free flow of information does not serve that goal.”

To the extent the self-government theory emphasizes protection for political speech, critics point out that it is hard to draw a line around “political speech.” Among other forms of speech that are not directly political, self-government theory might leave unprotected art, literature, and music. Much speech, not just rational debate, indirectly informs democratic decision making. Other critics complain that the self-government rationale for free-speech protection is reductionist, leaving out the role of speech as a tool of self-realization and personal development.

The third prominent theory is that free speech contributes to personal autonomy. Under this view, speech is valuable because it helps individuals achieve self-fulfillment, to develop in the way each person thinks best. Speech may also help people develop their capacity for rational decision making. The autonomy approach would give very broad and strict protection not only to political speech but also to art, literature, entertainment, and advertising.

The autonomy theory for protecting speech is also present in numerous decisions of the Supreme Court, though it is a less common theme in First Amendment jurisprudence than is the self-government theory. Though Justice Brandeis emphasized self-government in his Whitney concurrence, he also introduced the autonomy rationale. “Those who won our independence,” he wrote, “believed that the final end of the State was to make men free to develop their faculties.” Stanley v. Georgia (394 U.S. 557, 1969), which protected an individual’s right to possess otherwise constitutionally unprotected obscenity in the home, is perhaps the Court’s most full-throated defense of the autonomy theory. “The right to receive information and ideas, regardless of their social worth, [is] fundamental to our free society.... If the First Amendment means anything, it means that a State has no business telling a man, sitting alone in his own house, what books he may read or what films he may watch.”

In Cohen v. California (403 U.S. 15, 1971), which struck down a disorderly conduct conviction for publicly wearing a jacket bearing an expletive, the Court observed that “one man’s vulgarity is another’s lyric.” This suggested the moral skepticism and individualism of free-speech law. The Court also noted that “our political system rests” on “the premise of individual dignity and choice.” The Court’s protection of commercial speech has leaned heavily on the value of advertising as a means of enhancing individual choice and has distrusted the regulatory approach of keeping citizens in the dark about commercial information for their own good. “There is an alternative to this highly paternalistic approach,” wrote the Court in the Virginia Pharmacy case. “That alternative is to assume that this information is not in itself harmful, that people will perceive their own best interests if only they are well enough informed, and that the best means to that end is to open the channels of communication rather than to close them.”

One criticism of the autonomy rationale is that it is too broad. Former law professor and judge Robert Bork charges that if speech is meant to contribute to self-fulfillment there is no way to distinguish it from other activities that contribute to self-fulfillment, like trading stocks or having sex. There is no principled way to prefer one of these means of achieving self-fulfillment to another, argues Bork. Other critics point to problems with the concept of autonomy. The choices people make in life, they argue, are not wholly autonomous; individual choices are heavily influenced by the options people have, the options they think they have, the resources they command, and the environment in which their preferences develop. Yet another criticism of autonomy theory is that regulating speech might actually promote autonomy—for example, by ensuring that the citizen’s informational environment includes all relevant perspectives in a debate. Much advertising might be designed to overpower rational decision making by individuals and thus, on this view, could be regulated in order to prevent the subversion of the consumer’s autonomy.

Finally, there is a fourth theory of free-speech protection that emphasizes distrust of government. While the first three theories point to some affirmative good that may come from protecting speech (truth, good government, or individual autonomy) much free-speech doctrine and academic writing has emphasized this negative reason for strong protection of free speech. Distrust theory argues that even if speech has no positive value it ought not to be regulated because exercises of government regulatory power in this area are presumptively bad. This theory stresses the long history of foolish and harmful regulation of speech, including infamous decisions to ban books and great works of art.

The distrust theory focuses on three distinct evils of government speech regulation: incompetence, entrenchment, and intolerance. First, free speech guards against government incompetence. Distrust theory doubts the state's ability to discover and implement the best informational environment for citizens and its ability to discover and implement what is true and what is false with respect to their best interests in the content of information they receive. It involves an appreciation of the fallibility of political leaders in displacing citizens as the best judges of their own interests.

Second, in the view of distrust theory, free speech guards against government entrenchment. A fear embedded in much of our free-speech jurisprudence is that government speech regulation, even when government is competent to discover some objective best interests of citizens' informational environment, will be driven by a desire of incumbents to entrench themselves and the policies they favor. Thus, when the state has adopted an anti-tobacco or anti-gambling public policy, it will not only seek to advance those policies by regulating conduct but will seek to do so through preventing contrary information from reaching the public. Restrictions on speech will insulate the substantive conduct regulations from criticism and democratic debate. Or speech restrictions will substitute for conduct regulation, advancing the state's policy through the especially sinister (because self-insulating) means of controlling information rather than conduct.

Finally, for distrust theory, free speech guards against government intolerance. When the government restricts speech, this view holds, it will likely do so to disfavor unpopular ideas. For example, it would be easy enough for the state, under the guise of saving voters from confusion, to regulate political parties in a way that benefits the dominant ones and disfavors the small, unpopular ones.

Critics of distrust theory doubt whether it is really true that government regulations have been more incompetent, harmful, or error prone in the area of speech than in other areas, like the regulation of economic markets. If they are right that government has been equally incompetent (or competent) in speech and nonspeech regulation, that would leave two choices. Perhaps neither speech nor markets should be strictly protected. Thus, the appropriate level of protection for either would be left to political resolution. This position is advocated by those who see imperfections in speech and economic markets that need correcting. Alternatively, perhaps speech and markets should be strictly protected by the judiciary from government regulation. This approach is favored by libertarians.

The Supreme Court has never chosen a single theory of free-speech protection to guide its decisions. Each of the theories discussed here has appeared in First Amendment jurisprudence at different times and for different purposes. None by itself adequately explains all of free-speech law in the United States, but each gives insight into what has led to fairly robust protection overall for expression. Collectively, these theories offer a rich account of why speech is treated as a special civil liberty.

DALE CARPENTER

References and Further Reading

- Baker, C. Edwin, Scope of the First Amendment Freedom of Speech, UCLA L. Rev. 25 (1978).
 Black, Hugo. A Constitutional Faith. 1961.
 Bork, Robert, Neutral Principles and Some First Amendment Problems, Ind. L. J. 1 (1971): 47.
 Cafee, Zechariah, Jr. Free Speech in the United States. 1941.
 Carpenter, Dale. The Antipaternalism Principle in the First Amendment, Creighton L. Rev. 579 (2004): 37.
 Coase, R. H. "The Market for Goods and the Market for Ideas." Am. Econ. Rev. 64 (1974).
 Garvey, John H., and Frederick Schauer. The First Amendment: A Reader. 2nd ed., 1996.
 Levy, Leonard. Legacy of Suppression: Freedom of Speech and Press in Early American History. 1960.
 Meiklejohn, Alexander, The First Amendment Is an Absolute, 1961 Sup. Ct. Rev. 245.
 Redish, Martin, The Value of Free Speech, U. Pa. L. Rev. 130 (1982): 591.
 Schauer, Frederick. Free Speech: A Philosophical Enquiry. 1982.
 Sullivan, Kathleen M., Free Speech and Unfree Markets, UCLA L. Rev. 42 (1995): 949.
 Sullivan, Kathleen M., and Gerald Gunther. First Amendment Law. 2nd ed. 2003.
 Sunstein, Cass R. Democracy and the Problem of Free Speech. 1993.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. United States*, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
American Booksellers Ass'n v. Hudnut, 771 F.2d 323 (1986)
Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971)
Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
Konigsberg v. State Bar of California, 366 U.S. 36 (1961)
Masses Publishing v. Patten, 244 Fed. 535 (S.D. N.Y. 1917)
New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147 (1939)
Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)
Virginia State Pharmacy Board v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748 (1976)
Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)

THEORIES OF PUNISHMENT

The Primary Civil Liberty Issue

When someone gives us a gift, we naturally express our thanks. We rarely ask, “Why?” In contrast, when someone intentionally hurts us, perhaps by use of violence, we naturally demand an explanation. We are apt to ask, “Why me? Why this? Did I deserve this?” We feel rightly aggrieved unless we receive a good justification.

When society convicts and punishes a person for a crime, it, too, intentionally hurts that individual. The conviction represents the community’s condemnation of the convicted person’s wrongdoing and, at least indirectly, of the person. The conviction stigmatizes the wrongdoer, a real if intangible harm. Moreover, a criminal conviction for a serious offense in the United States nearly always entails loss of liberty by imprisonment or, in the case of murder, potentially the ultimate deprivation of liberty, loss of life. These denials of liberty (which are imposed in our name, as members of the community) demand a justification.

Why do we intentionally hurt persons who commit crimes, by punishing them? This is the most critical civil liberty question regarding any criminal justice system. Generally speaking, two theories of punishment imperfectly seek to provide justification for the restrictions on civil liberties that arise in the criminal justice system: utilitarianism and retributionism (or “retributivism”).

Utilitarianism

The premise of classical utilitarianism, formulated by Jeremy Bentham in the nineteenth century, is that the goal of all laws is to maximize the net happiness of society. Laws should be enacted and enforced, as much as possible, to exclude all unpleasant events. To a utilitarian, crime is unpleasant and undesirable, but so is punishment. Ideally, neither crime nor punishment would exist in the world; since some persons are inclined to commit crimes, however, utilitarians believe that pain inflicted by punishment is justifiable if, but only if and to the extent that, it will result in a greater reduction of pain in the form of future crime.

According to Bentham, the mere threat of imposition of punishment—often by observing it inflicted on others—can significantly reduce crime because humans are rational calculators. They seek to augment their happiness and avoid unpleasantness. Therefore, they will avoid committing crimes if they believe that the risk of apprehension, conviction, and ultimate punishment is greater than the foreseeable benefits to them from the intended crime. This form of utilitarianism is called “general deterrence.” Crime is also deterred directly by incarcerating a criminal because wrongdoers cannot commit crimes in the outside society during the period of incarceration (“specific deterrence by incapacitation”) and, if released, the individual may be deterred from further crime as a result of the memory of the prior unpleasant experience (“specific deterrence by intimidation”).

Another, more modern version of utilitarianism is commonly called “rehabilitation.” Like classical utilitarians, the goal of rehabilitationists is to reduce future crime, but they would do so by diagnosing the cause of the wrongdoer’s conduct (e.g., drug addiction, illiteracy, mental illness) and then curing the problem.

Retributionism

Some persons would argue that retributionism stems from biblical teachings of lex talionis (an eye for an eye). Immanuel Kant’s writings in the eighteenth century, however, are most commonly cited in philosophical support of retribution. In disrepute in the United States during the early and middle twentieth century, retributivism experienced a renaissance in the latter decades of the last century.

Retributionists consider punishment proportional to the seriousness of the offense morally required as a response to wrongdoing, even if it does not result in future reduction in crime. Retributivism is often justified as follows: Rules (laws) forbid various forms of injurious or morally objectionable conduct; compliance with these rules burdens each member of society who exercises self-restraint. This self-restraint in turn benefits everyone by promoting what Herbert Morris describes in Persons and Punishment as “noninterference by others with what each person values, such ... as continuance of life and bodily security.” Punishment of offenders is justified because the wrongdoer is a free rider by renouncing a burden imposed on all while benefiting from others’ self-restraint. Punishment helps return a moral equilibrium to society. By paying a debt to society through punishment, the wrongdoer may return to the community, back in moral balance with others.

Additional Civil Liberty Issues

Even if utilitarianism plausibly justifies restricting criminals' civil liberties, critics of the theory argue that it can also justify the intentional punishment of innocent persons. For example, assume that a murder occurs in a racially divided town. The victim is white and a rumor spreads that the killer is African American. Assume as well that as a result of racist activity in the community, a white mob threatens immediately to burn down the homes of black citizens and kill the inhabitants in order to exact revenge. The sheriff does not have adequate personnel to stop the mob, but is convinced that if he or she arrests a particular homeless African American for the crime and promises quick trial, the mob will be satisfied. Might a utilitarian sheriff determine that framing the innocent man is justified, since the pain to one innocent person will result in benefit to countless others who would have been victims of the mob?

Utilitarians commonly reject this suggestion by arguing that such hypothetical situations are unrealistic. They suggest, for example, that the sheriff could arrest the homeless man and release him later, prior to trial; even if the trial was held, there is too great a risk that the sheriff's conduct would later be discovered, which would result in counterutilitarian disrespect for the law. Despite these arguments, many utilitarians concede that, at least in theory, their philosophy allows for such an outcome.

A second concern regarding utilitarianism relates to practice, not theory. Many state legislatures in the late twentieth century enacted recidivist statutes ("three strikes" laws). These laws result in enhanced punishment of second- and third-time offenders; sometimes the third-time offender receives life imprisonment for any felony. Lawmakers justify these laws on the utilitarian ground that repeat offenders need this additional incapacitation because they have proven undeterrable. Utilitarians are themselves often critical of such legislation because the statutes are over- and underinclusive (some first-time offenders are far more likely to repeat than some repeat offenders); even when the right persons are incarcerated, such laws are often extreme (retaining persons in prison long past the age they are likely to re-offend, thus inflicting needless pain on them and costing the society for unnecessary incarceration).

Some civil libertarians are also concerned about rehabilitation theories. As humane as the concept sounds, a penal system that seeks to "treat" or "cure" offenders is demeaning to the dignity of such individuals—treating them as sick persons, unable to make free-will choices—and ultimately oppressive because freedom is tied to cure, not to the proportionality of the crime or even the dangerousness of the offender.

Retributionism is free of the preceding civil liberty concerns. By definition, retributivism would never justify punishment of an innocent person, since the basis of punishment is prior wrongdoing. Recidivist laws are usually not defended on retributive grounds, since they almost always result in punishment disproportional to the most recent crime committed. Retribution is premised on the belief that people generally have free will and thus can be held responsible for their wrongdoing; therefore, the fear of some civil libertarians that rehabilitation can result in disproportional loss of liberty is ameliorated.

Retributivism is also subject to civil libertarian criticism. Utilitarians argue that any theory of punishment that justifies imprisonment or death, even though it will do no future good, promotes senseless cruelty. Whether one treats the issue as a constitutional question or simply one of good public policy in a secular, liberal democracy such as the United States, critics argue that government denial of individuals' freedom should not be justified in the absence of a compelling state interest. Prevention of future crime—the utilitarian goal—might be such a compelling state interest, but, it is claimed, retributionists offer nothing more tangible than a "balancing of the moral equilibrium."

JOSHUA DRESSLER

References and Further Reading

- Bayles, Michael D., ed. Contemporary Utilitarianism. Garden City: Anchor Books, 1968.
- Bentham, Jeremy. An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation. New York: Hafner Publishing Co., 1948.
- Binder, Guyora. Punishment Theory: Moral or Political? Buffalo Criminal Law Review 5 (2002): 321–371.
- Dolinko, David. Three Mistakes of Retributivism, UCLA Law Review 39 (1992): 1623–1657.
- Dressler, Joshua. Understanding Criminal Law. 3rd ed. New York: Lexis Publishing Co., 2001.
- Husak, Douglas N., Retribution in Criminal Theory, San Diego Law Review 37 (2000): 959–986.
- McCloskey, H. J. "Utilitarianism and Retributive Punishment." Journal of Philosophy 64 (1967): 91–110.
- Moore, Michael S. "The Moral Worth of Retribution." In Responsibility, Character, and the Emotions, edited by Ferdinand Schoeman, 179–219. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Morris, Herbert. "Persons and Punishment." The Monist 52 (1968): 475–501.
- Murphy, Jeffrie G. "Retributivism, Moral Education, and the Liberal State." Criminal Justice Ethics 4 (Winter/Spring 1995): 3–11.

Reiss, Hans, ed., and H. B. Nisbet, trans. Kant's Political Writings. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970.
 von Hirsch, Andrew. Doing Justice: The Choice of Punishments. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1976.

See also Bill of Rights; Structure; Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment: Executions of Innocents; Mandatory Minimum Sentences; Sentencing Guidelines; Theories of Civil Liberties

THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT

The Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution is remarkably compact. In one short sentence, it forever ended slavery in the United States: "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction." A second section added an entirely new concept to the American Constitution by declaring that "Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." No other amendment had explicitly enhanced the powers Congress. Rather, the Bill of Rights had limited the powers of Congress or was at best a declaration of how laws ought to be in the United States. But the Thirteenth Amendment was different, explicitly granting Congress powers of enforcement.

Equally significant, the amendment altered the traditional relationship between the states and the federal government. Under the Constitution of 1787 the states were free to define the status of all people within their jurisdiction. The only exception to this was that Congress retained the power to regulate the naturalization of aliens. But the Thirteenth Amendment dramatically altered the status of millions of Americans. For the first time in the history of the nation, the national government had the power to regulate the status of individuals within the nation.

The amendment grew out of secession and the Civil War. By the time President Abraham Lincoln took office seven states had formally seceded from the Union and declared they were now part of a new nation, the Confederate States of America. In his first inaugural address Lincoln tried to assure the South that he was not a threat to slavery. He noted:

Apprehension seems to exist among the people of the Southern States that by the accession of a Republican Administration their property and their peace and personal security are to be endangered. There has never been any reasonable cause for such apprehension. Indeed, the most ample evidence to the contrary has all the while existed and been open to their inspection. It is found in nearly all the published speeches of him who now addresses you. I do but quote from one of those speeches when I declare that "I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so."

However, despite his pleas for peace and a return to the normal relations within the Union, the new Confederate nation moved forward and in April initiated hostilities against the United States by firing on Fort Sumter in the harbor of Charleston, South Carolina. Thus, the war began and four more slave states left the Union.

From the moment the war began, an increasing number of northerners wanted to make the conflict into a crusade against slavery. President Lincoln wisely ignored these demands, reiterating his view that he had no constitutional power to end slavery. More importantly, he understood that he could not move against slavery and hope to keep the southern border states—Maryland, Delaware, Kentucky, and Missouri—in the Union. Thus, shortly after the war began Lincoln quickly countermanded General John C. Fremont's attempt to end slavery in Missouri. Later, when a group of ministers told Lincoln he would have God on his side if he ended slavery, the president allegedly responded: "I would like to have God on my side, but I must have Kentucky."

In the first Confiscation Act, passed on August 6, 1861, Congress authorized the confiscation and emancipation of any slaves used by the Confederates for military purposes, such as building forts or transporting supplies. The Second Confiscation Act, passed July 17, 1862, declared that all slaves owned by persons participating in the rebellion would be emancipated. By this time Lincoln had already concluded that he could free slaves everywhere in the confederacy, under his power as commander in chief of the Army. In September 1862, he issued the preliminary Emancipation Proclamation, declaring that in one hundred days, he would free all slaves in the Confederacy unless the rebellious states returned to the Union. Of course Lincoln knew that this would not happen and so on January 1, 1863, Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation, which freed slaves living within the Confederacy. This proclamation applied to the vast majority of American slaves, but did not affect slaves in loyal slave states of Maryland, Kentucky, Delaware, and Missouri, as well as parts of Virginia and Louisiana that were under the control of the United States.

From the moment he issued the proclamation, Lincoln was concerned about its constitutionality. Slavery was clearly protected by the Constitution. This was understood by almost all legal scholars and politicians, North and South, at the beginning of the war. Virtually all legal scholars agreed that neither Congress nor the president had the power to end slavery in the states. The Supreme Court, in Dred Scott v. Sandford (60 U.S. 393, 1857) had emphatically supported this position as well, asserting slaves were a form of property explicitly protected by the Constitution. While Lincoln relied on the war power to issue the proclamation he was concerned that the Supreme Court would rule he lacked such powers. Indeed, as long as Roger B. Taney remained chief justice, the validity of the proclamation would be in doubt.

THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT

Lincoln feared that as soon as the war ended the Court would rule that the Emancipation Proclamation was unconstitutional. The Dred Scott precedent loomed large in this thinking. In that case Chief Justice Taney held that the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution prevented Congress from freeing slaves brought into the federal territories. If freeing a few slaves in the territories was an unconstitutional “taking” of private property without just compensation, then surely the Court might conclude that freeing millions of slaves during the war was also a taking.

Thus, in 1864 Senator Lyman Trumbull of Illinois, a longtime friend and political ally of the president, introduced the Thirteenth Amendment in Congress. This amendment would not only end slavery in the Confederate states, but also in the loyal slave states. By this time, however, slavery was virtually dead in those states and there was no chance that Kentucky or Missouri would leave the Union to join the crumbling Confederacy. In addition, by this time the U.S. Army had already brought freedom to hundreds of thousands of slaves in the Confederacy, and significant numbers of former slaves had been inducted into the army and were fighting to restore the Union and end slavery. Thus, Trumbull proposed his amendment to end slavery everywhere in the United States.

The Senate passed the amendment in December 1864 and sent it to the House. However, lame-duck House Democrats opposed the amendment and the Republicans in the House lacked the two-thirds majority to send the amendment on to the states. In his annual message, on December 6, 1864, Lincoln urged the House of Representatives to reconsider this vote and noted that the election results made clear that “the next Congress will pass the measure if this [Congress] does not.” Lincoln then successfully lobbied some northern Democrats to change their votes; on February 1, 1865, the House passed the amendment with the necessary two-thirds majority and it went to the states. On December 6, 1865, the amendment was ratified, and on December 15 Secretary of State William H. Seward announced this result to the nation.

As part of the price of losing the war, the legislatures of the former Confederate states ratified the amendment, although without much enthusiasm. The white leaders of these states—many of them former Confederate office holders and leaders—fully understood that their states would not be readmitted to the Union unless they ended slavery. The realists in the South must also have understood that it would be impossible to re-enslave the millions of now free people, especially since there were about one hundred fifty thousand black soldiers and veterans in the South who were armed and prepared to defend their newly acquired liberty. In the loyal slave states, however, there was no such necessity and Delaware stubbornly refused to ratify the amendment or end slavery on its own. Slavery did not end in that state until the amendment was ratified. In 1901, the state would symbolically ratify the Thirteenth Amendment and the other two Civil War amendments.

The language of the amendment was significant in three ways. First, it specifically empowered Congress to enforce the amendment with “appropriate legislation.” This open-ended language could have led to a massive federal intervention to preserve freedom. Second, the amendment was not limited to regulating government action. The Bill of Rights had limited the actions of the national government; the Fourteenth Amendment, which would be passed by Congress only a few months after the thirteenth was ratified, would limit state action. The Thirteenth Amendment, however, prohibited the status of slave, without regard to who or what created that status. Thus, under the amendment, Congress could limit state action or go after individuals who might try to enslave people. The third important part was tied to this last point. The limitation in the amendment went beyond chattel slavery, as it had been known in the antebellum South, and prohibited all forms of “involuntary servitude.” This could include coercive contract, debt peonage, and labor conditions that forced people to work against their will.

The meaning of the amendment was unclear at the time of its adoption. Some leaders believed it was narrowly confined to the antebellum system of slavery—the owning, buying, and selling of people. But many Americans and most Republicans (the authors and supporters of the amendment) thought it had a much broader reach. Republican leaders like Senator Charles Sumner of Massachusetts and Representative Thaddeus Stevens of Pennsylvania believed the amendment allowed them to secure black civil and political rights. Ultimately, the Supreme Court would accept some of this analysis, concluding that the amendment prohibited “badges of slavery,” such as state-imposed limitations on property ownership, contracts, and mobility.

Many Republicans also believed that representative democracy was not possible if large portions of the population were disfranchised and no one in their community had any access to political power. These Republicans understood, as did most Americans at the time, that the franchise might not be available to everyone. Restrictions based on citizenship, wealth, age, and gender seemed appropriate, but they believed that a representative democracy could not exist if large portions of the population were excluded from the political process.

The amendment raises a series of civil liberties issues. On one hand, the Thirteenth Amendment can be seen as the single most important expansion of civil liberty in American history. It secured freedom for nearly four million Americans who had previously been held as slaves. The first step to civil liberty is in fact liberty itself, which is what the amendment gave many Americans. But the amendment did not, in the end, preserve the civil liberties of former slaves. It did not guarantee the freedom of speech or assembly or fair trials. Freedom would have been hollow without the ability to protect that freedom and to participate freely in the economy and in politics. As noted, some Republican leaders thought the amendment did this, but others clearly saw that it did not, and thus Congress soon sent the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the states. Ironically, the Thirteenth Amendment can also be seen as a violation of the civil liberties of slave owners, in that it took their property from them. Such an analysis might seem perverse, but the former masters of the Confederacy were bitter about losing the vast amount of wealth their slaves represented.

In addition to prohibiting slavery—the actual owning of people—the Thirteenth Amendment banned “involuntary servitude,” which would later be extended to debt peonage, various kinds of contract labor, and coercing immigrants to work to pay off the cost of coming to the United States. In 1867, Congress passed the Peonage Act to abolish the historic system of peonage in the New Mexico Territory. However, the act applied to the entire nation. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries southern states developed a coercive economic system—often called debt peonage—supported by the police and prosecutors, that forced people to remain on the land while keeping them in perpetual poverty. In Clyatt v. United States (197 U.S. 207, 1905) the Supreme Court upheld a prosecution of individuals who held blacks in semi-slavery. In Bailey v. Alabama (219 U.S. 219, 1911) the Court struck down a state law that allowed people to be forced to work to pay off debts. The Court reached a similar conclusion in United States v. Reynolds (235 U.S. 133, 1914), which struck down Alabama’s criminal surety laws. As late as the 1930s, blacks were illegally held in peonage in the South.

An aspect of this part of the amendment that the framers did not anticipate would be harmful to the former slaves and their children. The amendment allowed involuntary servitude “as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted.” In the late nineteenth century southern states would use law enforcement as a method of controlling black labor and reducing hundreds of thousands of free blacks to a form of slavery. Blacks would be convicted of small and frivolous crimes. When they could not pay their fines, they would be sold to employers, who would use them as free laborers until their fine was paid off by their labor. Alternatively, southern states sentenced poor people, usually but not always, blacks, to work as convict laborers, where their involuntary servitude enriched the state, rather than private parties.

In the mid-twentieth century, the court would find yet one more use for the amendment: to strike down discrimination in housing. In Jones v. Alfred H. Meyer, Co. (392 U.S. 409, 1968) the Court held that the refusal of a white-owned real estate company to sell a house to a black was a violation of the Thirteenth Amendment because it was private action that constituted a “badge of slavery.” Slaves could not own property, so to refuse to sell to blacks was a carryover from slavery. In the more recent years, immigrants have been held against their will to work in sweatshops, on rural farms, and in the sex and prostitution industries. To this day federal prosecutors use the Thirteenth Amendment and statutes passed to enforce it to prosecute people holding others in involuntary servitude.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

Hyman, Harold M., and William M. Wiecek. Equal Justice under Law: Constitutional Development, 1835–1875. New York: Harper and Row, 1982.

ten Broek, Jacobus. The Antislavery Origins of the Fourteenth. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1951.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U.S. 219 (1911)
Clyatt v. United States, 197 U.S. 207 (1905)
Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857)
Jones v. Alfred H. Meyer Co., 392 U.S. 409 (1968)
United States v. Reynolds, 235 U.S. 133 (1914)

THOMAS, CLARENCE (1948–)

Clarence Thomas, the second African American to serve on the Supreme Court of the United States, was born in 1948 in the economically deprived town of Pin Point, Georgia. Abandoned by his father and given up by his mother, Thomas was raised by his maternal grandparents in a segregated society. Through hard work, sacrifice, and sheer force of will—his own and that of his grandfather—he graduated with honors from the College of the Holy Cross in Worcester, Massachusetts, and then from Yale Law School in New Haven, Connecticut. He held a number of government posts prior to being appointed in 1991—after a bitter confirmation battle—to the nation’s highest court, including the chairmanship of the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Justice Thomas is most famous for his civil rights opinions, especially those criticizing affirmative action. He has written a number of important civil liberties opinions as well.

Justice Thomas’s most significant free speech opinion is almost certainly his concurring opinion in the 1996 commercial speech case 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. State of Rhode Island (517 U.S. 484, 1996), in which he called for the abandonment of the distinction in the level of judicial protection afforded to commercial and noncommercial speech. He wrote: “Nor do I believe that the only explanations that the Court has ever advanced for treating ‘commercial’ speech differently from other speech can justify restricting ‘commercial’ speech in order to keep information from legal purchasers so as to thwart what would otherwise be their choices in the marketplace.” Thomas reiterated his call for increased judicial protection of commercial speech in three subsequent cases: Glickman v. Wileman Bros. & Elliot (1997), Greater New Orleans Broadcasting Association v. United States (1999), and Lorillard Tobacco Company v. Reilly (2001). No other member of the Court has concurred in his reasoning.

Justice Thomas has taken an equally dramatic position in three cases involving political speech. In Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission (1996), Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government PAC (2000), and Federal Election Commission v. Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee (2001), he called, in a series of dissenting and concurring opinions, for the overruling of Buckley v. Valeo (424 U.S. 1, 1976), the landmark Burger Court decision that, among other things, upheld Federal Election Campaign Act provisions limiting contributions by individuals to any single candidate for federal office. He insists that Buckley was a “flawed decision” riddled with “analytic fallacies” and that it was inconsistent with the framers’ position that political speech is the “primary object” of First Amendment protection.

As Justice Thomas’s political speech opinions make plain, he is not afraid to call for the overruling of precedent. His one-paragraph concurring opinion in Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel (524 U.S. 498, 1998) is further proof. In that case Thomas joined the controlling opinion of the Court that the federal statute in question effected an unconstitutional taking. He wrote separately to suggest that the case could have been decided on the basis of the ex post facto clause because that clause should be applied in the civil context and not simply the criminal context. Calder v. Bull, which was decided in 1798 and was one of the early Court’s most important decisions, limited the clause to the criminal context, but Justice Thomas stated that he would be willing to overrule the more than two-hundred-year-old precedent.

The justice also has written powerful opinions in the areas of religious freedom and abortion. For example, he joined the Court’s opinion in Rosenberger v. University of Virginia (515 U.S. 819, 1995) striking down a state university’s policy that forbade student activities fees from being used to fund student groups engaged in religious activities. He wrote separately to make clear that, in light of his reading of history, the establishment clause of the First Amendment only forbids direct government aid to a favored religion.

With respect to abortion, Justice Thomas penned a strong dissent in the “partial birth” abortion case Stenberg v. Carhart (530 U.S. 914, 2000). He called that procedure “infanticide” and declared that Roe v. Wade (1973), the Burger Court’s polarizing abortion decision, was “grievously wrong.”

Justice Thomas was the most conservative member of the Rehnquist Court, and all of his major civil liberties opinions during his ten-plus years of service have generated strong reaction from other members of the Court, scholars, interest groups, and the press. However, his most controversial opinion was issued during his first term. The case, Hudson v. McMillian (1992), found the Court holding that a prisoner need not always suffer a “significant” injury to prevail on an Eighth Amendment’s cruel and unusual punishments claim. The justice did more than disagree with the Court’s conclusion: He spent eleven pages in the U.S. Reports explaining why, as a matter of constitutional text and history, the Eighth Amendment does not apply at all to the conditions of a prisoner’s confinement.

If one relied solely upon what his critics said that Thomas said in his Hudson dissent, one might be left with the impression that the justice would have personally taken a few swings at the prisoner in question if he had been in the room when the guards assaulted him. Nothing could be further from the truth. Thomas condemned the mistreatment of prisoners in the strongest possible terms. He simply argued that state law and perhaps other provisions of the federal Constitution were where prisoners should turn for redress.

More recently, some commentators have begun to take seriously Justice Thomas's contributions to civil liberties jurisprudence. For example, famed liberal columnist and First Amendment icon Nat Hentoff, who had proclaimed during the justice's early years on the Court that "no new justice has ever done so much damage so quickly," now maintains that he is the Court's staunchest defender of the freedom of speech.

The vast majority of the justice's civil liberties opinions have been concurring and dissenting opinions. However, he has begun to persuade some of his colleagues on the Court, as he also has done with at least some of his former critics, of the power of his vision of the Constitution's civil liberties guarantees. Justice Thomas is still a relatively young Supreme Court justice and only time will tell how much he can shape this fundamental area of American law.

SCOTT D. GERBER

References and Further Reading

- Gerber, Scott Douglas. First Principles: The Jurisprudence of Clarence Thomas. New York: New York University Press, 1999; expanded edition, 2002.
- Hentoff, Nat. "First Friend: Justice Clarence Thomas Has Written as Ardently in Defense of Free Speech as Liberal Icon William Brennan, Jr. Ever Did." Legal Times, 3 (July 2000): 62.

THORNBURGH v. ABBOTT, 490 U.S. 401 (1989)

For prisoners, the 1987–1989 period represented a watershed: the Supreme Court decided three cases—Turner v. Safley (482 U.S. 78, 1987), O'Lone v. Estate of Chabazz (482 U.S. 342, 1987), and Thornburgh v. Abbott (1989)—each of which employed a reasonableness test ill equipped to protect prisoners' First Amendment rights. Thornburgh, the last of the Turner trilogy of First Amendment cases, addressed prisoners' rights to receive publications prepared by and directly mailed from the civilian community. The Thornburgh plaintiffs challenged Federal Bureau of Prisons rules that permitted wardens to reject an entire publication if they found it "detrimental to the security, discipline, or good order of the institution or if it might facilitate criminal activity." The rules contained two caveats: (1) a publication could not be rejected "solely because its content is religious, philosophical, political, social or sexual or because its content is unpopular or repugnant"; and (2) rejection triggered procedural safeguards.

In upholding the censorship rules, the Court applied the test first used in Turner v. Safley ("the Turner test"). This lax, deferential test uses the lowest degree of scrutiny by inquiring whether the rule or practice is "reasonably related to legitimate penological interests." Moreover, the test assumes the rule or practice is reasonable. The Thornburgh Court concluded the challenged rules satisfied the Turner test after it balanced four factors that bring the reasonableness standard into operation. First, the censorship rules were "rationally related" to "the legitimate objectives of prison security, order and discipline." Second, the availability of other publications provided an alternative means of free speech. Third, accommodating the asserted right to receive publications detrimental to safety would impair the rights of others. Finally, no "obvious, easy alternatives" to the challenged censorship rules existed at a "de minimis" cost.

The Thornburgh Court insisted that the "reasonableness standard is not toothless." In this regard, the majority opinion stressed that the Federal Bureau of Prisons rules in question required an individualized determination by the warden whether the publication constitutes "an intolerable risk of disorder ... [in] a particular prison at a particular time." The dissent thought differently, calling the test "a 'manipulable' reasonableness standard ... that too easily may be interpreted to authorize arbitrary rejections of literature addressed to inmates." Commentators largely agreed with the dissent. Application of the Turner/Thornburgh reasonableness standard by the federal courts of appeal has shown that its "teeth" are actually "false teeth" that can be effectively worn if the court so chooses.

JAMES E. ROBERTSON

References and Further Reading

- Frankel, Geoffrey S., Untangling First Amendment Values: The Prisoners' Dilemma, George Washington Law Review 59 (August 1991): 1614–1646.
- Kuby, Ronald, and William M. Kunstler, Silencing the Oppressed: No Freedom of Speech for Those Behind the Walls, Creighton Law Review 26 (June 1993): 1005–1025.
- Levine, Samuel J., Restricting the Right of Correspondence in the Prison Context: Thornburgh v. Abbott and Its Progeny, Fordham Intellectual Property, Media and Entertainment Law 4 (March 1994): 891–927.
- Mannetta, Jennifer A. "The Proper Approach to Prison Mail Regulations: Standards of Review." New England Journal on Criminal and Civil Confinement 24 (Winter 1998): 209–248.

Mushlin, Michael B. Rights of Prisoners, 3rd ed., vol. 1. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002.
The Supreme Court, 1988 Term—Leading Cases, Harvard Law Review 103 (November 1989): 137, 239–249.

Cases and Statutes Cited

O'Lone v. Estate of Chabazz, 482 U.S. 342 (1987)
Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)

See also Abortion; Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Services, 462 U.S. 416 (1983); O'Lone v. Estate of Chabazz, 482 U.S. 342 (1987); Prisoners and Freedom of Speech; Reproductive Freedom; Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)

THORNBURGH v. AMERICAN COLLEGE OF OBSTETRICIANS AND GYNECOLOGISTS, 476 U.S. 747 (1986)

After the decision in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), there were a myriad of legislative responses to Roe's holding that the right of privacy encompasses a woman's right to decide whether to terminate her pregnancy. In these responses the states were attempting to determine which restrictions on or regulations of abortion were constitutionally valid. In 1982, the Pennsylvania Legislature enacted the abortion legislation that is the subject of Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists. The plaintiffs, a variety of groups and persons interested in limiting restrictions on abortions, brought suit to enjoin the enforcement of the act.

Five members of the Court, with four dissenting, held that the six statutory provisions at issue were unconstitutional. In doing so the Court reaffirmed its holdings in Roe v. Wade and Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc. v. City of Akron (462 U.S. 416, 1983). The state of Pennsylvania defended the statutory provisions on the ground that, as allowed by these cases, the provisions were designed to protect maternal health and/or potential life. The Court, however, found that under the guise of protecting maternal health and potential life the state was attempting to intimidate women into continuing their pregnancies and such is not allowed by the Constitution.

The first two provisions that the Court invalidated concerned the giving of informed consent after the woman was provided with a variety of printed materials. The Court explained that the requirement that a woman's consent be voluntary and informed is proper and constitutional, but the state may not require the delivery of information designed to influence the woman's choice between abortion and childbirth.

The information that the Pennsylvania statute required to be given was designed to do this and therefore was unconstitutional.

The third and fourth provisions required that a physician report the basis for his determination that a fetus is not viable. The required report was to be detailed and to include personal information regarding the woman. The Court indicated that record-keeping and reporting designed to preserve maternal health is acceptable; however, the Pennsylvania statute went far beyond this goal. The Court felt that with such a provision in place a woman would be more reluctant to obtain an abortion because her identity might become public knowledge. Such a burden on the woman's right to choose is unacceptable.

The fifth provision set forth two independent requirements for postviability abortions. The first requirement demanded that a physician exercise the degree of care that he or she would be required to exercise if delivering a child as opposed to aborting it. The second requirement mandates that a physician use an abortion technique that provides the best opportunity for the unborn child to be aborted alive, unless such a technique would present a significantly greater medical risk to the pregnant woman. The Court invalidated both requirements because they required a trade-off between the woman's health and fetal survival and failed to require that the health of the pregnant woman be the physician's prime consideration.

Finally, the sixth provision required that a second physician be present during an abortion if there was a possibility that the unborn child could be viable. The second physician was to take control of the child and try to preserve the child's life and health. The Court found the provision to be unconstitutional because it did not contain an express or implied exception for situations when the woman's health was endangered by delay in the arrival of the second physician.

JANET W. STEVERSON

Cases and Statutes Cited

Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc. v. City of Akron, 462 U.S. 416 (1983)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

See also Abortion; Privacy

THREATS AND FREE SPEECH

Few areas of First Amendment law illustrate the importance of context as well as that of threatening statements. The rule is straightforward: There is no First Amendment protection for threats, a classic example of an exception to the general rule of free speech. However, an alleged threat must be looked at in context to determine whether it is a “true” threat or just hyperbole, which is not excepted from free speech protection. In Watts v. United States, 394 U.S. 705 (1969), a speaker at an antiwar rally on the Washington Monument grounds, after noting his 1-A draft classification, said, “If they ever make me carry a rifle, the first man I want to get in my sights is LBJ.” A jury found this statement to threaten President Lyndon B. Johnson. The Supreme Court overturned the conviction, saying that, viewed in context, the statement was not a threat but a “crude, offensive” yet protected political statement.

The Supreme Court has also ruled that speech intended to have a coercive impact, such as urging a boycott, is protected speech and not a threat, even if it creates an uncomfortable or menacing environment (NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware, 458 U.S. 886, 1982). Thus, an anti-abortion group that asserts that there will be divine retribution for those who engage in abortion is speaking words protected by the First Amendment, as it is when it refuses to condemn the murder of abortion providers by people unaffiliated with their group. However, urging specific acts of violence against abortion providers or making statements that indicate approval of such acts and encouraging more of them in the future (noting possible targets) probably would be considered a threat and unprotected speech (see Planned Parenthood v. American Coalition of Life Activists, 244 F.3d 1007, 2001).

When political causes are involved, robust debate will be allowed notwithstanding the discomfort it may cause those who are verbally attacked or a more dispassionate audience. The policy is easily understood. Unless the threat exception to free speech is rigorously limited to direct and credible threats against specific targets, the exception could fairly easily become a convenient vehicle for prohibition of unpopular views under the guise of public protection or a justification for government punishment of strongly expressed unpopular opinions.

Conversely, no legitimate free speech purpose would be advanced by giving true threats—statements advocating imminent illegal conduct—First Amendment protection. True threats “encompass those statements where the speaker means to communicate a serious expression of an intent to commit an act of unlawful violence to a particular individual or group of individuals” (Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343, 2003). In that case, the Supreme Court held that burning a cross constituted a true threat only when it could be shown that the burning was “used to intimidate.”

Relatively mild words may be considered threatening in a particular context. For example, an employer’s comments that unionization of its work force may cause the plant to close, in the context of an election to unionize, may be ruled a threat. The key to determining whether a true threat has been made is to focus on the question: “What did the speaker intend and the listener understand?” (NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 1969). It is not the literal meaning of the words but their context that is paramount.

GERALD J. THAIN

References and Further Reading

NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware, 458 U.S. 886 (1982).
NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969).
Planned Parenthood v. American Coalition of Life Activists, 244 F.3d 1007 (9th Cir. 2001).
Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343 (2003).
Watts v. United States, 394 U.S. 705 (1969).

THREE STRIKES/PROPORTIONALITY

In the early 1990s, growing public unease over high crime rates in the United States led many jurisdictions to adopt “three strikes” provisions targeting serious habitual offenders. Although sentencing enhancements for repeat offenders have been on the books throughout U.S. history, the new provisions were more comprehensive, prohibiting plea bargaining in almost all circumstances, imposing harsh mandatory minimum sentences, and eliminating probation and parole for certain repeat offenders. Three strikes laws vary considerably by jurisdiction, but the basic idea is that lengthy incarceration of offenders with one or more serious felony convictions removes from the population those individuals most likely to commit serious crimes in the future. By the mid-nineties, all fifty states and the federal government had some form of habitual offender statute. The most familiar provision was enacted in California in 1994 in the wake of two high-profile murders perpetrated by recidivist offenders. Although California’s three strikes law is harsher than most, the controversy over its constitutionality, effectiveness, and fairness has largely shaped the national debate over contemporary habitual offender provisions.

Constitutionality

The most significant constitutional challenge to three strikes provisions arises under the Eighth Amendment prohibition against “cruel and unusual punishments.” Opponents of three strikes note that the harsh sentences imposed for an ordinary third felony will often be disproportionate to the gravity of that offense. For example, in Lockyer v. Andrade (538 U.S. 63, 2003), decided by the Supreme Court in 2003, the defendant’s “third strike” was the theft of approximately $150 in videotapes from two Kmart stores. Because Andrade had previously been convicted of transporting marijuana and of various theft offenses, he was prosecuted under California’s three strikes law and sentenced to two consecutive terms of twenty-five years to life in prison. After serving a mandatory minimum of fifty years, Andrade would become eligible for parole at the age of eighty-seven.

In affirming Andrade’s sentence, the Court reviewed and clarified the proportionality dimension of its Eighth Amendment jurisprudence. In Weems v. United States (217 U.S. 349, 1910), the Court invalidated a sentence of fifteen years at hard labor for an offender who falsified a public document, observing that “it is a precept of justice that punishment for crime should be graduated and proportioned to desert.” In subsequent cases, the Court emphasized that reviewing courts should grant substantial deference to legislative authority and judicial discretion in setting criminal punishments. As a result, “successful challenges to the proportionality of particular sentences [should be] exceedingly rare.”

Thus, in Rummel v. Estelle (445 U.S. 263, 1980), the Court rejected a challenge to a repeat offender statute that resulted in a mandatory life sentence for a third felony fraud conviction. Among other things, the Court noted, the defendant would be eligible for parole in twelve years. In Solem v. Helm (463 U.S. 277, 1983), however, the Court invalidated a habitual offender provision that resulted in a life sentence without the possibility of parole for a nonviolent repeat offender convicted of check fraud. The Court identified three criteria relevant to its analysis: (1) the gravity of the offense and the harshness of the penalty; (2) the sentences imposed on other offenders in the same jurisdiction; and (3) the sentences imposed for similar offenses in other jurisdictions. Acknowledging that “a State is justified in punishing a recidivist more severely than it punishes a first offender,” the Court noted that a life sentence was “the most severe punishment the State could have imposed on any criminal for any crime.” Moreover, the defendant “could not have received such a severe sentence in 48 of the 50 States.”

In Harmelin v. Michigan (501 U.S. 957, 1991), the Court upheld a mandatory life sentence without the possibility of parole for possession of 672 grams of cocaine. Although the justices could not agree on a single rationale, a majority of the Court effectively repudiated Solem’s three-part proportionality test. In a concurring opinion, Justice Anthony Kennedy argued that because the Eighth Amendment does not require strict proportionality between crime and sentence, reviewing courts should only make intra- and interjurisdictional comparisons after a threshold finding of “gross disproportionality.” In Andrade, the Court adopted Kennedy’s modified proportionality test and declined to compare Andrade’s sentence to those for other offenses in California or for similar offenses in other jurisdictions. Instead, invoking the principle of deference to state legislative and judicial decision making, the Court observed that Andrade’s life sentence, which included the possibility of parole after fifty years, represented a reasonable interpretation of the Court’s proportionality standard as set forth in Rummel and Solem. Under this extremely deferential standard, “the gross proportionality principle reserves a constitutional violation for only the extraordinary case.”

Policy Considerations

Even if three strikes provisions do not violate the Constitution, their effectiveness remains a source of heated controversy. Proponents point to plummeting violent crime rates in California following enactment of three strikes and conclude that it has achieved the goal of crime reduction. Critics, however, note that crime rates began falling before enactment of three strikes and that rates have not dropped more dramatically in California than in jurisdictions with milder sentencing provisions. In response to critics who contend that the high cost of incarcerating recidivists places a strain on the state budget, proponents maintain that these costs are easily offset by the economic and social gains associated with crime reduction.

Apart from these practical considerations, critics of three strikes argue that it is simply unfair to punish relatively minor felonies as severely as murder, rape, or kidnapping. In response, proponents point to greater selectivity in the application of three strikes laws to only the most deserving offenders. Thus, though support for three strikes remains strong—California voters turned back an effort to repeal the law in 2004—prosecutors have indeed become more selective in applying the law, largely reserving it for violent offenders with substantial criminal records. While this approach responds to the felt need for effective responses to violent crime and the traditional commitment to proportionality, critics contend that it allows too much discretion for prosecutors and results in wide sentencing disparities within a single jurisdiction.

MARY SIGLER

References and Further Reading

- Ardaiz, James A., California's Three Strikes Laws: History, Expectations, Consequences, McGeorge Law Review 32 (Fall 2000): 1–36.
- Luna, Eric, Foreword: Three Strikes in a Nutshell, Thomas Jefferson Law Review 20 (Spring 1998): 1–89.
- Marion, Samara, Justice by Geography? A Study of San Diego County's Three Strikes Sentencing Practices from July–December 1996, Stanford Law and Policy Review 11 (Winter 1999): 29–47.
- Tonry, Michael. Thinking about Crime. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Harmelin v. Michigan*, 501 U.S. 957 (1991)
- Lockyer v. Andrade*, 538 U.S. 63 (2003)
- Rummel v. Estelle*, 445 U.S. 263 (1980)
- Solem v. Helm*, 463 U.S. 277 (1983)
- Weems v. United States*, 217 U.S. 349 (1910)
- California Penal Code §§ 667, 1170.12 (West 1999 & Supp. 2000)

See also Cruel and Unusual Punishment (VIII); Mandatory Minimum Sentences; Proportionality Reviews

TIBBS v. FLORIDA, 457 U.S. 31 (1982)

In Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1 (1978), the Supreme Court held that if an appellate court determined that there was insufficient evidence to sustain a conviction, the conviction could be reversed and the defendant could not be retried due to the double jeopardy clause.

In 1974, Florida indicted Delbert Tibbs for first-degree murder, felony murder, and rape. At trial, many issues were raised regarding the accuracy and truthfulness of the state's only witness, Cynthia Nadeau. Nadeau admitted to using drugs just before the crimes occurred. She was also confused on the time of day the crimes occurred. The jury, nonetheless, convicted Tibbs. On appeal, the Florida Supreme Court found many weaknesses in the state's case and called for a retrial. The trial court then dismissed the indictment due to the double jeopardy clause. The Florida Supreme Court discussed the distinction between insufficient evidence and weight of evidence. A reversal of conviction based on the weight of evidence "does not mean that acquittal was the only proper verdict. Instead, the appellate court sits as a 'thirteenth juror' and disagrees with the jury's resolution of the conflicting testimony." Therefore, a retrial was permitted under the double jeopardy clause.

The Supreme Court upheld the Florida Supreme Court, distinguishing between a retrial based on a weighing of the evidence and an appellate court finding that a defendant is not guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. A retrial is permitted only when the reviewing court has not made an independent determination that the evidence does not support a finding of guilt.

KIRK L. KIMBER

Cases and Statutes Cited

Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1 (1978)

See also Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1 (1978); Double Jeopardy: Modern History

TILESTON v. ULLMAN, 318 U.S. 44 (1943)

In the 1920s and 1930s, birth control advocates worked unsuccessfully to repeal a Connecticut law banning the use of contraceptives and prohibiting doctors from giving assistance or counsel in their use. In 1940, the state supreme court rejected their legal challenge to the law in State v. Nelson (126 Conn. 412, 11 A.2d 856, 1940), which resulted in the closing of the few birth control clinics that had been opened briefly in the state.

Shortly after that loss, the advocates recruited Wilder Tileston, a quiet sixty-five-year-old Yale Medical School professor and private practitioner in New Haven, to help them with another lawsuit. Tileston found three patients for whom pregnancy would be very harmful or even fatal. Without naming the patients as parties, Tileston's lawyers filed suit in state court. They named as the defendant New Haven County State's Attorney Abraham S. Ullman. Tileston's complaint argued that the state law violated the Connecticut Constitution and the U.S. Constitution, including the Fourteenth Amendment, by depriving Tileston's patients of "life" without due process of law and by depriving Tileston of "property"—the privilege of practicing his profession as a doctor—without due process. The Connecticut Supreme Court, in a three-to-two decision, rejected Tileston's claims and advised that his patients abstain altogether from sex in order to avoid harmful pregnancy.

As the case reached the Supreme Court for oral argument in January 1943, the only claim under consideration was the one based on the danger the Connecticut law posed to Tileston's patients. At oral argument, the justices were immediately skeptical of the likelihood of enforcement against Tileston's patients and of Tileston's attempt to defend the putative constitutional rights of his patients. Very little of the oral argument even addressed the substance of Tileston's appeal.

The Supreme Court unanimously dismissed the appeal on February 1, 1943, concluding that Tileston had no standing to assert the rights of his patients. In its very brief per curiam opinion, the Supreme Court noted that there were "no allegations asserting any claim under the Fourteenth Amendment of infringement of appellant's liberty or his property rights." The only basis for the Fourteenth Amendment claim was the law's threat to the life of Tileston's patients, obviously not to Tileston's life. Thus, the Court did not address the merits of Tileston's substantive due process claim.

After this defeat, birth control advocates in Connecticut continued for the next twenty-two years to urge the state legislature to repeal the anticontraceptives law. But the state legislature, disproportionately controlled by representatives from rural and heavily Catholic districts, rebuffed these attempts. Birth control advocates would also try again in the courts, reaching the Supreme Court in 1961 in Poe v. Ullman (367 U.S. 497, 1961) where they would once again lose on technical grounds.

Finally, in 1965, the Supreme Court heard the constitutional merits of their complaint against the Connecticut law in Griswold v. Connecticut (381 U.S. 479, 1965). In that decision, the Court held that the Connecticut law was indeed unconstitutional as a violation of the right to privacy.

DALE CARPENTER

References and Further Reading

Garrow, David J. Liberty & Sexuality: The Right to Privacy and the Making of Roe v. Wade. New York: Macmillan, 1994, pp. 94–105.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961)
State v. Nelson, 126 Conn. 412, 11 A.2d 856 (1940)
Tileston v. Ullman, 129 Conn. 84, 26 A.2d 582 (1942)

See also Due Process; Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961); Reproductive Rights

TILTON v. RICHARDSON, 403 U.S. 672 (1971)

On numerous occasions the Supreme Court has addressed the constitutionality of government assistance to religious elementary and secondary schools. Less frequently litigated has been the constitutionality of assistance to religious colleges and other institutions of higher education. Tilton v. Richardson is the first of three cases where a closely divided Court struggled with the issue, concluding in each instance that the assistance in question did not violate the First Amendment.

In Tilton, the point of contention was federal legislation providing for building construction grants to institutions of higher education. Public and private colleges were eligible, as were secular and religiously affiliated institutions. However, religious institutions became ineligible if any part of a building was used for sectarian instruction or worship. These restrictions remained for twenty years.

Federal taxpayers sued, alleging violations of the establishment and free exercise clauses. They challenged grants to four Roman Catholic colleges to construct a music and drama building, science building, language laboratory, and two libraries. A four-justice plurality of the Court held that the assistance was in most respects constitutional. A fifth and deciding vote was supplied by Justice Byron White, who concurred separately.

The Tilton plurality followed the analysis in Lemon v. Kurtzman (403 U.S. 602, 1971), decided the same day. Congress's aim in expanding opportunities for students regardless of where they attended college was deemed an appropriate secular purpose. The plurality found that church-related colleges were less permeated with religion than were K through 12 schools, and college students were more critically minded and less subject to religious indoctrination. Furthermore, the assistance was a one-time, single-purpose event, and academic buildings were religiously neutral aid. However, the twenty-year restriction was shorter than a building's useful life. To prevent later diversion of the aid to an inherently religious use, the plurality required that the restriction remain over the life of the facility. In all other respects the establishment clause was not violated.

Plaintiffs also claimed that their federal taxes, a small part of which were appropriated to support higher education including religious colleges, caused them to suffer coercion in violation of the free exercise clause. However, because there was no evidence of how the tax burdened plaintiffs' exercise of religion—central to a prima facie case—the plurality held that the action failed to state a claim under the free exercise clause.

The striking down of the twenty-year provision—while only a small and severable part of the overall legislation—was the first occasion for the Court to overturn a federal law as one contrary to the establishment clause. The Court faced two subsequent challenges involving aid to religious colleges. In Hunt v. McNair (413 U.S. 734, 1973), the Court upheld the issuance of tax-exempt revenue bonds for college buildings. The Court in Roemer v. Maryland Board of Public Works (426 U.S. 736, 1976; plurality opinion) sustained issuance of general educational grants to private colleges. Accordingly, Tilton helped set a pattern, not broken until the end of the century, in which the Court overturned most forms of direct aid to religious K through 12 schools while upholding assistance to religious colleges and universities.

CARL H. ESBECK

Cases and Statutes Cited

Hunt v. McNair, 413 U.S. 734 (1973)

Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)

Roemer v. Maryland Board of Public Works, 426 U.S. 736 (1976) (plurality opinion)

See also Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; State Aid to Religious Schools; Taxpayer Standing to Challenge Establishment Clause Violations

TIME, INC. v. HILL, 385 U.S. 374 (1967)

Escaped convicts took the Hill family hostage in their home but later released them unharmed. Subsequently, a novel was written depicting considerable violence. The novel was made into a play and Life magazine (a subdivision of Time) wrote a story about the play, complete with pictures from scenes staged in the former Hill home, suggesting that the play was an accurate reenactment. N.Y. Civil Rights §§ 50-51 provide for liability when the name or portrait of a living person is used for advertising purposes without consent. Under the statute, the New York courts granted the family damages for a false portrayal of an experience they never suffered. Time, Inc. claimed that the courts' application of the statute denied it constitutional rights to freedom of speech and press.

On appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court, per Justice Brennan, held that absent proof that the publisher knew of the falsities or acted in reckless disregard of the truth, no liability would attach. The dissent argued that a weaker standard should suffice to satisfy constitutional protections. The significance of the case is that it expanded the discussion of privacy into the constitutional arena, although it did not elevate it above freedom of speech or the press. Also, it extended the New York Times v. Sullivan (376 U.S. 254, 1964) malice standard, which had previously only been applied in defamation cases. A further interesting historical footnote was that Richard Nixon was the attorney representing the Hill family in the Supreme Court.

VINCENT J. SAMAR

References and Further Reading

Keck, Matthew C., Cookies, the Constitution and the Common Law: A Framework for the Right of Privacy on the Internet, Alb. L. J. Sci. & Tech. 13 (2002): 83.

Stohl, Matthew, False Light Invasion of Privacy in Docudramas: The Oxymoron which Must Be Solved, Akron L. Rev. 35 (2002): 251.

Cases and Statutes Cited

New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)

TIME, PLACE, AND MANNER RULE

The First Amendment's guarantee of free speech means that the government, with very few exceptions, cannot restrict speech because of its content. The Supreme Court, however, has frequently held that reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions on speech are permissible. As the term suggests, such restrictions regulate when, where, and how speech occurs to minimize interference with important state interests. Such restrictions are valid if they are content neutral, serve a significant government interest, are narrowly tailored, and leave open adequate alternatives for expression.

The Court's time, place, and manner analysis is most commonly associated with the "public forum" doctrine, where the Court has often stressed that even within traditional public forums the state can impose reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions on speech. For example, in Ward v. Rock against Racism (491 U.S. 781, 1989), the Court held that New York City could require use of city-provided sound systems and technicians for concerts in Central Park to protect nearby residential privacy. Other time, place, and manner restrictions upheld by the Court have included restrictions on picketing on sidewalks adjacent to schools, restrictions on distributing literature or soliciting funds at a state fair, creation of a buffer zone around an abortion clinic, and restrictions on placing campaign signs on public utility poles.

The Court's use of the time, place, and manner test is an appropriate balance between the rights of free speech and important state interests. By requiring that ample means of expression are available, the test permits restrictions that impose relatively minor burdens on speech while invalidating restrictions that are overly suppressive. Most importantly, the test requires that restrictions be content neutral, thus guarding against restrictions designed to distort debate or punish unfavorable views.

MARK W. CORDES

References and Further Reading

Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. 2nd ed. New York: Aspen Law & Business, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Ward v. Rock against Racism, 491 U.S. 781 (1989)

TINKER v. DES MOINES SCHOOL DISTRICT, 393 U.S. 503 (1969)

Tinker represents the Supreme Court's broadest and most definitive opinion recognizing free speech rights for students in public schools below the university level. The case arose when three students were suspended from public junior high and high schools for wearing black armbands to protest the Vietnam War. In a strongly worded seven-to-two opinion, the Court held that the suspensions violated the students' First Amendment free speech rights. The Court held that wearing armbands to symbolically express antiwar views is akin to "pure speech," and therefore entitled to "comprehensive" First Amendment protection.

The major significance of the case is the Court's extension of comprehensive First Amendment protection to students who expressed their views at school during the school day. According to the Court, students at a public school possess many of the same free speech rights as adults, so long as they exercise those rights in a nondisruptive manner. The most famous quote from the Court's majority opinion underscores this point: "It can hardly be argued that either students or teachers shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate." This view of the First Amendment also informed the Court's antiauthoritarian view of the general relationship between students and their schools in a state-operated school system:

In our system, students may not be regarded as closed-circuit recipients of only that which the State chooses to communicate. They may not be confined to the expression of those sentiments that are officially approved. In the absence of a specific showing of constitutionally valid reasons to regulate their speech, students are entitled to freedom of expression of their views.

The Court acknowledged some limits on student free speech. The key limitation is that the student speech may not "substantially interfere with the work of the school or impinge upon the rights of other students." The Court was careful to emphasize, however, that school authorities may not rely on an "undifferentiated fear or apprehension of disturbance" to overcome the students' right of free speech. According to Tinker, student speech cannot be suppressed simply because the speech is controversial and may instigate a verbal response from other students.

In recent years the Court has retreated somewhat from the strong free speech protection announced in Tinker. Later cases limit the Tinker rule in two important ways. First, in Bethel School District v. Fraser (478 U.S. 675, 1968), the Court upheld the authority of public school officials to sanction students who engage in what the officials deem "vulgar" expression. Second, in Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier (484 U.S. 260, 1988), the Court held that school authorities can regulate student speech when necessary to pursue legitimate educational objectives. In that case the public school authorities were allowed to dictate the content of student contributions to the school newspaper.

The more important aspect of both cases is the Court's retreat from the broad principles of student speech articulated in Tinker. In contrast to statements made in Tinker, the Court expressed the opinion in Fraser that the First Amendment rights of students in the public schools "are not automatically coextensive with the rights of adults in other settings." Some commentators have argued that statements such as these cut the heart out of Tinker, although that decision continues to be cited as the definitive statement of student free speech rights when the speech occurs outside the official curriculum and does not include vulgar or obscene statements.

STEVEN G. GEY

References and Further Reading

Abrams, J. Marc, and S. Mark Goodman, End of an Era? The Decline of Student Press Rights in the Wake of Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, Duke L. J. (1988): 706.

Ingber, Stanley, Socialization, Indoctrination, or the "Pall of Orthodoxy": Value Training in the Public Schools, U. Ill. L. Rev. (1987): 15.

Nahmod, Sheldon H., Beyond Tinker: The High School as an Educational Public Forum, Harv. C.R.-C.L. L. Rev. 5 (1970): 278.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bethel School Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675 (1986)
Hazelwood School Dist. v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988)

See also Academic Freedom; Bethel School District v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675 (1986); Campus Hate Speech Codes; Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988); Student Speech in Public Schools; Teacher Speech in Public Schools; Urofsky v. Gilmore, 216 F. 3d 401 (4th Cir. 2001)

TITLE VII AND RELIGIOUS EXEMPTIONS

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 was, and still is, an epic piece of legislation. Each of its chapters acts to protect victims of discrimination, although in different ways. Title II, for example, makes it illegal for places of public accommodation (like hotels, restaurants, and movie theaters) to discriminate on the basis of race, color, religion, and national origin; Title III prohibits the same sort of discrimination in public facilities run by state or local government (like courthouses or jails).

Title VII, known to lawyers as 42 U.S.C. § 2000e, was a pivotal part of the act. It broadly prohibits discrimination in public and private employment on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, and national origin. Employers that hire, fire, or harass people based on these criteria can face lawsuits by victims, as well as prosecution by the Department of Justice and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Title VII, however, does not apply across the board to all employers. It does not apply at all to foreign employers or employers with fewer than fifteen employees. Most significantly for our purposes, it does not apply fully to religious employers. While Title VII does bar religious employers from discriminating on the basis of race, sex, or national origin, it exempts religious employers from the ban on religious discrimination. Religious employers are therefore free to choose their employees along religious lines.

We turn now to the scope of the exemption, where two questions loom particularly large. First, to what types of employees does it apply? Does it apply only to a church's selection of ministers or does it apply more broadly to any personnel of a church? Second, to what types of employers does it apply? It certainly applies to churches and other similar religious bodies, but does it also apply to nonprofit corporations loosely affiliated with those churches? What about for-profit corporations that want to take a religious attitude?

The first question has been definitively answered. The original 1964 act exempted religious employers only for employee positions that were religious. A church could use religious criteria in selecting a minister, but not in selecting a janitor. That, however, changed in 1972, when the act was amended to broaden the exemption. As a result of the change, religious employers are now free to use religious criteria in making employment decisions for all employees. This decision sparked some controversy. It was largely accepted that religious organizations needed the ability to choose their leaders. That was part and parcel of their right to exercise their religion freely. But giving them the right to use religious tests for all positions seemed to pit the religious liberty of religious organizations against the religious liberty of their run-of-the-mill employees, like janitors or secretaries, whose day-to-day duties were mostly secular. These arguments came before the Supreme Court in 1987, in Corporation of Presiding Bishop v. Amos (483 U.S. 327) when the 1972 exemption was challenged as violating the establishment clause. The Court unanimously upheld the broadened exemption. As a result, religious employers now can use religious criteria in choosing personnel, regardless of their station.

The second question is much more unclear. Under Title VII, an employer is entitled to the religious exemption if it can show it is a "religious corporation, association, educational institution, or society." What that means, however, is somewhat uncertain. On one hand, traditional religious organizations—churches, for example—are certainly exempt. On the other hand, for-profit corporations surely cannot escape religious discrimination suits by suddenly claiming to be exempt religious employers. Ultimately, the key issue courts examine is whether the purpose and character of the organization are really religious in nature. Churches, synagogues, and other traditional religious organizations are clearly religious and therefore exempt. Exempt also are subsidiaries of such organizations, provided the subsidiaries are owned, operated by, or closely affiliated with the parent religious organization. Thus, organizations closely related to the Catholic Church or the Salvation Army will likely be considered exempt religious employers, even if their work is considered secular to some. However, organizations that were not founded for religious purposes or that have mostly secular functions are not likely to be exempt. For-profit corporations are also not likely to be exempt.

The religious exemptions to Title VII have taken on renewed importance in recent years. Programs like charitable choice now frequently provide religious organizations with government funds to do social-service work. To many, allowing religious organizations to discriminate using federal funds is morally and constitutionally problematic. Whether this argument will be successful in the courts or the Congress is not yet clear.

One last issue should be flagged. As we have said, Title VII only exempts religious employers from the ban on religious discrimination—not the bans on race or sex discrimination. How then is it possible that many established churches, including the Catholic and Mormon churches, many Protestant denominations, and schools of Judaism, Buddhism, and Islam, ordain only men? Is this not a violation of Title VII? The answer, somewhat surprisingly, is not to be found in Title VII. Instead, the missing piece of the puzzle is what is known as the “ministerial exemption,” which is thought to be constitutional in nature—an offshoot of the free exercise and establishment clauses.

Under this exemption, religious organizations have an absolute right to choose their leaders. Such decisions are not subject to Title VII at all. Thus, a church or synagogue cannot be sued on charges of race, gender, or religious discrimination when choosing its ministers. The scope of the “ministerial” exemption, like the Title VII exemption, is unclear. Certainly clergy qualify, but some cases read the ministerial exemption more broadly, going so far as to protect all those whose duties involve the spreading of religious ideas (such as school teachers or choir directors). One recent Supreme Court case, Boy Scouts of America v. Dale (530 U.S. 640, 2000), suggests perhaps that all nonprofits, religious or not, may have the same right to choose their leaders.

CHRISTOPHER C. LUND

References and Further Reading

- Berg, Thomas C. The State and Religion in a Nutshell. 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: West Publishing Group, 2004.
- Brant, Joanne C., “Our Shield Belongs to the Lord”: Religious Employers and a Constitutional Right to Discriminate, Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 21 (1994): 4: 275–321.
- Green, Steven K., Religious Discrimination, Public Finding, and Constitutional Values, Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 30 (2003): 1:1–55.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Corporation of Presiding Bishop v. Amos*, 483 U.S. 327 (1987)
- Boy Scouts of America v. Dale*, 530 U.S. 640 (2000)
- 42 U.S.C. § 2000e (Title VII)
- 42 U.S.C. § 604a (Charitable Choice)

See also Accommodation of Religion; Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000); Charitable Choice; Corporation of Presiding Bishop v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327 (1987); Discrimination by Religious Entities That Receive Government Funds; Equal Protection Clause and Religious Freedom; Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clause; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Title VII and Religious Exemptions; Unconstitutional Conditions; Zelman v. Simmons–Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

TONY AND SUSAN ALAMO FOUNDATION v. SECRETARY OF LABOR, 471 U.S. 290 (1985)

One important issue under the free exercise clause of the First Amendment has been the question whether the state can regulate the activities of religious organizations. Many, but not all, regulatory statutes provide exemptions from coverage for religious organizations. If no exemption is granted, does the regulation violate the free exercise clause?

One common area of governmental regulation is the employment relationship. The federal Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA), for example, imposes certain minimum wage, overtime, and record-keeping requirements on enterprises engaged in commerce. The FLSA, however, expressly exempts from its coverage employees of religious organizations engaged in the noncommercial, religious work of their employer. But the FLSA does not expressly exempt employees of religious organizations engaged in commercial activities. Moreover, the Department of Labor has consistently interpreted the FLSA to cover such commercial activities so long as they are carried out for a “business purpose.”

In 1985, in Tony and Susan Alamo Foundation v. Secretary of Labor, the United States Supreme Court considered the question whether the FLSA applies to workers engaged in the commercial activities of a religious organization and if so, whether applying the FLSA in this manner violates the free exercise clause. In this case, the Department of Labor had brought suit against the Tony and Susan Alamo Foundation, a nonprofit religious corporation whose articulated purpose was to “establish, conduct and maintain an evangelistic church, and generally to do those things needful for the promotion of Christian faith, virtue and charity.” The Department of Labor claimed that the foundation had violated the minimum wage, overtime, and record-keeping provisions of the FLSA. As part of its work, the foundation operated a wide array of commercial businesses, including hog farms, service stations, restaurants, and retail stores, staffed in large measure by approximately three hundred volunteer “associates,” most of whom had been drug addicts, derelicts, or criminals before their rehabilitation. The associates received no wages, but the foundation did provide them with food, clothing, shelter, and other benefits such as medical care.

The foundation resisted the litigation, arguing that the FLSA did not cover its associates because they were volunteers, not employees, and because these associates were engaged in religious activities exempt from the FLSA. The foundation also argued that application of the FLSA to its activities violated the free exercise clause of the First Amendment.

The U.S. Supreme Court unanimously found that the foundation’s associates were in fact employees since they engaged in the work of the foundation with the expectation of receiving substantial in-kind benefits in exchange for their labor. The Court further found that the associates engaged in commercial activities despite the foundation’s status as a tax-exempt, nonprofit organization. Significant to the Court was the fact that the foundation’s various businesses competed with nonreligious commercial enterprises. If the foundation’s various businesses were allowed to pay substandard wages, the Court concluded, they would have an unfair competitive advantage over their secular competitors. Thus, the Court held that the FLSA applied to the foundation’s associates.

The Court then addressed the constitutional question whether application of the FLSA to the commercial activities of religious organizations could be squared with the free exercise clause. The Court concluded that the FLSA’s minimum wage and overtime pay requirements did not infringe the associates’ free exercise rights because the associates were free to give their wages back to the foundation. Likewise, the Court concluded that the record-keeping requirements that the statute imposed on the foundation were not so onerous as to entangle the government excessively with religion.

In the years since the Supreme Court’s 1961 decision, Congress has continued to refuse to exempt the commercial activities of religious organizations from FLSA coverage while retaining an exemption for their employees engaged in noncommercial activities. At the same, courts have continued to maintain that FLSA coverage of the commercial activities of religious organizations does not violate the free exercise clause.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Bethel, Terry A., Recent Labor Law Decisions of the Supreme Court, Maryland Law Review 45 (1986): 170.
 Gregory, David L., The First Amendment Religion Clauses and Labor and Employment Law in the Supreme Court, 1984 Term, New York Law School Law Review 31 (1986): 1.

See also Accommodations of Religion; Exemptions for Religion Contained in Regulatory Statutes; Fair Labor Standards Act and Religion

TORCASO v. WATKINS, 367 U.S. 488 (1961)

Although Article VI of the U.S. Constitution provides that “no religious Test shall ever be required” for federal office-holding, individual states were not initially prohibited from maintaining religious tests (or professions of faith) as prerequisites to state office. Indeed, in the very early years of the Republic most states required some type of religious test. While the propriety of religious tests was contested and their prevalence eventually waned, many states retained religious tests—even if merely requiring the profession of a “belief in God”—well into the twentieth century. In Torcaso v. Watkins, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down all such state religious tests as unconstitutional under the First Amendment.

After the governor of Maryland appointed Roy Torcaso to the office of notary public, Torcaso went to the county clerk’s office to receive his commission. The clerk requested that he take an oath and subscribe to a declaration of his belief in God, as required by Article 37 of the Declaration of Rights of the Maryland Constitution (“[N]o religious test ought ever to be required as a qualification for any office of profit or trust in this State, other than a declaration of belief in the existence of God”). Torcaso declined to do so, and the clerk therefore refused to issue the commission. Seeking to obtain his commission, Torcaso petitioned for mandamus in Maryland state court against Clayton K. Watkins, clerk of the circuit court for Montgomery County, Maryland. After the Maryland courts refused to find Article 37 in violation of the state or federal constitutions, Torcaso appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. In an opinion by Justice Black, the Court reversed and remanded.

Eliding the issue of whether Article VI applied to state as well as federal offices, the Court held that Maryland’s religious test violated “the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.” Before reaching that conclusion, the Court noted the historical pedigree of religious tests (carried from Europe to the American colonial experience) and also the movement in American law to abolish such tests. On a federal level, Article VI secured the goal of putting people “securely beyond the reach” of religious test oaths, and the First Amendment then provided additional religious freedom. Cantwell v. Connecticut (310 U.S. 296, 1940) and Everson v. Board of Education (330 U.S. 1, 1947) made the First Amendment’s free exercise clause and establishment clause applicable to the states via the Fourteenth Amendment, extending the religious freedom embodied there to state as well as federal government.

The Supreme Court rejected the view of the state courts that Maryland’s religious test could stand because Zorach v. Clauson (343 U.S. 306, 1952) had tempered Everson. Instead, the Court held that Zorach did not “intend to open up the way for government ... to restore the historically and constitutionally discredited policy of probing religious beliefs by test oaths” or limiting public office to individuals with a particular type of religious belief. The Torcaso Court thus held that “neither a State nor the Federal Government can constitutionally force a person ‘to profess a belief or disbelief in any religion.’” The Court then pushed this neutrality principle even farther, stating that government could not pass laws favoring religion over nonreligion or favoring theistic religions over nontheistic religions. (This latter statement led to a famous footnote in which the Court stated that “Buddhism, Taoism, Ethical Culture, Secular Humanism, and others” would qualify as “religions” that do not teach about an existence of God.) Applying this neutrality and lack of favoritism to the case at hand, the Court quickly dispensed with the argument that Torcaso was not harmed by Maryland’s religious test because he was not compelled to hold office; the Court countered that a lack of compulsion was no excuse for barring Torcaso by state-imposed, constitutionally impermissible criteria.

Torcaso did not state which part of the religion clause was violated by the Maryland statute, leaving it open to varying later interpretations. But it is likely best viewed as an establishment clause case, given its statements about the government’s inability to set up religious criteria for office holding and its approving quotation that “complete separation between the state and religion is best for the state and best for religion” (quoting a concurrence in McCullum v. Maryland, 333 U.S. 203, 1948). The principle of governmental neutrality among religions and between religion and nonreligion stated in Torcaso would later provide support for a number of other Supreme Court opinions, some of which were seen as favorable to religion and some of which were seen as hostile to religion.

JOEL A. NICHOLS

References and Further Reading

- Curry, Thomas J. The First Freedoms: Church and State in America to the Passage of the First Amendment. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
 Witte, John, Jr., Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment. 2nd ed. Westview (2005).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cantwell v. Connecticut*, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
McCullum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203 (1948)
Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306 (1952)

See also Cantwell v. Connecticut*, 310 U.S. 296 (1940); Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clause; Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947); Incorporation Doctrine; Nonpreferentialism; Test Oath Cases; Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306 (1952)

TRADEMARKS AND THE ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE

Trademarks are words, names, symbols, devices, or any combination of these that serve to inform the public of the source or sponsorship of a good or service. Trademark infringement consists of using the same or a similar trademark in a way likely to confuse the relevant audience. Trademarks are usually considered a form of personal property and are protected by all of federal statutes, state statutes, and common law doctrines. Many names and symbols of religious organizations are trademarks. Repeatedly, parent church A is left by dissidents who form a competing church B. Both A and B claim to be the true embodiment of the church’s doctrine. Both want to use the same or similar trademarks.

Courts routinely decide such disputes even though the First Amendment bars government action “regarding an establishment of religion.” Courts decide by looking at religiously neutral doctrines of trademark, corporate, and property law. Because of the establishment clause’s bar on government entanglement with issues of religious doctrine, the courts refuse to consider which group has the stronger claim to represent the religious beliefs of the church, even though the relevant federal statute bars misleading advertising and false designations of origin (Title 17, United States Code, Section 1125). The reliance on corporate law commonly gives control to the established hierarchy of the church (Purcell v. Summers, 145 F.2d 979, 4th Cir., 1944).

However, both groups may be allowed to use the same term if the court decides the term is “generic”—that it is the common term for the good or service, as opposed to the source of the good or service. For example, “Christian science” was held to be generic by the New Jersey Supreme Court, but “Church of Christ, Scientist” was not (Christian Scientist Board v. Evans, 510 A.2d 1347, N.J. 1987). Another court refused to clarify “Christian science” as generic and explained the Evans case as standing on the rule that two entities may be allowed to use the same word if additional words make public confusion unlikely—for example, by adding the word “independent” (Christian Scientist Board v. Robinson, 115 F. Supp. 607, W.D. N. Car., 2000).

MALLA POLLACK

References and Further Reading

Annotation, Right of Charitable or Religious Association or Corporation to Protection against Use of Same or Similar Name by Another, American Law Reports 37 (1971): 277.

McCarthy, J. Thomas. McCarthy on Trademarks, vol. 1, section 9:02; vol. 2, chapter 12.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Christian Science Board of Directors v. Evans, 510 A.2d 1347 (N.J. 1987)

Christian Science Board of Directors v. Robinson, 115 F. Supp. 607 (W.D. N. Car. 2000)

Purcell v. Summers, 145 F.2d 979 (4th Cir. 1944)

See also Common Law or Statute; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Judicial Resolution of Church Property Disputes; Lemon Test

TRADITIONAL PUBLIC FORUMS

All recognize that citizens have a First Amendment right to speak. But what places are available for speech? If someone wants to proselytize a crowd of strangers in a public park or organize loud demonstrations on public streets, may the government restrict the speaker or regulate the marchers? May the government restrict distribution of leaflets on street corners because recipients litter the streets? Questions such as these are addressed under the First Amendment doctrine of the “public forum.”

Early in the twentieth century, while serving on the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in a case upholding the conviction of a preacher for speaking on the Boston Common without a permit, Justice Holmes held that the government could forbid use of streets and parks much like a private homeowner could exclude unwanted guests from his or her property. Such an approach would grant the government unlimited power to restrict communications on public property. However, beginning in the 1930s, the Supreme Court has held that certain public spaces known as “traditional” public forums—streets and parks—have “immemorially been held in trust” for the public to assemble and communicate.

Courts have followed two theories in cases involving traditional public forums. One theory is that the government is required to provide equal access to public places. The idea is that if the government permits public marches supporting breast cancer research, it must also permit marches criticizing the government’s incessant war-mongering. For example, in Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92 (1972), the Court invalidated a Chicago ordinance prohibiting picketing near schools but exempting peaceful picketing of any school involved in a labor dispute. In Staub v. Baxley, 355 U.S. 313 (1958), the Court overturned an ordinance that prohibited the solicitation of membership in dues-paying organizations without a permit from officials on the grounds that one’s First Amendment rights may not hinge “upon the uncontrolled will of an official.” Such decisions require that government act in a “content neutral” way toward speakers and demonstrators and protect against picking and choosing based on the message contained in one’s literature.

However, the equal access approach does not prevent the government from closing streets and parks to all demonstrations or public speakers. Thus, a second theory requiring presumptive mandatory access to streets and parks—traditional public forums—has continued to influence courts. For example, certain New Jersey municipalities forbade distribution of leaflets on public streets to curtail litter. The Supreme Court held this purpose insufficient to justify a total ban on literature distribution, particularly since the communities had other means of preventing litter—such as punishing those who actually throw papers on the street. Likewise, a municipality cannot forbid the display of advocacy signs on private residences on grounds that such signs contribute to visual blight: Residential signs posted during political campaigns provide an important outlet for citizens to communicate, and the government may not remove that “channel” of communication.

The fact that the government must permit access to certain property for communicative purposes does not mean that it may not impose restrictions on communication in the public forum. Indeed, unless the government property is a “traditional” forum, a different set of rules governs so-called “nontraditional” forums such as mailboxes and utility poles where literature might be posted, military bases, airports, and property immediately adjacent to post offices and jails.

Moreover, even within the “traditional” public forum, the government may regulate the “time, place, and manner” (TPM) of communications in the public forum. Such regulations must be issued without regard to the content of the communication; must serve important goals of the government and the means chosen must reasonably relate to the ends sought; and must leave open sufficient other outlets for the communications. The current Supreme Court has interpreted this doctrine in a relatively relaxed way and has approved many regulations that limit the scope of communicative activity.

For example, in one case, demonstrators sought to publicize the plight of the homeless by sleeping outdoors overnight in the middle of winter in a public park in Washington, D.C. The Court upheld National Park Service regulations that prohibited such camping as a reasonable “manner” regulation. In another case, the Minnesota State Fair prohibited the distribution of literature on fairgrounds, except from special booths. The Court upheld the partial ban as a reasonable “traffic” regulation that avoided congestion and inconvenient “bottlenecks” to pedestrian traffic.

The principle that reasonable TPM regulations will be upheld in public forum cases has been tested in several important abortion protest cases. In Madsen v. Women’s Health Center, 512 U.S. 753 (1994), after hearing evidence that demonstrators were preventing access to a medical clinic providing abortions, holding aloft images of bloodied fetuses, and employing amplification equipment that penetrated the clinic, a lower court had issued an injunction imposing limits on the demonstrators. The injunction established a thirty-six-foot “buffer zone” around the clinic, forbade the display of the images and use of sound equipment, and forbade approaching any patient within three hundred feet of the clinic.

In reviewing the injunction, the Supreme Court upheld the buffer zone limit, but only to the extent to which it protected actual entrances to the clinic. The court analyzed the image and sound regulation in light of the government’s interest in avoiding interference with the right to receive medical treatment. The noise injunction was upheld, since amplified voices interfered with surgical procedures and patient recovery. However, the image limitation was overturned; the Court reasoned that to protect patients the clinic could draw blinds. The ban on approaching others within three hundred feet was also overturned, since it was far broader than necessary to protect clinic patients.

In sum, the traditional public forum doctrine has generally protected access to streets and parks for communicative activity. However, courts have tended to be much more deferential to governmental time, place, and manner regulations that appear to be reasonable. Although TPM regulations may effectively restrict the capacity of speakers to reach their intended audience (such as the fairgoers at the Minnesota State Fair), the current Court has concluded that those restrictions are a reasonable trade-off.

JOHN T. NOCKLEBY

References and Further Reading

- Kalven, The Concept of the Public Forum: Cox v. Louisiana, Sup. Ct. Rev. (1965): 1.
 Post, Between Governance and Management: The History and Theory of the Public Forum, UCLA L. Rev. 34 (1987): 1713.
 Stone, Fora Americana: Speech in Public Places, Sup. Ct. Rev. (1974): 1287.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Clark v. CCNV*, 468 U.S. 288 (1984)
Davis v. Massachusetts, 167 U.S. 43 (1897)
Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939)
Heffron v. ISKON, 452 U.S. 640 (1981)
City of Ladue v. Gilleo, 512 U.S. 43 (1994)
Madsen v. Women’s Health Center, 512 U.S. 753 (1994)
Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92 (1972)
Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147, 163 (1939)
Staub v. Baxley, 355 U.S. 313 (1958)

See also Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; Picketing; Prior Restraint; Time, Place, and Manner Rule

TREASON

Treason, the only crime defined by the U.S. Constitution, has all but disappeared from the legal landscape. The framers of the Constitution may have started treason down this path. The bitter English experience with the misuse of treason charges for political purposes led them to define the crime narrowly and to make it difficult to prove. Only two acts constitute treason: levying war against the United States and adhering to an enemy of the United States, giving it aid and comfort. The framers drew this definition from the English law of treason, but omitted a third method of committing the crime—compassing or imagining the king’s death—that had proved most susceptible to politically motivated abuse. The framers also specified that treason could be proved only by a confession in open court or by the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act.

The first cases to command judicial attention arose from ex-Vice President Aaron Burr’s plot to cleave the trans-Appalachian states from the nation, conquer Mexico, and make from them a huge western empire. In Ex parte Bollman, 8 U.S. (4 Cranch) 75 (1807), a case against one of Burr's associates, Chief Justice Marshall established that "levying war" meant involvement in actual hostilities against the United States (as opposed to preparation for such hostilities). In the treason trial of Aaron Burr, Marshall, sitting as a trial judge, applied the Constitution's two-witness requirement so rigorously as to make the treason case against Burr virtually impossible to prove. These early, restrictive precedents further pushed the crime of treason along its course toward desuetude.

Although the Supreme Court stated in the Prize Cases, 2 Black 635 (1863), that those who took up arms against the Union in the secessionist cause were traitors, few treason cases emerged from the Civil War, and many of those convicted of treason received pardons. John Brown, who in 1859 organized a raid on the federal arsenal at Harper's Ferry in hopes of triggering a slave insurrection, was the last person in the United States convicted and executed for treason against state (as opposed to federal) authority.

World War II produced a number of treason prosecutions, all of them charges that Americans gave the enemy aid and comfort. Two went to the Supreme Court, and the results were mixed. In Cramer v. United States, 325 U.S. 1 (1945), the Supreme Court read the treason clause's two-witness requirement very narrowly, holding that "every act, movement, deed, and word of the defendant charged to constitute treason must be supported by the testimony of two witnesses." On the other hand, in Haupt v. United States, 330 U.S. 631 (1947), the Court took a more permissive approach to "aid and comfort," holding that a father's provision of shelter and other minor sorts of support to his Nazi saboteur son met the constitutional test.

No conduct has been the basis of a treason charge in the United States since the end of World War II. This is not solely because of the narrowness of the crime's definition or the difficulty of proving it. It is also because Congress has filled the field that treason once occupied with other partly overlapping crimes: espionage, sedition, aiding enemy prisoners of war, offering material support to terrorists, and the like.

ERIC L. MULLER

See also 9/11 and the War on Terror; Proof beyond a Reasonable Doubt

TREASON CLAUSE

Treason is the criminal offense of attempting to overthrow the government of the state to which one owes allegiance. As set forth in Article III of the Constitution, there are two ways in which this can be accomplished: by making war directly against the state or by materially supporting the state's enemies. Treason has been considered a crime of the worst order, since it constitutes a breaking of the social compact and a breach of one's allegiance to the state, the ultimate protector of the rights of citizens. The theory upon which treason was founded is that the government is greater than any individual and that being born into society creates a natural allegiance to the state. The long-standing punishment for breaking this trust, in England and later in the United States, is execution. In addition, the British punished treason by enacting a "corruption of blood," which would mean that any property passed along the hereditary lineage of the traitor would be seized. This punishment was expressly prohibited in the U.S. Constitution because it almost always punished innocent relatives who had committed no treason.

The treatment of treason in the U.S. Constitution draws on English legal and historic precedent. The crime of treason on British soil had a legacy of abuses because it was manipulated by rulers to punish severely many lesser crimes. Montesquieu warned that the crime of treason, if defined broadly, would cause any government to degenerate into arbitrary uses of power over its citizens. The British had experienced this problem, where in more tyrannical historic times, rulers had arbitrarily created constructive treasons. Effectively, a citizen who committed a misdemeanor could face the ultimate penalty for having constructively committed treason by failing to heed the rules of conduct of the land. This kind of law made it nearly impossible for citizens to know what they could and could not say or do. In response to these abuses, statutes were passed by Edward III requiring two lawful witnesses to testify or confession in open court, as well as an overt act taken toward the realization of a treasonous intent. Even after these statutes were enacted, abuses occurred periodically in England.

At the Constitutional Convention, the drafters were weary of the British experience and they sought to provide clarity in order to protect against similar abuses. First, the constitution provided a decisive definition of the crime (which paralleled portions of the British statutory definition). By limiting the definition of treason in the Constitution, it could not be expanded by legislative acts of law, effectively keeping treason out of politics where, as the British example made clear, there was potential for abuse by those in power. Next, the text provides the necessary evidentiary safeguards. To be convicted, the accused must confess or the government must produce two direct witnesses of the traitorous behavior. Also, that behavior must be an “overt act,” not mere words. Citizens only rise to the level of treason if there is an intent as embodied in words, as well as some overt act to carry out that intent. Finally, the punishment was limited by confining it to the offender and not his heirs.

There is an inherent tension between a need to punish treason and allowing free speech. The First Amendment safeguards a right to question and criticize the government, while those same questions and criticisms coupled with overt acts taken to overthrow the government can constitute treason. It is telling that the constitutional framers omitted the British form of treason, which constituted mere plotting or imagining the death of the king. By requiring an overt act, the American definition would not punish mere thoughts or words alone. The line between what constitutes protected speech and what is treason is not always necessarily clear. Strictly defining treason and providing stringent evidentiary requirements, including an overt act, provide necessary protection for free speech and expression, while still allowing the government the ability to punish someone who truly does commit treason, as long as that person confesses or there are two government witnesses to the overt act.

One of the best known treason cases, the case of “Tokyo Rose” (Iva Ikuko Toguri D'Aquino v. United States, 192 F.2d 338, 9th Cir., 1951), occurred during World War II. Iva Toguri D'Aquino, an American citizen in Japan, worked as an announcer for a Japanese radio station as a prisoner of war. She worked on a radio show that was designed to reach the American troops with propaganda. She allegedly read on the air anti-American propaganda, including the claim that all the American ships had returned to the United States, leaving all U.S. troops stranded. When D'Aquino returned to the United States from Japan, press attention and public outcry largely drove her prosecutors to try her for treason. Called a traitor, D'Aquino denied the claims throughout her trial for treason. The government produced numerous witnesses, including two of her former supervisors who testified that she has given positions of American ships and had recited other anti-American propaganda. The witnesses later admitted that they had testified inaccurately and had been coached extensively by the prosecution before trial.

D'Aquino was found guilty and punished with a ten-year prison sentence, as well as a large fine. She was eventually pardoned in 1977 by President Gerald Ford, based on the apparent weaknesses in the prosecution's case that had since come to light. The Tokyo Rose case highlights the continued need for protections against abuse, as well as the imperfections in safeguards that have existed historically. Even so, the American definition of treason has not been expanded at the hands of legislators, as has occurred in England, due to civil liberties concerns.

JAMES F. Van ORDEN

References and Further Reading

Hurst, James W. The Law of Treason in the United States. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1971.
Iva Ikuko Toguri D'Aquino v. United States, 192 F.2d 338, Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, 1951.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Cramer v. United States, 325 U.S. 1 (1945)

TRIAL IN CIVIL CASES (VII)

Starting with the assumption that government ought to protect property and personal liberty, as outlined in the Constitution, the Founding Fathers were faced with the question of how best to achieve these ideals through the courts. The Framers had inherited trial by jury, a feature of British common law, and chose to retain it in the Bill of Rights of the Constitution as the best means to protect fundamental rights. There was consensus at the time that trial by jury should be applied in the United States, but there was debate over whether it ought to be included in the text of the Constitution. Although some argued that trial by jury ought to be established through the legislature, it was enacted in the Bill of Rights, which placed it on higher ground as a constitutional right that is inherent, and therefore its core cannot be undermined via ordinary legislation. The Seventh Amendment to the Constitution provides for the right to trial by jury in common law suits when the value in controversy is greater than $20, a right that is therefore fundamental and cannot be revoked via normal legislation.

Generally, the role of the jury is to consider questions of fact, including the judgment of the credibility of testimony in court, while judges consider issues of law. Trial by jury, although it can be more costly and inefficient than trial by judge, allows its citizenry to retain power over the judicial branch through this fact-finding role. At the time of the framing of the constitution, proponents of jury trial in civil cases pointed out its virtues, including the fact that jury trial allows citizens to safeguard each other's well-being and that it protects liberty by limiting judicial despotism and arbitrary decision making, thereby enhancing the integrity of the judicial system. Trial by jury was viewed as a necessary check on the power of the government to take one's livelihood in civil and criminal trials and one's freedom in criminal trials. Thus, the constitutional guarantee of juries in civil trials ensures that the rights of all are weighed not by the government, but by a neutral group of one's peers. The Founding Fathers viewed the jury in criminal and civil cases as a means to ensure fair and more legitimate proceedings and outcomes in the court system by checking prosecutorial and judicial despotism.

JAMES F. VAN ORDEN

References and Further Reading

- Abramson, Jeffrey. We, the Jury: The Jury System and the Ideal of Democracy. New York: Basic Books, 1994.
 Jonakait, Randolph N. The American Jury System. New Haven, Conn.: University Press, 2003.
 Lehman, Godfrey D. We the Jury: The Impact of Jurors on Our Basic Freedoms: Great Jury Trials of History. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1997.

TRIAL OF THE SEVEN BISHOPS, 12 HOWELL'S STATE TRIALS 183 (1688)

King James II (1685–1688) attempted to introduce Catholicism back into England during his reign. He wanted to extend to Roman Catholics a dispensation of the religious laws to provide Dissenters and other sects outside the Church of England the ability to carry out their religious practices. James created a new Declaration of Indulgence in April 1687, but later ordered the clergy to read the declaration in the London churches in mid-May 1688 and then outside London on two Sundays in June.

William Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, along with other bishops and leaders of the London clergy decided on May 15 to petition the king, which they did (Sancroft absent) on May 18, 1688. The seven signers to the petition were William Sancroft, Thomas Ken of Bath and Wells, John Lake of Chichester, Jonathan Trelawny of Bristol, William Lloyd of St. Asaph, Francis Turner of Ely, and Thomas White of Peterborough. James was highly offended by the petition and held them for trial for publishing a false, malicious, and seditious libel. The trial took place on June 29 and 30, 1688.

The trial lasted just two days. The two main issues in the trial were critical of the king's dispensing and suspending power and the publication of the petition as a libel. The bishops denied the king had power to dispense or suspend legislative acts without consent of Parliament based on Parliament's condemnation of Charles II using the dispensing and suspending power in his declarations issued in 1662 and 1672. At first, counsel had to prove that the petition was actually written and handed by the bishops to the king (which it eventually was). The King's Counsel argued the bishops could only present a petition in Parliament, but defense counsel countered that claim using historical records of redress to the kings. Although the petition was shown to be presented by the bishops to the king (and under English law considered libelous), the defense argued it was neither malicious because the bishops did not cause the events that led to their petitioning, nor libelous because they had the right to petition the king to redress grievances outside of parliament. It was not seditious because it was presented in private to the king. None of the justices supported the king's power to suspend the laws.

The Lord Chief Justice Wright and Judge Allibone supported the king's position that it was a libelous petition, while Justices Powell and Holloway sided with the defense. Disobeying the judicial instructions, the jury found the bishops not guilty. The jury's rejection was recognized as a great victory for a rejection of the king's suspending authority and an Englishman's right to petition the government, which was upheld in the 1689 parliamentary act of the Bill of Rights (1 W. & M. sess. 2 cap. 2). The Bishops' Case was cited as precedent in the important John Peter Zenger trial (1735) and later for the First Amendment right to petition the government for redress of grievances.

JOEL FISHMAN

References and Further Reading

- Havighurst, Alfred. James II and the Twelve Men in Scarlet, Law Quarterly Review 69 (1953): 4: 522–546.
 Macaulay, Thomas B. History of England From the Accession of James the Second, vol. 2. Charles Firth, ed. London: Macmillan & Co., 1914. pp. 990–1039.
 Miller, John. James II. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2000.
 Spurr, John. The Restoration Church of England, 1646–1689. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1991.

See also Seditious Libel

TRIBE, LAURENCE H. (1941–)

Noted constitutional scholar Laurence Tribe was born in China to Russian-Jewish parents in 1941. At the age of five he moved with his family from China to San Francisco. In 1962, he earned an A.B. in mathematics from Harvard College and four years later he earned a Juris Doctorate from Harvard Law School. From 1966 to 1967, he was a law clerk for California Supreme Court Justice Mathew Tobriner, and from 1967 to 1968, he clerked for U.S. Supreme Court Justice Potter Stewart. Tribe began his teaching career at Harvard Law School in 1968 and since 1982 has been Ralph S. Tyler, Jr., Professor of Constitutional Law.

Professor Tribe's career also includes work as congressional advisor and Supreme Court advocate. He has given congressional testimony on topics such as maintaining a system of checks and balances while fighting global terrorism and the constitutional meaning of impeachment. He has argued numerous cases before the U.S. Supreme Court such as Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia (448 U.S. 555, 1980), Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. California Energy Resources Conservation & Development Commission (1983), Bowers v. Hardwick (478 U.S. 186, 1986), Rust v. Sullivan (500 U.S. 173, 1991), Vacco v. Quill (521 U.S. 793, 1997), and Bush v. Gore (531 U.S. 98, 2000).

Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia (1980) focused on the First and Sixth Amendments. In this case the Court held that the public and the media have the right to attend criminal trials. Tribe argued the cause for the respondents in Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. California Energy Resources Conservation & Development Commission, establishing that a state has the right to restrict nuclear power plants. He also argued for the constitutional right for homosexuals to engage in consensual sodomy, which the Court denied in Bowers v. Hardwick. The Court would later make the controversial decision to overturn this ruling in Lawrence v. Texas (123 S.Ct. 2472, 2003).

Tribe has appeared before the Court in other cases involving abortion and the right to die. In Rust v. Sullivan (1991), he argued, albeit unsuccessfully, that the Department of Health and Human Services had violated the First and Fifth Amendments of those who give and receive family planning services because it restricted recipients' ability to offer abortion-related services. The Court ruled the department was not in violation of the amendments and relegated the decision of dispersing funding to the department. In Vacco v. Quill (1997), Tribe challenged the constitutionality of New York's ban on physician-assisted suicide. The Court, using a rationality test, ruled that New York was not in violation of the equal protection clause.

Bush v. Gore (2000), the presidential election controversy over the legitimacy of Florida voting ballots, is another noteworthy case argued by Tribe before the Supreme Court. Attorneys for George W. Bush contended that the Florida Supreme Court had exceeded its authority by extending the certification deadline for questionable ballots to be counted. They also asked for an end to the voting recount. The Supreme Court ruled against another recount of the ballots, validating the contested recount as it stood with then Governor George W. Bush as the winner of the election.

Professor Tribe has written extensively on interpretation of the Constitution. In his book, On Reading the Constitution (1991), he offers a general format to the much-debated question of how to interpret the Constitution. He argues for an interpretation of the text using generative themes via constitutional conversation. Also, Tribe made contributions to the issue of interpreting the Constitution using the textualist approach in Justice Antonin Scalia's A Matter of Interpretation: Federal Courts and the Law (1997).

Tribe has also written on the issue of abortion in his book, Abortion: The Clash of Absolutes (1990). He believes that abortion is a constitutionally protected right. However, in this book, he examines the pro-choice and pro-life debates in an attempt to find strengths and weakness in both sides of the debate.

An established and highly sought-out legal scholar, Tribe has assisted in the drafting of constitutions for South Africa, Russia, the Czech Republic, and the Marshall Islands. His career includes that of author, attorney, Supreme Court advocate, and professor. His expertise and research interests span a wide range of topics such as constitutional law, abortion, federalism, free speech, privacy, church and state, and states' rights.

BA-SHEN WELCH

References and Further Reading

- Goldman, Jerry. Laurence H. Tribe Cases (online). Chicago: Oyez—The United States Supreme Court Media. Chicago (retrieved 4 August 2003). Available from http://www.oyez.org/oyez/resource/legal_entity/990/cases.
 Harvard University. Faculty: Laurence H. Tribe (online). Cambridge: Harvard School of Law (retrieved 4 August 2003). Available from <http://www.law.harvard.edu/faculty/directory/facdir.php?id=74>.
 Tribe, Laurence H. Abortion: The Clash of Absolutes. New York: Norton, 1990.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bowers v. Hardwick*, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98 (2000)
Lawrence v. Texas, 123 S.Ct. 2472 (2003)
Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. California Energy Resources Conservation & Development Commission (1983)
Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)
Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991)
Vacco v. Quill, 521 U.S. 793 (1997)

TROP v. DULLES, 356 U.S. 86 (1958)

The constitutionality of a particular punishment is determined, in part, by whether it comports with the "evolving standards of decency." This concept, which is most commonly used today in death penalty cases, was first enunciated by the U.S. Supreme Court in Trop v. Dulles.

After deserting his military unit for twenty-four hours and voluntarily returning, John Foster Dulles was convicted by military court martial of desertion from the U.S. Army during a time of war and sentenced to three years' hard labor, forfeiture of all pay, and a dishonorable discharge. In addition to the court martial sentence, Dulles was also stripped of his U.S. citizenship pursuant to a provision in the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA). In Trop v. Dulles the Supreme Court considered the scope of the "cruel and unusual" clause and determined that it is not static, but "must draw its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society." Pursuant to this analysis, the Court held that the expatriation provision of the INA constitutes "cruel and unusual" punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment because it involves the "total destruction of the individual's status in organized society."

The concept of "evolving standards of decency" has become particularly significant in recent years as it has guided the Supreme Court's decisions in cases finding that the execution of mentally retarded individuals and individuals under the age of eighteen at the time of the crime violates the Eighth Amendment.

JUDITH M. BARGER

References and Further Reading

Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002).

Heffernan, William C., Constitutional Historicism: An Examination of the Eighth Amendment Evolving Standards of Decency Test, American University Law Review 54 (2005): 1355.

Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551 (2005).

See also Capital Punishment and Sentencing; Cruel and Unusual Punishment Generally

TURNER BROADCASTING SYS., INC. v. FCC (TURNER I), 512 U.S. 622 (1994); 520 U.S. 180 (1997) (TURNER II)

From its humble origins as "community antenna television," a technological bridge for extending broadcast television signals into remote or mountainous communities, cable television came to pose a formidable competitive threat to FCC policies favoring free, local, over-the-air broadcasting. The 1968 case of United States v. Southwestern Cable Co. upheld the FCC's authority to regulate cable as a form of "interstate [or] foreign communication by wire or radio." In the ensuing decades, the FCC made multiple efforts to protect local television stations, especially UHF and educational stations, against market erosion attributable to the rise of the cable industry. Most of these efforts—rules concerning the mandatory origination of programs by cable operators, the reservation of access channels on cable systems, distant signal and program exclusivity, and the "siphoning off" of premium feature films and sports events—became the subject of fierce litigation in the federal courts throughout the 1970s and 1980s.

Congress intervened in these disputes by passing the Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act of 1992. Sections 4 and 5 of the 1992 Act imposed a "must-carry" regime that entitled local broadcast television stations to carriage on cable systems operating within their local markets. Upon request, a cable operator was required to carry the signal of a local broadcast station. The Act required most cable systems to set aside as much as a third of their channel capacity for the benefit of broadcast stations invoking their must-carry rights.

The constitutional question posed by this mandatory access scheme was whether the must-carry rules would be reviewed under the withering standard of Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo (418 U.S. 241, 1974), which invalidated a right-of-reply statute as applied to a newspaper, or the more deferential standard of Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC (395 U.S. 367, 1969), which upheld the FCC's fairness doctrine, a right-of-reply system governing conventional radio and television broadcasters. As of 1994, no court had definitively determined whether cable operators should be treated like print journalists or like over-the-air broadcasters for First Amendment purposes.

In a pair of cases styled Turner Broadcasting System, Inc. v. FCC, the Supreme Court upheld the must-carry scheme. In Turner Broadcasting I, decided in 1994, the Court distinguished cable from broadcasting. Writing for the majority, Justice Anthony Kennedy reasoned that cable "does not suffer from the inherent limitations that characterize the broadcast medium," especially in light of "rapid advances in fiber optics and digital compression technology" and the minimal "danger of physical interference between two cable speakers attempting to share the same channel."

Turner I nevertheless rejected strict scrutiny. Two factors served to distinguish cable from print journalism, the medium historically associated with the most robust form of constitutional protection for free speech. First, "cable's long history of serving as a conduit for broadcast signals" minimized the danger "that cable viewers would assume that the broadcast stations carried on a cable system convey ideas or messages endorsed by the cable operator.” Second, whereas a “daily newspaper ... does not possess the power to obstruct readers’ access to competing publications,” cable operators enjoy a substantial degree of “bottleneck, or gatekeeper, control” over the flow of television programming into subscribers’ homes. The Court thereupon prescribed the intermediate scrutiny test of United States v. O’Brien (391 U.S. 367, 1968) which upholds governmental regulation of speech in furtherance of important or substantial non-speech-related interests, with no greater restriction on expression than is essential to the accomplishment of the government’s objective.

In Turner II, decided in 1997, the Supreme Court applied the O’Brien test to a more complete factual record detailing Congress’s motivation in enacting the must-carry scheme. Speaking again through Justice Kennedy, the Court found that Congress had garnered “specific support for its conclusion that cable operators had considerable and growing market power over local video programming markets.” The must-carry regime, Turner II concluded, ensures that vulnerable local broadcasters would retain their audiences and their advertising revenues by virtue of being carried on the dominant cable systems within their markets.

In concert, Turner I and Turner II provide significant support for governmental efforts to structure mass media markets according to the presumed link between the ownership or operation of communicative facilities (such as cable systems and broadcast networks) and the diversity of viewpoints expressed on those facilities. When coupled with parallel cases such as the 1978 case of FCC v. National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting (436 U.S. 775 1978) which upheld an FCC ban on the common ownership of a radio or television broadcast station and a daily newspaper in the same market, the Turner cases strongly inform ongoing controversies over the “carry one, carry all” scheme for direct broadcast satellite, national media cross-ownership restrictions, and the battery of FCC rules governing horizontal and vertical integration within the cable industry.

JIM CHEN

References and Further Reading

- Benjamin, Stuart Minor, Proactive Legislation and the First Amendment, Mich. L. Rev. 99 (2000): 281.
 Chen, Jim., The Last Picture Show (on the Twilight of Federal Mass Communications Regulation), Minn. L. Rev. 80 (1996): 1415.
 ———, Conduit-Based Regulation of Speech, Duke L. J. 54.
 Yoo, Christopher S., Vertical Integration and Media Regulation in the New Economy, Yale J. on Reg. 19 (2002): 171.

———, The Rise and Demise of the Technology-Specific Approach to the First Amendment, Geo. L. J. 91 (2003): 245.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- FCC v. National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting*, 436 U.S. 775 (1978)
Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974)
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969)
United States v. O’Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)
United States v. Southwestern Cable Co., 392 U.S. 157 (1968)

See also Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969); United States v. O’Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)

TURNER v. SAFLEY, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)

Turner v. Safley represents a benchmark in the Supreme Court’s movement toward greater deference to prison administrators. A class of prisoners had challenged regulations restricting inmate-to-inmate correspondence and inmate marriage. The appellate court applied a strict scrutiny standard and found both regulations unconstitutional, but the Supreme Court held that a less stringent reasonableness standard should be applied. The Court reasoned that the task of prison administration calls for the development of expertise in resource allocation and planning best suited to the legislative and executive branches.

The Court articulated four factors relevant to the question of whether a regulation is (reasonably) related to legitimate penological interests (Turner v. Safley at 89). First, courts should examine the nexus between the regulation and the governmental interest, which must be legitimate and neutral. Absent a rational, logical connection, the challenged policy is unconstitutionally arbitrary and capricious. The second and fourth factors focus on the availability of alternative practices that permit prisoners to exercise the right otherwise curtailed by the regulation. On the one hand, the existence of alternatives favors judicial deference since prisoners may engage in protected behavior through other means. On the other hand, their existence may indicate that the challenged regulation is an exaggerated response that fails the reasonableness test, particularly when the alternative fully accommodates the prisoner’s rights at de minimis cost to valid penological interests (Turner v. Safley at 91). Under this reasoning, the absence of alternatives may also show reasonableness. The third factor advises deference to the informed judgment of corrections officials regarding the cost of accommodating a prisoner's constitutional right in terms of resource allocation and security concerns.

DONNA H. LEE

References and Further Reading

- A Jailhouse Lawyer's Manual* 869-72, Colum. Hum. Rts. L. rev. ed., 5th ed. 2000.
 Zick, Timothy D., and Jeff Trask, Annual Review, Twentieth Annual Review of Criminal Procedure: United States Supreme Court and Courts of Appeals 1989-90, VI. Prisoners' Rights: Prisoners' Substantive Rights, Geo. L. J. 1253 79 (1991): 1253-1254.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bell v. Wolfish*, 442 U.S. 520 (1979)
Block v. Rutherford, 468 U.S. 576 (1984)
Jones v. North Carolina Prisoners' Union, 433 U.S. 119 (1977)
Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817 (1974)

See also Cruel and Unusual Punishment (VII); Prisoners and Freedom of Speech

TWO GUYS FROM HARRISON-ALLEN TOWN, INC. v. MCGINLEY, 366 U.S. 582 (1961)

See Sunday Closing Cases

TWO-TIERED THEORY OF FREEDOM OF SPEECH

One of the earliest approaches to First Amendment methodology was the "two-tiered" theory of freedom of speech, sometimes called the "categorical" approach. Under this theory speech is deemed to be protected unless it falls within some defined category of unprotected expression, such as obscenity, libel, or "fighting words." Speech falling into the list comprising the "lower tier" gets zero First Amendment protection.

The two-tiered theory is most famously associated with the Supreme Court's decision in Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire (315 U.S. 568, 1942). The critical passage from Chaplinsky, one of the most often quoted in the American free speech tradition, is:

There are certain well-defined and narrowly limited classes of speech, the prevention and punishment of which has never been thought to raise any Constitutional problem. These include the lewd and obscene, the profane, the libelous, and the insulting or "fighting" words—those which by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace. It has been well observed that such utterances are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality.

Chaplinsky remains an often cited opinion, and the preceding passage continues to have adherents among scholars and jurists. Nonetheless, as a working methodology, the simplistic two-tiered approach has largely been abandoned in modern First Amendment jurisprudence. We now extend ample First Amendment protection to speech in categories once deemed unprotected, such as speech that is lewd, profane, or libelous. Conversely, in certain circumstances, speech not falling within those categories is often subject to significant regulation. Most importantly, the primitive "all or nothing" approach to free speech problems has been displaced by a far more complex body of First Amendment law in which highly refined and specialized tests exist for specific types of speech regulation, such as libel, invasion of privacy, obscenity, threats, incitement, commercial speech, political campaign regulation, and so on.

RODNEY A. SMOLLA

References and Further Reading

- Smolla, Rodney. Smolla and Nimmer on Freedom of Speech. New York: Thomson/West, 2005, § 2:70.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire*, 315 U.S. 568 (1942)

U

ULSTER COUNTY COURT v. ALLEN, 442 U.S. 140 (1979)

The three respondents, along with a young girl, were occupants of a vehicle stopped by the police for speeding. All four were convicted of illegal possession of two loaded firearms that were located in an open handbag, belonging to the girl, on the passenger side where the girl was sitting. Relying on a state statute, the trial court instructed the jury that they could (but need not) presume possession of the firearms by all the vehicle's occupants merely from the presence of the firearms in the vehicle. After two state appellate courts affirmed the convictions, the respondents filed a habeas corpus petition in federal district court that found that the mere presence of the respondents in the vehicle was not a sufficient basis for a jury to presume their possession of the firearms.

After a federal appellate court affirmed, the Supreme Court reversed the ruling, finding that the statutory presumption was constitutional as applied to the respondents and did not violate their right of due process. The Court reasoned that a permissive, as opposed to a mandatory, evidentiary presumption was constitutional provided that both a rational connection existed between the respondents' presence in the car and the presumption of possession and that their presence in the vehicle made their possession of the firearms more likely than not. Such evidentiary presumptions, however, arguably erode the constitutional right that every defendant be proven guilty not merely by a preponderance of the evidence but by evidence proving guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

RUSSELL L. CHRISTOPHER

References and Further Reading

Dressler, Joshua. Understanding Criminal Law. 3rd ed. Newark: LexisNexis, 2001.
Robinson, Paul H. Criminal Law. New York: Aspen Publishers, Inc., 1997.

See also Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307 (1985); Martin v. Ohio, 480 U.S. 228 (1987); Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197 (1977); Proof beyond a Reasonable Doubt; Sandstrom v. Montana, 442 U.S. 510 (1979)

UNCONSTITUTIONAL CONDITIONS

The unconstitutional conditions doctrine states that the government may not deny a discretionary benefit to someone because he or she chooses to exercise a protected constitutional right. For example, in Speiser v. Randall (1958), the Supreme Court held that California could not withhold property tax exemptions from those veterans who refused to sign Loyalty Oaths. Rejecting the Right v. Privilege Distinction advanced by the state, Justice Brennan wrote for the Court that "[t]o deny an exemption to claimants who engage in certain forms of speech is in effect to penalize them for such speech." Although the state was not obligated to grant tax exemptions to veterans at all, it nevertheless could not condition receipt of that benefit on the relinquishment of First Amendment rights.

Notwithstanding the Court's broad statements in Speiser, other cases have made clear that not all conditional government benefit programs raise unconstitutional conditions problems. In Regan v. Taxation with Representation (1983), for example, the Court upheld a tax code provision that denied certain tax benefits to those nonprofit organizations that engaged in lobbying. In his opinion for the Court, Justice Rehnquist characterized the law not as an unconstitutional penalty, but rather as a permissible nonsubsidy. Congress may allocate its funds as it desires, according to the Court and "is not required by the First Amendment to subsidize lobbying." Rehnquist noted that the result would have been different if the subsidy had applied in a viewpoint discriminatory manner.

In the abortion context, the Court used the penalty/nonsubsidy distinction in Rust v. Sullivan to uphold federal regulations forbidding federally funded family planning clinics from providing abortion counseling or referrals, while requiring those clinics to refer pregnant clients for prenatal care. Again writing for the Court, Justice Rehnquist stated that "the government is not denying a benefit to anyone, but is instead simply insisting that public funds be spent for the purposes for which they were authorized." In a controversial conclusion, the Court found that the federal regulations in question did not amount to viewpoint discrimination.

Many critics have observed that the penalty/nonsubsidy distinction is merely a question of semantics. Courts can reach either result by careful framing of the underlying issue. If the state's decision to provide conditional funding is described as a plan to encourage certain activities rather than others, it looks like a permissible selective subsidy. By characterizing the same decision as the exclusion of a particular recipient from an established program, it appears to be an unconstitutional penalty.

In unconstitutional conditions cases that involve state takings of private real property, the Rehnquist Court has applied a stricter "germaneness" analysis. For example, in Nollan v. California (1987), the Court invalidated a state requirement that, to procure a building permit to enlarge his house, a property owner grant a public easement across his private beach. The Court held that the condition constituted a taking for which the property owner was entitled to compensation, noting that the easement requirement was unrelated to any legitimate reason the state could have denied permit approval.

NICOLE B. CÁSAREZ

References and Further Reading

- Berman, Mitchell N., Coercion without Baselines: Unconstitutional Conditions in Three Dimensions, Georgia Law Journal 90 (2001): 1–112.
 Smolla, Rodney A. Free Speech in an Open Society. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., 1992.
 Sullivan, Kathleen M., Unconstitutional Conditions, Harvard Law Review 102 (1989): 1415–1506.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Nollan v. California Coastal Commission*, 483 U.S. 825 (1987)
Regan v. Taxation with Representation, 461 U.S. 540 (1983)
Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991)
Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513 (1958)

See also Government Funding of Speech; Right v. Privilege Distinction; Viewpoint Discrimination in Free Speech Cases

UNDOCUMENTED MIGRANTS

Undocumented migrants are persons who have entered the United States without authorization, namely, a visa, or without presenting themselves for inspection by a federal agent at a port or place of entry. The term "undocumented migrants" also includes persons who entered the United States with a nonimmigrant visa, a visa that allows a noncitizen to visit, study, or work in the United States for a temporary period of time, but who stayed beyond the time authorized by the visa. Undocumented migrants are sometimes referred to as unauthorized migrants or illegal immigrants.

It is difficult to determine exactly how many unauthorized migrants currently live in the United States. Unauthorized migrants face detention, removal, or federal prosecution as a result of their status; thus, it is almost impossible to accurately count the population. Federal estimates based on the 2000 census placed the figure at 7 million with an estimated annual growth of approximately 350,000 per year. Other estimates report the unauthorized population to range from 9 million to 11 million. The total United States population is approximately 281 million; thus, the unauthorized population is a small percentage of the total population of the United States—approximately 2.5 percent using the federal government figures.

The undocumented population tends to be employed in the agricultural, manufacturing, hospitality, and construction industries. Employment and the search for higher wages continue to be the strongest reasons for undocumented migrants to enter the United States, although U.S. employers face stiff federal civil and criminal penalties if they employ undocumented workers.

Undocumented migrants also enter the United States to flee economic, political, or natural disasters. Some of these persons may eventually qualify for permanent residency as refugees. Some of them may be granted temporary protected status until the emergency that caused them to leave their country of origin is remedied or resolved. Undocumented migrants also enter the United States to be close to relatives who are U.S. citizens or permanent resident aliens.

The United States currently limits authorized immigration to approximately 675,000 visas annually. These visas are awarded primarily on the basis of a close family relationship (approximately 480,000) or on the basis of an employment relationship (140,000). American immigration statutes grant U.S. citizens the benefit of an immigrant visa to their spouse, minor, unmarried and married children, and to the citizen's parents and siblings if the citizen is older than twenty-one. Permanent resident aliens are allowed the benefit of an immigrant visa for their spouse and minor or unmarried children. Family-based visas are subject to a per country cap as well. Because the number of eligible family beneficiaries is greater in some countries than the number of visas available each year, substantial backlogs build up in the various categories. In some cases, family beneficiaries may have to wait more than ten, sometimes even fifteen, years for their visa. Some of these persons in line for an immigrant visa may risk unauthorized status to be close to their family, while they wait for their visa number to come up. These undocumented migrants may be entitled to adjust their status to that of a permanent resident alien eventually.

Approximately 69 percent of unauthorized migrants come from Mexico. Most of the leading source countries for unauthorized migration to the United States are in Central or South America, with the exception of China. Significant numbers of unauthorized migrants reside in California, Texas, Illinois, Arizona, Georgia, and North Carolina.

American society has at times tolerated the presence of undocumented migrants. Increasingly, toward the latter half of the twentieth century amidst concern that the undocumented population was growing too quickly and taking away too many jobs from American workers, Congress enacted legislation to deter undocumented migration. Legislation enacted in 1986 dealt with undocumented migration in a variety of ways, including enhancing criminal sanctions, strengthening border controls, criminalizing the employment of undocumented workers and marriage fraud, and an amnesty program for undocumented workers to become permanent residents if they met certain criteria. Amnesty programs have been favored in the past as a way to deal with undocumented persons who have resided and worked in the United States for a long period of time and who have established relationships with American citizens and American communities.

In the 1990s, however, with the increase in terrorist incidents targeting the United States both abroad and at home, the perception that undocumented migration posed a serious threat to national security led Congress to enact even more restrictive measures aimed at deterring undocumented migration. Increasingly, these measures made it easier to remove undocumented migrants and to curtail statutory benefits and protections. Some of these measures, like indefinite detention, curtailing of habeas corpus, and curtailing of judicial review of immigration administration decisions, also threatened to strip constitutional protections of undocumented migrants.

There is lively debate among economic and migration experts about the costs and benefits of undocumented migration, with some experts concluding that the costs of undocumented migration are too great to tolerate it, and others concluding that the benefits to the economy and the country as a whole far outweigh the costs. Undocumented migration is a global phenomenon, felt not just by the United States but also by most major Western countries. The attention paid to this controversial subject by Congress and the president is likely to increase in the years to come.

ISABEL M. MEDINA

References and Further Reading

- Barbour, William, ed. Illegal Immigration. San Diego, CA: Greenhaven Press, 1994.
- Borjas, George J. Heaven's Door: Immigration Policy and the American Economy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1999.
- Garcia, Juan R. Operation Wetback: The Mass Deportation of Mexican Undocumented Workers in 1954. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1980.
- Johnson, Kevin R. "The Huddled Masses" Myth: Immigration and Civil Rights. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2004.
- Lozic, Charles P. Illegal Immigration: Opposing Viewpoints. San Diego, CA: Greenhaven Press, 1997.
- Medina, Maria I., The Criminalization of Immigration Law: Employer Sanctions and Marriage Fraud, George Mason Law Review 5 (1997): 671-731.
- Neuman, Gerald, The Lost Century of American Immigration Law (1776-1875), Columbia Law Review 93 (1993): 1833.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-603, 100 Stat. 3349 (codified as amended at scattered sections of Title 8 of the United States Code)

Immigration Marriage Fraud Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-639, 10 Stat. 3537 (codified as amended at scattered sections of Title 8 of the United States Code)
Immigration and Nationality Act of 1990
Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act, Pub. L. No. 104-193, 110 Stat. 2105 (1996)
Anti-Terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, Pub. L. No. 104-132, 110 Stat. 1214 (1996)
Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009 (codified as amended in scattered sections of Title 8 of the United States Code)
USA PATRIOT Act of 2001, Pub. L. No. 107-56, 115 Stat. 272
REAL ID Act of 2005, Division B of the Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act for Defense, The Global War on Terror and Tsunami Relief, Pub. L. No. 109-13, 119 Stat. 231, May 11, 2005

UNITED NATIONS SUBCOMMISSION ON FREEDOM OF INFORMATION AND OF THE PRESS

In the wake of World War II, world leaders believed that improving the free flow of information across borders and ensuring the security of war correspondents would help avert future conflicts. Thus, the nascent United Nations Economic, Social, and Cultural Organization created a Commission on Human Rights and Subcommittee on Freedom of Information and of the Press.

The subcommission met five times, beginning in 1947. It participated in drafting the free expression provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. It also produced a draft international code of journalist ethics and a Statement of the Rights, Obligations, and Practices of a free press. Both obliged the media to report accurately, and the latter obliged nations to allow reporters free movement and the widest possible access to sources.

The subcommission laid the groundwork for the U.N. Conference on Freedom of Information, which assembled in 1948. The conference proposed a Convention on Freedom of Information, but the convention was never opened for signature.

Work on the subcommission ultimately broke down for the same reason that the convention failed. East and West could never agree on the proper role of government in supervising the practice of journalism. Western democracies, moreover, feared that the codification of permissible impositions on media—to protect national security, for example—would license oppression in the developing world. In 1952, the United States and Union of Soviet Socialist Republics both opposed continuation of the subcommission.

RICHARD J. PELTZ

References and Further Reading

Hilding Eek. Freedom of Information as a Project of International Legislation. Uppsala, Sweden: Uppsala Universitets Årsskrift, 1953.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Final Act, U.N. Conf. Freedom Info., U.N. Doc. E/CONF.6/79 (1948)
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Dec. 19, 1966, 999 U.N.T.S. 171
Statement of the Rights, Obligations, and Practices to be Included in the Concept of Freedom of Information, UNESCO Subcomm'n Freedom Info. & Press, 2d Sess., U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/80 (1948)
Universal Declaration of Human Rights, G.A. Res. 217A, U.N. GAOR, 3d Sess., 1st plen. mtg., U.N. Doc. A/810 (1948)

See also Chafee, Zechariah, Jr.; Freedom of Expression in the International Context; Theories of Civil Liberties, International

UNITED STATES v. 12 200-FT REELS OF SUPER 8MM. FILM, 413 U.S. 123 (1973)

This case was one of a trio of major decisions of which Miller v. California (1973) was pivotal that the Burger Court used to revamp the standards of when depictions or descriptions of sexual conduct or possession of these depictions or descriptions are protected by the First Amendment.

This case revisited the constitutionality of the federal law prohibiting the importation of obscene material with the difference that the importer claimed the material was for private or personal use. A federal district court in California summarily dismissed the forfeiture action brought by the government based on the lower court decision in United States v. Thirty-Seven Photographs before it was reversed by the Supreme Court. By a five-to-four margin, the Supreme Court vacated the dismissal and remanded the case for reconsideration in light of the standards set forth in Miller. Burger, joined by Blackmun, Powell, Rehnquist, and White, wrote the majority opinion. Douglas dissented as did Brennan who was joined by Marshall and Stewart.

Burger argues that as in Thirty-Seven Photographs there is no right to import obscene material even for private possession in one's home or the absence of any stipulation of possible distribution in the future. Stanley v. Georgia (1969), he claims, did not depend on any First Amendment right to purchase obscene materials but on a right to privacy in one's residence. He draws attention to the concurrence by Brennan and two other justices who made the point of saying that Miller should have been disposed of on Fourth Amendment grounds irrespective of the character of the material in question. Stanley, then, did not rest on the First Amendment but on the right to privacy, which, as a corollary did not imply a right to receive or send obscene material outside the residence.

Burger dismisses what he refers to as the "seductive plausibility of single steps in a chain of evolutionary development of a legal rule" as the respondent tries to do with Stanley in an attempt to extend the right to private possession of obscenity beyond the home. Line drawing, "thus far, but not beyond," he notes, is commonplace in judicial decision making, and he adds that if "the precise, carefully limited holding of Stanley" included the importation of obscene material, it "would not be law today." There is no correlative right to buy, sell, give to others, or import obscene material. Nor is there a correlative right to transport it in interstate commerce as declared in United States v. Orito (1973), a companion case in the Burger Court reevaluation of the Court's obscenity jurisprudence.

Douglas's dissent offers historical documentation for his absolutist stance on the absence of any authority under the First Amendment to censor purported obscene material. Brennan simply refers to his dissents in Miller and in Paris Adult Theatre I for the reasons why he opposes the majority's decision.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Miller v. California*, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
- Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton*, 413 U.S. 49 (1973)
- Stanley v. Georgia*, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)
- United States v. 12 200-Ft Reels of Super 8mm Film*, 413 U.S. 123 (1973)
- United States v. Orito*, 413 U.S. 139 (1973)

UNITED STATES v. THIRTY-SEVEN (37) PHOTOGRAPHS, 402 U.S. 363 (1971)

In this companion case to U.S. v. Reidel (1971), the Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of a federal statute prohibiting the importation of obscene photographs in light of Stanley v. Georgia's (1969) protection of the "mere private possession" of obscene material.

Customs agents seized photographs Luros had brought into the United States after a trip to Europe and turned them over for forfeiture proceedings. Luros counterclaimed before a three-judge federal court. The court ruled the federal statute was constitutionally invalid, first, because it lacked time limits within which forfeiture proceedings could be started as required by an earlier Supreme Court decision and, second, because it banned obscene material for private use contrary to the Stanley decision.

In a fractured vote, the Supreme Court reversed the lower court's decision and remanded it to the lower court. White wrote the opinion. Five justices joined Part I of White's opinion, which "read in" time limits that were absent from the statute to avoid striking it down. Part II of the decision addressed the challenge based on Stanley and attracted only three justices (Burger, Brennan, and Blackmun) for a plurality. Harlan and Stewart writing separately concurred with the judgment and Part I of White's opinion but declined to join Part I. Black, joined by Douglas, dissented. Marshall also dissented.

Most of White's opinion was taken up by Part I and the majority's justification for construing and enunciating a time schedule for forfeiture proceedings including judicial review under the federal statute. Part II is relatively brief as White relies on Reidel to assert by analogy that if Congress can prevent the mails from being used to distribute obscene literature then it also has the authority to remove from the "channels of commerce" obscene photographs being imported into the country. The private use or possession of obscene material under Stanley is of no matter, because "a port of entry is not a traveler's home." And, because customs officials routinely inspect luggage, the right to be left alone "neither prevents the search of...luggage nor the seizure of unprotected but illegal materials" in a traveler's private possession. Stanley, in other words, does not extend "to one seeking to import obscene materials from abroad, whether for private use or public distribution."

Marshall's dissent, published as part of the Reidel opinion, pointed out that the photographs were taken from Luros' luggage and that they were "in his purely private possession" and that they "threatened neither children nor anyone else." If and when some of the photographs were published, Marshall argued, the government would have the opportunity to implement the law, because their publication would take place publicly through commercial distribution. The “magnitude of the threats” created by the photographs would “best be assessed when distribution actually occurs.” Justice Black’s more detailed dissent also referred obliquely to the issue of prior restraint that was implicit in the plurality opinion.

Taken in tandem, Reidel and Thirty-Seven Photographs were efforts by the Court, if not to rein in the genie that Stanley released from the bottle to at least clarify and reaffirm the Court’s support for Roth and the exception it made to the First Amendment’s protection of free speech and press.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Stanley v. Georgia*, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)
- United States v. Thirty-Seven (37) Photographs (Luros, Claimant)*, 402 U.S. 363 (1971)
- United States v. Reidel*, 402 U.S. 351 (1971)

UNITED STATES v. 92 BUENA VISTA AVENUE, 507 U.S. 111 (1993)

This was one of four forfeiture cases decided during the 1992 term of the Supreme Court, all against the government. In Buena Vista, a drug trafficker had given his girlfriend $240,000 to purchase a home for herself and her three children. When the government subsequently sought to forfeit her home as an asset “traceable” to illegal drug proceeds pursuant to 21 U.S.C. 881(a)(6), she asserted that the statute’s “innocent owner” defense applied, because she had no knowledge of the gift’s tainted origin. Justice Stevens’ plurality opinion is remembered for its holding that the statute’s innocent owner defense applies not only to someone who innocently purchases a tainted asset but also to someone who innocently receives it as a gift. This holding was effectively nullified by the Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act of 2000, which made the defense largely unavailable to the recipient of a gift.

Presumably Congress thought it was less important to protect such unwitting recipients than to deny a wrongdoer the opportunity to “launder” tainted assets by transferring them.

However, the case is also important because to reach its conclusion, the Court had to resolve other statutory ambiguities regarding the operation of forfeiture and the applicability of the common law “relation-back” doctrine. The government had argued, inter alia, that the claimant was not an owner at all (and thus not entitled to the statute’s innocent owner defense), because under the “relation back” forfeiture doctrine, the government became owner of the money at the time of the drug crime, and owner of any assets subsequently purchased with it. In rejecting this contention, the Court held that the government becomes owner only after a legal judgment of forfeiture; only after such a judgment does the relation back doctrine apply to retroactively vest the government’s title back to time of the crime. Because the government had not yet won a judgment, the claimant was an owner entitled to raise the defense. Both the statute’s innocent owner defense and the liberal interpretation applied in this case reflect some discomfort with the legal fiction that underpins civil forfeiture doctrine: that the inanimate object itself, not its owner, is the guilty party.

ERIC D. BLUMENSON

References and Further Reading

- Department of Justice, Asset Forfeiture Law and Practice Manual, June 1998.
- Kessler, Steven L., Civil and Criminal Forfeiture: Federal and State Practice § 6.01, 1993.
- Smith, David B. Prosecution and Defense of Forfeiture Cases. Matthew Bender.

See also Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co, 416 U.S. 663 (1974); Civil Asset Forfeiture

UNITED STATES v. AGURS, 427 U.S. 97 (1976)

In Agurs, the Supreme Court refined its test from Brady v. Maryland for deciding whether the due process clause requires a new trial when the government withholds exculpatory information from a criminal defendant.

Agurs, a prostitute, killed a customer, Sewell. At Agurs’ murder trial, her attorney unsuccessfully argued that she acted in self-defense after Sewell attacked her with a knife.

After her conviction, Agurs’ attorney discovered that Sewell had been convicted of assault and illegally carrying weapons. Agurs moved for a new trial, arguing that the prosecution's failure to disclose Sewell's record violated Brady. The trial judge denied the motion, but an appellate court ordered a new trial.

The Supreme Court reinstated Agurs' conviction by a vote of seven to two. The Court first rejected the prosecution's argument that it must disclose information only when the defense specifically requests it and instead held that prosecutors must turn over exculpatory information even without a request. However, the Court ruled, failure to turn over "Brady material" requires a new trial only if disclosure reasonably likely would have changed the outcome of the trial. Because the jury knew that Sewell was carrying knives, the Court concluded that disclosure of his record likely would not have changed the outcome.

Agurs is important, because it defined both the prosecution's duty to disclose exculpatory information and the standard to be used when such information is withheld. In subsequent cases, including Pennsylvania v. Ritchie and Arizona v. Youngblood, the Court has further refined the Brady standard.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

Imwinkelried, Edwin, and Norman Garland. Exculpatory Evidence. 2nd ed. Michie, 1996.

Stacy, Tom, The Search for Truth in Constitutional Criminal Procedure, Columbia Law Review 91 (1991): 1369.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988)

Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963)

Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39 (1987)

See also Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988); Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963); Due Process; Fourteenth Amendment

UNITED STATES v. ASH, 413 U.S. 300 (1973)

A right to counsel's presence during an eyewitness identification procedure exists to avert suggestive procedures and prevent convicting the innocent (United States v. Wade). In United States v. Ash, the Court decided this right would not generally extend to photographic identification procedures. Wade was already indicted when he was presented in person in a lineup with other individuals, and the eyewitness then chose him. Ash, too, had been indicted and had counsel appointed when his photo was included in an array of five photos displayed to eyewitnesses in pretrial interviews with the prosecutor. Ash argued his counsel should have been notified and allowed to attend these interviews to avert suggestiveness. Although these post-indictment non-corporeal identification procedures occurred in the course of the Sixth Amendment's criminal prosecution, see Kirby v. Illinois, the majority held there was no right to counsel so long as the photographs were preserved for examination at trial. This was not a critical stage in the criminal prosecution necessitating the presence of counsel, because it could be accurately reconstructed by retention of the photos, the defendant's absence distinguished this from trial-like confrontations where counsel was required, and the prosecutor should be allowed to interview its witnesses before trial without defense counsel's presence. Dissenters urged suggestive influences may be subtly brought to bear by the method of presentation of the photos and that preserving the photos would not detect or avert such prejudice. Due process arguments may still be made regarding photographic identification procedures.

UNITED STATES v. BALSYS, 524 U.S. 666 (1998)

MARGERY M. KOOSD

References and Further Reading

American Law Institute. A Model Code of Pre-Arrest Procedure, Proposed Official Draft and Commentary. (1975): 419-458.

Grano, Joseph D., Kirby, Biggers, and Ash, Do Any Constitutional Safeguards Remain against the Danger of Convicting the Innocent? Michigan Law Review 72 (1985): 717-798.

Levine, Felice J., and June L. Tapp, The Psychology of Criminal Identifications: The Gap from Wade to Kirby, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 121 (1973): 1079-1131.

Moore v. Illinois, 434 U.S. 220 (1977).

Panel Discussion, The Role of the Defense Lawyer at a Lineup in Light of the Wade, Gilbert, and Stovall Decisions, Criminal Law Bulletin 4 (1968): 273-296.

Cases and Statutes Cited

United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)

Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263 (1967)

Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682 (1972)

Manson v. Brathwaite, 430 U.S. 98 (1977)

See also Eyewitness Identification; Due Process; Lineups; Right to Counsel

UNITED STATES v. BALSYS, 524 U.S. 666 (1998)

This decision toes the line of cases declining to extend beyond U.S. borders certain civil liberties guaranteed by the Constitution. Aloyzas Balsys, a U.S. permanent resident, emigrated from Lithuania in 1961.

Thirty years later, the Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations came to suspect that during World War II Balsys had helped Nazis to persecute persons on account of race, religion, or political opinion. Balsys refused to reply to questions about this at an immigration hearing. He invoked the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination on the ground his answers might be used against him in a criminal trial—not in the United States, where the worst he faced was deportation, but in Lithuania, the country to which he would be deported. Resolving disagreement in courts below, justices held seven to two that witnesses might be compelled to testify in the United States even though a foreign prosecutor might use that testimony against them. Justice David Souter's majority opinion interpreted precedents to mean that the privilege binds only federal or state governments and not governments outside the United States. A concern underlying the privilege—that forced self-incrimination improperly harms human dignity—was said not to compel a different result. The Court held that an exception might occur if the United States were colluding with the foreign government; however, the extensive U.S.–Lithuania cooperation in Balsys' case did not rise to that level. At a time of increasing cross-border law enforcement cooperation, Balsys stands as an obstacle to assuring full protection of individual rights.

DIANE MARIE AMANN

References and Further Reading

- Amann, Diane Marie., A Whipsaw Cuts Both Ways: The Privilege against Self-Incrimination in an International Context, UCLA Law Review 45 (1998): 5: 1201–1295.
- , International Decisions: United States v. Balsys, American Journal of International Law 92 (1998): 4: 759–764.
- Seidmann, Daniel J., and Alex Stein. The Right to Silence Helps the Innocent: A Game-Theoretic Analysis of the Fifth Amendment Privilege, Harvard Law Review 114 (2000): 2: 430–510.

Cases and Statutes Cited

United States v. Balsys, 524 U.S. 666 (1998)

See also Constitution Overseas

UNITED STATES v. BRIGNONI-PONCE, 422 U.S. 873 (1975)

Two border patrol officers seated in their car late at night were watching cars drive by a border checkpoint that had been closed because of bad weather. The officers pursued a car, stopped it, questioned, and arrested its three occupants when the officers learned two of them were undocumented aliens. The officers claimed that the only reason for the stop had been the occupants' Mexican appearance.

The driver was convicted of knowingly transporting illegal immigrants. He challenged his conviction on the grounds that the testimony of the undocumented aliens had to be suppressed because their seizure was illegal. The Court affirmed the lower court's reversal of the conviction reasoning that the Fourth Amendment prohibited random, roving patrol stops in areas near the border. The Court interpreted the Fourth Amendment to permit Border Patrol officers to briefly stop vehicles in areas near the border and question the occupants to determine whether they were legally in the United States if the officers had a reasonable suspicion that the vehicle was carrying undocumented aliens. The fact that the vehicle's occupants were of Mexican ancestry or appearance could be used as a factor to establish reasonable suspicion but could not alone justify the stop. Reasonable suspicion consists of specific facts, like the characteristics of the area, the usual patterns of traffic, previous experience with alien traffic, the proximity of the border, information about recent illegal border crossings, the driver's behavior, the vehicle itself, and the characteristics of the persons in the vehicle that establish the likelihood that the vehicle carries undocumented aliens.

The case is one of the first modern Supreme Court cases to deal with the issue of racial profiling.

M. ISABEL MEDINA

See also Exclusionary Rule; Race and Criminal Justice; Race and Immigration; Noncitizens and Civil Liberties; Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), Undocumented Migrants

UNITED STATES v. CALANDRA, 414 U.S. 338 (1974)

The Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule directs that if evidence is seized in violation of a defendant's protection against unreasonable searches and seizures, it cannot be used at trial to prove his guilt. In United States v. Calandra, the Supreme Court considered whether the exclusionary rule should apply to grand jury investigations.

Federal agents searched Calandra's office and found a document that suggested Calandra might be receiving payments from an extortion victim. Calandra was subpoenaed to the grand jury to be questioned about that document. Although he received “testimonial and use immunity,” he still refused to testify, asserting that the document had been seized illegally, and therefore to allow the government to use it to question him in the grand jury would violate his Fourth Amendment rights. After a hearing, a federal judge agreed with Calandra on both points.

On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the lower court never should have held the hearing in the first place, because the exclusionary rule does not apply to grand jury investigations. The Court gave two reasons: the nature of the exclusionary rule and the nature of the grand jury.

The main purpose of the exclusionary rule, the Court stressed, is to deter police misconduct. Therefore, if applying the rule in a particular case is unlikely to deter other police from acting similarly in another case, there is no sense in applying the rule. Because it is unlikely police would conduct an unlawful search merely to gather material to ask someone questions in a grand jury, applying the rule in such a case would have little deterrent effect on future police conduct.

Moreover, applying the rule to grand jury investigations could interfere significantly with the grand jury's ability to fulfill its historic role: to decide whether a crime has been committed and, if so, who should be charged. A grand jury, the Court stressed, has the authority to investigate pretty much anything it wants and to consider whatever evidence it considered relevant, even if that evidence would not be admissible at trial. Permitting a witness to challenge the evidence used to question him would slow the process down without any significant deterrent impact on future police misconduct. Thus the rule has no application during grand jury investigations.

CLIFFORD S. FISHMAN

References and Further Reading

Exclusionary Rule: United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974); 65 Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 460 (1974); Barone, Joseph J., Calandra—The Present Status of the Exclusionary Rule, 4 Cap. University Law Review 95 (1974–1975); Erb, John C., An Unexcited View of United States v. Calandra, Chicago-Kent Law Review 51 (1974–1975): 212; Marks, Thomas C. Jr., Mark A., Hanley, and Mark Thomas Luttier, Personal Right to Exclusion—A Criticism of United States v. Calandra, Stetson Law Review 9 (1979–1980): 309.

LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure: a Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. 4th Ed. West, 2004, sections 1.6(a), 1.6(c), 1.7(b).

See also Exclusionary Rule

UNITED STATES v. CRUIKSHANK, 92 U.S. 542 (1876)

The aftermath of the American Civil War was marked by the passage of a series of constitutional amendments and federal laws designed to establish and preserve the civil rights of African Americans. Most significantly, the Fourteenth Amendment, ratified in 1868, provided for equal protection of the law for all American citizens and prohibited the deprivation of a citizen's “life, liberty, or property without due process of law.” Congress extended these protections in 1870 by passing the first Enforcement Act, which forbade two or more private citizens from depriving another citizen of his or her civil rights, making such conduct a felony under federal law.

These federal measures helped to stymie efforts to preserve the system of white supremacy that survived in the former Confederate states after the abolition of slavery. In reaction to these measures, white supremacists sought to preserve the southern racial caste system through state and local “Jim Crow” laws enforcing racial segregation and through the extralegal activities of paramilitary terror groups such as the Ku Klux Klan. Lynchings, or the enforcement of mob justice through public beatings and executions, became commonplace in many areas of the American South, in direct violation of the Enforcement Act.

Among the first persons charged with violating the Act was William J. Cruikshank, who along with approximately eighty co-conspirators was indicted for the lynching of two African-American men on April 13, 1873, for trying to vote in a local election. United States Attorney J. R. Beckwith had sought indictment of the co-conspirators on Federal charges, because the murder of an African American by a white person was not a crime under existing Louisiana law. The Federal Circuit Court for Louisiana convicted Cruikshank and the other defendants; after which the U.S. Supreme Court agreed to hear the case on appeal during the fall term of 1874. The prosecution, assisted by U.S. Attorney General Edwards Pierpont and Solicitor General Samuel F. Phillips, argued that the Fourteenth Amendment provided a basis for the 1870 Enforcement Act by giving the federal government the authority to prosecute violators of citizens' civil rights. The defense team, headed by David Dudley Field, countered that the Fourteenth Amendment only protected citizens against government violations of civil rights, not against the oppressive acts of private citizens. In October of 1875, the Court ruled unanimously that prosecution of the defendants under federal law was unconstitutional, because state law was primarily responsible for protecting citizens from each other.

As a result of the Court's decision, victims of civil rights abuses were left to seek protection from state courts, which were often uninterested in safeguarding the civil rights of southern blacks. The decision led to a variety of civil rights abuses, including a proliferation of state and local segregation laws, poll taxes and literacy tests designed to deny the vote to African Americans, and a continuation of racial intimidation and violence. Not until the passage of the federal civil rights legislation of the 1960s would African Americans receive full protection of their civil rights under federal law.

MICHAEL H. BURCHETT

References and Further Reading

- Foner, Eric. "The New View of Reconstruction." American Heritage 34 (October–November 1983): 6: 10–16.
- Neely, Mark E. The Fate of Liberty: Abraham Lincoln and Civil Liberties. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Nieman, Donald G. Promises to Keep: African Americans and the Constitutional Order, 1776 to the Present. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Tomlins, Christopher, ed. The United States Supreme Court: The Pursuit of Justice. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Fourteenth Amendment to U.S. Constitution, USCA Cons. Amend. 14s 1 Enforcement Act, Act of May 31, 1870, c. 6, 16 Stat. 141

See also Civil Rights Act of 1964; Federalization of Criminal Law; Freedom of Association; Thirteenth Amendment

UNITED STATES v. DIONISIO, 410 U.S. 1 (1973)

The government, seeking to identify people overheard on a court-authorized wiretap, issued a subpoena directing Dionisio to appear before the grand jury and give a voice exemplar. In United States v. Mara, 410 U.S. 19 (1973), a companion case decided the same day, a subpoena required production of a handwriting exemplar. Dionisio and Mara each refused, claiming the subpoena violated their Fourth and Fifth Amendment rights. The Supreme Court upheld the subpoenas, ruling that unless they complied, they could be held in contempt of court.

The Fourth Amendment protects against unreasonable searches and seizures. The Court held that, unlike a case where a suspect is forcibly taken into custody without probable cause to obtain an exemplar, there is nothing "unreasonable" about being subpoenaed: except in rare situations, everyone is required to comply with a subpoena to testify or produce physical evidence. Moreover, as the Court held in Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967) the Fourth Amendment protects only "reasonable expectations of privacy"; it does not objects or information that a person "knowingly exposes to the public." A person's voice and handwriting clearly fall into the latter, unprotected, category.

As to the Fifth Amendment, the Court reiterated its prior rulings in United States v. Wade, 388 218 (1967), involving lineups, and in Schmerber v. United States, 384 U.S. 757 (1966), involving a blood sample taken from a drunk driver, that the privilege against compelled self-incrimination only bars compelling "communications" or "testimony," not "physical characteristics." Because a person's voice and handwriting are physical characteristics, not "communications," the Court held, the Fifth Amendment does not protect a suspect from having to provide exemplars to the government.

CLIFFORD S. FISHMAN

References and Further Reading

- Etling, Sheryl B., United States v. Dionisio—Fourth Amendment and Grand Jury Investigations, UMKC Law Review 42 (1973–1974): 244.
- The Exclusionary Rule: United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1 (1973), United States v. Mara, 410 U.S. 9 (1973), Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 64 (1973): 414.
- Harvard Law Review November, 1973 The Supreme Court, 1972 Term 2. Applicability of Fourth Amendment to Grand Jury Subpoenas, Harvard Law Review 87 (1973): 204.

Cases and Statutes Cited

United States v. Mara, 410 U.S. 19 (1973)
Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967)
United States v. Wade, 388 218 (1967)
Schmerber v. United States, 384 U.S. 757 (1966)

See also Privacy; Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background

UNITED STATES v. EICHMAN, 496 U.S. 310 (1990)

See Flag Burning

UNITED STATES v. GRIMAUD,
220 U.S. 506 (1911)

The Forest Reserve Act of 1891, and subsequent amending Acts, gave the president the power to establish forest preserves. The Act included various statutes governing use of the forests and delegated to the Secretary of Agriculture the power to establish rules and regulations to further Congressional intent with respect thereto. Congress also set punishment for violations of the statutes or the regulations. Among the regulations subsequently promulgated by the secretary was a requirement that the grazing of more than six head of livestock within the forest required a permit.

Grimaud was indicted for grazing sheep on the Sierra Forest Reserve without a permit. He alleged that the Forest Reserve Act was an unconstitutional attempt by Congress to delegate its legislative powers to an administrative officer.

Determining the line that separates the power of the legislature to make laws from administrative authority to make regulations is difficult. The Court found that although grazing was prohibited through regulations established by the secretary rather than by Congress, such a determination was an administrative detail. After Congress has indicated its will, it can lawfully give others the “power to fill up the details” by establishing administrative rules and regulations to carry out that will.

The Court noted that the secretary could not make regulations for any and all purposes but only those that clearly relate to the matters authorized by Congress. A key factor in the decision was the fact that violation of the rules was made a crime and punishment fixed by Congress, not by the secretary.

The case resolved a longstanding conflict of authority within the lower federal courts and was a milestone in establishing the ability of Congress to regulate land use, and its authority to delegate to federal agencies rule-making ability in furtherance thereof.

STEPHEN WATKINS

References and Further Reading

Stern, Bill Steven, Permit Value: A Hidden Key to the Public Land Grazing Dispute, M.A. Thesis, The University of Montana, 1998 (available at: “<http://www.rangenet.org/directory/stern/thesis/index.html>”).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Forest Reserve (or “General Revision”) Act of 1891, 26 Stat. 1103; 16 U.S.C. 471
Organic Administration Act, 30 Stat. 34; 16 U.S.C. 473

See also Due Process; Federalization of Criminal Law

UNITED STATES v. HAVENS,
446 U.S. 620 (1980)

This opinion made it easier for the government to impeach defendants for false statements given during trial, allowing impeachment even based on statements given during cross-examination as long as the subject matter was “reasonably suggested” on direct examination. Havens and an acquaintance, both attorneys from Indiana, were stopped by customs returning to the United States from Peru. The other man was carrying cocaine that had been sewn into his shirt. He implicated Havens, whose luggage was searched without a warrant, revealing a T-shirt whose holes matched the patches in his accomplice’s shirt. During cross-examination at trial, Havens denied any knowledge of the cocaine or the shirt in his luggage, but these misstatements impeached his credibility and helped convict him of smuggling cocaine. The Court of Appeals reversed his conviction, charging that illegally obtained evidence—here gained without a warrant—could only be used to impeach a witness if it contradicts a defendant’s statement on direct examination. Although the Fourth Amendment protects citizens from illegal searches and seizures, the Court had already undermined that protection by allowing illegally seized evidence to be used at trial. The Supreme Court further relaxed the rule by allowing that a defendant’s statements during cross-examination can also be the basis for impeachment, even if the impeachment relies on illegally obtained evidence. The Court emphasized the underlying goal of seeking the truth in criminal trials, which overcame the procedural barriers set up by prior cases against using information gained during cross-examination. The dissenting opinion aptly cast this decision as part of a trend in the Court of undermining the rights of criminal defendants.

DAVID D. BURNETT

References and Further Reading

The Exclusionary Rule: Impeachment Exception Broadened to Include Statements First Elicited Upon Cross-Examination—United States v. Havens, DePaul Law Review 30 (1980): 225–242.

United States v. Havens: Impeachment by Illegally Obtained Evidence, Syracuse Law Review 32 (1981): 637–679.

Williams, Teresa Sigmon, Recent Development: Criminal Law and Procedure—Evidence—Impeachment of Cross-Examination Response with Suppressed Evidence, Tennessee Law Review 48 (1981): 721–740.

Cases and Statutes Cited

United States v. Havens, 446 U.S. 620 (1980)

See also Administrative Searches and Seizures; Airport Searches; Arrest without a Warrant; Automobile Searches; Due Process in Immigration; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants; War on Drugs; Warrantless Searches

UNITED STATES v. KAHRIGER, 345 U.S. 22 (1953)

Congress has no general power to police vice; that power belongs instead to the states. On the other hand, Congress can regulate, even prohibit, commerce across state lines, and Congress's power to tax is very broad indeed. Congress has long used taxes to discourage transactions it could not prohibit. In this case, a bookie complained of provisions of the Revenue Act of 1951 obliging those who took wagers to register with the federal government so that they might be taxed on that business. Where state law prohibited gambling, those registering risked state prosecution, while those refraining risked federal prosecution. The law made no exception for bookies who operated only locally. When Kahriger was prosecuted for failing to register, he argued successfully that the charges be dropped because the law amounted to abuse by Congress of its taxing power to achieve what the Constitution otherwise foreclosed. He relied heavily on U.S. v. Constantine (1935). In that case, the Court had concluded that a similar tax on liquor vendors was really a penalty beyond the scope of federal power after repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment and could not be sustained just because it took the form of a tax. By 1953, however, the Court had grown more receptive to federal solutions for national problems. The decision below in Kahriger's favor was reversed and the wagering excise provisions were upheld. Constantine was distinguished on the grounds that the tax in that case applied only to a business prohibited by state law, whereas the tax in this case applied to wagering without regard to its legality under state law. The Court preferred to follow its line of cases upholding federal taxes on the businesses of issuing private bank notes, Veazie Bank v. Fenno (1869), and selling margarine, McCray v. United States (1904), marijuana, United States v. Sanchez (1950), narcotics, United States v. Doremus (1919), or firearms, Sonzinsky v. United States (1937). As the Court now saw things, evidence that Congress intended to discourage a certain activity that it could not regulate does not make unconstitutional a tax proper in its form.

Kahriger also argued that compulsory registration violated his privilege against self-incrimination, but the Court took the view that registration amounted only to a declaration of intent to take wagers in the future, rather than a confession to taking them in the past. In Marchetti v. United States (1968), the Supreme Court changed its mind on this point, striking down the wagering tax because it coerced confession in violation of the Fifth Amendment.

JOHN PAUL JONES

References and Further Reading

Salzburg, Stephen, The Required Records Doctrine: Its Lessons for the Privilege against Self-Incrimination, University of Chicago Law Review 6 (1986): 53.
Steed, Thomas W., Jr., (Note) Constitutional Law—Taxation—Federal Excise and Operational Tax on Wagering, North Carolina Law Review 31 (1953): 467.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39 (1968)
McCray v. United States, 195 U.S. 27 (1904)
Sonzinsky v. United States, 300 U.S. 506 (1937)
United States v. Constantine, 296 U.S. 287 (1935)
United States v. Doremus, 249 U.S. 86 (1919)
United States v. Kahriger, 345 U.S. 22 (1953)
United States v. Sanchez, 340 U.S. 42 (1950)
Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 533 (1869)

See also Federalization of Criminal Law; Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background

UNITED STATES v. LEE, 455 U.S. 252 (1982)

When a person's religious beliefs are at odds with actions of their government, and the person is required to support the government through taxes, there may be conflict. In deciding these conflicts, courts must weigh the government's interest in the tax program against the burden on the individual's rights under the free exercise clause of the First Amendment.

Mr. Edwin Lee was a member of the Old Order Amish who owned a farming and carpentry business. Mr. Lee, and other members of the Old Order Amish, believed it is a sin to participate in a system of governmental insurance like social security. Because of that belief, Mr. Lee did not pay social security and employment taxes for himself or his employees. The IRS assessed back taxes against Mr. Lee, and Mr. Lee sued the IRS. Mr. Lee based his suit on the free exercise clause and a provision in the tax code that allowed self-employed Amish an exemption from social security taxes under certain conditions.

The Supreme Court decided this case using the same analysis it had used in Wisconsin v. Yoder, when it ruled that Wisconsin's compulsory education laws unconstitutionally interfered with the free exercise rights of parents of Amish children. However, unlike in Wisconsin, in this case the Court did not require an accommodation on the part of the government. In a unanimous opinion, the Court ruled that there was no constitutional requirement for an exemption from social security taxes based on the free exercise clause. It also ruled that the existing statutory exemption only applied to the self-employed, not employers like Mr. Lee.

Without conducting an analysis of his religious beliefs, the Court accepted as a fact that forcing Mr. Lee to pay social security taxes interfered with his free exercise of religion. This followed the practice that the Court had previously articulated in Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Security Div. Then the Court analyzed the compulsory nature of the social security system. It determined that the government's interest in having a compulsory social security system was "very high." It likened social security taxes to income taxes and determined that the tax system could not function with different religious denominations challenging each use of taxes that violated their beliefs. A concurring opinion noted that it would not be difficult to provide the exemption, because it already existed in the tax code for self-employed Amish, but the remainder of the Court believed that providing exemptions on the basis of religious beliefs could undermine the social security system. Therefore, the constitution did not require an exemption. Later, in Employment Div. Dep't of Human Res. of Or. v. Smith, the Court ruled that there would be no constitutionally required exemption from generally applicable laws on the basis of the free exercise clause.

Although there was no constitutionally required exemption from social security taxes based on the free exercise clause, Congress was still free to expand the existing statutory exemptions. In 1988, Congress passed a law that provided the exemption to Amish employers and employees.

JAMES G. HARWOOD

References and Further Reading

Harwood, James G., Religiously-Based Social Security Exemptions: Who Is Eligible, How Did They Develop, and Are the Exemptions Consistent with the Religion Clauses and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA)? Akron Tax Journal 17 (2002): 1: 1–22.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)

Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Security Div., 450 U.S. 707 (1981)

Employment Div. Dep't of Human Res. of Or. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)

UNITED STATES v. LEON, 468 U.S. 897 (1984)

The Fourth Amendment prohibits governmental officials from carrying out unreasonable searches and seizures. Under the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule, evidence obtained by the government from an unconstitutional search will normally be excluded at the criminal trial.

In its landmark decision in Mapp v. Ohio (1961), the Supreme Court held that the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule applies in state criminal proceedings. The Court in Mapp found that the exclusionary rule is necessary to deter police violations of the Fourth Amendment. The decision in Mapp generated intense controversy and debate. In United States v. Leon (1984), the Supreme Court created a significant exception to the exclusionary rule. Under Leon, if a law enforcement officer conducts a search in good faith reliance on a search warrant issued by a magistrate that is not based on probable cause, the exclusionary rule does not apply. An officer acts in good faith when reliance on the warrant is objectively reasonable. In the companion case of Massachusetts v. Sheppard (1984), the Court held that the Leon good-faith exception also applies when the warrant fails to describe the place to be searched with sufficient particularity.

The Court's opinion in Leon reads like a brief against the exclusionary rule. The Court adopted the view that the exclusionary rule is not mandated by the Fourth Amendment but is merely a judicially created remedy. Furthermore, there is great cost in applying the rule in that it impedes the truth-finding function and allows some guilty defendants to go free. As Justice Cardozo famously put it, the "criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered." On the "benefit" side of the cost-benefit analysis, the Court found no empirical evidence to support the deterrence rationale behind the exclusionary rule. To the extent deterrence supports the rule, it is designed to deter Fourth Amendment violations by law enforcement officers, not by magistrates.

The decision in Leon states that the good-faith exception does not apply when (1) the police officer did not have an objectively reasonable belief that the warrant was supported by probable cause; (2) the warrant was based on a police officer's affidavit that knowingly or recklessly omitted or misstated material facts; (3) the execution of the warrant was unreasonable; or (4) the magistrate wholly abandoned his or her role as a neutral and detached magistrate, for example, by either “rubber stamping” police applications for warrants or by participating in the search.

The actual impact of Leon on the police and criminal prosecutions has probably not been great, because most searches are conducted without a warrant, for example, incident to a lawful arrest or with consent. Nevertheless, the decision is important because it revealed the Supreme Court’s distinctively negative attitude toward the exclusionary rule. Applying the rationale of Leon, the Court later held that the exclusionary rule does not apply when the officer’s search was based on his good faith reliance on a state statute later declared unconstitutional, Illinois v. Krull (1987) or on inaccurate law enforcement records attributable to an error by a court employee (Arizona v. Evans, 1995).

MARTIN A. SCHWARTZ

References and Further Reading

LaFave, W., J. Israel, and N. King. Criminal Procedure. 4th ed. 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Arizona v. Evans, 514 U.S. 1 (1995)
Illinois v. Krull, 480 U.S. 340 (1987)
Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
Massachusetts v. Sheppard, 468 U.S. 981 (1984)
United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984)
Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914)
Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949)

See also Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971); Exclusionary Rule; Probable Cause; Warrantless Searches

UNITED STATES v. LOVASCO, 431 U.S. 783 (1977)

An individual charged with firearms violations sought dismissal of the indictment on the ground that the delay between the commission of the offense and the initiation of the prosecution—more than eighteen months—was both unnecessary and prejudicial to his defense and thereby deprived him of due process of law.

In a previous case, United States v. Marion, the United States Supreme Court held that only a formal charge or an arrest triggers an individual’s Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial, and it stated that statutes of limitation provide the primary protection against overly stale criminal charges. Nevertheless, it acknowledged that “the Due Process Clause has a limited role to play in protecting against oppressive delay.”

In United States v. Lovasco, the Court examined that role. It concluded that although prejudice to an individual’s defense generally is a necessary condition for a due process violation, it is not a sufficient condition; rather, the reasons for the delay are also relevant. The Court then held that prosecuting an individual after a delay caused by the government’s further investigation of the criminal transaction in question does not deprive that individual of due process, even though the lapse of time might have somewhat prejudiced the individual’s defense. The Court strongly implied that pre-accusation delay would deprive an individual of due process only when the government undertakes delay “solely to gain tactical advantage over the accused” or recklessly disregards an appreciable risk that delay would impair the accused’s ability to mount an effective defense.

DAVID S. RUDSTEIN

References and Further Reading

LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 4th ed. St. Paul: Thompson-West, 2004, pp. 877–879.
Rudstein, David S., C. Peter Erlinder, and David C. Thomas. Criminal Constitutional Law. Newark and San Francisco: LexisNexis-Matthew Bender, 1990, 2004, pp. 11–48 to 11–56.

Cases and Statutes Cited

United States v. Marion, 404 U.S. 307 (1971)

See also Speedy Trial

UNITED STATES v. LOVETT, 328 U.S. 303 (1946)

The Bill of Attainder Clause of Article I of the Constitution prohibits any legislative act that inflicts punishment on an individual without judicial trial. In 1943, during the pre-Cold War anticommunist hysteria, the House Committee on American Activities, after hearings, determined that Lovett and two other federal employees were guilty of subversive activity. To force the executive branch to discharge these three employees, Congress adopted a rider to the Urgent Deficiency Appropriation Act of 1943, which denied the authority to pay salaries to these employees unless they were reappointed with the advice and consent of the Senate.

In Lovett, the Supreme Court concluded that the statute was an unconstitutional bill of attainder. Writing for the majority, Justice Black identified three elements that distinguish bills of attainder from legitimate legislative acts. First, the statutes are specific in that they are designed to apply to particular individuals. Second, the statutes punish these individuals by excluding them from their chosen vocation. Finally, the statutes accomplish the punishment of the named individuals without a judicial trial. Relying on legislative history, the Court found that the statute in Lovett clearly involved such punishment because it amounted to a congressional statement finding certain individuals guilty of subversive activity and sentencing them to the exclusion from governmental service. The Lovett decision halted congressional efforts to punish individuals by name in statutes.

PATRICK H. HAGGERTY

References and Further Reading

Tribe, Lawrence H. American Constitutional Law. 2nd ed. Mineola, NY: Foundation, 1988, pp. 641–656.

See also Bill of Attainder; World War II, Civil Liberties in

UNITED STATES v. MILLER, 307 U.S. 174 (1939)

The Supreme Court's most recent and most important decision on the meaning of the Second Amendment, United States v. Miller, developed from the enactment of the National Firearms Act of 1934, the first federal regulation of private firearms. It taxed and required the registration of automatic weapons and sawed-off shotguns. In 1939, the Act was challenged under the Second Amendment in Miller.

The government indicted Miller and a co-defendant for transporting an unregistered sawed-off shotgun in interstate commerce. A lower court found that the Act violated the Second Amendment. By a unanimous opinion, the Supreme Court found that the sawed-off shotgun was not among the "arms" protected by the Second Amendment absent "evidence tending to show that" its use or possession "at this time has some reasonable relationship to the preservation or efficiency of a well-regulated Militia." The Court concluded that it was not "within judicial notice" that a sawed-off shotgun was a weapon that was "any part of the ordinary military equipment" or whose use "could contribute to the common defence." Without such evidence, the Court could not "say that the Second Amendment guarantees the right to keep and bear such an instrument."

UNITED STATES v. MILLER, 425 U.S. 435 (1976)

Miller leaves open the question of whether the rights secured by the Second Amendment belong only to individuals, to the states, or to persons serving in state-organized militia units. Given widespread gun ownership and the demand for stricter gun controls, the debate over the rights secured by the Second Amendment will remain ongoing and lively.

PATRICK H. HAGGERTY

References and Further Reading

Kates, Don B., Handgun Prohibition and the Original Meaning of the Second Amendment, Michigan Law Review 82 (1983): 204–273.

Levinson, Sanford, The Embarrassing Second Amendment, Yale Law Journal 99 (1989): 637–659.

Tribe, Lawrence, American Constitutional Law. 3rd ed. New York, NY: Foundation, 2000, pp. 894–903.

Williams, David C., Civil Republicanism and the Citizen Militia: The Terrifying Second Amendment, Yale Law Journal 101 (1991): 551–615.

See also Gun Control/Anti-Gun Control; National Rifle Association (NRA); Right to Bear Arms (II)

UNITED STATES v. MILLER, 425 U.S. 435 (1976)

In United States v. Miller, the Supreme Court held that financial records possessed by third parties are not subject to Fourth Amendment protection. Federal agents issued subpoenas to banks for the financial records of the defendant. The defendant argued that the government needed a warrant to obtain the information. The Court concluded that the defendant lacked a reasonable expectation of privacy in the records because "the Fourth Amendment does not prohibit the obtaining of information revealed to a third party and conveyed by him to Government authorities." As the Court reasoned: "The checks are not confidential communications but negotiable instruments to be used in commercial transactions. All of the documents obtained, including financial statements and deposit slips, contain only information voluntarily conveyed to the banks and exposed to their employees in the ordinary course of business."

The Court's reasoning in Miller suggests that if information is in the hands of third parties, an individual can have no reasonable expectation of privacy in that information, and accordingly, the Fourth Amendment does not apply. Three years later, in Smith v. Maryland, the Court used similar reasoning to conclude that a list of telephone numbers that a person dialed was not protected by the Fourth Amendment, because the phone company had access to the information. This reasoning presents difficulties today because so much personal information is in the hands of third parties. People's information is maintained by stores, businesses, websites, employers, internet service providers, hospitals, and numerous other companies. If Miller applies this broadly, the government can learn a lot about a person's lifestyle, reading habits, political activity, and health with little limitation or judicial oversight.

DANIEL J. SOLOVE

References and Further Reading

- LaFare, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 3d ed. 2000. pp. 144–145.
- Solove, Daniel J., Digital Dossiers and the Dissipation of Fourth Amendment Privacy, Southern California Law Review 75 (2002): 1083–1168.
- Swire, Peter P., Financial Privacy and the Theory of High-Tech Government Surveillance, Washington University Law Quarterly 77 (1999): 461.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979)

See also Privacy; Search (General Definition)

UNITED STATES v. O'BRIEN, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)

On the morning of March 31, 1966, David Paul O'Brien mounted the steps of the South Boston Courthouse where he burned his Selective Service registration certificate, or "draft card."

O'Brien's actions were not only a provocative form of protest but also a crime. After widespread publicity about draft card burnings, in August 1965, Congress amended the Selective Service Act to make criminally liable anyone who "knowingly destroys" or "knowingly mutilates" a draft card. O'Brien was convicted of violating these provisions of the Act over his objection that the 1965 Amendment violated his First Amendment right to protest the draft and the Vietnam War through the "symbolic speech" of draft-card burning.

The United States Supreme Court rejected O'Brien's First Amendment argument. In doing so, the Court described a test to determine whether regulation of symbolic speech, or, as it is more typically labeled today, "expressive conduct," is constitutionally permissible. In a seven-to-one opinion, Chief Justice Warren established that such regulation would not be subjected to strict scrutiny, but would, instead, be upheld if it passed a four-part test. A regulation would be permissible if it: was within the "constitutional power of the Government"; it advanced "an important or substantial governmental interest"; that interest was not "the suppression of free expression"; and what incidental impact it had on free expression was no greater than necessary to accomplish the governmental interest. Applying the test to O'Brien's case, the Court upheld his conviction.

The O'Brien test, with its intermediate level of scrutiny, remains the standard by which the Court evaluates the regulation of such expressive conduct as nude dancing.

ROBERT N. STRASSFELD

References and Further Reading

- Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. 2nd ed. New York: Aspen Publishers, 2002. pp. 1026–1029.
- Foley, Michael S. Confronting the War Machine: Draft Resistance during the Vietnam War. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2003. pp. 20–26, 42–46, 281–282.
- Stone, Geoffrey R. Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime from the Sedition Act of 1798 to the War on Terrorism. New York: W.W. Norton & Co., 2004. pp. 471–477.

See also Barnes v. Glenn Theatre Inc., 501 U.S. 560 (1991); Draft Card Burning; Flag Burning; Intermediate Scrutiny Test in Free Speech Cases; O'Brien Content-Neutral Free Speech Test; Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61 (1981); Symbolic Speech

UNITED STATES v. ONE BOOK ENTITLED "ULYSSES," 72 E. 2ND 705 (1934)

The legal regime organized around the Hicklin rule was successfully challenged in 1934 when a Second Circuit Court of Appeals panel by a vote of two to one affirmed a lower court's decision lifting a federal ban on importing James Joyce's controversial Ulysses into the United States. Judges Learned Hand and his cousin Augustus Hand, who wrote the opinion, made up the majority; Martin T. Manton wrote the dissent.

Thirty years earlier, though, Learned Hand, then a federal district court judge, issued an opinion United States v. Kennerley (209 F. 119 [SDNY 1913]) that foreshadowed his position in Ulysses. He complied with the Hicklin rule in Kennerley but wondered whether Hicklin coincided with the "understanding and morality of the present time." He complained in particular that because two pages of the book in question in Kennerley might tempt minds "open to...immoral influences,” Hicklin required that the whole book be declared obscene. If courts continued to follow Hicklin, he wondered whether the rule would “reduce our treatment of sex to the standard of a child’s library.” In an intimation of the concept of “contemporary community standards” that would emerge in the 1980s, Hand asked, “[S]hould not the word ‘obscene’ be allowed to indicate the present critical point in the compromise between candor and shame at which the community may have arrived here and now?”

Two decades later, Hand’s urgings for a new rule were heeded by District Court Judge John M. Woolsey, when he ruled against the federal government’s motion to confiscate Ulysses under the 1930 Tariff Act. Ulysses had been a cause celebre for more than a decade. To take advantage of the book’s notoriety, its American publisher and his lawyer deliberately planned the book’s confiscation and the subsequent litigation so as to gain the most publicity and to enhance sales. Woolsey appraised Ulysses as a whole and refuted the Hicklin standard. According to Woolsey, the question should be whether “reading ‘Ulysses’ in its entirety” excites immorality by “its effect on a person with average sex instincts.”

Augustus Hand, charged with the responsibility for explaining the circuit’s ruling, dismissed United States v. Bennett (1879) that imported the Hicklin rule as not representing the law and distinguished Rosen v. United States (1896) as dealing with pictorial representations. Ulysses, first of all, was not obscene. “The book as a whole is not pornographic, and, while in not a few spots it is coarse, blasphemous, and obscene, it does not, in our opinion, tend to promote lust. The erotic passages are submerged in the book as a whole and have little resultant effect.” And, second, instead of the Hicklin rule, “the proper test of whether a given book is obscene is its dominant effect” and the “question in each case is whether a publication taken as a whole has a libidinous effect.”

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Gunther, Gerald. Learned Hand: The Man and the Judge. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1994.
- Moscato, Michael, and Leslie LeBlanc, eds. The United States of America v. One Book Entitled Ulysses by James Joyce. Frederick, MD: University Publications of America, 1984.
- Stevens, Kenneth R. “‘Ulysses’ on Trial.” in Joyce in Texas, edited by Dave Oliphant and Thomas Zigal. Austin, TX: Humanities Research Center, University of Texas, 1983.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Rosen v. United States*, 161 U.S. 29 (1896)
- United States v. One Book Entitled “Ulysses,”* 72 E. 2nd 705 (1934)
- United States v. Kennerley* (209 F. 119 [SDNY 1913])
- United States v. Bennett*, 24 F.Cas. 1093 (1879)

UNITED STATES v. PLAYBOY ENTERTAINMENT GROUP, 529 U.S. 803 (2000)

In 1996, Congress passed telecommunications legislation including provisions aimed at regulating children’s exposure to adult, “sexually oriented” programming on cable television. The result was a law that significantly restricted the access of all viewers—adults and children—to these programs. A five-justice majority of the Court held that this violated the First Amendment because an alternative provision of the law, which required these programs to be blocked on a house-by-house basis, as requested by cable subscribers, was an efficient alternative for preventing children from viewing adult channels.

Section 505 of the law provided cable television operators with two options—to “fully scramble or otherwise fully block” access to adult channels, or confine transmission to between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. Most operators chose the “time channeling” option; they could be held liable if scrambling did not prevent “signal bleed”—resulting in occasionally hearing or seeing portions of blocked programs. The Court observed that the effect was that “for two-thirds of the day no household in those service areas could receive the programming, whether or not the household or the viewer wanted to do so.”

The justices unanimously agreed that because Section 505 regulated the content of speech, it should be reviewed using strict scrutiny, requiring the government to show that a regulation furthers a compelling state interest and is the option that places the least restriction on the expression it regulates. However, five justices agreed that Section 505 did not pass this test because of the existence of Section 504 of the law, which only restricted a household’s access to adult programming on the consumer’s request. Cable consumers would be informed of this option either by mailings or advertisements on channels others than those showing the adult programming. The government argued that this was an ineffective alternative, because few consumers requested channel blocking. The Court concluded that the government failed to show that this was more likely to be the result of the ineffectiveness of notifying homeowners of this option than the absence of a pervasive problem of signal bleed enabling children to see sexually explicit programs. Therefore, Section 504 was held to be an effective alternative that placed fewer restrictions on speech than Section 505.

The unanimous agreement to subject the legislation to strict scrutiny moves the Court away from its attempt, in Denver Area Educational Telecommunications Consortium v. FCC, to formulate different standards of judicial review for different types of media. In Denver Area, the Court reasoned that this would allow the law to accommodate rapid technological advances. Playboy instead accommodates the free speech choices of the media's consumers. As the Court explained: "Technology expands the capacity to choose; and it denies the potential of this revolution if we assume the Government is best positioned to make these choices for us."

Although, as the Court itself acknowledged technological advances will limit the impact of this decision, Playboy remains significant, because legislation regulating the content of broadcast media will need to be narrowly written to survive the strict scrutiny test.

HELEN J. KNOWLES

References and Further Reading

- Olufs, Dick W., III. The Making of Telecommunications Policy. Boulder, CO: L. Rienner, 1999, pp. 89–90, 148–151.
- Yoo, Christopher S., The Rise and Demise of the Technology-Specific Approach to the First Amendment, Georgetown Law Journal 91 (January 2003): 2: 245–356.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Denver Area Educational Telecommunications Consortium v. FCC*, 518 U.S. 727 (1996)
- Telecommunications Act of 1996, Pub. L. 104-104, 110 Stat. 136

See also Cable Television Regulation; Content-Based Regulation of Speech

UNITED STATES v. RAMIREZ, 523 U.S. 65 (1998)

In United States v. Ramirez, police were given reliable information that a dangerous escaped prisoner—Alan Shelby—was residing with Hernan Ramirez and that the Ramirez home had a stockpile of weapons in the garage, so they obtained a "no-knock" warrant, a warrant that allows police to enter a residence without first announcing themselves. While executing the search warrant, police smashed in the garage window and pointed a gun through it to deter occupants from seizing the weapons. Awakened by the noise and believing he was being burglarized, Ramirez, a convicted felon, grabbed a weapon from his closet and fired it into the ceiling. Once Ramirez realized it was the police, he surrendered.

Ramirez was charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm, but the District Court and Ninth Circuit suppressed evidence on the ground that the police lacked the authority to destroy property (the garage window) while executing the no-knock warrant. The Supreme Court ruled that the search did not violate the Fourth Amendment. The Court relied on Richards v. Wisconsin, where the Court held that a no-knock entry is constitutional if the police have "reasonable suspicion" that knocking and announcing would cause injury or destruction of evidence. The Supreme Court determined that the destruction of property had nothing to do with the constitutionality of the no-knock search under Richards. Ramirez stands for the proposition that police do not need a higher justification or burden of proof if they destroy property when executing a "no-knock" warrant.

CODY STODDARD

References and Further Reading

- Hatcher, Susan, Recent Developments, American Journal of Criminal Law 25 (1998) 2:473–475.
- Hemmens, Craig, I Hear You Knocking: The Supreme Court Revisits the Knock and Announce Rule, UMKC Law Review 66 (1998): 3:559–602.
- Hemmens, Craig, and Chris Mathias, United States v. Banks: The "Knock and Announce" Rule Returns to the Supreme Court, Idaho Law Review 41 (2004): 1–36.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- United States v. Ramirez*, 523 U.S. 65 (1998)
- Richards v. Wisconsin*, 520 U.S. 385 (1997)

See also Search (General Definition); Search Warrant

UNITED STATES v. REIDEL, 402 U.S. 351 (1971)

The decision in this case was announced on the same day as the decision in United States v. Thirty-seven (37) Photographs (1971). Both cases emerged from challenges to federal laws based on the decision in Stanley v. Georgia (1969) that the Constitution protects the "private possession of obscene material" and that it also "protects the right to receive information and ideas...regardless of their social worth." Did Stanley mean, therefore, that federal laws prohibiting the mailing or importation of obscene material is unconstitutional when only willing adults are involved?

Reidel operated a publishing firm and mailed a booklet, "The True Facts about Imported Pornography," to an adult older than twenty-one who, unbeknownst to Reidel, was a postal inspector responding to an advertisement Reidel placed in a newspaper. A search of Reidel's business uncovered other mailed copies that had been returned as "undelivered" with no indication of the identities, ages, or willingness of the potential recipients to accept the booklet.

Reidel was indicted on three counts of violating the same federal law that had been at the center of the Roth decision. A federal district court judge struck down the law as infringing on Reidel's constitutionally protected right to deliver the booklet as outlined in Stanley v. Georgia. In a seven-to-two decision, the Supreme Court reversed the lower court. White wrote the majority opinion.

White declared the district court ignored Roth and the "express limitations" on Stanley's reach. The decision was too sweeping: "To extrapolate from Stanley's right to peruse obscene material in the privacy of his own home a First Amendment right in Reidel to sell it to him would effectively scuttle Roth, the precise result that the Stanley opinion abjured." The "right to receive" in Stanley did not immunize the distribution of obscenity that Roth held was unprotected by the First Amendment. According to White, Roth "squarely placed obscenity and its distribution outside the reach of the First Amendment, and they remain there today." Stanley, he emphasized, did not overrule Roth, and "we decline to do so now."

Marshall's concurrence seeks to correct the "disingenuous" contention that Stanley's conviction was overturned only because his residence was searched. In fact, the justice states, the case pivoted on the whether the material in Stanley's possession was publicly displayed or intended to be distributed. As Marshall's opinion in Stanley states, "States retain broad power to regulate obscenity; that power simply does not extend to mere possession by the individual in the privacy of his own home." Marshall stresses that Stanley was an assessment of state interests used to legitimate government regulation of obscenity. The possibility of antisocial behavior and its consequences was rejected as one reason for these laws, whereas those that protect children or unwilling adults from being exposed to obscene material were permissible.

Marshall thus supports reversing the lower court in this case, because Reidel mailed or attempted to mail obscene material even though it could end up in the hands of underage youths or children. Despite his declared intentions not to do so and the absence of any evidence that children had received the booklets, Marshall thought Reidel had not taken sufficient precautions to prevent this occurrence from happening. From Marshall's perspective, this was an important distinction compared with the companion case, United States v. Thirty-Seven (37) Photographs.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Roth v. United States*, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)
- Stanley v. Georgia*, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)
- United States v. Reidel*, 402 U.S. 351 (1971)
- United States v. Thirty-Seven (37) Photographs (Luros, Claimant)*, 402 US 363 (1971)

UNITED STATES v. ROBINSON, 414 U.S. 218 (1973)

The Fourth Amendment requires that any seizure or search by law enforcement be reasonable, which generally requires a warrant or an exception to the warrant requirement. In Chimel v. California, the Supreme Court held that incident to a lawful arrest, the police may search the arrestee and areas within her control to secure any weapons that might be used for escape or to resist arrest. United States v. Robinson broadened police authority to search after a lawful custodial arrest.

Robinson was lawfully stopped and arrested for driving without a valid license. The officer searched Robinson and discovered a cigarette pack containing heroin in his coat pocket. Robinson was convicted of a narcotics offense. The Court of Appeals reversed, finding that an officer may only fully search an arrestee to uncover further evidence of the crime. If the officer believed the arrestee was armed, he could only perform a limited frisk of the person's outer clothing.

The Supreme Court disagreed, noting settled precedent that a search incident to a lawful arrest is an exception to the warrant requirement. Although the authority for such a search is based on the necessity to disarm or uncover evidence, the lawful arrest itself provides the authority for the search. The Court established a bright-line rule that full searches are always reasonable.

The Court has consistently reaffirmed this rule in later cases, holding that as long as the custodial arrest was supported by probable cause, a full search incident to that arrest is valid.

MARGARET M. LAWTON

References and Further Reading

- Dressler, Joshua. Understanding Criminal Procedure. 3rd ed. LexisNexis Publishing, 2002, pp. 220–225.
- LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure: Criminal Practice Series. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999, vol. 2, Chapter 3, sec. 5(b).
- Moskowitz, Myron. A Rule in Search of a Reason: An Empirical Reexamination of Chimel and Belton, Wisconsin Law Review 657 (2002): 657–697.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Chimel v. California*, 395 U.S. 752 (1969)
- Knowles v. Iowa*, 525 U.S. 113 (1998)
- Terry v. Ohio*, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)

See also Arrest without a Warrant; Automobile Searches; Stop and Frisk

UNITED STATES v. SCHOON, 971 F.2D 193 (9TH CIR. 1991)

From the earliest days of our country's founding, civil disobedience has had a role in our political, social, and cultural debates. However, there continues to be debate over the proper role civil disobedience plays in our society.

In December 1989, thirty people gained admittance to the IRS office where they chanted "Keep America's tax dollars out of El Salvador" and splashed simulated blood throughout the office. Three individuals were arrested. At their bench trial, these individuals argued that their acts in protest of American involvement in El Salvador were necessary to avoid further bloodshed in that country and, therefore, requested that the jury be instructed on a necessity defense that even though they broke a minor law, their actions were justified because they tried to prevent a more serious harm. The district court precluded the necessity defense and the individuals appealed.

The Ninth Circuit distinguished indirect civil disobedience—violating a law or interfering with a governmental policy that is not, itself, the object of protest, with direct civil disobedience—protesting the existence of a law by breaking that law or by preventing the execution of that law in a specific instance in which a particularized harm would otherwise follow it. The Court found that the necessity defense is per se inapplicable to cases involving indirect civil disobedience. The result of Schoon is that juries will never get the opportunity to determine whether indirect civil disobedience actions were just.

PATRICK H. HAGGERTY

References and Further Reading

- Bauer, Steven M., and Peter J. Eckerstrom, Note, The State Made Me Do It: The Applicability of the Necessity Defense to Civil Disobedience, Stanford Law Review 39 (1987): 1173–1200.
- Cavallaro, James L., Jr., Note, The Demise of the Political Necessity Defense: Indirect Civil Disobedience and United States v. Schoon, California Law Review 81 (1993): 351–385.
- Schulkind, Laura J., Applying the Necessity Defense to Civil Disobedience Cases, New York University Law Review 64 (1989): 79–112.

UNITED STATES v. SCHWIMMER, 279 U.S. 644 (1929)

Because the privilege of American citizenship is so highly regarded, the United States government has established certain requirements individuals must meet before becoming a naturalized citizen. In U.S. v. Schwimmer, Schwimmer (a female Hungarian academic) wished to gain citizenship but refused to consent to part of the required oath of allegiance because she was a pacifist. The oath required a declaration that she would take up arms in defense of the country when required by law. The district court denied Schwimmer's application for citizenship, and the Court of Appeals reversed. The Supreme Court granted certiorari to determine whether Schwimmer's application was improperly denied.

The Court ruled (eight to one) that Schwimmer's application was properly denied, relying on the government's interest in being able to compel military service of its citizens if necessary. Furthermore, the Court ruled that Schwimmer's pacifism could hinder her ability to promote nationalism, which would hurt the nation's safety and interests. Two years later, in United States v. Macintosh, 283 U.S. 605 (1931), the Court reaffirmed Schwimmer by denying a citizenship application because the individual would fight only in a morally justified war. In 1946, however, Schwimmer and Macintosh were overturned by Girouard v. United States, 328 U.S. 61 (1946), where the Court finally determined that individuals whose religious faiths prevented them from complying with the entire oath of allegiance could still attain citizenship. The Court relied on America's tradition of religious tolerance, noting that fighting is just one of many ways individuals can support their country during war.

LEE R. REMINGTON

References and Further Reading

- Brownstone, David, and Irene M. Franck. Facts about Immigration. New York: H.W. Wilson Company, 2005.
- NISBCO: National Interreligious Service Board for Conscientious Objectors at <http://www.nisbco.org>.
- Reardon, Nora H. "Derivative Citizenship of the United States—the Law, Procedure, and Practice in Its Determination, and in the Issuance of Documentary Evidence of Such Status." (Lecture, INS Course of Study for Members of the Service). Jan. 7, 1943.
- Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. 3rd ed. New York: West Publishing Company, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Girouard v. United States*, 328 U.S. 61 (1946)
- United States v. Macintosh*, 283 U.S. 605 (1931)
- United States v. Schwimmer*, 279 U.S. 644 (1929)

See also Citizenship

UNITED STATES v. SEEGER, 380 U.S. 163 (1965)

This case is important for two reasons. One, it was the first case in which the Supreme Court was asked to decide whether a statutory provision that exempts certain persons, because of their religious beliefs, from having to obey a law that other persons have to obey violates one of the religion clauses of the First Amendment. Two, in its opinion in the case, the Court enunciated an expansive, modern definition of "religion."

The provision challenged in the case was section 6(j) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act, which exempts from compulsory military service any person "who, by reason of religious training and belief, is conscientiously opposed to participating in war in any form." It also defines "religious training and belief" as "an individual's belief in a relation to a Supreme Being involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation, but does not include essentially political, sociological, or philosophical views or a merely personal moral code."

The case arose when Daniel Seeger was indicted for refusing to submit to induction into the armed forces. His defense was that he was a conscientious objector to fighting and, therefore, should have been given an exemption from the draft on the basis of section 6(j) and alternatively that if the section did not apply to him, it should be declared in violation of the free exercise and establishment clauses of the First Amendment. The trial judge held both that Seeger was not entitled to an exemption because he did not believe in a Supreme Being and that section 6(j) did not violate either of the religion clauses. When the case was appealed, however, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, after noting that there were religions that did not believe in the existence of a Supreme Being, nullified the law on the grounds that it favored certain religions over others.

UNITED STATES v. SEEGER, 380 U.S. 163 (1965)

The Supreme Court agreed with neither of the lower courts. It held that under its interpretation of section 6(j), Seeger was entitled to an exemption from the draft. It thereby avoided having to deal explicitly with the constitutional issue raised by the Court of Appeals. In explaining the Court's interpretation of section 6(j), Justice Tom Clark, writing for the Court, asked, "Does the term 'Supreme Being' as used in §6(j) mean the orthodox God or the broader concept of a power or being, or a faith, 'to which all else is subordinate or upon which all else is ultimately dependent'?" His answer was the latter. He elaborated, "We believe that under this construction, the test of belief 'in a relation to a Supreme Being' is whether a given belief that is sincere and meaningful occupies a place in the life of its possessor parallel to that filled by the orthodox belief in God of one who clearly qualifies for the exemption." This way of defining religion is now generally called a functional definition of religion.

Since the Seeger decision, some scholars have argued that Clark's definition of religion is the one that the Court either does or should use for the word "religion" in the First Amendment. In Seeger, however, the Court was defining only the word "religion" in section 6(j), and in a later case, Wisconsin v. Yoder (1972), the Court implied that the word "religion" in the First Amendment does not have a broad, functional meaning, but it was unclear on exactly what "religion" does mean.

Given that it was clearly not what Congress intended, why did the Court broadly define "religion" in section 6(j)? Apparently it believed that if the law contained a theistic definition of religion, it was unconstitutional. Justice William O. Douglas' concurring opinion indicated that he thought section 6(j), without a broad definition of "religion," violated the free exercise clause. Also, in Welsh v. United States (1970), a case similar to Seeger, Justice John M. Harlan's concurring opinion and Justice Byron White's dissenting opinion both clearly implied that a majority of the Seeger Court thought that section 6(j) violated either the free exercise or the establishment clause because it granted draft exemptions only to religious conscientious objects and not to all conscientious objectors. In Seeger, the Court remedied this problem by broadly defining “religion.” Had it not done so, it might have felt compelled to nullify the draft exemption law, which would have eliminated, at least temporarily, exemptions from the draft during the Vietnam War and perhaps made the Court as unpopular as the war itself was.

ELLIS M. WEST

References and Further Reading

- Mansfield, John H. “Conscientious Objection—1964 Term.” in Religion and the Public Order 1965, edited by D. A. Giannella, 3–81. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1966.
- Rabin, Robert L., When Is a Religious Belief Religious: United States v. Seeger and the Scope of Free Exercise, Cornell Law Quarterly 51 (1966): 231–249.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Welsh v. United States*, 398 U.S. 333 (1970)
- Wisconsin v. Yoder*, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)
- Universal Military Training and Service Act, 50 U.S.C. App. 456(j)

See also Clark, Tom Cambell; Conscientious Objection, the Free Exercise Clause

UNITED STATES v. TATEO, 377 U.S. 463 (1964)

During an individual’s trial for multiple offenses, the judge announced that if the jury convicted the accused, he would impose a life sentence on one charge and consecutive sentences on the others. In response, the accused pleaded guilty, and the judge discharged the jury and sentenced the accused to imprisonment for a term of years. The accused subsequently succeeded in having his conviction set aside on the ground that his guilty plea was involuntary. When the government sought to retry the accused for the original offenses, the trial court dismissed the charges, because it concluded that a new trial would place the accused twice in jeopardy for the same offenses in violation of the double jeopardy clause.

In United States v. Tateo, however, the United States Supreme Court held that a retrial would not constitute double jeopardy. The Court reiterated the rule that the double jeopardy provision does not preclude the government from retrying an individual whose conviction is set aside at his own behest because of an error in the proceedings leading to that conviction. More importantly, though, the Court articulated the current rationale underlying the rule:

first, granting immunity from punishment to an accused because of a defect in the proceedings leading to his conviction is too high a price for society to pay; and second, reviewing courts might be less zealous in protecting against the effects of errors at trial if they knew that reversing an individual’s conviction would bar the government from further prosecuting that individual.

DAVID S. RUDSTEIN

References and Further Reading

- LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 4th ed., St. Paul: Thompson-West, 2004, pp. 1200–1201.
- Rudstein, David S. Double Jeopardy: A Reference Guide to the United States Constitution. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2004, pp. 98–106.

See also Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1 (1978); Double Jeopardy: Modern History

UNITED STATES v. THE PROGRESSIVE, INC., 467 F. SUPP. 990 (W.D. WIS. 1979)

One proposition the First Amendment stands for is that the government cannot, except in rare circumstances, prevent publication of harmful material; it must turn to after-publication remedies. Yet, in United States v. The Progressive, Inc., a court was confronted with material so explosive that it did issue a prepublication injunction known as a prior restraint.

The subject of the injunction was an article titled “The H-Bomb Secret How We Got It, Why We’re Telling It” that explained the secret to building the hydrogen bomb. The author of the article, Howard Morland, claimed that all the information contained in his article came from the public domain and that he merely gathered that information together. His purpose in writing the article was to pierce the veil of secrecy that had been laid over nuclear weapons, thereby stimulating public debate. In response to arguments that his article was too dangerous to be published, Morland argued that his article did not provide a blueprint for building a hydrogen bomb and that the major barrier to building such a nuclear weapon was in the production phase, not the design phase. Thus, even though his article might arguably advance a non-nuclear nation’s understanding of the physics of the hydrogen bomb, it would not result in immediate nuclear proliferation.

Twice before, the Supreme Court had denied requests for prior restraints. In Near v. Minnesota

(1931), the Court struck down a Minnesota law that authorized public officials to force a publisher to prove, before publication, that it was printing defamatory material that was true and with good motives. The opinion rested in part on the key distinction between a prior restraint and subsequent punishment; thus, the Court expressly took no view on whether the publisher could be punished by a defamation lawsuit after having made his scurrilous remarks. The Court did, however, note in passing that “[n]o one would question but that a government might prevent actual obstruction to its recruiting service or the publication of the sailing dates of transports or the number and location of troops.”

More recently, during the height of the Vietnam War, the Court in New York Times v. United States (1971) refused to enjoin the Washington Post and the New York Times from publishing excerpts from a secret U.S. government history of the war, despite the government’s claim that publication would cause irreparable damage. Each of the nine justices wrote a separate opinion, but the six in the majority were able to agree on a joint per curiam opinion stating that the government bore “a heavy burden” to show that a prior restraint was necessary and that the government failed to do so in that case.

However, the district court in The Progressive case agreed with the government that Morland’s article was too dangerous to be published. Although the court agreed with Morland that the article was probably not a blueprint, the court was concerned that the article might accelerate other nation’s developments of nuclear weapons. The court also rejected the notion that the public needed to understand the physics of nuclear weapons to debate their desirability.

Finally, the crux of the court’s reasoning came down to weighing of risks: “A mistake in ruling against The Progressive will seriously infringe cherished First Amendment rights,” but “[a] mistake in ruling against the United States could pave the way for thermonuclear annihilation for us all.” Put in such stark terms, the balance led the court to issue the injunction. However, six months after the district court issued the injunction, while the case was still on appeal, a newspaper published a letter that contained substantially the same content as Morland’s article, and the injunction was mooted. The Progressive subsequently published the article.

Ultimately, The Progressive can be seen as a cautious decision, perhaps overly so, in which a court conducted a form of balancing, by measuring the harm to civil liberties if the injunction were granted against the harm to society from the expected harm from the publication (that is, the likelihood of disaster times the magnitude of that disaster). Unfortunately, this sort of cost–benefit balancing is likely to burden civil liberties, because the value inherent in having robust civil liberties is abstract, whereas the potential harm to be averted (nuclear proliferation in this instance, perhaps terrorism in other instances) is so horrendous that the expected harm is too much to bear, even if the likelihood of the outcome is quite small.

TUNG YIN

References and Further Reading

Alderman, Ellen, and Caroline Kennedy. In Our Defense: The Bill of Rights in Action. New York: William Morrow & Co., 1991.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)

New York Times Co. v. United States (“The Pentagon Papers Case”), 403 U.S. 713 (1971)

See also Absolutism and Free Speech; Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931); New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971); Prior Restraints

UNITED STATES v. UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, 407 U.S. 297 (1972)

The Fourth Amendment has long been understood to require the government to secure a search warrant from a judicial officer before conducting a search. Electronic surveillance escaped this requirement until 1968, when Congress enacted a federal law requiring judge-issued warrants for “normal” electronic surveillance. The law, however, said that it was not meant to “limit the constitutional power of the President to protect the Nation against actual or potential attack or other hostile acts of a foreign power...[or] to protect the United States against the overthrow of the Government by force or other unlawful means, or against any other clear and present danger to the structure or existence of the Government.”

In United States v. United States District Court (1972), the government took the position that entirely domestic electronic surveillance was exempted from the statute’s warrant requirement if it were conducted for national security reasons. The defendants in the case were charged with conspiracy to destroy government property; one of them was also charged with bombing a CIA building in Detroit. Suspecting they had been the subjects of secret wiretaps, the defendants asked the trial court to force the government to admit whether it had conducted electronic surveillance. If the government had wiretapped them, the defendants wanted the trial court to determine whether information obtained from the wiretap had tainted the indictment.

The government admitted that it wiretapped telephones used by the defendants but argued that the electronic surveillance was lawful because it was undertaken “to protect the nation from attempts of domestic organizations to attack and subvert the existing structure of the Government.” It argued that disclosure of the facts underlying the electronic surveillance would harm national security.

In an eight-to-zero vote (Justice Rehnquist did not participate), the Supreme Court rejected the government’s argument. Justice Powell’s majority opinion first concluded that the federal electronic surveillance law did not grant the president any new powers to conduct warrantless searches; rather, the text of the law clearly indicated only that it did not take any pre-existing power away from the president to protect national security. Turning to the question that the president had the preexisting authority to conduct warrantless electronic surveillance, the Court, citing Katz v. United States (1968), noted that the Fourth Amendment was not limited to physical searches.

The Court rejected the government’s argument that a warrant requirement would interfere too much with the president’s duty to protect domestic security and would jeopardize national security by risking the compromise of informants and other secret assets. The Court was especially concerned that unchecked authority to conduct warrantless electronic surveillance would tempt the Executive Branch to persecute political enemies in the guise of national security. The Court also noted that Congress had trusted federal judges to handle a variety of cases involving sensitive information, such as cases of “espionage, sabotage, and treason.”

Finally, the Court emphasized that its decision was narrow in scope, leaving unaddressed whether the government could conduct warrantless electronic surveillance of “foreign powers or their agents.”

Justice Douglas joined Justice Powell’s opinion but added a short concurrence that highlighted past and contemporaneous instances of the excesses of the government in the name of national security. Justice White agreed that the government had to turn over the contents of the electronic surveillance of the defendants but argued that the case could be resolved on statutory grounds without having to decide the scope of the Fourth Amendment.

Six years later, Congress enacted the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (FISA) to address the question left unresolved in United States District Court regarding surveillance of foreign powers. Under FISA, the government can conduct electronic surveillance without a warrant for up to one year when the Attorney General certifies in writing that the surveillance is directed at communications solely between foreign powers and their agents, that it is unlikely that communications involving a “United States person” will be intercepted, and that there have been “minimization procedures” set forth that further reduce the chance that communications involving United States persons will be kept. Where communications involve a United States person as well as a foreign power or foreign agent, FISA requires that the government obtain a warrant from a special foreign intelligence court.

The significance of United States District Court lies in the Court’s conclusion that national security did not automatically trump the Fourth Amendment, as well as its prompting of Congress to pass the FISA.

TUNG YIN

References and Further Reading

Abrams, Norman. Anti-Terrorism and Criminal Enforcement. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2003, pp. 390–407.

Banks, William C., And the Wall Came Tumbling Down: Secret Surveillance after the Terror, University of Miami Law Review 57 (2003): 1147.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, Act of Oct. 25, 1978, 92 Stat. 1783

Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1968)

See also Berger v. New York, 388 U.S. 41 (1967); Electronic Surveillance, Technological Monitoring, and Dog Sniffs; Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1968); National Security; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants; Terrorism and Civil Liberties; Wiretapping Laws

UNITED STATES v. VERDUGO-URQUIDEZ, 494 U.S. 259 (1990)

On discovering that a stateside warrant had been issued for alleged drug lord Rene Martin Verdugo-Urquidez, Mexican police arrested and delivered him to United States authorities. After his detention in San Diego, a joint U.S.–Mexico law enforcement team searched Verdugo-Urquidez’s properties in Mexico, uncovering evidence of possible drug trafficking. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the Fourth Amendment guarantee against unreasonable searches did not preclude this one, because Verdugo-Urquidez was a Mexican citizen without significant voluntary ties to the United States and because the search was conducted in Mexico. Writing for the majority, Chief Justice Rehnquist held that the Fourth Amendment's text applied only to "the people": those with sufficient, voluntary connections to the United States, thereby distinguishing the phrase from the broader term "persons" used in the due process clause. Looking to the amendment's history, Rehnquist argued that the framers intended for its protections to extend only to domestic, not foreign, territory. Next, Rehnquist distinguished the instant case from INS v. Lopez-Mendoza, in which the Court assumed that the Fourth Amendment applied to undocumented immigrants in the United States. Rehnquist read Lopez-Mendoza to mean only that the exclusionary rule may not apply in civil deportation hearings but said nothing about the constitution's extraterritorial application. Significantly, United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez limits the Fourth Amendment rights of certain noncitizens subject to United States law whose property is based abroad. Whether these rights are even further reduced by extension of Verdugo's reasoning to domestic searches and all noncitizens remains to be seen.

VICTOR C. ROMERO

References and Further Reading

- Neuman, Gerald L., Whose Constitution? Yale Law Journal 100 (1991): 909–991.
 Romero, Victor C., Whatever Happened to the Fourth Amendment?: Undocumented Immigrants' Rights after INS v. Lopez-Mendoza and United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, Southern California Law Review 65 (1992): 999–1034.

Cases and Statutes Cited

INS v. Lopez-Mendoza, 468 U.S. 1032 (1984)

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of

UNITED STATES v. WADE, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)

Because eyewitness identification is rife with risk of error, the Court in United States v. Wade and the companion case of Gilbert v. California held that charged persons were entitled to have counsel present when appearing in a lineup. The Court majority found suggestive influences were brought to bear on the witnesses making identifications in both cases, immediately before, and during the lineups conducted. Once subjected to such influences, eyewitnesses may mistakenly identify the wrong individual and their in-court identification at trial may well be a fruit of this pretrial identification that the accused is helpless to subject to effective scrutiny at trial, as the suggestive influences may go undetected by the suspect, or if noted, the suspect's unsupported version of what happened may be disregarded in favor of the police's version. With counsel present at the lineup, such influences could be averted or at least detected, and a meaningful confrontation and cross-examination of the witness at trial could be ensured. Providing counsel at this critical stage in the criminal prosecution would thus avert mistaken convictions. The majority holds testimony about an out-of-court lineup must be excluded if counsel was not provided or effectively waived, and an in-court identification could be made only if the prosecution first proved by clear and convincing evidence that the witness' identification at trial flowed from a source independent of the tainted lineup. Kirby v. Illinois and United States v. Ash narrow this right to counsel. For additional due process controls, see Manson v. Brathwaite.

MARGERY M. KOOSÉD

References and Further Reading

- American Law Institute, A Model Code of Pre-Arrest Procedure, Proposed Official Draft and Commentary, (1975): 419–458.
 Grano, Joseph D., Kirby, Biggers and Ash, Do Any Constitutional Safeguards Remain against the Danger of Convicting the Innocent? Michigan Law Review 72 (1985): 717–798.
 Levine, Felice J., and June L. Tapp, The Psychology of Criminal Identifications: The Gap from Wade to Kirby, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 121 (1973): 1079–1131.
 Panel Discussion, The Role of the Defense Lawyer at a Lineup in Light of the Wade, Gilbert, and Stovall Decisions, Criminal Law Bulletin 4 (1968): 273–296.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Gilbert v. California*, 388 U.S. 263 (1967)
Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682 (1972)
Manson v. Brathwaite, 432 U.S. 98 (1977)
United States v. Ash, 413 U.S. 300 (1973)

See also Eyewitness Identification; Line-Ups; Right to Counsel

UNITED STATES v. WASHINGTON, 431 U.S. 181 (1977)

Respondent was subpoenaed to appear as a witness before a grand jury investigating the theft of a motorcycle. Before testifying, the respondent was told among other things of his right to remain silent and his right to counsel. He was not, however, told that he might be a target of the investigation. Respondent's testimony was highly self-incriminating. On the basis of that testimony, he was indicted for the theft of the motorcycle. At trial, the court agreed with the respondent's efforts to suppress his grand jury testimony and quash the indictment. The Court of Appeals affirmed on the grounds that the prosecutor should have advised the respondent that he was a potential target of the grand jury investigation and that he should have been informed of his rights before being sworn in as a witness.

The Supreme Court reversed, holding that his grand jury testimony could be properly used against him in a later trial. Under the Court's analysis, knowing beforehand whether or not you are a potential target of a grand jury investigation "neither enlarges nor diminishes" the constitutional protections of the Fifth Amendment against compulsory self-incrimination. The Court went on to explain that in this case, the warnings that the respondent received before his testimony were enough to dispel "any possible compulsion to self-incrimination." The fact that the respondent voluntarily revealed the information does not allow him the advantages of the Fifth Amendment. The Court, however, did not say whether the warnings were constitutionally required.

MARCEL GREEN

References and Further Reading

Israel, Jerold H., and Wayne R. LaFave. Criminal Procedure in a Nutshell. St. Paul, MN: West, 2001.

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Miranda Warning; Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background

UNITED STATES v. WATSON, 423 U.S. 411 (1976)

Watson was suspected of possessing stolen credit cards. An informant met Watson at a restaurant to purchase the stolen credit cards. Watson was arrested without a warrant, and two stolen credit cards were found in his car pursuant to a consensual search.

At trial, Watson moved to suppress the credit cards claiming his warrantless arrest was illegal; the motion was denied and Watson was convicted.

Does the Fourth Amendment require a police officer to obtain a warrant before making a felony arrest in public on the basis of probable cause? The Court first looked to the Constitution and noted that nothing in the Fourth Amendment expressly required the police to obtain a warrant before making a felony arrest.

The Court subsequently weighed the costs of requiring arrest warrants against the benefits of such a requirement and concluded that the costs outweighed the benefits. The reasoning for the decision was based on a theory that warrant requirements would result in excessive litigation over whether exigent circumstances existed at the time of arrest, whether the suspect was a flight risk, or whether obtaining a warrant under the circumstances was practicable. Therefore, Watson's warrantless arrest did not violate the Fourth Amendment.

The effect of the Watson decision is still felt today, because police officers are free to arrest for felony offenses in public on the basis of probable cause without a warrant. However, the Court recommended that, when practicable, officers might want to obtain a warrant to dissolve any doubts regarding the probable cause surrounding the arrest.

STEPHEN L. SARAZIN

References and Further Reading

LaFave, Wayne, Jerold Israel, and Nancy King. Criminal Procedure. 4th ed., St. Paul, MN: West, 2004, p. 344.

Saltzburg, Stephen, and Donald Capra. Constitutional Criminal Procedure. 7th ed., St. Paul, MN: West, 2004, p. 720.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Abel v. United States, 362 U.S. 217 (1960)

Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590 (1975)

Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925)

Draper v. United States, 358 U.S. 307 (1959)

Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975)

Kurtz v. Moffitt, 115 U.S. 487 (1885)

Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973)

United States v. DiRe, 332 U.S. 581 (1948)

See also Arrest; Arrest Warrants; Arrest without a Warrant; Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925); Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975); Probable Cause; Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973)

UNIVERSITIES AND PUBLIC FORUMS

College and university campuses are often hotbeds of controversial speech, from student protests to cutting-edge research projects. Universities play an important role in the free exchange of ideas in America, yet tension often arises between the right of free expression and the need for the university to function effectively. The First Amendment states that "Congress shall make no law...abridging the freedom of speech..." and the Fourteenth Amendment extends this prohibition on restrictions of free speech to state governments. Public universities, as part of the state government, are limited in the restrictions they can impose on free speech.

Public universities are able to limit speech under the First Amendment in two important ways. First, universities may restrict speech that is not protected by the First Amendment. This includes speech that aims to incite immediate violence, confrontational or threatening “fighting words,” obscenity, and defamation. Second, universities may restrict speech—to varying degrees—on the basis of the forum in which the speech occurs. There are three basic categories of forum: the traditional public forum, the limited public forum (sometimes called a “designated public forum”), and the nonpublic forum.

Traditional public forums are those that have traditionally or historically been opened up to the public for assembly or debate, including sidewalks, streets, or public parks. Limited public forums are areas that have not been traditionally opened for public expression but the university has expressly designated them as areas where expression is permitted. Unlike traditional public forums, limited public forums may be restricted to use by subsections of the public or for particular uses. Limited public forums are more common than traditional public forums on university campuses; they might include forums designated for use by student organizations or areas designated for academic and political, but not commercial, expression.

When a university places restrictions on a limited or a traditional public forum, courts review the restrictions under a standard of strict scrutiny to determine whether they are valid under the First Amendment. The strict scrutiny standard examines whether the restriction is narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling government interest. This is a very difficult barrier to surmount, and it typically limits the restrictions a university may place on the forum to time, place, and manner of speech restrictions. In this way, universities are able to regulate speech in traditional and limited public forums according to the way in which the speech is conducted, but not its content.

Universities often contain nonpublic forums (also referred to as “reserved” or “closed” forums). These are mediums that have been reserved for purposes other than speech by the public or a segment of the public; this category might include administrative offices and in some cases classrooms and university publications. Courts will uphold a university’s restrictions in nonpublic forums as long as the restriction is reasonably related to a legitimate government purpose. A university may cite interests such as the efficient operation of the campus or the integrity of the university as a learning community as legitimate government interests. A nonpublic forum affords the university the opportunity to regulate on the basis of content, but the university is still obligated to make viewpoint-neutral decisions; that is, the university may restrict expression on a particular topic altogether, but it cannot restrict only one point of view regarding a given topic.

One of the most common areas in which universities impose restrictions on free expression is student newspapers or other university-sponsored student publications. The Supreme Court has never addressed the issue of whether a public university student publication is a public forum; however, the Court found that a high school newspaper was not a public forum, and therefore could impose reasonable restrictions on the publication, in Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier. Lower courts, like the 7th Circuit in Hosty v. Carter, have relied on the Hazelwood decision, applying its framework to college newspapers. Therefore, it is likely that a university may impose viewpoint-neutral restrictions on student publications, as long as those restrictions are reasonably related to a legitimate university interest.

Restricting oral and written expression are the two most obvious ways in which a university might violate its students’ rights to free speech, but they are not the only ways. In Rosenberger v. University of Virginia, the Supreme Court found that the University violated students’ free speech rights by denying student activity funding to a student newspaper that promoted Christian beliefs. In that case, the Court held that the University’s restriction denying funding to publications that promote religious beliefs violated the principles governing limited public forums, because it discriminated on the basis of viewpoint. Similarly, in Board of Regents v. Southworth, the Court found that the First Amendment permits public universities to charge a student activity fee and use it to fund extracurricular activities, as long as the distribution of the funding is viewpoint neutral.

Although the limited restrictions on speech in public forums apply not only to students but also to professors and other university employees, it is important to remember that a public university may further restrict the rights of professors and university staff because they are public employees. The Supreme Court’s decision in Pickering v. Board of Education laid out the standards for evaluating the public employee’s First Amendment rights. In that case, the Court stated that when a public employee speaks on a matter of public concern, the university must balance the employee’s interest in commenting on the matter of public concern against the state’s interest, as an employer, in promoting the efficiency of its public services.

When the speech of a professor at a public university is called into question under the First Amendment, courts may examine it both in terms of forum and as the speech of a public employee. In Omoegbon v. Wells, for example, the 7th Circuit Court of Appeals examined the First Amendment rights of a professor who alleged that the university tried to prevent him from participating in events in the African-American community under both a forum analysis and the public employee speech test.

JULIE H. MARGETTA

Cases and Statutes Cited

Board of Regents v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217 (2000)
Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988)
Hosty v. Carter, 412 F.3d 731 (7th Cir. 2005)
Omoegbon v. Wells, 335 F.3d 668 (7th Cir. 2003)
Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968)
Rosenberger v. University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995)

See also Academic Freedom; Campus Hate Speech Codes; Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Disciplining Public Employees for Expressive Activity; Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988); Limited Public Forums; Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968); Public Forum Doctrines; Public/Non-public Forums Distinction; Student Activity Fees and Free Speech; Traditional Public Forums

UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN v. SOUTHWORTH, 529 U.S. 217 (2000)

In University of Wisconsin v. Southworth, the U.S. Supreme Court held that, provided they allocate funds in a viewpoint-neutral manner, public universities may use mandatory student fees to support expressive activities to which some fee payers object. The case arose when several students at the University of Wisconsin-Madison objected to the use of a portion of their fees to assist student organizations with whom they ideologically disagreed. The funds were distributed at the discretion of student government and occasionally by student referendum. Previously, the Supreme Court had found mandatory union and bar association dues to violate dues payers' First Amendment rights when used for expressive purposes not germane to issues of collective bargaining or regulation of the legal profession (Aboud v. Detroit Board of Education, Keller v. State Bar of California). Relying on such precedent, the students won in the district court and court of appeals. But the Supreme Court distinguished the union and bar association contexts from a university environment. It concluded that courts ought not become involved in determining what is germane to a university's mission and acknowledged universities' interest in facilitating expression on a broad range of issues. Thus, the court decided that insisting that student fees be allocated by viewpoint-neutral criteria would better protect all interests. Because the parties had stipulated for purposes of the litigation that the Wisconsin method of fee allocation was viewpoint neutral, the court upheld the university with one exception. Allocating fees by referendum, the court suggested, might well not be viewpoint neutral.

ROBERT E. DRECHSEL

Cases and Statutes Cited

Aboud v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977)
Board of Regents of the University of Wisconsin System v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217 (2000)
Keller v. State Bar of California, 496 U.S. 1 (1990)

See also Academic Freedom; Forced Speech

UROFSKY v. GILMORE, 216 F.3D 401 (4TH CIR. 2000)

The Virginia General Assembly in 1995 enacted a law prohibiting any state employee from using a state-owned computer to access Internet sites or files having "sexually explicit content." In those instances in which an employee had a legitimate, job-related reason to access such sites, he or she had to secure permission from the agency head, and his or her name would then be posted by the agency. Six professors in state colleges and universities challenged the law on the grounds that it unconstitutionally abridged the First Amendment right to free expression as well as the academic freedom.

The professors won in district court, Urofsky v. Allen, 995 F. Supp. 634 (E.D. Va. 1998), in which Judge Brinkelman wrote an extremely strong free-speech-protective opinion. A panel of the Fourth Circuit reversed this decision by a two-to-one vote in Urofsky v. Gilmore, 167 F.3d 191 (4th Cir. 1999), but the majority opinion failed to even address the main issues raised in the district court. As a result, the judges agreed to a rehearing en banc.

This opinion, although also upholding the law (which, in the meantime had been slightly modified after the earlier decisions), spelled out the reasons in a more coherent manner. Essentially, the majority of judges held that state employees held limited First Amendment rights, relying on United States v. National Treasury Employees Union, 513 U.S. 454 (1995), which, as the dissent pointed out, gave government employees more rights than the Fourth Circuit recognized. The lead opinion by Judge Wilkins also declared that academic freedom belonged to the institution and not to individual faculty members, a point that Chief Judge J. Harvey Wilkins dismantled in his dissent.

Although the state won its case, in fact, the law has become a dead letter in the state's university system, with both administration and faculty ignoring it. It did, however, form the basis for the dismissal of several dozen employees of the Department of Transportation in 2002 for accessing pornographic websites from state computers during working hours.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

Cases and Statutes Cited

United States v. National Treasury Employees Union, 513 U.S. 454 (1995)

Urofsky v. Allen, 995 F. Supp. 634 (E.D. Va. 1998)

Urofsky v. Gilmore, 167 F. 3rd 191 (4th Cir. 1999)

Urofsky v. Gilmore, 216 F. 3rd 401 (4th Cir. 2000)

V

VAGRANCY LAWS

Vagrancy is the principal crime in which the offense consists of being an aesthetically undesirable person rather than in having done or failed to do certain acts. The crime of vagrancy originated in fourteenth-century England with the passage of the first statute of laborers that restricted the movement of those persons who owned no land and were unemployed. The common law crime of vagrancy consisted of being without visible means of support, being without employment, or being able to work but refusing to do so. The concept of vagrancy followed colonists to America, and nearly all states enacted statutes embodying differentiations of the common law offense.

The definition of “vagrancy” differs from jurisdiction to jurisdiction and typically encompasses a myriad of misdemeanor offenses. Existing vagrancy statutes may be divided into essentially five categories: (1) statutes that make one a vagrant on the basis of his status or condition, such as poverty and absence of employment; (2) statutes that make one a vagrant for engaging in an activity considered innocuous, such as loitering; (3) statutes that make one a vagrant on the basis of reputation; (4) statutes that make one a vagrant for a condition generally obnoxious to the community standards, such as drunkenness and drug use; and (5) statutes that make one a vagrant for acts of conduct recognized in many jurisdictions as separate crimes, such as fortune telling and subversive activities.

Beginning in the 1960s vagrancy laws came under constitutional attack and were struck down by courts as being unconstitutionally vague, overbroad, violating due process, exceeding the police power, and violating the equal protection clause. In light of the increasing judicial disapproval of vagrancy statutes, some states repealed such statutes in favor of laws that prohibit specific conduct. Although vagrancy laws still exist in different forms, vagrancy laws must balance both the interest of the state and the rights of the individual.

PATRICK H. HAGGERTY

References and Further Reading

- Dubin, Gary V. and Richard H. Robinson, Note, The Vagrancy Concept Reconsidered: Problems and Abuses of Status Criminality, New York University Law Review 37 (1962): 102–136.
- Lacey, Forrest W., Vagrancy and Other Crimes of Personal Condition, Harvard Law Review 66 (1953): 1203–1226.
- Ribton-Turner, C. J. A History of Vagrants and Beggars and Begging. London, England: Chapman and Hall, 1887.

VAGUENESS AND OVERBREADTH IN CRIMINAL STATUTES

Among the fundamental principles that underlie the enforcement of the criminal law are those embodied by the doctrines of void-for-vagueness and overbreadth. The first doctrine, which finds its source in the due process clause of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, requires that a law be sufficiently precise in its formulation so as to give people of ordinary intelligence sufficient warning that they may conduct themselves in a manner that will avoid criminal liability. Under the overbreadth doctrine, which is associated primarily with the First Amendment rights of speech and assembly, a statute can be invalidated if, in addition to proscribing activities that are not constitutionally prohibited, it applies to activities that are so protected. Although complementary, the two doctrines are analytically distinct, and each needs to be considered separately.

The allegation of unconstitutional vagueness was originally made in connection with a wide range of statutes targeting Communists, antiwar protesters, abortion providers, abortion protesters, and people who refused to take loyalty oaths. In recent years, the claim of unconstitutional vagueness has been made most frequently in the context of vagrancy laws. For example, a City of Jacksonville, Florida, ordinance that prohibited a person from being a "vagrant" (defined to include "rogues and vagabonds," "persons wandering or strolling around from place to place without any lawful purpose," and "habitual loafers") was held to be so imprecise as to violate the constitutional requirement of certainty.

Four rationales are said to underlie the void-for-vagueness doctrine. The first is the supposed unfairness of imposing criminal punishment on a defendant who is unaware that such conduct is prohibited. However, several scholars have argued that, in fact, the criminal law ordinarily provides that "ignorance of the law is no excuse" and that ascertaining the nature and extent of a particular penal statute frequently involves difficult questions of statutory interpretation. The second rationale is that vague statutes have the effect of unconstitutionally shifting the responsibility for defining what is criminal from the most representative branch, the legislature, to the least representative branch, the courts. In response to this claim, it has been argued that separation of powers doctrine requires only that courts refrain from creating common law crimes, not that they be limited in their ability to interpret vague statutes passed by the legislature. The third rationale is that vague statutes encourage arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement of the criminal law. And, indeed, statutes and ordinances that prohibit unspecified forms of "annoying" or "disorderly" conduct are precisely the kinds of laws that allow police and prosecutors unduly broad discretion in deciding whom to arrest and prosecute—powers that are often exercised to the detriment of the poor and minorities. The final rationale is that vague laws will tend to overdetter: A vague statute can "inhibit the exercise" of constitutional freedoms, leading citizens to "steer far wider of the unlawful zone...than if the boundaries of the forbidden areas were clearly marked."

Closely related to the problem of vagueness is that of overbreadth. A statute is said to be overbroad if, in addition to proscribing activities that are constitutionally protected, it also sweeps within its coverage activities that are protected by one or another constitutional right (usually found in the First Amendment, although the doctrine has also been cited in abortion rights cases as well). A good example is an Alabama statute that prohibited picketing "for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or interfering with" business. In declaring the statute unconstitutional, the Court noted that a chilling effect on protected conduct might occur under a statute that does not "aim specifically at evils within the allowable area of state control but, on the contrary, sweeps within its ambit other activities that in ordinary circumstances constitute an exercise of" constitutional rights.

The overbreadth doctrine is unusual in constitutional law in that it allows a defendant to challenge the validity of a statute or ordinance "on its face," rather than the more common "as applied." Plaintiffs are "permitted to challenge a statute not because their own rights of free expression are violated, but because...the statute's very existence may cause others not before the court to refrain from constitutionally protected speech or expression." As such, the overbreadth doctrine is said to provide "breathing space" for First Amendment freedoms. The void-for-vagueness and somewhat narrow overbreadth doctrines thus have at least one rationale in common. Like laws that are vague, laws that are overbroad may have a "chilling effect" on citizens' willingness to exercise their constitutional rights. In both cases, citizens will be unsure about whether a particular form of contemplated activity is likely to lead to criminal enforcement.

STUART P. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Amsterdam, Anthony G., Note, The Void-for-Vagueness Doctrine in the Supreme Court, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 109 (1960): 67–116.
- Batey, Robert, Vagueness and the Construction of Criminal Statutes—Balancing Acts, Virginia Journal of Social Policy and Law 5 (1997): 1–96.
- Fallon, Richard H., Jr., Making Sense of Overbreadth, Yale Law Journal 100 (1991): 853–908.
- Jeffries, John Calvin, Jr., Legality, Vagueness, and the Construction of Penal Statutes, Virginia Law Review 71 (1985): 189–244.
- Monaghan, Henry Paul, Overbreadth, Supreme Court Review (1981): 1–39.

See also Abortion Protest Cases; Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959); Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41 (1999); Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352 (1983); Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville, 405 U.S. 156 (1972); Vagrancy Laws

VAGUENESS DOCTRINE

Linguistically, defects of language include generality, ambiguity, and vagueness. A term is “general” when it refers to a class. “President” is general; “President George Washington” is singular. A term is “ambiguous” if its referent is twofold. “Bank” is verbally ambiguous because it possesses two referents (for example, deposit money or stand to fish). Syntactical ambiguity arises when a word may modify two referents in a sentence for example, “Humans alone laugh.” Does it mean when humans are alone (adverb), they laugh, or does it mean humans alone (adjective) laugh? Contextual ambiguity arises from the context of a situation (for example, “Teach my child a game.” For those who abhor gambling, “game” extends to jump rope, not dice. For those who relish gambling, “game” extends to dice. Thus, disambiguating “game” involves looking to the community). A term is “vague” if its meaning is uncertain, that is, the edges of the concept are “fuzzy,” as in day or night at dawn or dusk. Cicero in Academica 94 (Loeb ed.1951) observed: “[I]f we are asked...are yonder objects many or few...we do not know [when in] the addition or subtraction [of an object] to give a definite answer.” Thus, all concepts that admit of degrees (most do) are uncertain, not in their cores, but at their edges.

Constitutionally, “vagueness” means, not “fuzzy” edges, as in linguistics, but “no core meaning” at all in the context in which it is used. When a concept used in legislation lacks a core meaning, the statute is “void-for-vagueness.” The constitutional doctrine stems from Articles I and II that separate making laws from interpreting laws. If a law is meaningless (no core), a court must not add meaning; interpretation is exegesis, not eisegesis. Similarly, the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments mandate that the government act with “due process,” which requires “fair notice.” A law lacks fair notice if ordinary citizens cannot determine the covered persons, conduct, or sanctions. Nevertheless, words may be definite if they have a well-settled legal or technical meaning. Vagueness is also a question of degree. “Condemned to the use of words, we can never expect mathematical certainty from our language” (Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 110 [1972]). In addition, typical statutes are not vague because determining whether marginal or hypothetical cases fall within them is difficult. Generally, statutes are judges in light of the conduct of the defendant who challenges them (“as applied”); he may not complain of their indefinite character in reference to the conduct of others. Courts also give a narrower reading to statutes that impose criminal sanctions, whereas those that grant civil benefits need not be as definite. Finally, statutes that require a showing of a state of mind may also be less definite. The void-for-vagueness doctrine is well-settled law in the Supreme Court. It played an essential part of substantive due process challenges to economic regulation in the nineteenth century, but they are no longer a mainstay of the Court’s docket.

The void-for-vagueness doctrine, however, plays a substantially different role in First Amendment jurisprudence. At the time of the Founders, the First Amendment solely protected against prior restraint (for example, “licensing books”), but a person was accountable for whatever he said or did (for example, “libel”) In the 1920s, the Supreme Court began the long process of extending free speech protections. Today, subject to limited categories (for example, “fighting words,” “obscenity,” or “true threats”), a person cannot be sanctioned—criminally or civilly—for speech or expressive conduct, as apposed to mere conduct, in particular based on its content (for example, “blasphemy” or “hate speech”). Only if a substantial danger exists of immediate harm may speech or expressive conduct be circumscribed (that is, “excitement”). In addition to these general free speech protections, the void-for-vagueness doctrine plays a unique role in protecting First Amendment freedoms. Here, challenges to statutes are not “as applied,” but to the “face” of a statute. A defendant (or a challenger, who is not currently charged with an offense, but reasonable fears that he might be charged) may not be able to claim constitutional protection for himself (for example, “a pornographer”). But if he (or a challenger) can point to a substantial number of other instances of speech or expressive conduct that arguably fall within the statute, it is unconstitutional “on its face.” It cannot serve as a basis for his sanctioning. Its general application is subject to an injunction by the court at the behest of a proper challenger. The Supreme Court teaches that such statutes—characterized either by no core meaning, fuzzy edges, or the impermissible exercise of governmental discretion—inhibit constitutionally protected speech or expressive conduct. Thus, they are constitutionally overbroad because they “chill” the exercise of rights guaranteed by the First Amendment. For example, the police may not condition the granting of a parade permit on the payment in advance of the cost of protecting the demonstrators from a hostile crowd (no “heckler’s veto”). In the face of such statutes, public speaking, writing, or otherwise communicating would not be as fully robust as envisioned by our nation's "free market" in ideas that are necessary in the search for truth. We would not have the full measure of pamphleteering, parading, or public speaking. Accordingly, such statutes are void-for-vagueness, in the special sense in which the doctrine applies to the First Amendment. Thus, the modern Court uses a stricter version of the void-for-vagueness doctrine to protect civil liberties in the area of First Amendment freedoms; it also uses it as a tool to circumscribe low-level police-citizen contacts (for example, "loitering statutes") that might otherwise interfere with freedom of association or assembly.

G. ROBERT BLAKEY

References and Further Reading

- Amsterdam, Anthony, The Void for Vagueness Doctrine in the Supreme Court, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 109 (1960): 67.
 Dickerson, Reed, The Fundamentals of Legal Drafting. 1965.
 Frankfurter, Felix, Some Reflections on the Reading of Statutes, Columbia Review 47 (1947): 527.
 Leech, Geoffrey. Principles of Pragmatics. 1983.
 Palmer, R. F. Semantics. 2nd ed. 1981.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Jordan v. De George*, 341 U.S. 223, 230 (1951)
Kolander v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 358-59 (1983)
Village of Hoffman Estates v. Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. (1982)
Nash v. United States, 229 U.S. 373, 377 (1913)
Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997)
City of Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41 (1998)

VALENTINE v. CHRESTENSEN, 316 U.S. 52 (1942)

Valentine v. Chrestensen is often cited as evidence that for two hundred years the prevailing understanding was that the First Amendment did not apply to "commercial speech." In 1976, that understanding was definitively, and perhaps permanently, changed with the Supreme Court's decision in Virginia Pharmacy, that "commercial speech" was entitled to limited First Amendment protection. But in 1942, when the Court decided Valentine, it seemed self-evident to the Court that although government "may not unduly burden or proscribe" freedom of expression and opinion, "[w]e are equally clear that the Constitution imposes no such restraint on government as respects purely commercial advertising." Chrestensen owned a former U.S. submarine, which he wanted to dock on the East River and charge a fee to the public for touring. He had an advertising handbill printed up about the ship. The New York police commissioner, Valentine, advised Chrestensen that distributing his handbills would violate a provision of New York City's Sanitary Code. However, he was also informed that handbills "devoted to 'information or a public protest'" were exempted from the Code. So Chrestensen had new handbills printed up. On one side was the original information. On the other, a protest against the City Dock Department for refusing him wharfage facilities. The Commissioner restrained distribution of the new handbill as well, and Chrestensen brought suit alleging the restraint violated his rights under the First Amendment. As noted, this claim was summarily dismissed. It would take another thirty-four years before the Court was prepared to systematically revisit the question of First Amendment protection for what later came to be called "commercial speech."

TAMARA R. PIETY

References and Further Reading

- Kozinski, Alex, and Stuart Banner, Who's Afraid of Commercial Speech? Virginia Law Review 76 (1990): 627.
 Post, Robert, The Constitutional Status of Commercial Speech, UCLA Law Review 48 (2000): 1.
 Redish, Martin, The First Amendment in the Market Place: Commercial Speech and the Value of Free Expression, George Washington Law Review 39 (1971): 429.
 Shiner, Roger A. Freedom of Commercial Expression. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc.*, 425 U.S. 748 (1976)

See also Central Hudson Gas and Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York, 447 U.S. 557 (1980); Commercial Speech; First Amendment and PACs; Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748 (1976)

VANCE v. UNIVERSAL AMUSEMENT CO., INC., 445 U.S. 208 (1980)

The constitutionality of two Texas statutes were challenged by King Arts Theatre, which operated an indoor, adults-only motion picture theater, after the Dallas county attorney informed the operator's landlord that the county planned to initiate action that would declare the theater a public nuisance to prevent it from showing obscene films in the future. One statute authorized injunction suits by the state against alleged public nuisances; the other provided that certain "habitual uses" of premises constituted public nuisances, including the "commercial exhibition of obscene material," and could be enjoined.

Kings Arts Theatre filed suit in federal district court seeking an injunction and declaratory relief to forestall the county attorney's plans. A three-judge federal district court ruled the statutes constituted invalid prior restraint and granted declaratory but not injunctive relief. On appeal, a Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals panel reversed the lower court but a rehearing en banc by an eight-to-six vote reversed the panel's holding. The Supreme Court issued a five-to-four per curiam opinion affirming the en banc ruling, noting this was "an unusual obscenity case." Burger, joined by Powell, dissented separately as did White, who was joined by Rehnquist.

The ruling distinguishes the customary and accepted use of injunctions to prevent future conduct on the basis of findings of undesirable past or present conduct from the current case where an exhibitor found to have shown obscene films in the past is prohibited from showing films in the future that, however, have not yet been found to be obscene. The basis of the distinction is Near v. Minnesota (1931), which mandated special analysis when future conduct may be protected by the First Amendment. Because the Texas statute in question "authorizes prior restraints of indefinite duration on the exhibition of motion pictures that have not been finally adjudicated to be obscene," it imposed an invalid prior restraint on the operator's First Amendment rights. The Court also agreed with the en banc ruling that the statutes lacked guarantees of prompt reviews of preliminary findings of probable obscenity as required by Freedman v. Maryland (1965).

Burger's dissent argues the Court need not have reached the merits of the case, because the statutes had not been enforced and thus there was a "failure to present a real and substantial controversy." White disagrees with the Court for equating an injunction against showing unnamed, obscene films with prior restraint. For him, the Texas statute in question seemed "functionally indistinguishable from a criminal obscenity statute" and thus not constitutionally suspect.

ROY B. FLEMMING

Cases and Statutes Cited

Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965)

Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)

Vance v. Universal Amusement Co., Inc., 445 U.S. 308 (1980)

VERNONIA SCHOOL DISTRICT v. ACTON, 515 U.S. 646 (1995)

In 1991, a seventh-grade student named James Acton wanted to play football at a grade school in Vernonia, Oregon. Before being allowed to play, however, the school district required him and his parents to sign forms consenting to drug testing. James and his parents refused to sign the consent forms, and, as a consequence, James' school prohibited him from playing football. After James' school prohibited him from playing football, the Actons filed suit against the school district claiming inter alia that the district's Student Athlete Drug Policy (the "Drug Policy") violated James' Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. The case made its way to the U.S. Supreme Court where six of the nine justices decided that the Drug Policy was reasonable and hence constitutional.

In upholding the Drug Policy, the Court first made it clear that the Astate-compelled collection and testing of urine—as required by the Drug Policy, was a search that was subject to the Fourth Amendment's demand that government searches be reasonable. The Court then found that the search was reasonable by examining five factors.

The Court recognized that underlying the prohibition of unreasonable searches was a citizen's interest in protecting her privacy. Thus, the first factor that the Court considered was the nature of the privacy interest of the persons affected by the policy. The Court found that the athletes involved had a lower expectation of privacy than the average citizen for a variety of reasons. One, the athletes involved were minors, and minors traditionally are subject to the control of their parents and guardians. In addition, the athletes were in public school and, as the Court found in New Jersey v. T.L.O., public schools may closely supervise and guide the children in its care. Thus, although the Court in Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District found that children do not Ashed their constitutional rights at the schoolhouse gate, the rights of public school children are different from those of the general populace. Furthermore, given that schools routinely require students to submit to various medical procedures, students within the school environment have a lesser expectation of privacy than members of the population generally. Finally, student athletes have a lesser expectation of privacy than nonathletes because they shower and dress without any aspect of privacy and because by going out for the team they voluntarily subject themselves to greater intrusions on their privacy.

With regard to the second factor, the character of the intrusion on the students' privacy, the court found the intrusion to be negligible, because the students remain fully clothed and the males are only observed from behind, whereas the females are in stalls. Furthermore, the Court felt that the test itself was not very intrusive mainly because the urinalysis tested only for certain drugs and only for the purpose of helping the student, rather than punishing the student. The third and fourth factors involve the nature and immediacy of the governmental concern that led to the enactment of the statute. Here the Court found that deterring drug use by schoolchildren was an important and, perhaps, compelling government interest. Furthermore, the concern was immediate because a large segment of the student body, particularly those involved in interscholastic athletics, was in a state of rebellion, that “[d]isciplinary actions had reached ‘epidemic proportions,’” and that the rebellion was being fueled by alcohol and drug abuse as well as by the student’s misperceptions about the drug culture.

The final factor examined by the Court concerned the efficacy of the means chosen to address the government’s concern. Here the Court found that a drug problem that is fueled in large part by the role model—the effect of athletes’ drug use—and that is of particular danger to such athletes will be effectively addressed by a program that ensures that athletes do not use drugs.

In Vernonia, the Court continued the trend of granting fewer constitutional protections to minors in school because of the nature of the minor’s place in society.

JANET W. STEVERSON

Cases and Statutes Cited

New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985)
Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969)

VICE PRODUCTS AND COMMERCIAL SPEECH

“Vice” activities tend to be the front line of battles over the freedom afforded commercial speech. Societal interests in reducing vice provide a weighty counter to commercial interests.

In 1967, the Federal Communications Commission forced broadcasters to run antismoking commercials, and in the 1980s, Oklahoma’s constitution was challenged because it banned alcohol advertising. These are but two illustrations of how government efforts to protect the public from vice can impinge on speech, both of which played important roles in the evolution of the commercial speech doctrine. This evolution, however, is best seen in a few Supreme Court decisions.

Posadas de Puerto Rico v. Tourism Company (1986) declared gambling casino advertising could be regulated because it might cause Puerto Rico’s citizens to gamble, leading to crime, prostitution, and corruption. Justice Rehnquist, writing for the Court, introduced his “greater-includes-the-lesser” argument, positing that the government’s greater power to ban gambling includes the lesser power to ban its advertising.

That logic arguably could be applied to almost any product, but it arose again in U.S. v. Edge Broadcasting (1993), a case about lottery advertising, with a more limited scope. The Court declared that the power to ban a vice included the power to ban its advertising. This later led to Rhode Island arguing commercial speech concerning vice products is unprotected, in 44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island (1996), thereby permitting restrictions on alcohol advertising. But in the end the Court rejected that contention, declaring there is no vice exception to the First Amendment.

JEFF I. RICHARDS

References and Further Reading

Berman, Mitchell N., Commercial Speech and the Unconstitutional Conditions Doctrine: A Second Look at “The Greater Includes the Lesser,” Vanderbilt Law Review 55 (2002): 693–796.
 Hoefges, Michael, and Milagros Rivera-Sanchez, “Vice” Advertising under the Supreme Court’s Commercial Speech Doctrine: The Shifting Central Hudson Analysis, Hastings Communication & Entertainment Law Journal 22 (2000): 345–389.
 Richards, Jeff I., Politicizing Cigarette Advertising, Catholic University Law Review 45 (1996): 4: 1147–1212.

Cases and Statutes Cited

44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1996)
Posadas de Puerto Rico Association v. Tourism Company of Puerto Rico, 478 U.S. 328 (1986)
U.S. v. Edge Broadcasting, 509 U.S. 418 (1993)

See also 44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1996); Commercial Speech; Posadas De Puerto Rico Association v. Tourism Company of Puerto Rico, 478 U.S. 328 (1986); Rehnquist, William H.

VICTIM IMPACT STATEMENTS

For every crime committed, there are at least two victims—society suffers a violation of its laws and the actual victim suffers an injury to person or property. Beginning with the “Victims’ Rights Movement” in the 1970s, the participation of the victim in the criminal justice system has increased. A victim impact statement is designed to increase victim participation at the posttrial stage of the criminal justice process after a defendant has been found guilty.

Although victim impact statements vary from state to state, they generally refer to written or oral information about the impact of a crime on a victim and the victim's family and generally include a brief summary of the harm or trauma suffered by the victim as a result of the crime, the victim's reactions or objections to the proposed sentence, a concise statement of what outcome the victim would like and the reasons to support this opinion, and the overall effect of the crime had on the victim and the family.

Today, the use of victim impact statements is routine in our criminal justice system. However, the use of victim impact statements in capital cases remains controversial. Although the Supreme Court in Payne v. Tennessee found that the admission of victim impact statements in capital cases did not violate the constitution, the role of victim impact statements in capital cases continues to be debated.

PATRICK H. HAGGERTY

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Allen, and Janice Harris Ward. Impact Statements—A Victim's Right to Speak.... A Nation's Responsibilities to Listen. National Center for Arlington, VA: Victims of Crime, 1994.
- Bandes, Susan. Empathy, Narrative, and Victim Impact Statements. University of Chicago Law Review 63 (1996): 361–412.
- National Center for Victims of Crime. Statutory and Constitutional Protection of Victims' Rights: Implementation and Impact on Crime Victims, Final Report, Arlington, Va., 1996.
- Talbert, Philip A., Comment, The Relevance of Victim Impact Statements to the Criminal Sentencing Decision, University of California–Los Angeles Law Review 36 (1988): 199–232.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808 (1991)

See also Victimless Crimes; Victims' Rights

VICTIMLESS CRIMES

The term "victimless crime" is one that occurs more frequently in the rhetoric of civil and economic libertarianism than in the doctrine or theory of the criminal law. That is, there are no specific legal consequences that follow from a crime's being classified as "victimless," and criminal law theorists have for the most part eschewed the term. Nevertheless, the suggestion that certain crimes are victimless, and should therefore be repealed or limited, raises profound questions about the proper limits of the criminal law. Although there is no consensus on exactly which crimes should be regarded as victimless, the category has, over time, been thought to include some or all of the following offenses: vagrancy, public drunkenness, drug possession, obscenity, public nudity, contraception, abortion, suicide, gambling, failing to wear a seatbelt or motorcycle helmet, and various consensual sexual activities such as adultery, bigamy, incest, prostitution, and homosexuality.

To understand what it is about the criminalization of victimless offenses that has provoked challenge, we need to recognize the importance of what theorists refer to as the "harm principle." Under this principle, which is associated most famously with the philosophers John Stuart Mill and Joel Feinberg, governmental power may be used only to prevent harm to others. A corollary of this is that the criminal law, the most serious kind of sanctions we have in a civil society, should be used only to prevent harms that are serious. Thus, assuming that we accept the premise of the harm principle, we can frame the problem presented by the criminalization of victimless offenses as that, which is raised by the criminalization of offenses that do not involve serious harms to others.

There are several ways in which supposedly victimless crimes might be thought to fail to satisfy the harm principle. First, although offenses such as suicide involve the potential for serious harm, such harm is caused to self rather than to others. Put another way, although suicide is not literally "victimless," it involves a victim who consents to the harm and in fact brings it on himself. Second, offenses such as vagrancy and public drunkenness involve harms that are diffuse and attenuated, and it is difficult to identify any particular victim or group of victims who are affected. Such crimes are better characterized as involving the risk of harm to others, rather than any actual harm. Third, offenses such as obscenity and nudity seem to involve not harm per se but rather something like "insult" or "offense" to sensibilities. In addition, some offenses may involve genuine harm to victims who are either unaware that they have been harmed or who are insufficiently motivated to swear out a complaint.

So what exactly is wrong with criminalizing acts that fail to satisfy the harm principle in such ways? As a matter of principle, the argument is that, in a liberal society like ours, people should be free to pursue their life paths with minimal coercive control by the government. Under such a view, the only circumstances in which the government should be permitted to interfere with an individual's personal autonomy, particularly by means as intrusive as the criminal law, are when the individual causes or threatens to cause harm to other citizens.

Victimless crime statutes also pose a number of practical problems, many of which have been cited by civil libertarians seeking to challenge the validity of such laws. First, criminalizing conduct that is not harmful may result in an overuse of limited prosecutorial, judicial, and penal resources, and a consequent diversion of such resources from more important law enforcement priorities. Second, much victimless crime is private in nature and hard to detect. Its investigation may involve neighbors spying on neighbors, intrusive forms of surveillance, and the possibility of entrapment. Third, because the price of goods or services involved in supposedly victimless offenses such as drug possession and prostitution will be higher than it would be in a legal market, people who buy and sell such goods and services may engage in other, more serious forms of criminality to pay for a habit or protect turf. Fourth, because victimless crimes frequently occur without being observed publicly, there is more potential for official corruption and discriminatory enforcement (particularly against members of politically unpopular groups). Fifth, in some cases, such legislation may encourage societal intolerance for, and unfair stigmatization of, behaviors associated with certain minorities or other powerless groups. Finally, as a result of most or all these problems, the enactment and enforcement of victimless crime statutes is likely to lead to diminished respect for both the rule of law and the authorities that enforce the law.

STUART P. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Devlin, Patrick. The Enforcement of Morals. New York: Oxford University Press, 1965.
- Feinberg, Joel. The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law, 4 vols. Vol. 1. Harm to Others (1984); Vol. 2. Offense to Others (1985); Vol. 3. Harm to Self (1986); Vol. 4. Harmless Wrongdoing (1988). New York: Oxford University Press.
- Hart, H. L. A. Law, Liberty & Morality. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1963.
- Packer, Herbert. The Limits of the Criminal Sanction. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1968.
- Schur, Edwin M., and Hugo Adam Bedau. Victimless Crimes: Two Sides of a Controversy. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1974.
- Wertheimer, Alan. Victimless Crimes, Ethics 87 (1977): 302–318.

See also Abortion; Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986); Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003); Mill, John Stuart; Obscenity; Sodomy Laws; Vagrancy Laws

VICTIMS' RIGHTS

Origins

The victims' rights movement has both liberal and conservative roots. In the 1960s, women's groups and feminists focused on the plight of rape victims. Predominantly progressive, they brought attention to outmoded laws and attitudes toward rape and to the insensitivity of police, prosecutors, and the court system to rape victims. The modern victims' rights movement has its conservative origin in reaction to the Warren Court's expansion of procedural protections for defendants grounded in the Bill of Rights. Victims took the Court's language of rights and argued that victims' rights were needed to counterbalance the Court's excesses and the resulting failure to curb rising crime rates.

An important moment in shaping the conservative political focus of the modern victims' movement occurred in 1982, when President Ronald Reagan and Attorney General Ed Meese convened a President's Task Force on Victims of Crime. The Task Force helped to bring victims prominently into the criminal justice debate as symbols for and supporters of law-and-order policies.

The victims' rights movement cannot be understood without focusing on the stories of individual victims—stories of great tragedy—that are a powerful part of its message. Their stories often also involve insensitivity by the criminal justice system and include complaints that it is designed to protect perpetrators rather than innocent victims.

Conceptual Components

The victims' rights movement has three major components: (1) guaranteeing victim participation in criminal proceedings; (2) securing financial benefits and services for crime victims; and (3) achieving more certain and harsher punishment for perpetrators. Of these goals, only the first two are generally consistent with protecting civil liberties.

The participatory rights element seeks to provide victims with notice of proceedings and the right to be present and to be heard at them. This element also champions opportunities for victims to consult with prosecutors regarding whether to charge and to plea bargain with defendants. The second element, which may be termed the "victim assistance" component, has led to restitution orders from perpetrators, which are required in virtually all jurisdictions and victim compensation programs funded from governmental resources. The third, "defendant damage," element of the movement includes restricting pretrial release, relaxing restrictions on admission of evidence against the accused, and requiring tougher sentencing practices. In these efforts, victims frequently become the allies of prosecutorial and conservative political forces that support a law-and-order agenda.

Successes of the Victims' Movement

The movement's greatest success is the increased level of respect and dignity given to victims in the criminal justice system. Prosecutors' offices now spend far greater time and energy than they had earlier in giving notice to victims and consulting with them about decisions in their cases. Victim counselors and advocates are now part of many court systems.

More controversial are a vast array of changes in criminal law enforcement that have made conviction more likely and punishment harsher. Many of these have been labeled by their supporters as part of victims' rights, and victim groups and victims of particularly notorious crimes have often been important to their passage. Tougher drunk driving laws represent one of the clearest examples of the impact of victim's groups, whereas mandatory minimum sentences have occasionally been the product of victim campaigns, as with California's Three Strikes law.

A major interest of the victims' rights movement has been the opportunity to describe at sentencing the harm caused by the crime. Although victim impact evidence was quickly accepted in non-death penalty cases, the major area of controversy involved such evidence in death penalty cases. In Payne v. Tennessee (1991), the Court reversed its decision of only a few years earlier that such evidence created a substantial risk of arbitrariness and concluded that the Eighth Amendment imposed no barrier to admission, giving the movement one of its biggest victories.

Finally, a greater focus on the interests of victims has been a contributing factor to the development of alternative ways of settling criminal cases. Viewing victims' interests as central to the criminal case means that mediation efforts are sometimes seen as alternatives to prosecutions, particularly for minor crimes. Some victims groups push further, seeking understanding and healing between victims and perpetrators in a movement called restorative justice.

Efforts to Amend the United States Constitution

The effort to amend the United States Constitution on behalf of crime victims began in 1982 with the President's Task Force on Victims of Crime. It proposed adding a sentence to the Sixth Amendment that would grant victims the right to be present and to be heard at all critical stages of judicial proceedings.

Supporters first worked to build political momentum by passing victims' rights amendments in the states, with great success. By 1990, five states had approved victims' rights; by 1995, twenty; and by 1999, thirty-one. In September 1995, the National Victims' Constitutional Amendment Network, representing the major victims' rights organizations, adopted proposed language for the amendment and began serious efforts to amend the United States Constitution. Since 1996, a victims' rights amendment has been introduced in every session of Congress, and in 2000, it was debated on the Senate floor before being withdrawn.

A recent version, Senate Joint Resolution 1 (2003), would guarantee victims of violent crime the right

- to reasonable notice of public proceedings and the release or escape of the defendant;
- to not be excluded from any public proceedings;
- to be reasonably heard at public release, plea, sentencing, reprieve, and pardon proceedings;
- and
- to adjudicative proceedings that duly consider victim's safety, interest in avoiding unreasonably delay, and claims to restitution from offenders.

The proposed amendment gives victims standing to enforce its provisions and grants Congress power to enact enforcement legislation. Significantly, the proponents have repeatedly defeated efforts to add a provision that it is not to be construed to deny or diminish the rights of the accused guaranteed by the Bill of Rights.

Proponents argue that only by enshrining victims' rights in the U.S. Constitution will victims be given full rights in the criminal process and thereby bring the system into essential balance. Opponents argue that the Bill of Rights protections are critical to guaranteeing fairness to defendants who, unlike victims, lack the political power to succeed in the political process. Their major conceptual objection is that the amendment begs the essential question of who is a true victim and whether the particular defendant is the responsible party: while the identity of the accused is clear at trial, whether the apparent victim should have rights against the accused is only determined by the verdict. The most significant impact of the amendment would occur if it were seen as changing the fundamental concept of criminal trials from one in which the Constitution gives defendants procedural rights to guard against abuses of governmental power to a contest between a victim and a defendant both protected by constitutional rights, or if victims' rights simply enhance the power of the prosecution.

ROBERT P. MOSTELLER

References and Further Reading

- Bandes, Susan, Empathy, Narrative, and Victim Impact Statements, University of Chicago Law Review 63 (1996): 361–412.
- Beloof, Douglas E. Victims in Criminal Procedure. Durham, North Carolina: Carolina Academic Press, 1999.
- Braithwaite, John, A Future Where Punishment Is Marginalized: Realistic or Utopian? UCLA Law Review 46 (1999): 1727–1750.
- Cassell, Paul G., Barbarians at the Gates? A Reply to the Critics of the Victims' Rights Amendment, Utah Law Review (1999): 479–544.
- Fletcher, George P. With Justice for Some: Victims' Rights in Criminal Trials. New York: Addison-Wesley Publishing Company, 1995.
- Gerwitz, Paul, Victims and Voyeurs at the Criminal Trial, Northwestern University Law Review 90 (1996): 863–897.
- Henderson, Lynne N., The Wrongs of Victim's Rights, Stanford Law Review 37 (1985): 937–1021.
- Lamborn, LeRoy L., Victim Participation in the Criminal Justice Process: The Proposals for a Constitutional Amendment, Wayne Law Review 34 (1987): 125–220.
- Mosteller, Robert P., The Unnecessary Victims' Rights Amendment, Utah Law Review (1999): 443–477.
- , Victims' Rights and the United States Constitution: An Effort to Recast the Battle in Criminal Litigation, Georgetown Law Journal 85 (1997): 1691–1715.
- , and H. Jefferson Powell, With Disdain for the Constitutional Craft: The Proposed Victims' Rights Amendment, North Carolina Law Review 78 (2000): 371–397.
- Pizzi, William T., and Walter Perron, Crime Victims in German Courtrooms: A Comparative Perspective on American Problems, Stanford Journal of International Law (1996). 32: 37–64.
- President's Task Force on Victims of Crime. Final Report. Washington: Task Force, 1982.
- Shapiro, Bruce. "Victims and Vengeance: Why the Victims' Rights Amendment Is a Bad Idea." The Nation, Feb. 10, 1997: 11–19.
- Symposium: Victims and the Death Penalty: Inside and Outside the Courtroom*, Cornell Law Review 86 (2003): 257–581.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808 (1991)

See also Due Process

VIDAL v. GIRARD'S EXECUTOR, 43 U.S. 127 (1844)

Stephen Girard, at his death, was probably the richest man in America. The bulk of his fortune, estimated at close to seven million dollars, he left to the City of Philadelphia to establish a school for "poor white male orphan" children. Additional monies were given for specified municipal improvements. Girard was very specific regarding the institution that would become known as Girard College. For instance, he spelled out in the most minute detail the dimensions of the cellars, planned so as to guarantee that no orphans could ever be housed there.

Two restrictions in the will, however, would prompt Supreme Court review. In the instant case, the controversy arose from the requirement that "no...minister of any sect...shall ever hold...any station...in the said college; nor...be admitted for any purpose...." Two twentieth century Supreme Court cases dealt with the exclusion of non-white orphans. In 1968, the Court ordered the admission of African-American orphans, concluding that the degree of governmental involvement in the college constituted "state action." Later, the college was opened to girls and to nonorphans.

Vidal was brought by what one story biographer, Gerald T. Dunne, dubbed Girard's "passed-over French relatives." They claimed Philadelphia lacked authority to administer the trust, the beneficiaries were not clearly defined, and the prohibition against ministers was antithetical to public policy.

Argument before the Supreme Court lasted for ten days, with Daniel Webster appearing on behalf of the unhappy relatives. Despite Webster's argument, one that caused "tears [to] pour from the eyes of sentimental observers"—critics dismissed it as merely a "speech" as opposed to the "argument" advanced by the attorneys representing the Girard estate—his friend, Justice Joseph Story, was unmoved as were his fellow justices, who according to Story, accepted his opinion without any revisions.

The opinion effectively reversed the Marshall Court's decision in the case of Baptist Association v. Hart's Executors (1819) in which Story had himself concurred. Charles Warren in his The Supreme Court in United States History explains that Story's shift resulted from the publication in 1827 of English precedents dating back to the reign of Elizabeth that had been unavailable in 1819. Their publication convinced Story that Marshall had been wrong in Baptist Association in stating there was no chancery jurisdiction. As to the claim that excluding clergy "is derogatory and hostile to the Christian religion, and so is void, as being against the common law and public policy of Pennsylvania,” Story, while acknowledging “that the Christian religion is part of the common law” and that this is “a Christian country” held “there is nothing in the devise...inconsistent with the Christian religion....” Nothing prevented the orphans being taught the basics of Christianity. In fact, regular religious services were held on Sundays as soon as the College opened, but they were conducted by the president of Girard College, a layman.

FRANCIS GRAHAM LEE

References and Further Reading

- Arey, Henry W. The Girard College and Its Founder. Philadelphia: C. Sherman, 1857.
- Dunne, Gerald T. Justice Story and the Rise of the Supreme Court. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1970.
- Hoffman, John N. Girard Estate Coal Lands in Pennsylvania, 1801–1884. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1972.
- Swisher, Carl B. The Taney Court 1836–1864, vol. V of History of the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Macmillan, 1974.
- Warren, Charles. The Supreme Court in United States History, Vol. Two. Boston: Little, Brown, and Company, 1922.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Baptist Association v. Hart's Executors*, 17 U.S. 1 (1819)
- Brown v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania*, 391 U.S. 921 (1968)
- Pennsylvania v. Board of Directors of City Trusts of the City of Philadelphia*, 353 U.S. 230 (1957 and 357 U.S. 570 (1958))

VIDEO PRIVACY PROTECTION ACT (1980)

Congress' role in protecting information privacy has, historically, been reactive rather than proactive. The Video Privacy Protection Act of 1980 (“VPPA” or “Act”) is a perfect example of this reactive role. Arising out of the failed nomination of Judge Robert Bork to the Supreme Court, the Act is one of the most privacy protective ever passed and, perhaps, one of the most narrow.

Bork's confirmation hearings were highly contentious and focused on many of the nominee's more controversial views related to the judicial function and Constitutional interpretation. As his hearings progressed, many began to search his personal background for information that would, it may be assumed, reflect poorly on his candidacy. In 1998, one reporter from a small Washington, D.C. paper, the City Paper, fell on the idea of obtaining Bork's video rental history. One may assume the reporter was not interested in finding whether Bork rented A Day at the Races, but no scandalous materials were found, and the story may have ended there. However, politicians and interest groups on all sides of the political spectrum immediately denounced the story and called for legal action. In response to this outcry, Sen. Patrick Leahy introduced the VPPA and, in short order, it was passed into law.

In summary, the Act forbids the release of information related to the rental of “prerecorded video cassette tapes or similar audio visual material” without the customer's prior, written consent. The Act does not, by its express terms, extend beyond the protection of video rental records (despite initial drafts that included magazine subscriptions and other media). The VPPA does have some exceptions to this general ban. Disclosure of personally identifiable information will not violate the Act if made (1) to police officers pursuant to a valid warrant; (2) with the prior, written, and informed consent of the customer; (3) pursuant to a judicial subpoena (provided the customer is given the opportunity to be heard and oppose); and (4) in the ordinary course of business, including for debt collection, order fulfillment, or transfer of ownership of the store in question. Finally, video rental companies may release customer lists that identify name, address, and “genre” preferences, if such releases are solely for marketing or advertising purposes and the customer has been provided “clear and conspicuous” opportunity to opt out.

The Act authorizes the injured customer to sue any person who violates the Act. When a violation is established, the injured customer is entitled to damages of no less than $2,500 and may be awarded punitive damages and attorney fees and costs. Early decisions held that anyone who discloses or uses video rental information might be held liable. As a result, liability was previously extended to police officers or other individuals who obtained protected information in violation of the Act (Dirkes v. Borough of Runnemede [1996]; Camfield v. City of Oklahoma [2001]). However, a recent decision has called into question this earlier expansive reading of the Act. In Daniel v. Cantrell (2004), the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals determined that only video rental companies and their direct employees can “violate” the Act and, as a result, other persons are immune from suit.

Although the Act's protections are among the strongest in federal privacy law, it is unclear whether they continue to apply to new technologies. Most video rental services now rent, almost exclusively, DVDs and video games. The bare wording of the Act does not clearly encompass rentals of these new media, and no cases have, to date, been brought to test the

VIDEO PRIVACY PROTECTION ACT (1980)

VPPA's application to them. As new technologies emerge, including "on-demand" video and digital content, the limits of the VPPA will be probed and its apparent anachronism tested.

DOUGLAS J. SYLVESTER

Cases and Statutes Cited

Camfield v. City of Oklahoma, 248 F.3d 1214 (10th Cir. 2001)

Daniel v. Cantrell, 375 F.3d 377 (6th Cir. 2004)

Dirkes v. Borough of Runnemede, 939 F. Supp. 235 (D.N.J. 1996)

Video Privacy Protection Act, Act of Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. No. 100-618, 102 Stat. 3195

See also Bork, Robert Heron; Congressional Protection of Privacy; Invasion of Privacy and Free Speech; Journalism and Sources; Privacy

VIEWPOINT DISCRIMINATION IN FREE SPEECH CASES

Viewpoint discrimination is the term the Supreme Court has used to identify government laws, rules, or decisions that favor or disfavor one or more opinions on a particular controversy. For example, a government official who permitted "pro-life" proponents to speak on government property but banned "pro-choice" proponents because of their views would be engaged in "viewpoint discrimination." Courts may also describe this constitutional requirement by saying that government laws and decisions must be "viewpoint neutral." In recent decades, viewpoint discrimination has been distinguished from content or subject matter discrimination, which involves government regulation of an entire topic or subject, such as abortion, war, or sexual speech, either by punishing those who use this kind of speech (such as obscenity) or by completely excluding the subject from discussion on particular government property or in public forums.

Government laws and regulations that evince viewpoint discrimination generally receive the highest form of scrutiny under the free speech clause, because viewpoint discrimination threatens many of the purposes for protecting speech. For example, in RAV v. City of St. Paul, referring to Justice Holmes' argument that the free speech clause ensures a marketplace of ideas that can compete for acceptance by citizens seeking the truth, the Court noted that the government may improperly try to use content or viewpoint discrimination to drive certain ideas out of the marketplace. In addition, government suppression of controversial viewpoints threatens the role of free speech in checking abusive government practices that might otherwise go unchallenged. Viewpoint discrimination also makes it difficult for citizens to engage in effective self-government by preventing them from hearing political speech that contradicts the government's position and prevents citizens from "blowing off steam" by expressing their views under the "safety valve" rationale for the free speech clause.

By contrast, the RAV Court argued that excluding whole subject matters or categories of speech, particularly from certain nonpublic areas of government property, does not quite raise "the same concerns of government censorship and the distortion of public discourse presented by viewpoint regulations." Therefore, the Court has more often upheld subject matter or content restrictions in limited public forums and nonpublic forums if no particular viewpoint is excluded by the government. For example, the Court has held that cities may impose zoning regulations on nonobscene sexual speech, Young v. American Mini Theatres, and may regulate indecent language in the media to protect children, FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, without violating the First Amendment.

On occasion, the Supreme Court has all but suggested that viewpoint discrimination is never permitted under the free speech clause; see Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators' Association. On other occasions, particularly before the Supreme Court's full elaboration of the public forum doctrine in cases such as Perry Education Association, the Court has discussed viewpoint discrimination under the rubric of content discrimination, see Chicago Police Department v. Mosley and Carey v. Brown, or suggested that content and viewpoint discrimination will be subjected to the same standard of inquiry. For example, in Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Comm'n, involving the Commission's ban on utility bill inserts that commented on controversial public energy policy, the Supreme Court held, "[t]he First Amendment's hostility to content-based regulation extends not only to restrictions on particular viewpoints, but also to prohibition of public discussion of an entire topic...."

However, viewing all of the Court's cases as a whole, it is more accurate to say that although content discrimination is permitted in many circumstances, especially in limited public and nonpublic government-owned forums, viewpoint discrimination is rarely permitted and is normally subjected to the strictest standards of scrutiny.

As a threshold matter, a reviewing court must determine whether a government decision constitutes viewpoint discrimination, which is not always an easy matter. The most debated cases on whether a government content exclusion is actually viewpoint discrimination have been those in which a state has refused to extend privileges, such as funding or space, to religious groups. Usually, the government has denied space or funding because of its view that providing government assistance to a religious organization that wishes to worship or proselytize would violate the establishment clause. In at least three cases, the Court has held that providing government assistance or space to secular groups engaged in communicative acts while denying the same assistance to religious groups constitutes prohibited viewpoint discrimination. In Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School Dist., the Court held that a public school's decision to permit school property to be used for the presentation of many views about family issues and child rearing but not those of a religious group constituted viewpoint discrimination. In Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of University of Virginia, the Court found viewpoint discrimination when a state university refused to fund a student religious newspaper when it funded secular student communication forums in violation of the free speech clause. Most recently, in Good News Club v. Milford Central School, the Court held that a public school's refusal to permit a student group to gather for Christian education and worship in the school building after school hours, while providing the space to nonreligious community groups, violated the free speech clause. Consistent with these cases is Widmar v. Vincent, although in Widmar, the Court had characterized a university's refusal to provide meeting space for a student religious group as a "content-based exclusion," which is not permitted in public forums except for compelling reasons. In Widmar, as in the later cases, the University failed to show that its regulation was necessary and narrowly drawn to serve the compelling state interest in avoiding establishment clause violations.

By contrast, the Court has often determined that a government's decision to exclude certain speakers from public property does not constitute viewpoint discrimination, despite the fact that those groups are promulgating a message that contradicts the views of groups permitted to speak by the government. For example, in Perry Education Association, a rival teachers' union requested that it be permitted to put fliers about its views on teachers' rights and school interests in teachers' mailboxes, just as the recognized teachers' union was allowed to do.

In Perry Education Association, the Court held that in nonpublic forums, government officials' exclusions of speakers were required only to be reasonably related to the government interests and not to discriminate on the basis of viewpoint. Despite the fact that the rival union wished to challenge many claims of the recognized teachers' union, the Court held that the school's exclusion of the rival union was not viewpoint discrimination. Rather, school officials had decided to permit and deny union speech on the basis of the status of the speaker: the recognized union had a role in the collective bargaining process and thus in school-related matters, whereas the non-recognized union had no official school role.

Similarly, in Ark. Education Television Commission v. Forbes, the Supreme Court refused to find viewpoint discrimination when a state agency operating public television stations excluded Congressional candidate Ralph Forbes from its televised candidate debates because the electorate did not evidence interest in his platform or candidacy. The Commission had made a decision to limit participation in the debates to "major party candidates or any other candidate who had strong popular support." Construing the "viewpoint neutrality" requirement in nonpublic forums to mean that a government actor "cannot grant or deny access to a candidate debate on the basis of whether it agrees with a candidate's views," the Court held that the Commission's decision was viewpoint neutral: Forbes was not excluded "because his views were unpopular or out of the mainstream" but because of "his own objective lack of support" among voters.

The fact that government excludes speakers because they may cause controversy is not sufficient to trigger the court's viewpoint discrimination rule. In Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., the Supreme Court upheld the Reagan administration's decision to prohibit groups from participating in its annual federal employee charitable giving campaign, the Combined Federal Fund, if they were "[a]gencies that seek to influence the outcomes of elections or the determination of public policy through political activity or advocacy, lobbying, or litigation...." Applying the Perry Education Association rule to conclude that the Fund was a nonpublic forum, the Court held that "[t]he First Amendment does not forbid a viewpoint-neutral exclusion of speakers who would disrupt a nonpublic forum and hinder its effectiveness for its intended purpose." In the Court's view, exclusion of these advocacy groups because their causes may be controversial to minimize workplace disruption caused by employee reactions to them and thereby ensure the fundraising effort's success did not constitute viewpoint discrimination.

Similarly, in Hazelwood School Dist. v. Kuhlmeier, the Court refused to hold that a public school could censor student newspaper articles without running afoul of the "viewpoint neutrality" requirement. The Court held that educators might ensure that students “are not exposed to material that may be inappropriate for their level of maturity, and that the views of the individual speaker are not erroneously attributed to the school.” As a result, student speech on “potentially sensitive topics” or advocacy of “drug or alcohol use, irresponsible sex, or conduct otherwise inconsistent with ‘the shared values of a civilized social order,’” could be excluded without running afoul of the viewpoint neutrality rule. Justice Brennan, in dissent, expressed the view that a school’s “‘mere desire to avoid the discomfort and unpleasantness that always accompany an unpopular viewpoint’... or an unsavory subject...does not justify official suppression of student speech in the high school.”

On the other hand, the Court has invalidated statutes on the basis of viewpoint discrimination even in cases in which the speech would otherwise be considered outside of the protection of the First Amendment. For example, in RAV v. City of St. Paul, the Court invalidated a statute that prohibited symbols such as a burning cross or swastika, which the speaker had reason to know would “arouse anger, alarm or resentment in others on the basis of race, color, creed, religion or gender.” Despite the fact that this statute was construed to reach only fighting words, which normally have received only rational basis scrutiny under Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, the Court held that the state may not punish fighting words on the basis of the viewpoint they represent. The majority rejected the argument that the St. Paul law punished speech on the basis of the status of the victim, for example, because the speech was fighting words directed at certain persons or groups. Rather, the Court claimed that the law prohibited only fighting words with “messages of ‘bias-motivated’ hatred” and “racial supremacy,” while permitting fighting words favoring racial equality and racial harmony, in violation of the viewpoint discrimination rule.

By contrast, in Virginia v. Black, the Court upheld a cross-burning statute against a claim of viewpoint discrimination. The Court there used a narrow distinction it had created in RAV: fighting words and other “unprotected” speech can be prohibited “‘when the basis for the content discrimination consists entirely of the very reason the entire class of speech at issue is proscribable,’” because “‘no significant danger of idea or viewpoint discrimination exists.’” Thus, as the Court opined in RAV, it is not viewpoint discrimination to punish only the most prurient obscenity or the most serious threats, for example, threats against the president, because the reasons that obscenity and threats are not protected especially apply to the worst forms of obscenity and threat. The Black Court held that because threats or intimidations are not protected by the First Amendment, and burning a cross with the intent to intimidate is a “particularly virulent form of intimidation,” the state could ban cross-burning without running afoul of the viewpoint discrimination rule.

In Cornelius, however, the Court did acknowledge the fact that when the government limits access to government property because of the possibility of disruption, the government’s action may call into question whether the regulation “is in reality a facade for viewpoint-based discrimination.” Thus, for example, the Court would be required to scrutinize whether, for example, the school district in Perry Education Association excluded the rival union because it did not like the rival union’s views about teacher’s rights and roles. In City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, the Court also held that there was no evidence that the city ordinance proscribing private signs on public utility poles was directed at the viewpoints of the political candidate who tried to post them.

However, in many areas in which discretion is normally given to government officials, the Court will not probe deeply into whether the choices made by state actors constitute viewpoint discrimination. For example, teachers will be given broad discretion to determine what is educationally suitable for children of various ages, according to Hazelwood, without being heavily scrutinized by the Court. Similarly, the Court held that broadcasters have wide editorial discretion to make choices about how to represent diverse views on public programs, in Ark Ed. TV; and it seems that the Court will not probe deeply into whether their choices might actually constitute viewpoint discrimination. Moreover, in National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, the Court held that the government’s duty to make discretionary aesthetic decisions permitted it to choose which work should be funded, even using such arguably vague criteria as “general standards of decency and respect for the diverse beliefs and values of the American public.”

The one significant exception to the general rule that viewpoint discrimination is subject to the highest scrutiny is in the area of government-funded programs. In Rust v. Sullivan, the Supreme Court held that the government may choose to subsidize programs that essentially convey a government-preferred point of view about a controversial public subject, while refusing to subsidize the contrary view. In Rust, medical providers challenged the so-called “gag rule” that prohibited providers receiving Title XX federal family planning funds from “engaging in abortion counseling, referral, and activities advocating abortion as a method of family planning.” The rule also required that such providers segregate Title XX projects from any abortion-related activities through separated facilities, personnel, and accounting. Plaintiffs argued that this rule constituted quintessential viewpoint discrimination, because it prohibited them from advocating or discussing one method of birth control—abortion—while funding them to advocate other methods of birth control as well as childbirth.

In Rust, because of the Court's view that the Government could constitutionally "make a value judgment favoring childbirth over abortion and implement that judgment by the allocation of public funds," Maher v. Roe, the choice to allocate funds to support certain views on family planning but not views advocating or advising about abortions was not viewpoint discrimination. The Court held that the government "has merely chosen to fund one activity to the exclusion of another" and its ban on speech about abortion "simply ensure[s] that appropriated funds are not used for activities, including speech, that are outside the federal program's scope."

In Legal Services Corporation v. Velazquez, however, the Court reiterated an earlier limitation to general rule that the government may favor one viewpoint over another in the subsidies and grants it makes. The Court held that viewpoint discrimination is permissible in government subsidy cases when the government is itself the speaker, as well as cases in which the government uses private speakers to convey its own information pertaining to programs it subsidizes.

However, the Velazquez Court held that, consistent with Rosenberger, viewpoint restrictions are improper "when the [government] does not itself speak or subsidize transmittal of a message it favors but instead expends funds to encourage a diversity of views from private speakers." The regulation in Velazquez prohibited federally funded lawyers representing indigent clients from advising clients in cases involving welfare benefits or filing a lawsuit—speaking for their clients—in such cases, if the representation related to a legal or political challenge to existing statutes or regulations. The Court held, as in Rosenberger, that this was a program "designed to facilitate private speech" of the lawyer's "private, indigent client," under ethical strictures requiring that the lawyer exercise independent judgment for the client. It was not speech of the government or third-party speech subsidized by the government to promote a governmental message. Because the government was subsidizing "private speech," the Court invalidated the restrictions on legal representation because of their viewpoint discrimination.

Critics of the Court's recent viewpoint decisions have argued that viewpoint discrimination in federally subsidized programs is just as problematic as viewpoint discrimination in other public forums. They claim that government should demonstrate neutrality toward political and social viewpoints at least when the government itself is not speaking. Because government so pervasively influences public life through its subsidy programs, courts' willingness to permit governments to choose whether to subsidize offensive or controversial speech invites government officials to control free speech through public funding. Whether the Rust decision's government funding exception to the general rule against viewpoint discrimination will hold in light of criticisms remains to be seen.

MARIE A. FAILINGER

References and Further Reading

- Greenawalt, Kent, Viewpoints from Olympus, Columbia Law Review 96 (1996) 697–709.
 Heins, Marjorie, Viewpoint Discrimination, Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 24 (Fall 1996), 99–169.
 Jacobs, Leslie Gielow, Clarifying the Content-Based, Content Neutral and Content/Viewpoint Determinations, McGeorge Law Review 34 (2003): 595–635.
 Redlich, Norman, John Attanasio, and Joel K. Goldstein, Understanding Constitutional Law. 3rd ed. New York, NY: Matthew Bender, 2004, pp. 652–658.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Arkansas Education Television Commission v. Forbes*, 523 U.S. 666 (1998)
Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455 (1980)
Chaplinsky v. State of New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942)
City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789 (1984)
Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 530 (1972)
Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., 473 U.S. 788 (1985)
F.C.C. v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)
Good News Club v. Milford Central School, 533 U.S. 98 (2001)
Hazelwood School Dist. v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988)
Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School Dist., 508 U.S. 384 (1993)
Legal Services vs. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533 (2001)
Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)
National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, 524 U.S. 569 (1998)
Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators' Association, 460 U.S. 37 (1983)
Police Dept. of the City of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92 (1972)
R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992)
Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995)
Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991)
Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343 (2003)
Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263 (1981)
Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc. 427 U.S. 50 (1976)

VINSON COURT (1946–1953)

On June 24, 1946, President Harry Truman appointed Fred Vinson to replace Chief Justice Harlan Stone after the death of Stone in April. Having served in every branch of the federal government at the time of his appointment, Vinson came to the Court with a broad experience rarely held by a Supreme Court justice. Vinson was born in Louisa, Kentucky, on January 20, 1890. He left Louisa after graduating high school to attend Centre College in Danville, Kentucky, where he completed both his undergraduate and law degree. On graduation, Vinson started his legal career in private practice. Later, he served as a Commonwealth Attorney for the state of Kentucky until he won a seat to the House of Representatives in 1924. As a congressman, Vinson distinguished himself on tax matters and in his skills as a negotiator. In 1938, President Franklin Roosevelt appointed him to the D.C. Circuit Court. However, in 1943, Vinson resigned his judgeship to work as the director of the newly created Office of Economic Stabilization. Subsequently, Vinson held positions as the director of Federal Loan Agency, the director of War Mobilization and Reconversion, and finally as the Secretary of Treasury. Vinson, who was fifty-six years old when called to succeed Stone, was widely respected in Washington and was considered by some as a potential presidential candidate.

Vinson assumed the chief justiceship at a time of disorder on the Supreme Court. He found a court torn by ideological and personal conflicts between the justices. The most public of which was between Justices Hugo Black and Robert Jackson over judicial ethics and who should succeed Stone as the Chief Justice. The dispute began in 1945 when Jackson argued that Black should have recused himself from the Jewell Ridge case, a case in which Black's former law partner, Crampton Harris, was involved. It continued into 1946, when Black is said to have threatened to resign if Jackson were elevated to the Chief Justice position as a replacement for Chief Justice Stone. At the time, Jackson had been serving as the chief prosecutor at the Nuremburg War Tribunal. When Truman appointed Vinson as Chief Justice, Jackson publicly criticized Black for his involvement in the Jewell Ridge case. The feud seemed to resolve itself publicly on Jackson's return from Nuremburg, but privately the feud continued to negatively influence the Court.

Another less public dispute but equally fractious was the ideological battles between Justice Black and Justice Felix Frankfurter concerning the role that judges should play in the American judicial system. Black was an advocate of the principle that judges and courts had a duty to preserve individual liberties. Black felt that blind deference to government was to forfeit the responsibility a judge has to preserve the Constitution. Black believed in the literal meaning of the Constitution and that judges should look to the text to find definite rules with which to guide their analysis and interpretation. Frankfurter was an advocate for judicial self-restraint and the principle that public policy should be made by elected representatives rather than judges. Frankfurter consistently supported judicial caution and deference to Congress and the states. He believed in balancing the individual interest against the interests of society and that courts should be careful in finding too many prohibitions in the Constitution. These differences in judicial philosophy led to heated debates that would last the duration of the Vinson Court.

Although Vinson proved himself capable as a legislator and later as an administrator in the executive branch, his political skills proved less effective in managing the disputes between the justices. One of the most glaring examples of the divisions on the Court were the number of concurring and dissenting opinions written in the seven years that Vinson served as Chief Justice. Moreover, several of the justices, Frankfurter and Black in particular, openly challenged his authority to lead the Court and often questioned his ability to handle complex legal questions.

The disorder within the Court was mirrored by turmoil in the nation. The Vinson Court sat during a time in American politics that saw the nation struggling over the twin fears of a Cold War with the Soviet Union and a growing Communist influence within the nation. Facing a panic that threatened to spiral out of control, President Truman on March 27, 1947, ordered the implementation of a loyalty-security program that required all persons suspected of subversive activity to take a loyalty oath. The oath, among other terms, required that the individual swear not to take part in any anti-U.S. government or antidemocratic activities. Several months after the initiation of the loyalty-security program, the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) began a series of hearings to uncover a Communist plot to take over the movie industry. The hearings led to further investigations of Communist influences in the nation's labor unions, colleges, and government. These fears and actions led to policies that directly endangered individual rights.

At the same time, the increasing power of the African-American vote and the civil rights movement led President Truman to commission a review of the status of racial discrimination in the nation. The October 1947 report entitled "To Secure These Rights,” reaffirmed the principle that each person, regardless of race, should have equal opportunity in education, employment, and housing. It also called for a strong federal government effort to eliminate segregation from American life. The report, however, angered white southerners and their supporters in Congress who effectively limited Truman’s efforts to implement the reforms to actions he could make without Congressional approval through his executive authority.

Under these circumstances, the Vinson Court’s record on civil liberties was quite mixed. The Court often upheld limitations on freedom of speech, due process, and the freedom of association, but on civil rights and issues of desegregation, the Court overturned several statutes that eventually lead to the rejection of the separate but equal policy in the landmark Brown v. Board of Education decision.

The Vinson Court’s first free speech, Terminiello v. Chicago (1949) led to a five-to-four decision overturning the conviction of an anti-Semitic defrocked Catholic priest whose speeches led to a riot by protestors. Police arrested Terminiello for disturbing the peace, even though it was his opponents who, in fact, disturbed the peace. Justice Douglas’s opinion upheld the right of speech even for people who are deemed hateful. Justice Robert Jackson, who had recently prosecuted Nazi leaders at the Nuremberg Trials, dissented, arguing that Terminiello’s anti-Semitic tirades did not constitute free discussion but rather were similar to the tactics of the Nazis in seizing power in Germany. He argued such speech constituted a clear and present danger to liberty and peace in America. Whatever the merits of Jackson’s arguments, this would be the last important free speech victory in the Vinson Court.

American Communications Assn. v. Douds. (1950) involved a provision of the Taft–Hartley Act that imposed certain restrictions on labor organizations that failed to file “non-Communist” oaths with the National Labor Relations Board. The union argued this violated the fundamental First Amendment guarantees of freedom of speech and assembly. According to the Court, Congress’ power to regulate commerce between the states allowed it to require the oaths that the Court found were reasonably related to the legitimate fear that Communist union leaders could burden commerce by organizing strikes and work stoppages. By an odd five-to-one vote the Court upheld this provision, with Justice Black dissenting and Douglas, Clark, and Minton not participating. Justices Frankfurter and Jackson concurred in the result on technical grounds but objected to the idea that Congress could impose a test on the beliefs and political views of labor leaders.

In 1951, the Court decided two free speech cases that reflected the growing anti-Communism in the nation and the decreasing support for political dissent. At the beginning of 1951, the Court upheld the conviction of Irving Feiner, who had been arrested after giving a speech on a street corner denouncing President Truman. Feiner had not advocated violence, but a crowd hostile to him threatened to attack him. In Feiner v. New York (1951), the Court, in effect, allowed the “heckler’s veto” to overrule the free speech rights of a nonviolent speaker. Most observers believe that Feiner’s leftist views influenced the Court.

In Dennis v. United States (1951), the Court went further. The issue in this case was whether sections of the Smith Act, which made it a crime merely to advocate the overthrow of the U.S. government, were constitutional. According to the Court, when the speech demonstrates, “a clear and present danger,” then government action is justified. The Court went on to say that the government does not need to wait until an attempt against it is made as long as an advocate for the overthrow of the government exists and there is the possibility that he may carry out his intentions. Indeed, the Court here expanded the power of government to suppress speech that presented no clear or present danger. Thus the Court upheld convictions of Communist Party leaders who merely advocated a communist state and taught about it but had taken no steps to start a revolution. A year later the Court upheld, by a vote of five to four, the conviction of Joseph Beauharnais, a white supremacist who had been prosecuted under an Illinois law prohibiting group libel. Although fearful of communism at the high point of the McCarthy era, the Vinson Court also feared fascism in the wake of World War II. Thus, it showed little respect for dissenting political views or notions that radical theories should be presented to the marketplace of ideas.

The Court had a mixed record on religious liberty and the establishment clause. In its first religion case, Everson v. Board of Education of Ewing Township (1947), the Vinson Court, in a five-to-four decision allowed a New Jersey school district to provide school busses for students attending parochial schools. Justice Hugo Black, quoting Jefferson’s famous letter to the Danbury Baptist Church, said that “the clause against establishment of religion by law was intended to erect a ‘wall of separation between Church and State.’” However, as Justice Robert Jackson noted in dissent, the decision did not in fact support that wall. Rather, the dissenters argued that by approving the use of state money to support parochial education, the court breached the wall. A year later, in McCullom v. Board of Education (1948), with Court struck down the use of school facilities for “church schools.” Illinois allowed clergymen from various faiths to come into the school to conduct religious education. The school monitored this attendance while providing free facilities to the religious educators. In a concurring opinion Frankfurter supported this result but attacked the decision in Everson, declaring that “separation means separation, not something else.” He argued that American freedom depended on secular education for all people in the same schools and that “the public school must keep scrupulously free from entanglement in the strife of sects.” The issue of religion arose again in Zorach v. Clauson (1952). This case involved New York’s policy of allowing children to leave school early to go to “church schools” where they received religious education during the school day. Here the Court backed away from McCullom, allowing the policy. In writing an opinion for a six-to-three majority, Justice William O. Douglas noted that “we are a religious people whose institutions presuppose a Supreme Being.” Douglas found this program constitutional because the school did not instruct anyone in religion, and no religious instruction took place on school grounds. Critics argued that the school laws required all children to attend school for a certain number of hours and to allow some to leave for religious education was in itself an establishment. In Niemotko v. Maryland (1951), the Court overturned the convictions of Jehovah’s Witnesses who held meetings in public parks without permits. The Court ruled the city had denied permits because it did not approve of the religious views of the Witnesses, and this violated the free speech rights of Niemotko. Although not a religion case per se, this case did support religious free speech. In Niemotko v. Maryland (1951), the Court overturned the convictions of Jehovah’s Witnesses who held meetings in public parks without permits. The Court ruled the city had denied permits because it did not approve of the religious views of the Witnesses, and this violated the free speech rights of Niemotko. Although not a religion case per se, this case did support religious free speech. Indirectly, the Vinson Court also supported religious free exercise in Ballard v. United States (1946), where the Court reversed the conviction of Edna Ballard, a religious leader who had been convicted of fraud. Ballard did not win on free exercise grounds. Rather, the Court reversed because women had been systematically excluded from federal juries in California.

The Vinson Court was generally unsympathetic to the rights of the accused. Ballard v. United States (1946) was an exception to this. Thus, in Brinegar v. United States (1949), the Court upheld the search of car without a warrant because the police alleged the car seemed to be “weighted down with something,” which turned out to be illegal liquor. More significantly, in Adamson v. California (1947), the Court refused to apply the Fifth Amendment’s prohibition on forced self-incrimination to the states. Justice Black vigorously dissented here, arguing that the entire Bill of Rights should be incorporated to the states.

One of the Vinson Court’s most important decisions was Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer (1952), which prevented President Truman from seizing and operating privately owned steel mills in the wake of steel workers strike during the Korean War. This case remains a major precedent for limiting the power of the executive, even in times of crisis, and preserving the Bill of Rights—in this case the Fifth Amendment—even in times of war.

The Vinson Court was very protective of civil rights and the civil liberties of minorities. In Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission (1948), the Court overturned a California law that denied commercial fishing licenses to Japanese immigrants. Federal law prohibited Japanese immigrants from becoming naturalized citizens, and California used this to deny them other rights, such as commercial fishing licenses. The Court found that aliens legally in the United States had a right to earn a living, just as American citizens did. In Oyama v. California (1948), the Court prevented that state from seizing property purchased by a Japanese immigrant for his American-born son. Several cases illustrate the Vinson Court’s stance on desegregation. In Shelley v. Kraemer (1948), the issue was whether states could enforce private agreements to exclude persons from owning or using real estate on the basis of their race. The Court held that although the private agreements were not unconstitutional, state enforcement of such agreements were a violation of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In Sweatt v. Painter, the Court struck down the separate but equal education policy in Texas law schools when it found that the education that the petitioner would receive in a separate law school for African Americans would not be “substantially equal” to what he would receive at the University of Texas Law School. In McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, the issue was whether the appellant, an African-American student, could be separated from his classmates in the classroom, library, and cafeteria on the basis of his race. The Court found that the Fourteenth Amendment required that the appellant’s admission into a state-supported graduate program guaranteed that he should receive the same treatment “at the hands of the State as students of other races.”

In Terry v. Adams (1953), the Court once again struck down an attempt by Texas Democrats to exclude blacks from their primaries. An earlier decision, Smith v. Allwright (1944), had prohibited the all-white primary. In response some Democrats, known as “Jaybirds” organized a private primary before the official one, which was only open to whites. All whites in the county then agreed to vote for whoever won that primary in the official primary a month later. In Terry v. Adams, the Court prohibited this practice, thus expanding the voting rights of blacks in Texas.

The Court had a chance to make a decision on the Brown case, hearing oral arguments in December 1952. However, disagreement among the justices on the legal basis in which to abolish segregation forced the Court to postpone making a ruling and order a reargument of the case on October 12, 1953. Then, with a little more than a month before rearguments could take place, Vinson died suddenly on September 8, 1953, of a heart attack. President Eisenhower promptly appointed California governor Earl Warren as his replacement, thereby ending the Vinson Court.

In addition to Justices Jackson, Black, and Frankfurter, the Vinson Court included Roosevelt appointees William Douglas, Stanley Reed, Frank Murphy, Wiley Rutledge, and Truman appointees Harold Burton, Tom C. Clark, and Sherman Minton.

The last important case decided by the Vinson Court was Rosenberg v. United States (1953), which most scholars consider one of the great miscarriages of American justice. The case involved Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, who had been convicted of espionage for allegedly giving the secret of the atomic bomb to the Soviet Union. They were sentenced to death, and when the sentences were carried out, they became the only civilians ever executed for peacetime espionage in American history. Justices Douglas, Frankfurter, and Black argued that their death sentence had been illegally imposed and that the law under which they were convicted was no longer in force. Chief Justice Vinson and five other members of the Court disagreed. Despite many problems with their trial, and serious doubts about whether they had in fact passed any secrets to the Soviet Union, Vinson and his colleagues allowed the executions to go forward. Scholars today debate the guilt or innocence of the Rosenbergs, but few scholars or legal experts defend the Court, which heard the case on June 17 and decided it on June 19 without a signed opinion or any full debate or discussion of the issues. Here the Vinson court reflected the anticommunist paranoia of the age rather than the traditions of careful consideration of law and principles of justice.

MARCEL GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Belknap, Michal R. The Vinson Court: Justices, Rulings and Legacy. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2004.
 Murphy, Paul L. The Constitution in Crisis Times, 1918–1969. New York: Harper and Row, 1972.
 St. Clair, James E., and Linda C. Gugin. Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson of Kentucky: A Political Biography. Lexington, KY: University Press of Kentucky, 2002.
 Urofsky, Melvin, and Paul Finkelman. A March of Liberty: A Constitutional History of the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- American Communications Assn. v. Douds*, 339 U.S. 382 (1950)
Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
Jewell Ridge Coal Corp. v. Local NO. 6167, et al., 325 U.S. 161 (1945)
McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U.S. 637 (1950)
Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948)
Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629 (1950)
 Labor Management Relations Act, Act of June 23, 1947, c. 120, 61 Stat. 136
 National Labor Relations Act (Wagner Act), Act of July 5, 1935, 49 Stat. 449
 Smith Act, Act of June 28, 1940, 54 Stat. 671

VINSON, FRED MOORE (1890–1953)

Fred Vinson was born on January 22, 1890, in the Kentucky hamlet of Louisa, and after seven years of service as chief justice of the United States, died on September 8, 1953. A graduate of Centre College and its law school, he served for six terms in the United States House of Representatives before being appointed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in 1938. He sat there and on the Emergency Court of Appeals as its chief judge, where he heard appeals from wartime economic regulation, until 1943. Vinson then assumed critical positions in the executive branch: director of economic stabilization, director of postwar reconversion efforts, and Secretary of the Treasury.

President Harry S. Truman nominated him to the Supreme Court in 1946, hoping that Vinson could soothe the animosities among the justices of that fractious Court. These hopes were disappointed: few people could have harmonized the postwar Court. But Vinson was a more formidable judge than his detractors concede. His extensive experience in all three branches of government left him with an abiding appreciation for the necessity of vigorous government, especially in the executive branch, to preserve American liberty. Hence as a judge he never voted to hold a federal statute or an action of the executive branch unconstitutional.

Vinson wrote only a few noteworthy opinions, and nearly all of them involve civil liberties issues that were related directly or indirectly to the Cold War. His opinion in American Communications Association v. Douds (1950) sustained the anticommunist affidavit provisions of the Taft–Hartley Act of 1947. Writing for a plurality of the Court in Dennis v. United States (1951), Vinson upheld the Smith Act convictions of eleven national leaders of the Communist Party. Although in a dictum he endorsed the speech-protective readings of the clear-and-present-danger test by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes in Abrams v. United States (1919) and Justice Louis D. Brandeis in Whitney v. California (1927), Vinson attenuated the relationship between substantive evil (overthrow of government by force) and speech protected by the First Amendment. To sustain prosecutions on the basis of organizing the Communist Party and teaching its doctrines, Vinson relied on a sliding-scale test devised by Chief Judge Learned Hand in the Court of Appeals below, which permitted prosecution of acts posing only remote dangers if the “gravity of the evil” was great enough. Dennis provided the foremost constitutional endorsement of the second Red Scare, but it was not Vinson’s only contribution in that line.

Vinson’s final opinion for the Court justified denial of stays of execution to Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, sustaining their capital convictions under the Espionage Act of 1917 as amended against persuasive constitutional and procedural objections. Throughout the contentious conference debates over their appeals, Vinson voted consistently to deny their petitions, and he used his position as chief justice to frustrate any possibility of delay in carrying out their death sentences.

Even when Cold War issues were not directly implicated, Vinson’s First Amendment opinions often retarded the cause of civil liberties and free expression. In Terminiello v. Chicago (1949), he dissented from a holding that protected the speech of a rabble-rousing anti-Semite. Two years later, in Feiner v. New York (1951), he wrote for the Court in sustaining the conviction of a leftist street ranter. His Feiner opinion, although of dubious authority today, remains significant for introducing the problem of the so-called heckler’s veto: the power of a hostile mob, backed by police, to quell speech by a speaker whose views were unwelcome to them. Vinson anticipated his Dennis opinion of that same year by suggesting that the First Amendment does not protect “incitement,” although neither opinion defined in any useful way what that vague concept meant.

The speaker whose topic was religion rather than politics fared better at Vinson’s hands. In two 1951 cases, Vinson overturned convictions of a Jehovah’s Witness and a Baptist minister, respectively, for conducting preaching in a public park or on city streets without first obtaining a permit on the grounds that the ordinances in question conferred excessive discretion on the permit-issuing authority (Niemotko v. Maryland, Kunz v. New York). He also condemned an ordinance that forbade door-to-door peddling of articles of commerce that included books (in this case, secular, nonpolitical reading materials) without prior consent by the homeowner (Breard v. Alexandria [1951]).

Dedicated as he was to a vision of civic freedom sustained by effective governmental power, Chief Justice Fred Vinson subordinated civil liberties concerns to pressures of the national-security state in the early Cold War.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK

References and Further Reading

- Frank, John P., Fred Vinson and the Chief Justiceship, University of Chicago Law Review 21 (1954): 2: 212–246.
 Pritchett, C. Herman. Civil Liberties and the Vinson Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1954.
 St. Clair, James E., and Linda C. Gugin. Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson: A Political Biography. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2002.
 Urofsky, Melvin I. Division and Discord: The Supreme Court under Stone and Vinson, 1941–1953. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. United States*, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382 (1950)
Breard v. Alexandria, 341 U.S. 622 (1951)
Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951)
Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290 (1951)
Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268 (1951)
Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)

VIRGINIA CHARTER OF 1606

Much of the settling of the New World by British colonists resulted from the efforts of mercantile companies seeking a profit, and they did so under royal charters. In 1606, King James I issued a charter to the Virginia Company of London, granting it the right to establish colonies between the thirty-fourth and forty-first parallels of the new continent. The London Company, as it was called, would have a governor and an advisory council of thirteen, located in London, to direct the colony's affairs, although it could appoint local councils, also of thirteen men, to actually govern the colonies. The stockholders of the company were to assemble from time to time in a general court.

From the standpoint of liberties, the most important part of the charter declared that the settlers were to enjoy "all Liberties, Franchises and Immunities... as if they had been abiding and born within this our Realm of England." The idea that colonists would continue to have the rights of Englishmen was not new, however, but had been included in the Letters Patent Elizabeth I had given to Sir Humphrey Gilbert in 1578, which held that any person settling in colonies founded by Gilbert "shall and may have, and enjoy all the privileges of free denizens and persons native of England."

The importance of the charter, from the colonial viewpoint, is that at no point had they either given up or had taken from them the rights of Englishmen secured under Magna Carta and other documents of the English constitution. When the colonists rose up in rebellion a little over a century and a half later, they did so as Englishmen claiming the rights of Englishmen.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

Quinn, David B. England and the Discovery of America. New York: Knopf, 1974.

VIRGINIA DECLARATION OF RIGHTS (1776)

On May 15, 1776, immediately after passing a resolution favoring independence from Great Britain, the Virginia House of Burgesses turned to two additional items of business, writing a declaration of rights and a constitution for the soon-to-be independent commonwealth. The chief burden of writing the Declaration of Rights fell to George Mason, then forty years old, and the owner of Gunston Hall in Fairfax County. He had been the author of the "Fairfax Resolves" of 1774, in which he had attacked Great Britain for subverting the traditional rights of Englishmen. In the proposal he drafted for the Burgesses, Mason drew on such varied sources as the colonial charters, English law, and libertarian writers such as Locke, Milton, and Sidney. But none of these provided evidence for Mason's sweeping assertion that "all power is vested in, and derived from, the people." In its sum, Mason's draft relied heavily on a natural rights philosophy that upset many of the more conservative members of the assembly.

From the beginning, the Declaration of Rights was seen as separate from the state constitution, and there has been debate over whether the delegates saw it as a foundation necessary for the constitution, or in some ways superior to the constitution. But in any event, it is the first declaration of individual rights enacted by the newly independent states, and although incomplete, it would become a model for James Madison when he drafted the federal Bill of Rights thirteen years later.

The Declaration, adopted on June 12, had sixteen articles. The first stated that all men are "by nature equally free and independent, and have certain rights," and they enter into a social compact to protect these rights, including life, liberty, and property—a statement that Thomas Jefferson borrowed from later in the month in drafting the Declaration of Independence.

Articles II and III buttressed the first statement, noting that all power is vested in the people and that government is established by the people for their mutual protection and the protection of their rights.

The next several articles actually dealt more with the nature of government than with individual rights and may have been adopted as guides for the committee drafting the constitution. No one group of men are entitled to special privileges, but offices are open to all citizens; the legislative and executive powers of the government should be kept separate; election to government should be by free elections; there should be no taxation except by assent through free elections; and no officer of government should have the power to suspend representative government.

Articles VIII through X dealt with rights of the accused and provided that an accused shall know the charges against him; shall have the right to call witnesses on his behalf; and not be deprived of life or liberty except by due process of law. There is a right to a fair and speedy trial, and defendants could not be compelled to give evidence against themselves. Excessive bail should not be required, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted; and searches may not take place without specific warrants, general warrants being prohibited.

Article XI provided for jury trial in civil suits, whereas XII provided for freedom of the press. Article XIII held that a state militia, although important, should always be under the authority of the civil power. There was no reference in XIII to a right to own or carry arms.

Articles XIV and XV are hortatory in nature, urging that there never be more than one state government created within the borders of the commonwealth, and that the only way free government could survive was by "firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality, and virtue and by frequent recurrence to fundamental principles.”

The last article provided for the free exercise of religion, but did not disestablish the church and spoke of the “mutual duty of all to practice Christian forbearance, love, and charity towards each other.”

Strangely, there is no mention of freedom of speech, but in nearly all other aspects Mason’s work provided a template for both Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence and for Madison in the Bill of Rights, both of whom borrowed not only his ideas but his language as well.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

Sutton, Robert P. Revolution to Secession: Constitution Making in the Old Dominion. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1989.

VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF PHARMACY v. VIRGINIA CITIZENS CONSUMER COUNCIL, INC., 425 U.S. 748 (1976)

Supreme Court decisions before the mid-1970s seemed to indicate that commercial speech does not receive First Amendment protection. The 1975 Bigelow case and the Virginia State Board case put those earlier decisions to rest. On First Amendment grounds, as applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court invalidated a state statute declaring it unprofessional conduct for a licensed pharmacist to advertise prices of prescription drugs.

The Court rejected a variety of proffered justifications for the statute. The justifications involved “the State’s protectiveness of its citizens [which] rests in large measure on the advantages of their being kept in ignorance.” The Court rejected this “highly paternalistic approach.”

Virginia State Board did not precisely define the differences between commercial and noncommercial speech. Nor did it delineate precisely how much First Amendment protection commercial speech receives. Subsequent cases, such as Ohralik and Central Hudson, established that commercial speech receives an intermediate degree of First Amendment protection, tested under a four-part analysis: (1) whether the speech relates to a legal activity and is not misleading, (2) whether the government has a substantial interest in restricting the speech, (3) whether the restriction effectively advances that interest, and (4) whether the restriction is broader than required to advance that interest.

Many subsequent decisions, such as the Posadas, Fox, 44 Liquormart, Greater New Orleans Broadcasting, and Lorillard cases, have applied Virginia State Board—not always consistently. The precise contours of the commercial speech doctrine are not fully settled.

STEVE R. JOHNSON

References and Further Reading

Annotation, Protection of Commercial Speech under First Amendment—Supreme Court Cases, 164 American Law Reports Federal 1.

Symposium, Nike v. Kasky and the Modern Commercial Speech Doctrine, Case Western Reserve Law Review 54 (2004): 4: 965–1299.

Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. 2nd ed., Mineola, NY: Foundation, 1988, pp. 890–904.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975)

Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass’n, 436 U.S. 447 (1978)

Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission, 447 U.S. 557 (1980)

Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Co. of Puerto Rico, 478 U.S. 328 (1986)

Board of Trustees of State University of New York v. Fox, 492 U.S. 469 (1989)

44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1996)

Greater New Orleans Broadcasting Ass’n, Inc. v. United States, 527 U.S. 173 (1999)

Lorillard Tobacco Co. v. Reilly, 533 U.S. 525 (2001)

See also Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp., 463 U.S. 60 (1983)

VIRGINIA v. BLACK 123 S. CT. 1536 (2003)

Cross burning is perhaps the most compelling domestic terror symbol in America. Law enforcement has sought authority to prosecute those who burn crosses to spread fear and harm. Such defendants have often sought First Amendment protection.

In Virginia v. Black, the Supreme Court parsed Virginia’s cross burning, locating its constitutional limits. Virginia’s half-century-old cross-burning statute proscribed the burning of a cross “with the intent of intimidating” another and providing that “[a]ny such burning of a cross shall be prima facie evidence of an intent to intimidate a person or group of persons.”

The Supreme Court granted certiorari on two related issues: whether the cross-burning statute violated the First Amendment as interpreted in R.A.V. v. St. Paul (the R.A.V. issue) and whether the statutory presumption that cross burning is “prima facie evidence” of the defendant’s intent to intimidate was unconstitutionally overbroad (the “overbreadth” issue).

Justice O'Connor's majority opinion upheld the statute on the R.A.V. issue; Justice Souter, joined by Kennedy and Ginsburg, dissented, doubting whether this statute, separate from other cross-burning statutes, was constitutional under R.A.V.

On the overbreadth issue, a majority view may have existed, if not a majority opinion. O'Connor, for a four-judge plurality, found the statutory presumption constitutionally invalid. Separately, Souter, Kennedy, and Ginsburg found the presumption invalid and indicative of their broader concern with the R.A.V. issue.

Under Virginia v. Black, a law may not punish cross burning per se but may punish intimidation crimes committed through targeted cross-burning—a “particularly virulent form of intimidation.”

FREDERICK M. LAWRENCE

Cases and Statutes Cited

Va. Code. Ann. §18.2-423 (Michie 1991) (enacted in 1950).
The prima facie provision was added to the statute in 1968.
R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992)

VIRTUAL CHILD PORNOGRAPHY

See Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002)

VOID FOR VAGUENESS

A void for vagueness statute is one that does not fairly put a person on notice of prohibited versus permissible behavior. Subjecting an individual to criminal liability on the basis of a vague law may violate his or her right to due process; neither individuals nor the courts should have to guess at exactly what behavior the government is proscribing.

Certain categories of criminal statutes are frequently challenged pursuant to the void for vagueness doctrine. Chief among these are vagrancy statutes and statutes that purport to regulate speech (such as laws criminalizing hate speech). Laws that are subjective, either in language or in the type of behavior to be regulated, open themselves up to such a challenge.

When statutes are challenged as unconstitutionally vague, courts may find them entirely void. This occurs frequently when the vague law purports to regulate constitutionally protected conduct, such as freedom of speech or freedom of assembly. In other circumstances, courts may find that a vague law is only unconstitutional as applied to the individual challenging the law. Such a situation occurs when the law proscribes identifiable criminal behavior as well as arguably permissible behavior. Of course, courts often find that statutes challenged under the void for vagueness doctrine are actually constitutional, either in whole or as applied. Over the years, the Supreme Court has developed this test: whether people of ordinary intelligence are on notice that their conduct is prohibited by law.

ANN B. CHING

References and Further Reading

Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360 (1964).
Coates v. City of Cincinnati, 402 U.S. 611 (1971).
Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451 (1939).
Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997).

See also Defense, Right to Present; Due Process; Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Fighting Words and Free Speech; Fourteenth Amendment; Gang Ordinances; Hate Crimes; Hate Speech; Obscenity; Overbreadth Doctrine; Substantive Due Process; Vagrancy Laws; Vagueness Doctrine; Vagueness and Overbreadth in Criminal Statutes

VOTING RIGHTS (COMPOUND)

The idea of one person, one vote is attractively simple. The concept that blacks and women as individuals deserved the right to vote as a matter of basic principle and personal respect holds great moral and logical weight. But what about the idea that voting rights given to groups are just as important as the rights given to individuals? After all, political power—defined in terms of actual effect on public policy—belongs to groups and not to individuals, insofar as individual voters can tell the government how to exercise its authority only when those individuals are aggregated into groups.

Viewing the right to vote as exclusively individual neglects the equally important facet of voting as a group-based right. Blacks and women needed the power to vote as individuals as a matter of dignity and respect. And as groups, blacks and women needed the right to vote as a matter of basic survival: Each group needed political power to obtain equal protection of the law and a fair share of the material benefits provided, as well as the burdens imposed, by the government.

A sophisticated understanding recognizes the essentially hybrid nature of constitutionally protected voting rights, and all political rights, in America. The group aspect highlights voting as the power and ability to direct government decisions. The individual dimension underscores the need for respect—the ability to vote confers status on the individual and provides a forum for expressing one’s views.

The modern Supreme Court, unfortunately, has failed to fully recognize the group-based component present in voting rights. For example, since its seminal decision in Shaw v. Reno in 1993, the Court has repeatedly invalidated majority–minority voting districts when race is used too heavily as a factor in the drawing of district lines. In Miller v. Johnson, the Court justified its decision on the ground that “[a]t the heart of the Constitution’s guarantee of equal protection lies the simple command that the Government must treat citizens as individuals, not as simply components of a racial, religious, sexual or national class.” This idea assumes that line-drawing legislators should ordinarily be color blind. This reasoning focuses exclusively on the individual aspect of voting rights while ignoring the group component present in all political rights including voting rights.

Yet the idea that voting rights are hybrid in nature finds support in enactment of and the circumstances giving rise to the Fifteenth and Nineteenth Amendments. It also gains traction from ideas that underlie the decisions in more than 100 years of case law addressing the nature of political equality in a constitutional context.

These sources form a solid foundation to support the dual dimensions of voting rights. Each shows that the right to vote contains both an individual respect component and a group-based active component. By slighting one aspect of voting rights, the modern Court has been unable to resolve difficult constitutional questions in a coherent way and as a result has often built its doctrinal edifices on shaky ground.

Black Suffrage, Reconstruction, and the Fifteenth Amendment

To understand the Fifteenth Amendment, we must first ask why it was necessary—why, that is, the Fourteenth Amendment did not enfranchise the newly freed slaves. It is relatively clear by the text and historical accounts that the Reconstruction framers did not intend the Fourteenth Amendment’s Equal Protection, Due Process, or Privileges and Immunities Clauses to impact the right of states to regulate political rights at all, including the right to vote. Indeed, passage of the Fourteenth Amendment was made smoother because its backers explicitly eschewed the Amendment’s application to voting, office-holding, jury service, and militia service—the four traditional components of so-called political rights. The Fifteenth Amendment, by contrast, passed not long before the Republican Congress lost power, explicitly takes on the political rights realm by declaring that “the right of the citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.”

The story of the Fifteenth Amendment involves the group dimension of the right to vote, as well as the individualistic component. Support for black suffrage certainly derived in part from the basic idea that blacks deserved the right to vote as individuals. Black Americans merited suffrage as a matter of personal dignity and self-respect, as well as to confer status as newly ordained citizens. Certainly the military service of black Americans in Union armies during the Civil War supported the argument that blacks, as individuals, earned the right to vote and should be rewarded for their loyalty and support with the franchise. Proponents also used a natural rights argument—the idea that every citizen has a natural right to vote as an essential characteristic of the country’s republican form of government. Supporters cited one of the United States’ most fundamental founding democratic principles: that the government derived its legitimacy from the consent of the governed.

Opponents contended that blacks were uneducated and unfamiliar with the political process. While conceding the factual truthfulness of those assertions, black voting advocates saw the ballot as a “great educator” and the right to vote as an incentive for self-improvement, education, and the development of political savvy.

In addition to the individualistic arguments, supporters also urged that the right to vote was necessary to ensure blacks’ collective right to self-defense. Pro-franchise Congressmen argued that extending voting rights to blacks translated into the power blacks would need to deflect the racially discriminatory legislative measures supported by some white southerners. At the time, the voice of blacks in the ballot box served as the strongest—and maybe even the only—means of opposition to white hegemony. Fifteenth Amendment advocates argued that if government didn’t empower blacks with the right to vote to facilitate self-protection, then the federal government would have to permanently assume the duty to protect blacks as a group for the indefinite future. All of these kinds of justifications assume, of course, that giving blacks the right to vote would result in the exercise of group political power.

Indeed, the Republicans, the party of Lincoln, well appreciated that they stood to benefit politically from extending the franchise to black Americans as a group. New black voters were expected to vote dependably Republican. Their votes could help Republicans suppress the dormant seeds of dissension and treason that threatened to sprout if the leaders of the Confederacy retained economic and political power.

Also, both proponents and opponents of black suffrage assumed black voters would support black candidates for office, although each group had distinct reactions to this possibility. Although motivated by partisan politics, these arguments also rely for their premise on the group-based aspect of voting and assume that giving blacks the right to vote would result in blacks exerting collective political power.

In fact, some Democrats who opposed extending the franchise to blacks explicitly relied on the group-based aspect of voting. These opponents argued that the very problem of political participation by blacks was their aggregate power rather than the individual participation of black persons. Even some Republicans who supported suffrage for blacks expressed concern about the possibility that blacks would inevitably demand, and be able to implement with their voting clout, complete equality with whites.

All these arguments in support of the Fifteenth Amendment that relied on the group dimension of voting—the recognition of racial voting patterns, the idea that black voters had a distinct voice that deserved to be heard, and the role of blacks voting as a racial bloc—do not deny the individual nature of voting rights. These group-based rationales supplement, rather than supplant, the more individualistic aspects of voting commonly associated with suffrage.

The Nineteenth Amendment

The women's suffrage movement, which started before the Civil War, culminated in the ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920. As with the Fifteenth Amendment, this movement for voting rights relied on arguments including natural rights and individual liberty, equal justice, and the nonfungibility of men and women.

Women started with the same rationales their male counterparts used when they stood up to the English rules and demanded political recognition in 1776. Originally, suffragists argued women were created equal to men and therefore had the same inalienable right to political liberty. This line of argument emphasized the ways men and women were identical. Supporters focused on men and women's common humanity as the core of the argument for women's suffrage.

It didn't take long for suffragists to add another weapon to their arsenal—group-based arguments joined the natural rights rationale at the end of the nineteenth century. Suffragists argued that women constituted a distinct voting bloc from men; that women had a unique voice, distinct priorities, and perspectives; and that women needed the right to vote to express these views. Supporters demanded political power for women because of the way the woman's voice would influence government's actions for the better.

History offers several theories to explain the eventual shift from an individualistic, inalienable rights approach to the emphasis of group rights and political power. First, arguments suggesting inherent equality and similarity of all people became less effective as America experienced an influx of immigrants and growing heterogeneity.

Second, women began participating in the American economy in unprecedented numbers, and female workers were faced with dreary working conditions, questionable safety standards, and meager wages. Suffragists believed that stressing these unique policy problems facing women was the only way for women to combat these new realities.

Finally, the Progressive era was dawning and reform was in the air. Giving women the right to vote fit seamlessly with the goals of progressives: promoting equality, improving education, and making government more efficient and accountable. Ultimately, suffragists crafted arguments out of the same political amalgam used for expanding the franchise to unpropertied men 150 years earlier: a mixture of natural, individual, and dignitary rights that should be afforded to all citizens and adding a new collective voice as an instrumentally beneficial supplement to the existing order.

In particular, supporters of women's suffrage contended that female voters would add humanitarian sensibilities and heightened moral awareness to politics. Women would probably fight earnestly to protect women's interests in the workplaces, promote the welfare of children, and help achieve a proper legal status for women in the family. In the end, suffragists emphasized the social and economic differences between men and women to justify a move toward inclusion.

The humanitarian interests and moral sensitivity of women was featured prominently in the idea that women were a distinct group with a unique political vision. Pro-suffrage legislators repeated the refrain of women's moral superiority over men. Representatives whose states allowed women to vote attributed recent political innovations in their jurisdictions to the extension of the franchise to women. The president himself admitted the country needed the influence of women to solve the problems present at the end of World War I.

Although these arguments envisioned an expanded political role for women, supporters of women's suffrage did not challenge traditional domestic gender-based roles, specifically a woman's role as homemaker. Indeed, the homemaker argument—that women needed the vote to fulfill their designated role as guardians of the home—was easily incorporated into the idea that men and women had different strengths and thus both needed to be heard at the ballot box.

If society accepted this argument, it was an easy leap to the idea that women also served as the primary caregivers to children. It wasn't that men lacked compassion or care for children, but they lacked the personal knowledge and political will to ensure the welfare of children. Legislators cited women's disproportionate support for child labor laws, interest in education and literacy, and special concern for issues surrounding education and literacy, as reasons for why their group voice needed to be heard.

As with blacks, women's suffrage was premised as well on the idea of group self-defense. Because they were a disadvantaged class, women needed the ballot to protect their own interests. This included the poor working conditions and low wages that afflicted many female workers. Reformers pointed to movements by women in New Zealand and Australia as empirical proof that women could enact change if given the chance at the ballot box.

Both opponents and proponents of women's suffrage recognized that trumpeting the idea that men and women were entirely fungible would weaken the arguments that women needed to and would, in fact, act as a group or that society as a whole would gain anything as a consequence of woman's suffrage. Opponents of the movement thus tried to invoke the original fungibility argument against suffragists, who responded by insisting that women had fundamentally different points of view, natures, and experiences.

Similar to the rationales found in support of black suffrage, these arguments shared a common theme: the voice of women would not be heard without the power of the ballot to back it up. Again, then, group-based arguments reinforced the individualistic arguments for women's suffrage, and even occasionally stole the spotlight.

Judicial Review of Voting and Electoral Regulations

The judicial decisions in political rights cases across a range of disputes usually emphasize, and sometimes acknowledge only, one or the other aspect of voting rights. That is, often each case is styled as involving only the individual rights or the group dimension of voting. Less commonly, a court may grapple with both dimensions in a single decision. Rarer still are decisions that offer a coherent explanation of how both aspects fit together in the context of answering constitutional questions. The judicial failure to be comprehensive and completely honest about the true complex nature of political rights results in an ambiguity in the case law.

Even rulings that seem to rest exclusively on individualistic grounds betray the importance of the group dimension. Take two seminal reapportionment cases, Baker v. Carr and Reynolds v. Sims, which, in fact, reveal the essential duality of voting rights even as they appear to focus solely on individual interests.

Baker and Sims both strongly uphold the notion of "one person, one vote" as an idea that emphasizes the individual right to be treated respectfully. At the same time, however, the Supreme Court also had on its mind how gerrymandering skewed legislative policy—concerns that focused on the impact of groups on legislative behavior. In these cases, both arguments happen to cut in favor the plaintiff. As a consequence, the tension between individuals and groups lurked in the background of these cases but was not acknowledged.

Sometimes, however, the individualistic and group dimensions of voting rights cut in opposite directions. For example, the so-called ballot access cases decided in the end of the twentieth century reflect a more complicated tension between the individual component of voting rights and its group-based counterpart. The tension exists because an individual candidate wants to use the ballot as his platform, and the individual voter wants a broad field of candidates to choose from, on the one hand, and groups of voters, on the other hand, want to make sure the ballot is not too complex or fragmented to serve as a method for aggregating sentiment and fashioning policy.

In their decisions, courts have recognized some need to respect the rights of the individual voter, as well as the candidate who may lack broad public support. Prohibiting access to the ballot to a less popular candidate may amount to a statement that his views and concerns aren't worthy of respect. But the courts have also viewed the problem through the group lens, recognizing that political parties and other blocs view the ballot as a means to an instrumental end and not just a platform for expression. Limiting ballot access to candidates with some fair prospect of winning the election—which courts have said legislatures may do—makes sense only if one agrees that voting allocates political power to groups and not just to individuals.

Faced with competing perspectives, the Supreme Court has tended to prioritize the group dimension of voting rights in this line of cases. So, for example, the Court has upheld restrictions prohibiting minor candidates from cluttering up the ballot, including state refusals to count write-in votes and prohibitions against independent candidates affiliated with a political party during the year before a primary election.

However, not all restrictions have survived judicial review. The Court has struck down restrictions that impair the group dimension of political rights, including laws requiring an early filing deadline for independent candidates. The Court has also struck down substantial filing fees on the basis of the rationale that the requirement particularly disadvantages groups defined by economic class.

The central dispute in so-called vote dilution cases is not the right to vote, to have that vote counted, or to have an individual vote given the same nominal weight as all other ballots cast. Instead, the contention is that members of some racial groups are not able to elect representatives as easily as members of the racial majority. Vote dilution cases affect individuals only with respect to their membership of a particular group. Indeed, vote dilution cases would not exist without the recognition that racial minority groups constitute politically cohesive groups. But this recognition—which drives the vote dilution case law—seems to have been ignored altogether in the so-called racial redistricting cases like Shaw and Miller referred to near the outset of this entry.

Conclusion

An understanding of political rights that is broad enough to encompass both the individual and group nature of political equality stands in sharp contrast to the Court's tendency to offer a one-sided perspective. Constitutional doctrine that recognizes the hybrid nature of political rights more authentically reflects the political reality of the present, as well as the past. Groups, and the importance of group identity to the exercise of political rights, are a part of the American story. Just as there is something missing when the distinct voices of racial and gender groups are not included in our legislatures and juries, our constitutional discourse is incomplete and distorted when group interests are ignored.

VIKRAM AMAR

References and Further Reading

- Equal Protection, Unequal Political Burdens, and the CCRI*, Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 23 (1996): 1019 (with E. Caminker) (symposium Issue on Proposition 209).
The Hybrid Nature of Political Rights, Stanford Law Review 50 (1998): 915 (with A. Brownstein).
Jury Service as Political Participation Akin to Voting, Cornell Law Review 80 (1995): 203.

VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965

One of the two major pieces of civil rights legislation of the 1960s, the Voting Rights Act of 1965, used the power of the federal government to preempt state resistance, particular in the South, to blacks exercising their right to vote and enforce the Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

During the era of Jim Crow and segregation, most Southern states enacted roadblocks (such as literacy tests, poll taxes, and other measures) to prevent blacks from voting. With the rise of the modern civil rights movement in the 1950s and 1960s, the disenfranchisement measures came under attack. Yet it was the public demonstrations by blacks and the violent reactions by whites who supported segregation that prompted the enactment of the Voting Rights Act.

With plans to march to the state capital of Alabama, black marchers were attacked at the Edmund Pettus Bridge in Selma, Alabama, by state troopers. With television cameras rolling, the attacks prompted outrage, particularly from President Lyndon B. Johnson. He responded by proposing a voting rights bill that would deny state attempts to abridge the right to vote. The resulting legislation denied the use of literacy tests in locations where black registration or voting had been less than 50 percent in 1964's presidential election. These areas included the states of Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Virginia, as well as forty counties in North Carolina. In addition, the act gave the Attorney General the power to send in federal examiners into areas to ensure that eligible individuals were registered to vote or observers to oversee federal elections.

In addition, the act required that changes in voting practices (such as the drawing of district lines) in the states of Alabama, Alaska, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Virginia, along with counties or parts of Arizona, Hawaii, Idaho, and North Carolina had to be submitted for “pre-clearance,” or approval, from either U.S. Attorney General or to the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. On being challenged in court, the U.S. Supreme Court ultimately upheld the constitutionality of the act in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301 (1966) by saying that “After enduring nearly a century of systematic resistance to the Fifteenth Amendment, Congress might well decide to shift the advantage of time and inertia from the perpetrators of the evil to its victims.”

With Congress passing extensions in 1972, 1975, and 1982 of the act, additional minorities were included under the protection of the federal government. Hispanic, Asian, and Native American citizens had protections added to prevent voting discrimination as well. The 1982 amendments included arrangements for areas to terminate, or “bail out” of, being covered by the act’s requirements. In 2007, some sections of the act, most notably section five dealing with “pre-clearance,” will be up for renewal by Congress.

The Voting Rights Act has been credited with being an instrumental force to increasing minority participation in the democratic process, from voting to office holding. For example, in March 1965, only 6.7 percent of blacks in Mississippi were registered. By 1998, more than 70 percent of blacks were registered. In 2001, seven of the top ten states with the most elected black officials were in the South, with again Mississippi leading the nation with most elected black officials (892).

J. MICHAEL BITZER

References and Further Reading

- Davidson, Chandler, and Bernard Grofman, ed. Quiet Revolution in the South: The Impact of the Voting Rights Act, 1965–1990. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- Kotz, Nick. Judgment Days: Lyndon Baines Johnson, Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Laws that Changed America. New York: Houghton-Mifflin, 2005.
- Lawson, Stephen F. Black Ballots: Voting Rights in the South, 1944–1969. New York: Columbia University Press, 1976.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- South Carolina v. Katzenbach*, 383 U.S. 301 (1966)

WACO/BRANCH DAVIDIANS

Events that many consider an atrocity began on February 28, 1993, when agents of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms (BATF) allegedly attempted to serve a search warrant on the compound of a religious sect called the Branch Davidians outside Waco, Texas, and an arrest warrant for its leader, who went by the name David Koresh. While the agents were talking to Koresh at the front door, shots were fired; it is unclear by whom, although the Davidians suggested that it was done by some BATF agents around the corner, to kill some dogs. The agents at the door then thought they were being fired on, and began firing at the Davidians, and some of the Davidians returned fire. Koresh was hit in the side, although his wound was not fatal. The agents then attempted to break into the building, and four of them died in an unsuccessful assault, along with six Davidians, which featured automatic weapons fire from helicopters into the building where many children were housed. The agents then withdrew, and the situation became a standoff.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation Hostage Rescue Team (FBI HRT) then took over the scene, and engaged in a strange saga of negotiation and harassment that continued until they assaulted the compound fifty-one days later, on the morning of April 19, 1993. That assault brought a fire that destroyed the compound, killing most of the remaining Davidians, a total of eighty-two since the commencement of hostilities, but a few escaped and were taken into custody. Koresh was one of those who died in the fire.

The government claimed that the Davidians started the fire, and killed themselves. It does appear that some of them did kill themselves to escape being burned alive, but evidence has since come to light that the government started the fire and deliberately sought to kill the Davidians rather than capture them alive.

Eleven of the surviving Davidians were tried in federal court in early 1994 in San Antonio, Texas. Many regard it as a political trial, fraught with judicial and prosecutorial misconduct. District Judge Walter P. Smith refused to let the defense team challenge the authority for the warrant or the evidence presented by the prosecution, or to make an argument for self-defense. When the defense team threatened to file an offer of proof that could bring a reversal on appeal, the judge offered them a deal to not do so if he would include a jury instruction that the jury could consider self-defense. The defense team, thinking that was the best deal they could get, and hoping that the jury would see through the prosecution's case, agreed to the deal.

The jury instructions, however, were cleverly worded to confuse the jury, led by foreperson Sarah Bain, into acquitting all the defendants on all criminal charges, but convicting them on what are only enhancements, "carrying a weapon during the commission of a crime." At first the judge ruled, correctly, that the defendants could not be convicted of an enhancement if they were acquitted of the crime, but then, after an ex parte meeting with the prosecution, reversed his own ruling, and imposed long prison terms on those convicted of the enhancements, saying, "The law doesn't have to be logical." Subsequent appeals brought a reduction in some of the sentences, but not a reversal of the convictions.

Independent investigators continued to bring forward evidence of government misconduct. A critical piece of such evidence was a tape provided by a whistleblower, thought to have been acting at the behest of William Colby, former CIA director, of a forward-looking infrared (FLIR) camera on an aircraft over the compound during the final assault. Experts conclude that the tape showed two government tanks bulldozing the buildings from behind, out of sight of any news cameras, and two figures firing automatic weapons into the building, in a way that seemed to be trying to prevent anyone from getting out alive. Some Davidians were found to have been crushed under the tank treads. Also revealed from evidence gathered from the ruins by the Texas Rangers were undetonated incendiary grenades of a kind available only to the government. This evidence has been released as two documentary films and tapes available to the public, the first of which won an Emmy and was nominated for an Oscar.

Experts alleged that the tanks and troops used in the final assault were personnel of the Combat Applications Groups, popularly known as Delta Force, in violation of the Posse Comitatus Act that forbids the use of Army personnel for law enforcement. Some FBI agents, in casual conversation, not for attribution, have said that the "burn out" of the Davidians was intentional, to kill all of them, and that the main motive was budgetary. The standoff was costing the FBI too much money.

JON ROLAND

References and Further Reading

- Constitution Society. Waco: Massacre at Mount Carmel. Updated April 19, 2003. <http://www.constitution.org/waco/mtcarmel.htm>.
- Gazecki, William, and Dan Gifford. Waco—The Rules of Engagement. DVD. Los Angeles: Distributed by Som-Ford Entertainment, 1997.
- Hardy, David T., and Rex Kimball. This Is Not an Assault. Philadelphia: Xlibris Corporation, June 2001.
- Kopel, David B., and Paul H. Blackman. No More Wacos: What's Wrong with Federal Law Enforcement and How to Fix It. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1997.
- Reavis, Dick J. The Ashes of Waco: An Investigation. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1998.
- Thibodeau, David, and Leon Whiteson. A Place Called Waco: A Survivor's Story. New York: HarperCollins, 1999.

WAITE COURT (1874–1888)

From the time of his appointment by President Ulysses S. Grant to the position of chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court in 1874, to his death in 1888, Morrison R. Waite presided over several critical areas of controversy in American civil liberties jurisprudence. Principal constitutional battlegrounds included the free exercise clause of the First Amendment, and the newly ratified Fourteenth Amendment (1868).

Interpreting the free exercise of religion guarantee fell to the Court for the first time in Reynolds v. United States in 1878. George Reynolds, a prominent member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, the Mormon Church, was convicted for practicing polygamy in the Territories, contrary to federal law. In appealing to the Supreme Court, Reynolds argued that as an accepted doctrine of his church, "it was the duty of male members ... to practice polygamy," and that this duty was called for by various sources that the members thought to be of divine origin.

In upholding the Morrill Act of 1862, which forbade and punished polygamy practiced in the Territories, a unanimous Court, speaking through Chief Justice Waite, read the First Amendment as saying that "Congress was deprived of all legislative power over mere opinion, but was left free to reach actions which were in violation of social duties or subversive of good order." Waite reviewed the traditional condemnation of multiple marriages in modern Western society, and cited studies suggesting that "polygamy leads to the patriarchal principle, which, when applied to large communities, fetters the people in stationary despotism...." He concluded: "Laws are made for the government of actions, and while they cannot interfere with mere religious belief and opinions, they may with practices."

Thus, it was early established by the Court that the free exercise of religion guarantee, while absolutely protecting religious thought, would generate a balancing test regarding activities carried out in the name of religion. Although the early test of polygamy was an easy one, given the hostile climate of public opinion toward the practice at the time, others less compelling would later challenge and divide the Court.

Such an issue was presented in Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith in 1990. There, the free exercise clause was tested against a state law that included the use of peyote as a prohibited mind-altering drug, resulting in Oregon's denial of unemployment benefits to persons who had been dismissed from their jobs because of their religiously inspired consumption of the drug as a sacrament.

Justice Antonin Scalia, for a sharply divided five-to-four majority, noted:

We have never held that an individual's religious beliefs excuse him from compliance with an otherwise valid law prohibiting conduct that the State is free to regulate. On the contrary, the record of more than a century of our free exercise jurisprudence contradicts that proposition.... We first had occasion to assert that principle in Reynolds v. United States.

Although most of the leading constitutional issues of the late nineteenth century arose from changing economic realities, the problem of race relations stemmed from other sources. During Reconstruction, freedmen in the South had great difficulty integrating with the larger white community and the process generated both resentment of legal backlash. The Supreme Court was able to offer little help. An early post-Civil War challenge came to the Court in the guise of the new Civil Rights Act of 1875. It prohibited racial discrimination in the selection of juries and forbade segregation in inns, taverns, transportation facilities, and other public accommodations. Five separate suits challenged the public accommodations portions of the Act, and the Court reviewed them together as the Civil Rights Cases (1883). The decision, consistent with those in the Slaughterhouse Cases (1873) and United States v. Cruikshank (1876), was that, although the Fourteenth Amendment forbade discriminatory acts by states, it made no mention of discriminatory acts by private individuals or individually owned businesses. As the act did prohibit such discrimination, it was found to exceed the authority granted to Congress by the enforcement clause of the amendment and was therefore unconstitutional.

While the Fourteenth Amendment was passing into disuse in regard to the civil rights of freedmen, it was evolving into a potent check upon the economic regulatory activities of the states. The state governments' powers to promote, regulate, prohibit, or otherwise control economic activity were of three broad descriptions: taxation, eminent domain, and the police power. Prior to the Civil War, the only constitutional restraints on the exercise of those powers were contained in Article 1, Section 10, most notably the contract clause and the restrictions on the kinds of taxes that could be levied. As the Court's interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment developed, however, the due process clause became another, and sometimes more significant restraint.

It was over the issue of property rights, and of controlling state regulatory excesses, that the Waite Court worked out its most important doctrine, that of substantive due process. The first step in the development of the doctrine took place in the Granger cases of 1877. The Grange and other farmers' organizations were formed in the 1860s as social, educational, and marketing groups, and as they gained legislative control in some states, they enacted laws that imposed regulations on private businesses. In Munn v. Illinois (1877), the Court reviewed such legislation, particularly acts fixing the maximum prices charged by grain elevators in Chicago.

The Supreme Court, speaking through Chief Justice Waite, held that grain elevators, being "affected with a public interest," were subject to regulation under the state's police powers. The due process clause guaranteed procedural rights, and was therefore irrelevant to the case. Nevertheless, he cautioned that "under some circumstances" a regulatory statute might be so arbitrary as to be unconstitutional. With those seemingly mild words, Waite gave formal recognition to the concept of substantive due process, and with it he effectively gave to the Court a new weapon. Thus armed, the Court was able to referee the contest between big business and government regulation for the next sixty years, favoring one side or the other as times and circumstances seemed to warrant. A classic example of that economic tug-of-war can be seen in the 1905 case, Lochner v. New York.

KENNETH F. MOTT

References and Further Reading

- Magrath, C. Peter. Morrison R. Waite: The Triumph of Character. New York: Macmillan, 1963.
 McCloskey, Robert G. The American Supreme Court. 2nd ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.
 Trimble, Bruce R. Chief Justice Waite: Defender of the Public Interest. New York: Russell & Russell, 1970.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Civil Rights Cases*, 109 U.S. 3 (1883)
Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
Munn v. Illinois, 94 U.S. 113 (1877)
Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)
Slaughterhouse Cases, 16 Wall. 36 (1873)
United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1876)

See also Civil Rights Act of 1875; Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883); Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990); Mormons and Religious Liberty; Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878); Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873); United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1876)

WALKER, DAVID (1795/6/7–1830)

David Walker's birth date has been varyingly estimated as September 25 in 1795, 1796, or 1797 in Wilmington, North Carolina. He was born to a slave father and a "free black" mother. Under the prevailing law, having been born to a "free black" mother, David Walker was born free. Despite his free status, accounts of his early years indicate a difficult existence as was the norm for African Americans during that time period. Eventually, Walker became an early member of the newly formed African Methodist Episcopal (AME) Church—as a free black person, Walker was disallowed from worshipping in slave churches.

In 1826, after traveling throughout the country and witnessing the brutality of slavery, Walker settled in Boston, Massachusetts, and opened a used clothing store. This enterprise would play a significant role during his abolitionist efforts. Further securing his place within the African-American elite in Boston, in 1826, Walker married Eliza Butler—a member of a prominent local family.

David Walker began to publicly denounce southern slavery and northern racism. As such, he became the Boston agent for and frequently contributed to the nation's first African American newspaper, Freedom's Journal (a weekly paper published in New York City). He wrote about the South as follows:

If I remain in this bloody land, I will not live long. As true as God reigns, I will be avenged for the sorrows which my people have suffered. This is not the place for me—no, no I must leave this part of the country.... Go I must.

By 1828, Walker had become the best-known anti-slavery advocate in Boston.

During the fall of 1829, Walker published the first edition of his Appeal, in Four Articles; Together With a Preamble, to the Coloured Citizens of the World, but in Particular, and Very Expressly, to Those of the United States of America ("Appeal").

The Appeal called for self-determination, independence, and slave revolt:

[T]hey want us for their slaves, and think nothing of murdering us ... [T]herefore, if there is an attempt made by us, kill or be killed ... and believe this, that it is no more harm for you to kill a man who is trying to kill you, than it is for you to take a drink of water when thirsty.

Additionally, in a break from commonly held abolitionist views, Walker did not support the colonization of free African Americans to Africa or the Caribbean. Frederick Douglass stated that the Appeal "startled the land like a trumpet of coming justice."

To disseminate the Appeal, Walker gained the assistance of antislavery sailors traveling to the South—copies of the document would be sown into clothes purchased through his clothing store and later distributed to slaves, "free Blacks," and antislavery sympathizers in southern localities.

While African Americans—both slave and free—clamored to gain access to the document, slave owners recoiled from it. The pamphlet was proclaimed subversive. As such, the Georgia and Louisiana legislatures passed laws against the circulation of the Appeal, and violation punishable by imprisonment or death. To similar ends, the Georgia, Louisiana, and North Carolina legislatures made it a crime to teach a slave to read. In 1829, when copies of the Appeal first began to surface within the state, the Georgia state legislature met in secret and passed a bill making it a capital offense to circulate materials that might incite slaves to riot. The Georgia legislature offered a "reward" for the capture of David Walker—$10,000 alive, and $1,000 dead. In addition, a group of wealthy southerners offered a $3,000 bounty for the severed head of David Walker.

The third edition of the Appeal was published in 1830. A scant two months later, David Walker was found dead on the doorstep of his clothing establishment. While folklore attributed his death to poisoning, some modern historians speculate the cause of death was tuberculosis.

Despite David Walker's Appeal being alternatively decried as "for a brief and terrifying moment..., the most notorious document in America" and being praised as "present[ing] the first sustained critique of slavery and racism in the United States by an African person ... [and] crystalliz[ing] the universal principles against slavery" along with "the most significant Black anti-slavery document in the antebellum period[.]" there are scant few references to Walker and his work. Despite David Walker's influence on abolitionists like Frederick Douglass, William Lloyd Garrison, and perhaps Nat Turner; and twentieth-century activists Malcolm X, and even Martin Luther King, Jr., unfortunately and notably, many of the major tomes on slavery fail to reference David Walker and his Appeal at all.

CYNTHIA G. HAWKINS-LEÓN

References and Further Reading

- Britannica Concise Encyclopedia. David Walker. <http://www.concise.britannica.com/ebc/article?tocId=9382248>.
Finkelman, Paul, ed. Slavery, Race and the American Legal System (1700–1872). Statutes on Slavery, the Pamphlet Literature, Series VII, Vols. 1 and 2. New York: Garland Publishing, Inc., 1988.

- Hinks, Peter P. To Awaken My Afflicted Brethren: David Walker and the Problem of Antebellum Slave Resistance. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1997.
- National Park Service. Boston African-American National Historic Site, David Walker (c. 1785–1830). <http://www.nps.gov/boaf/davidwalker.htm>.
- Public Broadcasting System. David Walker's 'Appeal' (1829). Africans in America, Resource Bank, Historical Document. <http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/aia/part4/4h2931.html>.
- . Editorial Regarding David Walker's 'Appeal' (1831). Africans in America, Resource Bank, Historical Document. <http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/aia/part4/4h2929.html>.
- . Richard Allen in Walker's 'Appeal' (1829). Africans in America, Resource Bank, Historical Document. <http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/aia/part3/3h101.html>.
- . David Blight on Walker. Africans in America, Resource Bank, Historical Document. <http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/aia/part4/4i2983.html>.
- . Eric Foner on David Walker. Africans in America, Resource Bank, Historical Document. <http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/aia/part4/4i2982.html>.
- . William Scarborough on David Walker. Africans in America, Resource Bank, Historical Document. <http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/aia/part4/4i2982.html>.
- . David Walker (1796–1830). Africans in America, Resource Bank, Historical Document. <http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/aia/part4/4i2982.html>.
- Schwartz, Philip J. Slave Laws in Virginia. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1996.
- . Twice Condemned: Slaves and the Criminal Laws of Virginia, 1705–1865. Union, NJ: Lawbook Exchange, 1998.
- Walker, David. Appeal, in Four Articles; Together with a Preamble, to the Coloured Citizens of the World, but in Particular, and Very Expressly, to Those of the United States of America ("David Walker's Appeal"). 3rd ed. Baltimore: Black Classic Press, [1830] 1993.

See also Abolitionist Movement; Abolitionists; American Anti-Slavery Society; Anti-Abolitionist Gag Rules; Slavery and Civil Liberties; State Constitutions Civil Liberties and

WALL OF SEPARATION

A “wall of separation” between church and state has been referenced in Western discourse for half a millennium. The figurative phrase was most famously used by President Thomas Jefferson (1743–1826) in a January 1802 letter to the Baptist Association of Danbury, Connecticut, as a representation of the U.S. Constitution’s First Amendment religion guarantees. This controversial trope has been embraced by proponents of a prudential and constitutional separation between the concerns of religion and the civil state and denounced by advocates of an expansive role for religion in civic life.

Although Jefferson is usually credited with coining the phrase, he was not the first to use it in a church–state context. The Dutch Anabaptist Menno Simons (1496–1561) used the metaphor in a 1548 missive explaining the Anabaptists’ insistence that the community of faith be entirely separated from the world. In his magnum opus, Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, Anglican theologian Richard Hooker (1554–1600) renounced the erection of “walles of separation” between the Church and the Commonwealth that would prevent a Christian prince from fulfilling his divine duty to protect the spiritual estate. Roger Williams (1603?–1683), the founder of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, maintained in a 1644 tract that a “hedge or wall of separation between the garden of the church and the wilderness of the world” must be maintained to preserve the purity of Christ’s church from worldly corruptions. The dissenting Real Whig reformer, James Burgh (1714–1775), warned of corrupt ecclesiastical establishments that merely advanced their own profane interests and those of the civil state. Therefore, in his work Crito (1766, 1767), Burgh proposed building “an impenetrable wall of separation between things sacred and civil.”

In late December 1801, President Jefferson received a message from the Danbury Baptist Association congratulating him on his election to the “chief Magistracy in the United States” and celebrating his support for religious liberty. In his reply, Jefferson linked the “wall of separation” with the text of the First Amendment, thereby, in the minds of many Americans, transforming the metaphor into a constitutional principle. Jefferson wrote:

Believing with you that religion is a matter which lies solely between Man & his God, that he owes account to none other for his faith or his worship, that the legitimate powers of government reach actions only, & not opinions, I contemplate with sovereign reverence that act of the whole American people which declared that their legislature should “make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof,” thus building a wall of separation between Church & State.

Jefferson’s wall, as a matter of federalism, was erected between the national and state governments on matters pertaining to religion and not, more generally, between the church and all agencies of civil government. The “wall of separation” was a metaphoric construction of the First Amendment, which Jefferson said imposed its restrictions on the national government only. The wall delineated the constitutional jurisdictions of the national and state governments respectively on religious concerns, such as official proclamations for days of public prayer, fasting, and thanksgiving.

The term slipped into obscurity until it was rediscovered by the U.S. Supreme Court. In Reynolds v. United States (1879), a Mormon polygamy case, the Court reproduced the paragraph from the Danbury letter containing the metaphoric phrase. The metaphor's current fame dates to Everson v. Board of Education (1947), in which a divided Court upheld the constitutionality of state reimbursements to parents for money expended in transporting their children to and from parochial schools. The Court rejected the contention that the tax supported program constituted an establishment of religion in violation of the First Amendment. In separationist language dissonant from the holding, Associate Justice Hugo L. Black wrote for the majority:

Neither a state nor the Federal Government can set up a church. Neither can pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another.... In the words of Jefferson, the [First Amendment] clause against establishment of religion by law was intended to erect "a wall of separation between church and State".... That wall must be kept high and impregnable. We could not approve the slightest breach.

The Everson Court also incorporated the First Amendment into the Fourteenth Amendment, thereby holding the nonestablishment provision of the First Amendment against the states. Insofar as the First Amendment erected a "wall of separation," that wall now separated church and state at both the national and state levels.

In McCullum v. Board of Education (1948), the following term, the Supreme Court confirmed the metaphor's influence in constitutional law, noting that the justices had "agreed that the First Amendment's language, properly interpreted, had erected a wall of separation between Church and State." In subsequent cases, several justices, most notably Associate Justice Potter Stewart in Engel v. Vitale (1962) (Stewart, J., dissenting) and then Associate Justice William H. Rehnquist in Wallace v. Jaffree (1985) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting), have criticized the judiciary's reliance on a metaphor not found in the U.S. Constitution as a substitute for constitutional text.

Since the mid-twentieth century, few phrases have had a greater influence on church-state law and policy or have generated more controversy than the "wall of separation." Bitterly debated is whether the trope clarifies or distorts constitutional principles governing the relationship between church and state.

The metaphor's proponents contend that it encapsulates an important constitutional principle. A wall prevents religious establishments and all other forms of government assistance for religious objectives, avoids conflict among denominations competing for government favor, and facilitates the private, voluntary exercise of religion.

Opponents counter that reliance on an extraconstitutional metaphor as a substitute for First Amendment text distorts constitutional principles governing church-state relationships. Unlike the First Amendment, which imposes restrictions on civil government only (specifically on Congress), a wall is a bilateral barrier that inhibits the activities of both civil government and religion. The wall, critics say, exceeds constitutional requirements by inhibiting religion's ability to influence public life and policy.

DANIEL L. DREISBACH

References and Further Reading

- Dreisbach, Daniel L. Thomas Jefferson and the Wall of Separation between Church and State. New York: New York University Press, 2002.
 Forum, William and Mary Quarterly, 3d ser., LVI (October 1999): 775-824.
 Hamburger, Philip. Separation of Church and State. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Engel v. Vitale*, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
McCullum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203 (1948)
Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1879)
Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)

See also Application of First Amendment to States; Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962); Establishment Clause; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clause; Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947); Fourteenth Amendment; Incorporation Doctrine; Jefferson, Thomas; McCullum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203 (1948); Mormons and Religious Liberty; Rehnquist, William H.; Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878); Stewart, Potter; Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985); Williams, Roger

WALLACE v. JAFFREE, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)

In its 1962 and 1963 decisions in Engel v. Vitale and Abington Township School District v. Schempp, respectively, the Supreme Court ruled that the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment prohibits school-sponsored group prayer and similar devotional exercises in the public schools. These decisions were designed in part to protect the religious liberty of dissenting students and their parents. Many mainstream religious believers, however, found the decisions hostile to religion, and this position continues to have substantial political support. Critics have pushed for a constitutional amendment, and they have urged the Court itself to overrule its decisions concerning prayer in public schools. These efforts have failed. Although privately initiated prayer is protected, even in the public schools, the Supreme Court has consistently reaffirmed that the schools themselves cannot sponsor or promote it.

Moment of silence statutes represent an alternative response to the Supreme Court's decisions, a response that tests the boundaries of the Court's constitutional doctrine. Adopted by more than half of the states, these statutes authorize moments of silence in the public schools, moments that may be used by religious students as a time for silent prayer. It was inevitable that these laws would be challenged, and the question of their constitutionality reached the Supreme Court in 1985. In a range of opinions, the justices in Wallace v. Jaffree confronted not only the moment of silence issue, but also broader questions concerning the proper meaning and application of the establishment clause.

Wallace arose as a challenge to each of three Alabama statutes concerning the public schools, one enacted in 1978, another in 1981, and the third in 1982. The 1978 statute authorized a period of silence "for meditation." The 1981 law separately authorized a period of silence "for meditation or voluntary prayer." The 1982 enactment authorized a prescribed spoken prayer, this in direct contravention of Engel and Schempp.

The challengers ultimately abandoned their attack on the 1978 statute. The district court upheld the 1981 statute and, remarkably, the 1982 statute as well. Disregarding the Supreme Court's incorporation doctrine, Judge W. Brevard Hand concluded that the Fourteenth Amendment did not incorporate the Establishment Clause for application against the states, and that Alabama therefore was free to ignore the Establishment Clause altogether. The court of appeals reversed, invalidating both the 1981 and the 1982 statutes, and the Supreme Court affirmed this ruling.

In accepting the case for review, the Supreme Court unanimously and summarily affirmed the court of appeals' invalidation of the 1982 statute authorizing spoken prayer. When the Court later issued its decision on the 1981 statute, moreover, Justice John Paul Stevens, speaking for the Court, chastised District Judge Hand for refusing to honor the Court's incorporation decisions. Justice Stevens did not meaningfully answer Judge Hand's historical arguments concerning the original understanding of the Fourteenth Amendment, but he did resoundingly reaffirm the Court's incorporation doctrine.

Even Justice William H. Rehnquist, in his dissenting opinion, accepted the incorporation issue as settled.

Unlike on the issues of incorporation and spoken prayer, the Court was deeply divided on the moment of silence issue. It invalidated Alabama's 1981 statute on a vote of six to three, but the justices' various opinions suggested that other moment of silence statutes were likely to survive constitutional scrutiny. Writing for a majority of five, Justice Stevens found that the Alabama statute's authorization of a moment of silence "for meditation or voluntary prayer" was "entirely motivated by a purpose to advance religion." As such, it violated the secular purpose requirement of the establishment clause, as set forth in the oft-cited constitutional test of Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971). Justice Stevens focused especially on the language and the sequence of the three enactments in Alabama. Given the 1978 law authorizing silent "meditation," Stevens argued that the 1981 statute was largely superfluous except for its "voluntary prayer" language. As a result, he concluded that the legislature had acted in 1981 with the constitutionally impermissible purpose of endorsing and promoting religion. Justice Stevens's conclusion also was supported by candid statements from the legislative sponsor of the 1981 law and by the fact that the Alabama legislature went on in 1982 to authorize a prescribed spoken prayer that was clearly unconstitutional.

In a separate opinion, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor concurred in the Court's judgment. Like Justice Stevens, she concluded that the Alabama law's peculiar legislative history rendered it infirm, but she emphasized that other moment of silence statutes would stand on a different footing. Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr., who had joined the majority opinion, also submitted a concurrence in which he agreed that many moment of silence laws might well be constitutional. Along with Justice Rehnquist, Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justice Byron R. White each submitted a separate dissent.

The various opinions in Wallace indicate that the justices would have upheld many moment of silence laws. Justice Stevens's majority opinion itself suggested that a law not mentioning prayer would be constitutionally permissible. The five justices who wrote separate opinions, moreover, apparently would have approved many laws that do mention prayer. The three dissenters, of course, would have upheld even the Alabama law. Justices O'Connor and Powell would not, but they obviously regarded the Alabama legislative history as highly unusual. Absent such stark evidence of an exclusively religious motivation, Justice O'Connor clearly would have upheld a law explicitly stating that the period of silence could be used for prayer as well as meditation or reflection, and Justice Powell probably would have joined her.

Although this issue has not returned to the Supreme Court, lower courts have read Wallace to permit moment of silence statutes as long as their legislative histories do not suggest the improper purpose of promoting or endorsing religion. In Bown v. Gwinnett (1997) County School District, for example, the Eleventh Circuit approved a Georgia statute requiring “a brief period of quiet reflection,” and in Brown v. Gilmore (2001), the Fourth Circuit upheld a Virginia statute requiring a “minute of silence” for students to “meditate, pray, or engage in any other silent activity.”

In his lengthy dissenting opinion in Wallace, Justice Rehnquist argued that the Supreme Court was wrong not only in rejecting the Alabama law, but also in its general approach to the Establishment Clause. Although he accepted incorporation, Rehnquist challenged the Court’s doctrine by focusing on the original understanding of the First Amendment. He claimed that properly interpreted, the First Amendment permits the government to favor religion as long as it avoids discrimination among competing religious sects. On this view, there is no need for subtle distinctions concerning the purpose or form of moment of silence laws, for the government is perfectly free to “characterize prayer as a favored practice.”

DANIEL O. CONKLE

References and Further Reading

- Davis, Derek. Original Intent: Chief Justice Rehnquist and the Course of American Church/State Relations. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1991.
- Dellinger, Walter, The Sound of Silence: An Epistle on Prayer and the Constitution, Yale Law Journal 95 (1986): 1631–1646.
- Smith, Rodney K., Now Is the Time for Reflection: Wallace v. Jaffree and Its Legislative Aftermath, Alabama Law Review 37 (1986): 345–389.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abington Township School District v. Schempp*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
- Bown v. Gwinnett County School District*, 112 F.3d 1464 (11th Cir. 1997)
- Brown v. Gilmore*, 258 F.3d 265 (4th Cir. 2001)
- Engel v. Vitale*, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)

See also Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses

WALZ v. TAX COMMISSION OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, 397 U.S. 664 (1970)

Many states and localities have long granted exemptions from property taxes to religious institutions. In Walz v. Tax Commission, the Court considered whether such exemptions violated the establishment clause and concluded that they did not.

In 1968, the State of New York granted property tax exemptions to a variety of groups, including literary, historical, educational, charitable, and religious organizations. In fact, all states granted some type of tax exemption to religious organizations at the time, and several had granted the exemptions for over 200 years. Frederick Walz owned property in New York City; therefore, he paid property taxes. He believed that the tax exemption for religious organizations caused him to indirectly support those religious organizations by paying a part of their share of taxes. He viewed this indirect contribution to the religious organizations as a violation of the establishment clause of the First Amendment. Walz sued but lost in the New York State courts. He appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. Thirty-seven state attorneys general (including three future U.S. Senators), along with a number of religious organizations, submitted briefs in support of the tax exemptions. The Supreme Court held, by a vote of seven to one, that tax exemptions to churches do not violate the establishment clause of the First Amendment.

Chief Justice Burger wrote the opinion for the majority, in which he articulated the underlying principle of the First Amendment religion clauses: “[W]e will not tolerate either governmentally established religion or governmental interference with religion.” He reasoned that the legislative purpose of this exemption was not to advance religion or inhibit religion. Certain groups foster “moral and mental improvement” and “exist in a harmonious relationship to the community at large.” Religious groups, along with other charitable, literary, historical, and educational groups, provided a benefit to the community. Therefore, the groups were worthy of tax exemptions, as taxation would be burdensome to those groups. The tax exemptions were provided equally to each of these groups, and were not simply for the benefit of religious organizations. The tax exemptions were also neutral as applied to religious organizations. The statute did not identify specific religions or churches, but applied the exemption to all, equally. The statute had a secular legislative purpose and it neither advanced nor inhibited religion.

He also explained that the effect of such legislation did not cause “excessive entanglement” between religion and government. The danger of excessive entanglement between religion and government would be greater if religious organizations were subject to tax appraisals, tax liens, and tax foreclosures, than if the religious organizations were simply exempted from taxes.

Justice Brennan wrote a concurrence in which he analyzed the statute to ensure that it did not serve “religious activities,” “religious purposes,” or “use religious means to serve governmental ends.” He reviewed a number of examples from the nation’s early history to demonstrate that the Founding Fathers approved of tax exemptions for religious organizations both before and after the Bill of Rights was drafted and ratified. If such tax exemptions did not offend the drafters of the Constitution, then such tax exemptions did not offend the Constitution. Justice Brennan also relied, in part, on the fact that many religious organizations also perform charitable and secular functions. The majority rejected this rationale as a basis for supporting the tax exemptions.

Justice Harlan wrote his own concurrence in which he based his support for the statute on “neutrality and voluntarism.” Laws must not favor one religion over another, or religion over nonreligion. Laws also must not encourage or discourage participation in religion. This law satisfied both tests of neutrality and volunteerism.

Justice Douglas wrote the dissent, in which he argued that a tax exemption is no different than a subsidy. Justice Douglas distinguished houses of worship from other charitable organizations that receive tax exemptions. He reasoned that since the government could fund the charitable organizations directly, the government could provide a tax exemption to them. Since government could not provide a direct subsidy to support a house of worship, it could not provide a tax exemption to that house of worship.

This case contributed the “excessive entanglement” analysis to the framework that the Court would use in the future to examine any government action under the establishment clause. The following year, when the Court decided Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971), it created the Lemon test. Under the Lemon test, in order for government action to comply with the establishment clause, the action must have a secular purpose; it must neither advance nor inhibit religion; and, it must cause no excessive entanglement between government and religion. In subsequent cases, the Court held that providing sales and use tax exemptions exclusively to religious organizations that sold materials violated the establishment clause.

JAMES G. HARWOOD

References and Further Reading

- Hamilton, Marci A., Free? Exercise, William and Mary Law Review 42 (2001): 823–861.
Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization of California, 493 U.S. 378 (1990).
McCreary County v. American Civil Liberties Union of Kentucky, 125 S.Ct. 2722 (2005).
Texas Monthly, Inc. v. Bullock, 489 U.S. 1 (1989).
 Zelinsky, Edward A., Are Tax “Benefits” for Religious Institutions Constitutionally Dependent on Benefits for Secular Entities? Boston College Law Review 42 (2001): 805.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)

WAR ON DRUGS

According to conventional wisdom, the term “war on drugs” was coined by President Richard Nixon in the early 1970s, when he fingered drug use and traffic as “public enemy number one” and “declared all-out, global war on the drug menace.” Since then, every U.S. president (except Jimmy Carter) has deployed this phrase in political rhetoric, often as a rallying cry for law enforcement or new legislation. Strictly speaking, however, the drug war is not a “war” in the classic sense, but instead a state-sponsored metaphor used to emphasize the alleged seriousness of the underlying threat posed by banned substances, to describe government’s collective response to this contraband, and to generally reaffirm the righteousness of drug laws and their enforcement.

The drug war typically is associated with criminalization and harsh punishment for the production, transportation, sale, purchase, possession, and use of certain intoxicating and/or psychoactive substances. Law enforcement efforts have focused on common recreational drugs such as marijuana and cocaine, but prohibition extends to a variety of other drugs as well. As a matter of pharmacological classification, opium, morphine, and heroin are correctly termed “narcotics,” for instance, while cocaine is a “stimulant” and LSD is a “hallucinogen.” Nonetheless, drug legislation, government officials, and the general public frequently use the term “narcotic” to describe any illicit drug. Other substances are not considered targets of the war on drugs and instead fall outside the criminal law (for example, caffeine) or are subject to regulation rather than near total prohibition (for example, alcohol and tobacco).

In theory, the use of the criminal sanction has both supply-side and demand-side components. The former seeks to diminish the availability of drugs by employing government resources to eliminate drug production, interdict drugs as they flow through distribution chains, and apprehend those who sell drugs to ultimate consumers. In contrast, the latter strategy aims to reduce the demand by deterring potential users from purchasing and consuming illegal drugs. Moreover, it should be kept in mind that certain government policies may not implicate the criminal justice system at all, such as drug treatment and abstinence programs or aerial eradication schemes using defoliants. Nonetheless, supply-side strategies backed by the criminal sanction have dominated drug war efforts.

The following will discuss the history and development of the war on drugs followed by the legal debate that it has inspired.

Historical Origins

For much of human history, drug production, distribution, and consumption were not matters for government regulation let alone prohibition. Instead, any controls were informal in nature, based on the force of social mores rather than legal restrictions. The exceptions were few and far between, marked by strict dictates and brutal punishment. Coffee was banned in sixteenth-century Egypt and the Ottoman Empire, for instance, and tobacco was forbidden in a handful of nations during the seventeenth century, enforced with corporal punishment and even death in, among others, czarist Russia. Likewise, Imperial China made numerous attempts to stamp out opium in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, culminating in a frenzy of state executions, while England occasionally applied exorbitant duties on gin to decrease alcohol sales and consumption. But in general, the pre-twentieth century norm throughout the world was the absence of legal constraints on drugs and drug-related activities.

The same can be said of the United States, with a few exceptions during the late nineteenth century and early twentieth century. Opiates and eventually cocaine were widely used in nineteenth-century America for a variety of medicinal purposes. These drugs were also available without a prescription by mail order or over the counter at grocery and general stores, while countless patent medicines were laced with opiates and popular beverages were spiked with cocaine, such as the aptly named Coca-Cola. Although Pennsylvania enacted the first drug control legislation in America, restricting the sale of morphine in 1860, only a handful of antidrug laws were in effect prior to the turn of the previous century, including local bans on opium in San Francisco, California and Virginia City, Nevada, and state wide laws regarding cocaine in Illinois and opium in Idaho and Ohio.

Despite the relative dearth of drug laws in the nineteenth century, a number of factors coalesced around the turn of the century and provoked a campaign for national legislation. To begin with, there was lingering anxiety over the consequences from extensive use of narcotic drugs to treat the wounded during the Civil War, with many veterans supposedly coming home with the so-called “soldier’s disease,” addiction to opiates. Another concern was careless prescription of narcotics by medical professionals as cure-alls for nearly any disease or defect, as well as the aforementioned availability of drugs without prescription and their introduction into common goods and remedies—all of which allegedly produced inadvertent drug addiction among the general population.

The federal Pure Food and Drug Act offered one Progressive-era response to such concerns, requiring accurate labeling and full disclosure of ingredients to consumers, including potentially addicting substances such as opiates and cocaine. But the American Progressive movement, composed of a wide range of civic reformers and clergymen, saw the issue as more than one of good governance, transparency, and a fully informed public. The Progressive agenda also sought to shape the country’s morality by prohibiting social vices like gambling, prostitution, and not least of all, intoxicating substances. The consumption of alcohol, cocaine, opiates, and nicotine in whatever form was looked upon with disdain, seen as a primary cause of sloth, depravity, and even violent crime, and thus an impediment to the advancement of American society.

The seemingly benevolent paternalism of Progressives merged with less charitable values, including ethnocentric hegemony and racism. As detailed in sociologist Joseph Gusfield’s classic study, Symbolic Crusade, the antialcohol temperance movement was not merely a conflict between teetotalers and imbibers, but a cultural battle as well. The “rural, orthodox Protestant, agricultural, native Americans” were pitted against “the immigrant, the Catholic, the industrial worker, and the secularized upper class,” with the social status of the former degraded by the normalization of the drinking and saloon life of the latter. Temperance leaders sought public dominance of their abstemious qualities through a national alcohol ban backed by the criminal sanction.

Similar cultural struggles motivated the drive for legislation against opiates and cocaine, with the lifestyle of the drug user challenging the ascetic qualities and fabled work ethic of American Protestantism. But there were additional quasicultural and ethnocentric factors at play, most notably, race-based animosity and fear. For instance, early drug laws in the American West were overtly racist, aimed at Chinese railroad workers and laborers who were easy scapegoats for local crime and other social ills. Likewise, Southern folklore claimed that African Americans were particularly susceptible to drug addiction, and when on cocaine, they were deemed impervious to certain weapons and prone to crime sprees, including the ultimate offense in the Deep South, the rape of white women.

International comity provided yet another rationale for antidrug legislation in the United States. Acquisition of the Philippine Islands after the Spanish-American War forced administrators of the new U.S. territory to evaluate both drug consumption on the archipelago and its involvement in opium smuggling. Around this time, China embarked on a massive antidrug campaign marked by brutal enforcement methods, with opium blamed for the empire's social and economic decline, and the narcotics trade considered a symbol of foreign intrusions on national sovereignty. Some U.S. officials saw this as a dual opportunity to quell Chinese anger over mistreatment of their citizens in the United States, which had led to a boycott of American imports, and also to address rampant drug smuggling in the Philippines. Moreover, American missionaries in the Far East supported the Chinese anti-opium efforts on religious and humanitarian grounds and were convinced that the United States had a moral obligation to help stamp out the evils of narcotics. Appropriately enough, the Episcopal bishop of the Philippines led the charge for a series of meetings with delegations from around the world, culminating in protocols calling upon all nations to ban the narcotics trade.

A final factor, and one that would be repeated in subsequent decades, was the rise of a singular figure with the necessary talents, political alliances, and sheer tenacity in support of antidrug efforts. This individual, Dr. Hamilton Wright, had been a U.S. delegate to the international meetings and authored the leading study on drug use and abuse in America. Although its methodology has since been discredited on numerous grounds, the study offered the conceptual foundation for a national response to drugs in the early twentieth century. Moreover, Wright became a chief negotiator and principal architect for federal legislation, forwarding a litany of reasons to provoke lawmakers to action or soothe any anxieties raised by the proposed bill. He deployed all of the aforementioned rationales in favor of antidrug legislation: America's international obligations and moral duties to support other countries, the need for Progressive-style regulation and paternal protection of innocent victims, the rise of drug use and related crime in U.S. cities and the resulting threat to the dominant culture, and the deeply ingrained racial prejudice and race-based fear held by congressional delegations from certain geographic regions. Given the vehemence of his efforts and seemingly unprincipled collection of arguments, historians have questioned whether Wright was driving the antidrug movement toward success or instead the movement was propelling the "father of American narcotics laws" to the fame and fortune he desired.

But whatever the underlying motivation, the efforts led to the Harrison Act of 1914, named after the congressman who introduced the bill, Representative Francis Burton Harrison, although commentators have suggested that appellative credit should have gone to Wright or possibly Representative James Mann or Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan, who were the bill's main facilitators in the legislative and executive branches. Nonetheless, the title stuck and the Harrison Act remained the cornerstone of American narcotics regulation for more than a half-century. What changed, however, were the legislation's alleged goals. On its face, the Harrison Act had three purposes: (1) to uphold America's treaty commitments from previous international conclaves; (2) to regulate the marketing of opium and other drugs and to place the dispensing function in the hands of medical professionals; and (3) to provide revenue for the federal government. Toward these ends, the law demanded documentation of drugs from their arrival in the United States through their distribution to patients, while physicians and other permissible drug dispensers were required to be licensed with the government and pay a small tax.

In the words of drug scholar Edward Brecher, "It is unlikely that a single legislator realized in 1914 that the law Congress was passing would later be deemed a prohibition law." Yet that is precisely what happened. The entity entrusted with enforcement of the Harrison Act, the Internal Revenue Service of the U.S. Treasury Department, promulgated regulations that slowly converted the legislation from an orderly marketing and taxation scheme into a de facto ban backed by criminal sanction. In particular, federal law enforcement claimed that the act barred prescriptions to drug users solely to maintain their addiction. The lower courts rejected this tortuous statutory interpretation on a number of grounds, as did the U.S. Supreme Court in its 1916 decision, United States v. Jin Fuy Moy. Only a few years later, however, the Supreme Court reversed course in a pair of 1919 cases—United States v. Doremus and Webb v. United States—which affirmed, respectively, the constitutionality of the Harrison Act and the validity of criminal prosecutions for prescribing and dispensing drugs to an addict.

The judicial flip-flop was inexplicable in terms of legal doctrine, but perfectly explainable as a matter of historical events. In the three-year interim, World War I had incited extreme nationalism that had no place for antisocial and economically counterproductive drugs and their addicts. Likewise, the Bolshevik Revolution generated a “red scare” throughout the nation, with drugs being associated with rebellion and addiction viewed as unpatriotic. Most of all, the temperance movement had finally achieved a nationwide ban on alcohol with the passage of the Eighteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and the necessary enabling legislation known as the Volstead Act. American society embarked on a phase of intolerance against those who failed to conform to the dominant cultural norms, and a national prohibition on alcohol, opium, and other drugs was part and parcel of this dogmatic agenda. Alcohol prohibition would last almost fourteen years, and today is considered an abject failure by most commentators. Prohibition had only marginal effect on alcohol consumption but produced an enormous black market of smuggling and speakeasies, fostered unprecedented levels of graft and public corruption, and created a financial windfall for gangsters who, in turn, protected their illegal enterprises with lethal threats and violence. But while the first “drug war” would end with the passage of the Twenty-First Amendment in 1933, “America’s longest war” was only getting started.

Development and Current Status

During the initial years under the Harrison Act, the number of federal agents and associated budget resources remained relatively small, although enforcement efforts still produced a sizable yield in terms of criminal punishment. Within a decade and a half, nearly a third of inmates in federal prisons had been sentenced under the Harrison Act. Still, the extent of antidrug efforts during this period seems rather paltry by today’s standards. As with passage of the first national drug law, a number of factors would coalesce and eventually lead to the current drug war.

As Hamilton Wright had been necessary for passage of the Harrison Act, a singular individual was required to professionalize and intensify drug enforcement efforts. In 1930, Harry Anslinger became the director of the newly created Federal Bureau of Narcotics, the successor to the Narcotics Division of the Internal Revenue Service. “The father of the drug war” proved to be a relentless antidrug crusader, disseminating the idea that drugs and drug addiction were unprecedented threats to American society that required concerted efforts for their elimination. By cultivating strong relationships with federal lawmakers, Anslinger was able to obtain virtually all of the Bureau’s desired funding and legislation. Moreover, he used his position to push for state legislation that paralleled federal law, and within a decade almost every American jurisdiction had adopted stiff antidrug regimes.

Among Anslinger’s many endeavors during his three decades at the helm of federal drug enforcement, his push to criminalize marijuana is probably the best known and most consequential. The resulting propaganda campaign forwarded the idea that shocking crimes were commonly committed under the influence of marijuana, with the drug creating “reefer madness” in its consumer. Similar to the race bating that supported the Harrison Act, Anslinger singled out marijuana use among minorities as causing both serious crime and interracial sexual relations. He then insisted that marijuana was quickly spreading among the children of respectable America and that similar violence and moral depravities were sure to follow. “You smoke a joint,” Anslinger hyperbolically claimed in congressional testimony, “you’re likely to kill your brother.” By 1937, antimarijuana efforts had inspired legal bans in most states and, for the first time, federal legislation. Like the Harrison Act, the Marijuana Tax Act was nominally a revenue and registration statute, requiring physicians and other permissible distributors to obtain licenses and pay small fees. But in a bit of déjà vu, Anslinger’s Narcotics Bureau issued few permits and effectively terminated medically prescribed marijuana, treating distribution of this drug as a federal crime carrying the possibility of substantial punishment.

During and after World War II, drug use and abuse remained stable and even possibly declined due to the war-related disruption of smuggling operations. Nonetheless, Anslinger and several leading federal lawmakers attempted to connect drugs to increased juvenile delinquency and, most importantly, the growth of organized crime. Apparently, mob bosses such as Salvatore “Lucky” Luciano became heavily involved in drug trafficking, creating syndicates modeled after the illegal enterprises of the alcohol prohibition era. Although the extent of Mafia involvement and resulting drug-related crime and violence can be disputed, the evocative claims made by the Federal Bureau of Narcotics provided the impetus for progressively more severe legislation during the postwar period. Moreover, the nation was immersed in the demagoguery of Senator Joseph McCarthy, with drugs considered un-American or, even worse, part of a communist conspiracy against the United States. In 1951, Congress passed the Boggs Act, which both increased the potential punishment and set mandatory minimum sentences for drug crimes, and many states followed this lead with “little Boggs Acts” that provided lengthy sentences for drug offenders. Five years later, federal lawmakers enacted still harsher punishment under the Narcotics Control Act of 1956, raising the sentencing range for all drug offenses and authorizing the death penalty for the sale of heroin to a minor.

During the 1960s, a schism grew between those who pitied drug addicts and supported rehabilitation versus those who detested all drug offenders and favored harsh punishment. The former group was buttressed by a joint study from the American Bar Association and American Medical Association that suggested, among other things, experimental drug clinics for treating addiction. But the latter group dominated the federal government and pushed for further and stronger antinarcotics legislation. In 1963, the President’s Commission on Narcotic and Drug Abuse made a series of recommendations for reforming federal drug policy, although only a few of them came to fruition. As the Commission suggested, previously unregulated drugs came under federal control, including amphetamines, barbiturates, and eventually LSD. Likewise, in 1965 various drug issues were vested in the new Bureau of Drug Abuse Control within the Food and Drug Administration; the new agency’s period of influence would be short lived, however, as it was eliminated along with the old Federal Bureau of Narcotics in 1968 and replaced with a new multipurpose Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs lodged in the Department of Justice. And although civil commitment and treatment had been authorized by Congress under the Narcotic Addict Rehabilitation Act of 1966, the statute’s implementation was so restricted as to have little practical effect on addicted populations and criminal law enforcement.

The turmoil in federal drug policy paralleled the cultural upheaval of the late 1960s. Recreational drug use became popular with American youth, particularly among so-called “hippies” and antiwar protesters. With acceptance if not outright endorsement of time-honored drugs such as marijuana and relatively newer ones such as LSD, the counterculture’s drug use symbolized opposition to government, the Vietnam War, and traditional social values. The apparent threat to established society was palpable, raising the anxieties among mostly older, more conservative Americans. Drugs were seen to be spreading from stereotypical users—minorities and the urban poor—to suburban youth. These fears were only compounded by the rampant drug use by U.S. soldiers in Vietnam and the alleged wave of heroin addiction among returning war veterans.

In 1968, Richard Nixon was elected president in large part due to a “law and order” campaign that promised a national crackdown on crime. During his first year in office, President Nixon drew upon the conventional wisdom that there was a causal connection between crime and drugs, warning the American public of the “serious national threat” posed by illegal drugs and calling for a complete overhaul of federal law and coordination with state governments. The end result was the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, a lengthy omnibus statute premised on Congress’s jurisdiction over interstate commerce rather than the power to tax and spend. It consolidated all previous federal drug provisions into a single scheme and, among other things, established the modern five-category approach (referred to as “schedules”) predicated on each drug’s alleged medical value and potential for abuse. While heroin, LSD, and even marijuana were placed in the strictest schedule with no accepted medical use, for instance, cocaine, opium, and amphetamines were placed in a somewhat more relaxed category. The law also set steep maximum punishments for drug crimes, ranging up to fifteen years of imprisonment, as well as enhanced penalties for repeat offenders and supposedly dangerous drug criminals. Moreover, many states had already enacted or would eventually adopt drug laws comparable to the federal approach. Some jurisdictions took even more drastic steps, including New York State’s notoriously harsh “Rockefeller Drug Laws,” which provided mandatory prison terms and even life sentences for drug crimes.

In 1971, President Nixon formally declared a war on drugs, and two years later, he merged the various antidrug forces into a “superagency,” the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), with broad authority over all aspects of illegal drug trade and use. But despite concerted efforts and Nixon’s own declaration that “we have turned the corner on drug addiction,” drugs continued to flow into and throughout the United States. Cocaine became particularly chic during the 1970s, and its popularity and media depictions continue to this day, along with criminal law enforcement efforts against this drug. And although the administration of President Jimmy Carter advocated decriminalizing marijuana, such proposals for federal drug law all but ended with the end of his term in office.

In the 1980s, President Ronald Reagan re-declared war on drugs, emphasizing aggressive drug enforcement and an abstinence campaign highlighted by the pithy phrase, “Just Say No.” These efforts seemed to have little effect, as this decade witnessed, among other things, the rise of billion-dollar drug smuggling operations, the introduction and ensuing “epidemic” of crack cocaine, and the growth of cutthroat drug dealing by street gangs. The media publicized these stories with specificity, for instance, documenting the drug trafficking by Colombian cocaine cartels, the neonatal damage to “crack babies” caused by their mother’s cocaine consumption, and the lethal drug turf wars between “Crips” and “Bloods” in urban America.

In 1986, Congress responded to the perceived drug scourge and related crime by enacting lengthy mandatory minimum sentences for trafficking comparatively small quantities of illegal drugs; for instance, possession with intent to distribute as little as five grams of crack cocaine generated a five-year mandatory prison term. Federal lawmakers further extended the scope of mandatory drug minimums in 1988 by adding drug-related conspiracies to the predicate crimes. A year later, President George H.W. Bush re-declared war on drugs and created the Office of National Drug Control Policy to oversee the federal government’s antidrug efforts, with the head of this office typically referred to as the nation’s “drug czar.” Although President Bill Clinton was the first American chief executive to admit to experimenting with drugs (claiming that he “tried” but did not “inhale” marijuana), the Clinton administration sustained the drug war through the turn of the twenty-first century, including spending billions of dollars on eradication programs in foreign countries. Likewise, President George W. Bush has continued drug enforcement efforts since his election in 2000, and in light of the terrorist attacks the following year, the Bush administration has upped the ante by attempting to draw a connection between the drug war and the new “war on terrorism.”

A few statistics help provide context for understanding the extent of America’s war on drugs. In the late 1960s, the budget for the Federal Bureau of Narcotics was around $6 million. Federal drug enforcement spending increased to over $40 million in 1970 and to more than $320 million in 1975. By the early 1980s, the federal drug control budget had well surpassed the billion-dollar mark, and in the year 2000, the budget soared to $18.5 billion. By the late 1990s, conservative estimates placed state drug-related expenditures at over $80 billion, or more than 13 percent of all state spending. Pursuant to their billion-dollar budgets, law enforcement agencies arrested over 1.5 million people for drug crimes in 2001, a number that has tripled since 1980, with 80 percent of drug arrestees nabbed for simple possession. Well over 100,000 jail inmates are being held for drug-related crime, and more than 300,000 individuals are serving time for drug offenses in state and federal prisons. The average federal drug sentence is around 6.5 years, more than three times the mean punishment for those convicted of manslaughter. Almost half of the population admits to at least trying illegal drugs during their lifetime, with nearly 13 percent of all Americans admitting to drug use in the past year. One survey reported that nine out of ten high school seniors said they could obtain at least some controlled substance, while the street price of illegal drugs has actually decreased over the past two decades. Pursuant to the large demand and plentiful supply, Americans spent $66 billion on illicit drugs in 1998 and more than $63 billion the following year. Moreover, a 1992 study found that drugs and drug warfare cost society around $98 billion per year, a figure that one might safely assume has increased substantially during the intervening years.

Legal Debate

Almost all legal challenges to drug regulations and their enforcement have failed over the past nine decades, leading some scholars to claim that the courts have created a “drug exception” to the Constitution. As mentioned above, the U.S. Supreme Court initially held in its 1916 Jin Fuey Moy decision that Congress had not intended “to make the probably very large proportion of citizens who have some preparation of opium in their possession criminal,” and as a result, mere drug possession was an insufficient predicate for conspiracy charges. But three years later the Court reversed course, holding in Doremus that the Harrison Act was constitutionally valid pursuant to Congress’s taxation power, while in Webb, it affirmed law enforcement’s interpretation of the act banning physicians from prescribing narcotics to their drug-addicted patients. And in its 1921 decision in Minnesota v. Martinson, the Supreme Court rejected a last jurisdictional challenge to drug regulation, concluding that a state could enact drug laws despite the existence of federal statutes covering the same topic. Since then, legal challenges to government’s power to enact drug regulations and denominate their violation a crime have uniformly failed. The one outlier, Ravin v. State, was a 1975 state case announcing that possession of marijuana by an adult for personal consumption in one’s home was protected under the Alaska Constitution and thus beyond the state’s police powers. It must be noted, however, that Alaska voters later approved a constitutional amendment that allowed the recriminalization of marijuana possession.

More focused challenges to drug laws or their enforcement have largely been unsuccessful as well. In 1962, criminalization opponents saw the Supreme Court's decision in Robinson v. California as a potentially robust limitation on drug punishment. In that case, the Court struck down a state statute that made it a crime to "be addicted to the use of narcotics" as violating the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment. "[N]arcotic addiction is an illness," Justice Potter Stewart opined, and "[e]ven one day in prison would be cruel and unusual punishment for the 'crime' of having a common cold." Six years later in Powell v. Texas, however, the Supreme Court upheld the crime of being intoxicated in public against an Eighth Amendment challenge, thereby clarifying Robinson as only barring so-called "status crimes" but not affecting offenses that criminalize conduct alone. Although an individual cannot be punished for drug addiction, he may be charged and sentenced for drug use, possession, sale, and so on. More recently, the Supreme Court addressed the issue of extreme punishment for drug crimes in Harmelin v. Michigan. In this 1992 case, the defendant was convicted of possessing more than 650 grams of cocaine and received a mandatory life sentence without the possibility of parole. Despite the fact that the sentence severity was only surpassed by the death penalty, the Court concluded that it was not cruel and unusual punishment under the Constitution.

Other substantive challenges to drug laws have likewise failed before the Supreme Court. In the 1990 case of Employment Division v. Smith, civil plaintiffs claimed that the denial of unemployment benefits because of their spiritual peyote use violated the First Amendment clause protecting the free exercise of religion. The Court rejected this claim, arguing that generally applicable drug regulations that have an incidental effect on religious practices are nonetheless constitutional. In 2001, the Supreme Court considered whether medical necessity might be a valid defense to federal drug laws. In that case, United States v. Oakland Cannabis Buyers' Co-Op, an organization established under state law to distribute marijuana to authorized patients for medical purposes was sued by U.S. officials to enjoin their operations. The group maintained that a common-law medical necessity defense should be read into the federal drug scheme, but the Court rejected this argument, holding that Congress's decision to place marijuana in the most restrictive schedule foreclosed any contention that the drug has currently accepted medical value.

Like substantive claims, almost all procedural challenges to drug law enforcement have been rejected by the courts. For instance, in a pair of 1989 cases, Caplin & Drysdale v. United States and United States

v. Monsanto, the Supreme Court upheld the pretrial asset forfeiture against drug defendants even though the funds were necessary to pay attorneys' fees or had already been transferred to their legal counsel. According to the Court, "there is a strong governmental interest in obtaining full recovery of all forfeitable [drug] assets, an interest that overrides any Sixth Amendment [right to counsel claim]." Similarly, in the 1987 case of United States v. Salerno, the Supreme Court upheld the federal Bail Reform Act, which permitted pretrial detention without bail for, among other things, certain drug crimes. And in 1996, the Court's decision in United States v. Armstrong rejected a discovery request to determine whether drug offenders were being selectively prosecuted based on their race, despite a showing that all crack cocaine cases closed during a calendar year in the relevant federal district involved African-American defendants.

Although drug enforcement has affected the full array of constitutional criminal procedure guarantees, in the words of one federal judge, the "hors de combat of the government's so-called War on Drugs" has been the search and seizure protections under the Fourth Amendment. This was particularly evident in a series of drug-related cases in the mid- to late-1980s. In Oliver v. United States (1984), the Supreme Court held that law enforcement can ignore "no trespassing" signs and hurdle locked fences to sneak onto the property surrounding homes in search of drugs, while in United States v. Dunn (1987) the Court acquiesced to DEA agents who jumped over a perimeter fence, several barbed wire fences, and an interior wooden fence to snoop for a drug lab within a rancher's barn. In California v. Greenwood (1988), narcotics agents were allowed to examine contents of garbage bags to uncover indicia of drug activity within the defendant's home. And in California v. Ciraolo (1986) and Florida v. Riley (1989), the Supreme Court held that law enforcement may fly in planes and helicopters, respectively, to detect marijuana cultivation on private property. In all of these cases, the justices concluded that no reasonable expectations of privacy had been implicated, meaning that such drug war-driven intrusions can be undertaken without judicial oversight and in the absence of a warrant or probable cause.

More recently, the 1998 case of Minnesota v. Carter scrutinized the actions of a police officer who peered through a small gap in an apartment's drawn window blind and witnessed a pair of house guests bagging up cocaine. In affirming the convictions, the Court held that the drug dealers had no Fourth Amendment protection because they were engaged in a "purely commercial" transaction, were in the home for a relatively short period of time, and had no previous association with the resident. The Supreme Court has also tacitly acquiesced to the drug-related phenomenon of racial profiling, where law enforcement uses race as a proxy for drug crime which, in turn, leads to the detention and search of minority individuals in public places. In 1996, the Court held in Whren v. United States that police may stop vehicles for traffic violations without inquiry into their “subjective intentions,” regardless of signs that the officers were really pulling over minority motorists in pursuit of illegal drugs. Lower court cases, such as the 1992 decision in United States v. Weaver, have ignored or even explicitly allowed law enforcement’s use of race to determine whether an individual should be detained as a potential drug courier.

A final drug-related Fourth Amendment issue helps demonstrate the extent to which drug war prerogatives can trump individual privacy interests. Over the past decade and a half, the Supreme Court has had occasion to consider six drug testing regimes, each conducted in the absence of judicial warrants and probable cause. A pair of 1989 cases, National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab and Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives’ Association, upheld drug testing for, respectively, certain customs agents and railroad employees based on the allegedly minimal intrusions on privacy and “compelling” government interests at stake, namely, preventing “unsympathetic” customs agents from being involved in drug interdiction or carrying firearms and deterring train accidents resulting from intoxicated railroad workers. In contrast, two subsequent cases—Chandler v. Miller in 1997 and Ferguson v. City of Charleston in 2001—struck down drug testing programs. In Miller, a testing regime for political candidates was deemed to be largely “symbolic” and therefore failed to provide the type of justification for warrantless, suspicionless searches. Ferguson involved a program where certain maternity patients had their urine tested without their consent, and positive results were handed over to local officials for possible criminal prosecution—all of which made the regime look like traditional anti-drug policing and thus unconstitutional in the absence of valid search warrants. The Supreme Court, however, appears to have given carte blanche to drug test public school students. In the 1995 Vernonia School District 47J v. Acton case, the Court upheld a testing regime where all student athletes had to consent to urinalysis in order to play sports, arguing that those individuals who are tested have a substantially lower expectation of privacy, as students in general are “committed to the temporary custody of the State as schoolmaster” and student athletes in particular are subject to the “communal undress” of the gym locker. But in the Board of Education of Independent School District No. 92 of Pottawatomie County v. Earls decision of 2002, the Supreme Court expanded its earlier reasoning in affirming a testing program for students participating in any extracurricular activity, whether it was band, choir, debate, or even the Future Homemakers of America.

ERIK LUNA

References and Further Reading

- Barnett, Randy E., Bad Trip: Drug Prohibition and the Weakness of Public Policy, Yale Law Journal 103 (1994): 2593–2630.
- Boaz, David, A Drug-Free America—or a Free America? University of California Davis Law Review 24 (1991): 617–636.
- Bonnie, Richard J., and Charles H. Whitebread, II. The Marihuana Conviction: A History of Marihuana Prohibition in the United States. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1974.
- Brecher, Edward M., et al. Licit and Illicit Drugs: The Consumers Union Report on Narcotics, Stimulants, Depressants, Inhalants, Hallucinogens, and Marijuana—Including Caffeine, Nicotine, and Alcohol. Philadelphia: Lippincott Williams & Wilkins, 1972.
- Bureau of Justice Statistics, U.S. Department of Justice. Drugs and Crime Facts. Updated July 11, 2005. <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/drugs.htm>.
- . Sourcebook of Criminal Justice Statistics 2002. <http://www.albany.edu/sourcebook/>.
- Courtwright, David T. Dark Paradise: Opiate Addiction in America before 1940. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1982.
- Duke, Steven B., and Albert C. Gross. America’s Longest War: Rethinking Our Tragic Crusade against Drugs. New York: G.P. Putnam’s Sons, 1994.
- Finkelman, Paul, The Second Casualty of War: Civil Liberties and the War on Drugs, Southern California Law Review 66 (1993): 1389–452.
- Grinspoon, Lester, and James B. Bakalar. Cocaine: A Drug and Its Social Evolution. New York: Basic Books, 1978.
- . Marihuana: The Forbidden Medicine. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.
- Gusfield, Joseph R. Symbolic Crusade: Status Politics and the American Temperance Movement. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1963.
- Hamowy, Ronald. Dealing with Drugs: Consequences of Governmental Control. San Francisco: Pacific Research Institute for Public Policy, 1987.
- Kaplan, John. The Hardest Drug: Heroin and Public Policy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1983.
- Luna, Erik, Drug Exceptionalism, Villanova Law Review 47 (2002): 753–807.
- . The Prohibition Apocalypse, DePaul Law Review 46 (1997): 483–568.
- Morgan, H. Wayne. Drugs in America: A Social History, 1800–1980. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1981.
- Musto, David F. The American Disease: Origins of Narcotic Control. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- . Drugs in America: A Documentary History. New York: New York University Press, 2002.

- Nadelman, Ethan. "Should We Legalize Drugs? History Answers: Yes." American Heritage (1993): 41–45.
- Ostrowski, James. The Moral and Political Case for Drug Legalization, Hofstra Law Review 18 (1990): 607–702.
- Rudovsky, David. The Impact of the War on Drugs on Procedural Fairness and Racial Equality, University of Chicago Legal Forum 1993 (1994): 237–274.
- Trebach, Arnold S. The Heroin Solution. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1982.
- Wisotsky, Steven. Beyond the War on Drugs: Overcoming a Failed Public Policy. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1990.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Education of Independent School District No. 92 of Pottawatomie County v. Earls*, 536 U.S. 822 (2002)
- California v. Ciraolo*, 476 U.S. 207 (1986)
- California v. Greenwood*, 486 U.S. 35 (1988)
- Caplin & Drysdale, Chartered v. United States*, 491 U.S. 617 (1989)
- Chandler v. Miller*, 520 U.S. 305 (1997)
- Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Ferguson v. City of Charleston*, 532 U.S. 67 (2001)
- Florida v. Riley*, 488 U.S. 445 (1989)
- Harmelin v. Michigan*, 501 U.S. 957 (1991)
- Minnesota v. Martinson*, 256 U.S. 41 (1921)
- Minnesota v. Carter*, 525 U.S. 83 (1998)
- National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab*, 489 U.S. 656 (1989)
- Oliver v. United States*, 466 U.S. 170 (1984)
- Powell v. Texas*, 392 U.S. 514 (1968)
- Ravin v. State*, 537 P.2d 494 (Alaska 1975)
- Robinson v. California*, 370 U.S. 660 (1962)
- Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association*, 489 U.S. 602 (1989)
- United States v. Armstrong*, 517 U.S. 456 (1996)
- United States v. Doremus*, 249 U.S. 86 (1919)
- United States v. Dunn*, 480 U.S. 294 (1987)
- United States v. Jin Fuey Moy*, 241 U.S. 394 (1916)
- United States v. Monsanto*, 491 U.S. 600 (1989)
- United States v. Oakland Cannabis Buyers' Co-Op*, 532 U.S. 483 (2001)
- United States v. Salerno*, 481 U.S. 739 (1987)
- United States v. Weaver*, 966 F.2d 391 (8th Cir. 1992)
- Vernonia School District 47J v. Acton*, 515 U.S. 646 (1995)
- Webb v. United States*, 249 U.S. 96 (1919)
- Whren v. United States*, 517 U.S. 806 (1996)
- See also* Anslinger, Harry Jacob; Board of Education v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822 (2002) (students); California v. Greenwood, 486 U.S. 35 (1988); Chandler v. Miller, 520 U.S. 305 (1997) (candidates); Drug Testing; Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990); Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957 (1991); Mandatory Minimum Sentences; National Treasury Employee Union v. Von Raab, 489 U.S. 656 (1989); Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660 (1962); Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association, 489 U.S. 602 (1989); Vernonia School District v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995); Victimless Crimes

WARDEN v. HAYDEN, 387 U.S. 294 (1967)

When may the police enter a home without a warrant? May the government seize personal property and use it to convict its owner? Both questions arose in Hayden.

Witnesses saw an armed robber fleeing a crime scene and followed him to a home. While the robber was inside, police were notified and arrived within minutes. They found Hayden inside feigning sleep; they also found guns, ammunition, and clothing that matched those worn by the robber. These items were used to convict Hayden.

The Supreme Court held that under the Fourth Amendment a warrant was not required because the "exigencies" of the situation made it impractical to get one. A delay to get a warrant here could have endangered the lives of the officers and others. This "exigent circumstances" exception to the warrant requirement remains the law today.

The Court also held that the seizure of Hayden's clothing was reasonable. The Court rejected a Fourth Amendment "mere evidence" rule—which it had previously endorsed in Gouled v. United States (1921)—that stated the government could not seize personal property to use as evidence unless it was contraband or the fruit or instrumentality of a crime. The amendment protects privacy, the Court explained, and property interests were neither necessary nor sufficient for protecting privacy. The Court rejected the property-based conception of the Fourth Amendment it had previously endorsed in Boyd v. United States (1886), which would make personal property off limits even with a warrant.

MICHAEL S. PARDO

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Boyd v. United States*, 116 U.S. 616 (1886)
- Gouled v. United States*, 255 U.S. 298 (1921)
- See also* Arrest without a Warrant; Plain View; Probable Cause; Seizures; Warrantless Searches

WARRANT CLAUSE (IV)

In the American colonies before 1776, there did not exist any meaningful right to be secure against unreasonable search and seizure. By then, however, many colonists had come to believe that among the rights enjoyed by Englishmen was protection of their homes against intrusion by the Crown. Justice Felix Frankfurter would state that the abuses of the Crown in invading private homes "more than any other single factor gave rise to American independence.” Within fifteen years after the Declaration of Independence, those beliefs had been translated into the Fourth Amendment.

In the centuries between Magna Carta and American independence, English political theorists wove together what one scholar has called the “appealing fiction that a man’s home is his castle.” That this idea had little basis in law or in fact mattered little, because gradually—despite practices that continuously showed the power of the Crown to search where it pleased—people began to believe it. In 1763, William Pitt rose before Parliament and declared that

The poorest man may, in his cottage, bid defiance to all the forces of the Crown. It may be frail; its roof may shake; the wind may blow through it; the storm may enter, the rain may enter, but the King of England may not enter; all his force dare not cross the threshold of the ruined tenement.

By then the idea that a man’s home was his castle had penetrated deeply into popular thought and even into statements from the bench. As early as 1505 the chief justice of the King’s Bench had noted that “the house of a man is for him his castle and his defence.” Yet one century later, in the Court of Common Pleas, a judge declared that although a man’s house could not be searched by his neighbors, it could be in every instance in which the king was a party. Privacy meant nothing if the government sought to capture felons or find evidence of their criminality. The government could—and did—engage in general searches, where officers might go from house to house, entering as they pleased, and ransacking the contents in search of evidence, and all of this without any sort of court order.

During the fifteenth century, Tudor monarchs used a general warrant—that is, one that did not identify a particular place or even a particular person—in seeking out religious dissidents and their heretical books. Although some victims claimed that their rights had been violated, neither Crown nor courts paid that claim any heed. Moreover, the methods used by the Crown’s soldiers, including sledgehammers to break open walls and floors in search of hidden compartments, evoked no protest except from those whose homes had been damaged. And should evidence be found, it could be used to prosecute, even if it led to the death penalty. No conception of “illegally seized evidence” existed in either English law or practice.

The Puritan Revolution in the mid-seventeenth century did little to change things. In fact, after the Stuarts returned to power, the House of Lords issued dozens of general warrants in an effort to regain property that had been confiscated by the Puritans.

Parliament also authorized the use of general warrants to enforce a variety of laws, especially the wide range of tax measures, as well as those criminalizing particular activities, such as counterfeiting, poaching, or religious heresy.

Beginning in the late sixteenth century, however, some jurists and political philosophers began constructing a conceptual argument against general warrants. Robert Beale, the clerk of the Privy Council, linked the Magna Carta to the opposition to general warrants, especially to Chapter 39, which declared that no man should be condemned without proceedings by the law of the land. If the Crown could enter wherever and whenever it pleased, carrying off whatever evidence it pleased and then using it to condemn a man to prison or to death, how did this comport with the law of the land? The Magna Carta, a document the barons forced King John to sign so as to protect their holdings and lives, was being transformed into a more general shield for the gentry and middle classes. Sir Edward Coke, the lord chief justice, gave his authority to this interpretation of Chapter 39, declaring that it required the Crown to seek a specific warrant before a search. Coke, however, when he had been attorney general had used general warrants extensively, and probably changed his mind only after he had become a victim of a search and ransacking of his papers in 1621 ordered by King James I himself.

Yet despite this increasing sense that general warrants somehow violated individual rights, courts did little to undo their work, and manuals written in the seventeenth and eighteenth century for the use of judges of the peace and other judicial officers all held general warrants to be legal. The House of Commons, while damning general warrants as “against law and the liberties of the subject,” nonetheless authorized general warrants repeatedly. The writings of such legal luminaries as Beale, Coke, Overton, Penn, Hale, and even Sir William Blackstone, all condemned general warrants, yet appear to have had little effect in doing away with them. The Commons that heard Pitt declaim about the sanctity of a man’s home went on, as soon as he had finished speaking, to pass an excise bill containing provisions for the use of general warrants, and its cousin, the writ of assistance. The writ of assistance was a general warrant that commanded not only officers of the government, but all bystanders and neighbors as well, to join in and assist the search. It descended from the old “hue and cry,” in which all citizens had to join in the chase after a suspected criminal.

But despite the continuation in practice of the general warrant, the accumulating arguments against it began to coalesce into a coherent philosophy. The triggering event, which turned abstract thought into real opposition, came with the arrest of John Wilkes, a member of Parliament, for his criticism of and insult to a speech by the king in 1763 in number 45 of Wilkes's journal, The North Briton. The secretary of state then issued a general warrant to find and arrest everyone connected with that issue, and to seize evidence related to it. Forty-nine people were arrested, and soon after the Crown commenced some two hundred prosecutions, all the while arresting people right and left on the flimsiest of charges, searching their houses, and confiscating all sorts of materials. Eventually some of the printers confessed their "crimes" and identified Wilkes as the author of the article. Officers broke down the doors of his house, confiscated his books and hundreds of pages of manuscript writings, all on a general warrant. The Commons voted that North Briton number 45 constituted seditious libel and expelled Wilkes from the body. In court he was convicted for criminal publications, outlawed, jailed, and fined.

The Crown, however, had caught a tiger by the tail. Wilkes filed suits for trespass against everyone connected with the general warrant, from the lowest clerks on up to ministers of state, and this led others who had been swept up in the persecution to file similar suits as well. The government had arrested almost two hundred people, and nearly all of them now filed suit. Libertarians in England rallied to Wilkes's defense, spurred on by his own writings, and he became a popular idol, the champion of constitutional liberties in both England and in the colonies. News about the various cases resulting from the suits of Wilkes and his followers filled the pages of American newspapers from Massachusetts to South Carolina.

In cases such as Wilkes v. Wood (1763) and Huckle v. Money (1763), juries found for the plaintiffs against government officials, and awarded punitive monetary damages out of all proportion to the amount of harm suffered. In the Huckle case, Chief Justice Charles Pratt, later Lord Camden, charged the jury saying: "To enter a man's house by virtue of a nameless warrant, in order to procure evidence, is worse than the Spanish Inquisition, a law under which no Englishman would wish to live an hour." He condemned the general warrant because it failed to specify the names of the suspects, and because it had not been issued on a complaint made by oath. Although not going so far as to void all general warrants, he insisted that they specify the places to be searched and the type of evidence to be seized.

Pratt also presided over the Wilkes lawsuit, and there he called a search by general warrant "totally subversive of the liberty of the subject," and ordered the jury to return a verdict for Wilkes. The jurors did and awarded £1,000; in a second trial he won an additional £4,000 against the secretary of state who had issued the general warrant. All in all, the government had to pay out more than £100,000 in costs and judgments as a result of the attack on Wilkes and his allies. In order to avoid this payment, the Crown appealed to nation's highest criminal court, the King's Bench, only to have Lord Chief Justice Mansfield declare the government warrants illegal. Although the government kept persecuting Wilkes, its efforts were continuously thwarted by the courts.

Moreover, it led to one of the more remarkable documents in English political and legal thought, An Enquiry into the Doctrine Lately Propagated Concerning Libels, Warrants, and Seizures of Papers (1764) by an author calling himself "Father of Candor." The author, who may have been Lord Camden, chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas, condemned the general warrant as an instrument inconsistent with every idea of liberty. The book went through several editions, and was read on both sides of the Atlantic.

The Wilkes case and the literature resulting from it stirred up the colonies, who by the mid-1760s had already embarked on the road to independence. "Wilkes and Liberty" became a slogan that patriot leaders endlessly exploited. In New York, Alexander McDougall, a leader of the Sons of Liberty, was imprisoned for his attack on a bill to provide provisions for the king's troops. He labeled himself as an American Wilkes, and the Sons of Liberty kept up a constant series of protests on his behalf. Moreover, the writings of jurists such as Coke and Blackstone, as well as "Father of Candor," all made their way into the context of American political debate, and were well-known to patriot leaders by the time the Continental Congress met in Philadelphia.

Yet it should be noted that through most colonial history, general warrants had been the norm, and even after Englishmen began to complain about them, the colonists apparently tolerated—or ignored—they until the 1760s. The acceptability of the general warrant had crossed the Atlantic with the settlers, and it had been used by colonial governors and assemblies with the same zeal as had been shown by the Crown and Parliament. In Massachusetts, for example, general warrants had been used in the effort to eradicate Quakers from the colony. In the Southern states, general warrants existed well past the Revolution when used to hunt for runaway slaves or to put down slave rebellions. As late as 1749, the Conductor Generalis, the most popular manual in the colonies for use by judges of the peace and other law officers, listed only two specific warrants, one for the search of a particular home and the other to find identifiable stolen goods. Otherwise, the general warrant should be used for enforcing excise taxes and other laws.

WARRANT CLAUSE (IV)

The colonists began to resist in the late 1750s and early 1760s when the imperial government, attempting to increase revenue to cover the costs of the seven-year war with France, passed a series of tax measures and attempted to enforce them. Local officers of the Crown then learned that Americans knew not only about Wilkes, but about other attacks on general warrants, and in fact, some people opposed warrants of any sort. In 1759 a sheriff in Maryland attempted to break into a house to serve a legitimate arrest warrant, only to be shot to death. Because of the extensive smuggling that existed up and down the Atlantic seaboard, most colonists either engaged in smuggling directly or indirectly, or were neighbors to someone who did. Thus one ship owner, reflecting his awareness of English theory, declared that

[m]y home is my castle, and so is my ship, and therefore I lay it down as fundamental law of Nations, that if the greatest officer of the King was to come with a thousand warrants against me for a crime whatsoever, if he offered to take me out of my castle, I can kill him, and the law will bear me out.

The law might not, but in all likelihood no jury of his neighbors would convict him. The colonists may not have come up with the sophisticated arguments of a Coke, Blackstone, or "Father of Candor," but they put those ideas into practice by resisting the execution not just of general warrants, but of all warrants.

What many historians see as a critical moment both in colonial history as well as in the development of arguments against a general warrant came in 1761. General warrants, like all English judicial writs, ran in the name of the king, and thus once issued remained in force so long as the monarch lived. George II died in 1760, and so customs officers in Boston had to apply to the courts for new writs. In Boston, merchants who opposed the writs of assistance that had been used to enforce custom duties and justify breaking and entering by customs officers looking for smuggled goods, hired James Otis to argue against the issuance of new writs.

In his argument, Otis wove together fiction and fact, much as did his English contemporaries, to argue that British law ever since Magna Carta made general warrants unlawful. He claimed that only specific warrants could be lawful, and may have been the first to make that claim. Moreover, Otis appealed to what he called a higher law, the law of the English Constitution and the law of Providence, which, he claimed, outweighed any statutes authorizing general warrants. The fact that Parliament had issued general warrants only showed how depraved English authority had become, since in doing so Parliament had itself acted unlawfully.

Although the Massachusetts Superior Court rejected Otis's arguments and issued the new writs, public opinion clearly backed him. Many newspapers reported his arguments verbatim, and the colonial legislature, aware of the vehemence of the populace against the writs, yielded a little in enacting a new bill to authorize the writs. The new law restricted the life of a writ to one week, rather than the life of the sovereign, and required specificity. It had to include the name of the informer, the subject of the search, the nature of the goods sought, and the location where authorities believed the contraband to be hidden. Otis's speech also helped to inflame patriotic sentiment in the country, and while a majority of the colonists still had no desire to break from the mother country, it is apparent that they wanted the full protection of what they considered to be English liberty.

In the audience to hear Otis were two cousins, Samuel and John Adams, both of whom would play an important role in the Revolution. Many years later John Adams declared, "Otis was a flame of fire! Then and there was the first scene of the first act of opposition to the arbitrary claims of Great Britain. Then and there the child Independence was born." Otis's speech led to wide-scale resistance to searches, and often mobs would form to prevent officials from searching a house. Justices of the peace, who heretofore had freely given out general warrants now demanded that officers seeking a writ provide specific information. In 1765, the governor's council of Massachusetts ruled that justices of the peace could not issue writs of assistance.

When Parliament passed the Townshend Acts in 1767, it authorized issuance of writs of assistance to help enforce collection of the duties in the colonies. An officer armed with such a writ could search all houses in the daytime and all vessels at any time. Only the courts in Massachusetts and New Hampshire, where Crown-appointed judges presided, issued such writs; that provision went unenforced in all of the other colonies, and even in those two only a half-dozen or so writs actually led to seizures. Mob violence in effect nullified the writs, since every seizure made under a writ of assistance was quickly liberated by local mobs. When a schooner was seized for smuggling, for example, a mob prevented the officers from unloading its illegal cargo. The captain in charge retreated, and went to a court to get a writ. By the time he returned, the townspeople had unloaded the vessel and its cargo had disappeared. By 1768, the attorney general of England concluded that colonial judges were refusing to issue writs because they believed them unconstitutional, and from that time until the Revolution writs of assistance practically disappeared from the colonies.

Otis's 1761 speech would be reprinted widely for the next fifteen years, and inspired several of the states when they wrote their new constitutions in 1776 and after. Virginia, the first state to draft a constitution and bill of rights after the Declaration of Independence, included a strong prohibition against general warrants, although it did not go as far as some would have hoped. A month later, Pennsylvania adopted its new constitution, and as opposed to the negative wording of the Virginia bill, it put forth the right of the people to be secure in their homes in positive terms. John Adams, who had been at Otis's speech, was one of the prime drafters of the Massachusetts Constitution of 1780, and its bill of rights included a prohibition against unreasonable search and seizure that, in particularity and in emphasizing the positive rights of the people, is the strongest of all the early state provisions. Other states also included some requirements for specific warrants, although all of them recognized that there were exceptions to the rule, such as when officers were in hot pursuit of a felon.

Not all states, however, abandoned the general warrant. Maryland, New York, North and South Carolina, and Georgia utilized general warrants during the Confederation period, primarily to enforce their import laws. Southern states, even those such as Virginia that forbade general warrants, nonetheless allowed their use in hunting runaway slaves.

The Philadelphia convention that drafted the Constitution did not include a Bill of Rights, because its members, including James Madison, did not believe one necessary. As Alexander Hamilton put it, the entire Constitution was a Bill of Rights. The lack of specific protections proved a central issue in the fight over ratification, and several states ratified on condition that a bill of rights be added to the Constitution at the first session of Congress. James Madison, who led the fight for ratification in Virginia and was one of the authors of The Federalist, agreed to this demand, and when the first Congress met in 1789, it was Madison who drafted the measures that became the Bill of Rights. What became the Fourth Amendment read:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Dash, Samuel. The Intruders: Unreasonable Searches and Seizures from King John to John Ashcroft. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2004.
- Lasson, Nelson B. The History and Development of the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution. New York: AMS Press, 1988.
- Lovell, Colin Rhys. English Constitutional and Legal History: A Survey. New York: Oxford University Press, 1962.
- McWhirter, Darien A. Search, Seizure, and Privacy. Phoenix: Oryx Press, 1994.
- Polyviou, Polyvios G. Search and Seizure: Constitutional and Common Law. London: Duckworth, 1982.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Huckle v. Money*, 95 Eng. Rep. 768 (1763)
- Wilkes v. Wood*, 98 Eng. Rep. 489 (1763)

WARRANTLESS SEARCHES

Although the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution does not specifically require a warrant as a predicate to a valid search or seizure, the U.S. Supreme Court has generally imposed a warrant "preference" (see United States v. Chadwick [1977]). In other words, the Court tends to presume that warrant-less searches are unconstitutional. Despite the warrant preference, the Court has upheld warrant-less searches in a variety of contexts. The Court's decisions are fully consistent with the literal language of the Fourth Amendment, which only prohibits "unreasonable" searches and seizures. In general, in deciding whether a warrantless search is permissible, the Court asks whether it is reasonable to proceed without a warrant.

Over the decades, the Court has sustained a variety of exceptions to the warrant requirement. One such exception is the so-called "automobile exception" to the warrant requirement. Under this exception, the police may search an automobile when they have probable cause to believe that it contains the fruits, instrumentalities, or evidence of crime. In California v. Carney (1985), the Court held that this exception to the warrant requirement is justified by the "diminished expectation" of privacy associated with automobiles (diminished, vis-à-vis, for example, homes), the fact that automobiles are mobile, and that probable cause to search a vehicle can arise unexpectedly. In defining the exception, the Court has held that the scope of the automobile exception can extend to any place in the vehicle that the police have probable cause to believe that the fruits, instrumentalities or evidence of crime can be found. In some cases, the exception will justify a search of the entire vehicle.

Warrantless searches have also been upheld at border crossings and airports. Border searches have generally been upheld on the basis that the United States has the right to control its borders and to prevent the introduction of contraband into the country. Airport searches have generally been upheld as consensual. In other words, by trying to avoid airplanes, passengers consent to searches of their persons and luggage.

Warrantless searches are also permitted under the search incident to legal arrest exception (see Chimel v. California [1969]). Under that exception, the police are entitled to search a suspect whom they have legally arrested because the person being arrested might have a weapon that he can use to effect escape, or may have evidence that could be destroyed. The search incident exception authorizes the police to conduct a search and to remove any weapons or evidence they find. However, given the justifications for the search, Chimel held the scope of the search should be limited to the area within the arrestee's "immediate control."

In recent decades, in addition to continuing recognize the traditional exceptions to the warrant requirement, including those listed above, the Court has created new exceptions using the so-called "need" versus "intrusion" test. Under this test, first articulated in the Court's decision in Camara v. Municipal Court (1967), the Court balances the "need" for the search against the level of "intrusion" caused by the search. Based on this balancing, the Court decides whether the police may search without a warrant. In Camara, the Court used this test to create a new exception for administrative inspections—inspections that are generally conducted by administrative officials (for example, food inspectors, elevator inspectors, mine inspectors) to determine whether individuals or businesses are in compliance with regulatory codes.

Perhaps the broadest use of the need versus intrusion test is in the so-called "stop and frisk" cases. The stop and frisk exception to the warrant requirement was first articulated in the Court's landmark holding in Terry v. Ohio (1968). In that case, the Court used the need versus intrusion test to hold that, when a police officer reasonably believes that criminal activity is afoot and that the suspects are armed and dangerous, the officer may "stop" the individuals (a seizure under the Fourth Amendment) to make inquiry. If the officer stops the individuals, and his questions fail to dispel his fears, the officer can conduct a limited pat down of the suspect (a search for Fourth Amendment purposes) to determine whether he is in possession of weapons. In Terry, the officer had reason to believe that the suspects were carrying weapons in preparation for a holdup of a store. Since robbers usually carry weapons, the officer could reasonably conclude that the suspects were "armed and dangerous." The officer stopped the suspects and made inquiry, but did not receive satisfactory responses. At that point, the officer frisked the individuals and found that they were in possession of concealed weapons. The Court upheld the pat down as a valid stop and frisk. The need for the search (to intervene against suspects who appeared to be engaged in criminal activity and who appeared to be armed and dangerous) outweighed the intrusion (the pat-down).

In a series of subsequent cases, the Court has extended the "need versus intrusion" test and the "stop and frisk" exception to a variety of contexts and authorized a number of other warrant-less searches. For example, in Maryland v. Buie (1990), the Court found that when the police entered a house to arrest a felony suspect, they had reason to believe that other armed individuals might be present in the house. Under such circumstances, the Court held that the police were justified in making a protective sweep of the house in an effort to ensure "that the house in which a suspect is being, or has just been, arrested is not harboring other persons who are dangerous and who could unexpectedly launch an attack." The Court found that the "need" for the search (to protect the police against possible attack) justified the "intrusion" (a cursory inspection of the remainder of the house).

As the foregoing exceptions reveal, warrantless searches are a well-established part of police searches under the Fourth Amendment.

RUSSELL L. WEAVER

References and Further Reading

- Weaver, Russell L., Leslie W. Abramson, John M. Burkoff, and Catherine Hancock. Principles of Criminal Procedure. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West 2004.
- Weaver, Russell L., Leslie W. Abramson, Ronald Bacigal, John M. Burkoff, Catherine Hancock, and Donald E. Lively. Criminal Procedure: Cases, Problems & Exercises. 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- California v. Carney*, 471 U.S. 386 (1985)
Camara v. Municipal Court, 387 U.S. 523 (1967)
Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969)
Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325 (1990)
Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)
United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 9 (1977)

See also Privacy; Probable Cause; Stop and Frisk

WARREN COURT (1953–1969)

Although the Warren Court is perhaps best remembered for cases holding racial segregation unconstitutional, as well as its reconfiguration of American politics in the reapportionment cases, it also undertook the most extensive reinterpretation of constitutionally protected rights in American history. The question that had deviled the Court since the 1920s—to what extent did the Fourteenth Amendment’s due process clause incorporate the Bill of Rights and apply them to the states—was now answered. By 1969 all of the major provisions of the first eight amendments applied to the states as well as to the federal government.

One needs to see the Warren Court decisions in the areas of civil liberties as closely related to those protecting civil rights. Some of the key speech and association decisions, such as New York Times v. Sullivan (1964), grew directly out of the civil rights conflict. Blacks also suffered greatly from the inequities of the criminal justice system, and justice for unpopular minorities accused of crime related closely to the Court’s overall search for a living Constitution that treated all citizens equally.

The First Amendment: Speech

The Warren Court was among the most speech protective in the nation’s history, and its major contribution to speech jurisprudence lay in the broad vision of the First Amendment that informed its decisions. In Bates v. City of Little Rock (1960), the Court held that First Amendment freedoms “are protected not only against heavy-handed frontal attack, but also from being stifled by more subtle governmental interference.”

Two related themes run throughout these cases. One was the debate over the preferred position of First Amendment rights advocated by Justices Black and Douglas; the other was whether these rights are “absolute” or require “balancing” with competing interests. For Black, the preferred position doctrine led naturally to the absolutist view, while Frankfurter, joined by John Marshall Harlan, advocated balancing. How difficult the issue could be was seen in Konigsberg v. State Bar of California (1961), a five-to-four opinion in which the Court sustained the state’s denial of bar admission to an applicant who had refused to answer questions on Communist Party membership. Harlan’s majority opinion carefully explored how society had differing interests, none of which could be allowed to override all others. While people had a right to say whatever they wished, in some instances society had an equally compelling reason either to limit that speech or to punish the speaker if the speech had incited certain results. Harlan detailed a lengthy list of cases in which the Court had approved limits on speech to show that historically the Court had always balanced these various interests. Justice Black’s eloquent dissent acknowledged these cases, but he believed that, in the area of speech, any whittling away of liberty would lead to its eventual loss. Balancing required establishing criteria for evaluating the government’s intent as well as that of the speaker, which meant that the most important of all freedoms rested on the subjective judgment of courts. He believed it much better to take an absolutist stance.

“Overbreadth” became a key idea informing the Warren Court’s speech decisions. The doctrine acknowledged that speech and other First Amendment rights might be restricted, but required that the government show a compelling need to do so. Judges could thus use the test to keep interference as minimal as possible. It provided the balancers with a means to achieve the goals of the absolutists, while at the same time retaining flexibility to meet emergency situations.

In Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), the Warren Court responded to the criminal syndicalism statutes that Holmes and Brandeis had protested against in the 1920s. Brandenburg, the leader of a Ku Klux Klan group, had been convicted for advocating terrorism as a means of political reform. In the per curiam opinion, the Court voided the statute because its overly vague definition of criminal activities unduly restricted both advocacy and the right to assembly. Brandenburg has been described as combining the best of Holmes, Brandeis, and Learned Hand, in that it makes freedom the rule and restraint the exception, permits restriction only where a clear connection between speech and legitimately proscribed actions can be established, and requires that the government spell out its rules clearly and in the least restrictive manner.

Overbreadth also proved a useful doctrine in the various Vietnam protest cases. In Bond v. Floyd (1966), for example, the Court ruled that black activist Julian Bond’s First Amendment rights had been violated by the Georgia House of Representatives, which had excluded him from membership because, it claimed, Bond could not conscientiously take the required oath to support the Constitution given his antiwar sentiments. In the unanimous opinion, Chief Justice Warren ruled that neither public officials nor private persons could be punished for their opinions if they did not violate the law. Expressing admiration for those who had the courage of their conviction did not constitute “counseling, aiding or abetting.”

Speech may take several forms, and the Court consistently ruled that symbolic speech also came under the First Amendment umbrella. In Tinker v. Des Moines School District (1969), the Court overturned the expulsion of three students for wearing black armbands to symbolize their opposition to the war. School officials claimed that the wearing of armbands interfered with proper discipline and might be disruptive. Justice Abe Fortas rejected this argument, and held that students do not lose their constitutional rights when they enter the schoolhouse. School officials had shown no proof that any disruption had occurred, and fear that a disturbance might occur could not justify repression.

Symbolism had its limits, however, as the Court made clear in United States v. O'Brien (1968). Four men had burned their draft registration cards at an antiwar rally, claiming that the card burning symbolized their opposition to the Vietnam War. The Court, according to the chief justice, refused to accept “the view that an apparently limitless variety of conduct can be labeled ‘speech’ whenever the person engaging in the conduct intends thereby to express an idea.” The government had a legitimate interest in preserving the cards, since the draft played an important role in providing manpower for the nation’s defense.

The overbreadth doctrine, despite some whittling down during the 1970s, remains a core ingredient of First Amendment law; its importance lies not just in these few cases, but in its wider application. It is a present-oriented doctrine, requiring judges to look not at some horrid future possibility, but at what happened in a specific set of circumstances.

The First Amendment and the Press

As late as 1942, in Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, a unanimous Court had confidently listed “fighting words,” obscenity, and libel as examples of expression outside First Amendment protection. The United States had long ago done away with the English common law on libel and defamation of character, in which the mere publication of a defamatory statement—whether true or not—could be punished. American law allowed the defendant to offer evidence of the truth of the statement, which, if accepted by judge or jury, served as a complete defense. All states, however, still permitted civil actions in tort for false or malicious statements, and wide gradations existed among the jurisdictions; the Supreme Court had, with few exceptions, left libel a matter for state law.

In this context the Warren Court handed down one of its most important First Amendment cases, New York Times v. Sullivan, in 1964. An advertisement in the Times signed by dozens of clergy and civil rights advocates charged the police and city officials of Montgomery, Alabama, with unleashing “an unprecedented wave of terror” against blacks engaged in nonviolent demonstrations against discrimination. Sullivan, Montgomery’s police and fire commissioner, sued the newspaper and several of the black clergymen who had signed the ad, and won a $500,000 judgment under Alabama law. Alabama law held publications “libelous per se” if the words tended “to injure a person [in] his reputation” or “to bring [him] into public contempt.” The statute retained many elements of the old common law, and although the defendant could offer truth as a defense, he had a heavy burden to prove.

The nexus between the First Amendment and civil rights could not have been clearer. If Alabama could force the Times to bankruptcy (and $500,000 was an enormous judgment in the 1960s), it could insulate itself from public scrutiny of its treatment of blacks. Criticizing the South, or even just reporting what happened, could prove too expensive for news organizations.

In a unanimous decision, the Court found the statute “constitutionally deficient for failure to provide the safeguards for freedom of speech and of the press that are requirements” of the First Amendment. Justice Brennan’s opinion carefully explained that there is always a balancing test between unlimited speech and the legitimate interests of the state; in matters of public interest and concerning public officials, he struck that balance on the side of free speech, with the exception of “recklessly false statements” made with “actual malice.” The Court considered the case, Brennan wrote, “against the background of a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials.” As Brennan wrote in another libel case, Garrison v. Louisiana (1964), “speech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government.” In effect, the Court proposed a strategy, which has governed ever since, that extended the line of protection past the constitutional minimum all the way to facts, even false facts, to encourage the debate that democracy deems valuable.

Within a few years of this case, the law of libel had been effectively nationalized. While states could still control the procedural aspects of actions for libel, the substantive criteria had to conform to the Court’s ruling in Times and subsequent cases. If speech dealt with public officials and their conduct, it came within constitutional protection. In 1967, a majority of the Court applied the Times rule to public figures as well as to officials in Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts and Associated Press v. Walker.

Obscenity

Obscenity, like libel, had long been considered outside First Amendment protection and subject to state control. The Supreme Court's first encounter with obscenity came in a little noticed case at the beginning of the 1956 term, Butler v. Michigan, in which Justice Frankfurter threw out a state statute as a violation of freedom of the press. The law banned books containing obscene, immoral, or lewd language for their potentially harmful effect on youth. "Surely this is to burn the house to roast the pig," wrote Frankfurter. The law "would reduce the adult population of Michigan to reading what is fit for children." Although the case put forward no judicial standards by which to judge the obscene, it did make clear that the older, Victorian values could not be sustained in a First Amendment challenge.

The following year the Court did try to establish a new standard in Roth v. United States. Justice Brennan, for a majority of the Court, noted that "obscenity is [historically] not within the area of constitutionally protected speech or press," but any idea having "the slightest redeeming social importance" could claim First Amendment protection. He drew a distinction between sex and obscenity, defining the latter as material "which deals with sex in a manner appealing to prurient interests." The Court rejected the earlier test for obscenity, developed in the 1868 English case of Regina v. Hicklin, which judged the material by the effect of selected passages on particularly susceptible persons. In its place the Court adopted a standard already in use in some American courts: "Whether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interests."

Justices Douglas and Harlan in their separate opinions both pinpointed the key problem as being how to identify obscene material. The Brennan test, although more liberal and fairer than the Hicklin standard, still required subjective judgment as to whether the allegedly prurient material had any redeeming social value.

The determination of what constituted obscenity troubled the Court for the next two decades. As Justice Harlan noted in 1968, the subject had produced a variety of views "unmatched in any other course of constitutional adjudication." Thirteen obscenity cases between 1957 and 1968 elicited a total of fifty-five separate opinions. The justices seemed preoccupied with the question of "What is obscenity?" instead of conducting the type of inquiry normal to First Amendment litigation, "What state interests justify restraint?" Brennan's flat-out "obscenity is not speech" put it into a separate category apart from the well-defined analyses that the Court developed in other speech issues. Not until the Burger Court refined the Roth test in 1973 did the justices finally confront the question of why the states had an interest in such controls.

The First Amendment: The Religion Clauses

The Court's libertarian reading of the First Amendment's freedom of expression infused new vigor into the Jeffersonian philosophy of the two religion clauses. The "wall of separation" formula had first been utilized by Justice Black in Everson v. Board of Education (1947), a strange five-to-four opinion in which Black had written an eloquent essay on the historical reasons for separation of church and state, going all the way back to the 1786 Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom. He quoted Jefferson that the clause had been intended to erect "a wall of separation between church and State," a wall, Black claimed, that had to be sustained; the Court "could not approve of the slightest breach." He then turned around and sustained a New Jersey statute allowing school districts to reimburse parents of parochial school students for costs in transporting them to class.

The first significant religion cases before the Warren Court came in 1961 and involved Sunday closing laws. In McGowan v. Maryland, the Court upheld a state law that required most retail stores to close on Sunday, but permitted a number of exceptions for resorts and entertainment businesses. The policy, long established not only in Maryland but elsewhere, had the support of Christian groups as well as established businesses who did not want to compete with newer and aggressive retailers offering longer hours of service. A strict reading of the First Amendment would have required the Court to strike down these laws, since, as Chief Justice Warren conceded, "the original laws which dealt with Sunday labor were motivated by religious forces."

The Court sidestepped the problem by claiming that over the years, the original religious purpose of the blue laws had given way to a secular rationale, and that therefore the laws bore "no relationship to establishment of religion as those words are used in the Constitution.” The present purpose, according to Warren, “is to provide a uniform day of rest for all citizens.” Jewish merchants, however, objected to the Sunday laws on free exercise grounds as well. In Braunfeld v. Brown (1961), Orthodox Jewish merchants pointed out that under rabbinic law they could not keep their stores open on Saturday, and since Pennsylvania forbade them to do business on Sunday, they were in a cruel situation where they had either to violate their religious beliefs or suffer severe economic hardships. The chief justice again side-stepped the real issue by claiming, as in McGowan, that the Sunday laws served only a secular purpose. Laws that had a primarily secular purpose but that imposed an indirect burden on religion did not violate the Constitution.

Warren’s opinions in McGowan and Braunfeld elicited strong dissents from Justice Douglas and Brennan. According to Douglas, all blue laws were derived from the Fourth Commandment and not from the Constitution, and therefore all violated both the establishment and free exercise prohibitions. In a separate dissent in Braunfeld, Justice Brennan asked the questions that Warren had so carefully evaded, and yet that are essential in First Amendment cases. “What, then, is the compelling state interest which impels the state to impede appellants’ freedom of worship? What overbalancing need is so weighty in the constitutional scale that it justifies this substantial, though indirect, limitation of appellants’ freedom?”

The dissenters’ arguments had a surprisingly swift impact, for two years later the Court handed down a decision that in effect negated Braunfeld. A Seventh Day Adventist had been discharged from her job because she would not work on Saturday, her sabbath; she could not find other work because she would not accept any job requiring Saturday work. South Carolina rejected her claim for unemployment compensation because state law barred benefits to workers who failed, without good cause, to accept “suitable work when offered.” After the South Carolina Supreme Court upheld the denial of benefits, Sherbert appealed, claiming interference with her free exercise of religion. In Sherbert v. Verner (1963), the Court through Justice Brennan agreed with her.

Brennan applied the traditional analysis he had urged in his Braunfeld dissent—what compelling state interest required an infringement on religious freedom?—and he could not find any. He did not believe that granting benefits to Adventists on slightly different grounds than to Sunday worshipers constituted an establishment in favor of the Adventists. Rather, it ensured that the government would act neutrally toward all groups and not penalize one because it had a different day of rest from the others.

By this case, the Court had already begun moving toward a more activist view of the religion clauses. In Torcaso v. Watkins (1961), it upheld an individual’s right not to believe in God by striking down test oaths in Maryland. Nearly all states had had some form of test oath prior to the Civil War, requiring an affirmation of religious belief, but most had either been wiped off the books or allowed to stagnate in the latter nineteenth century. Because the First Amendment had not applied to the states at that time, no cases testing such oaths had come before the Court prior to Torcaso, which in essence administered the coup de grace to a moribund practice.

Prayer, Bible Reading, and Evolution

Prayer in public schools, however, was far from moribund when the Court declared the practice unconstitutional in Engel v. Vitale (1962). The New York Board of Regents had prepared, for use in public schools, a “nondenominational” prayer which read: “Almighty God, we acknowledge our dependence upon Thee, and we beg Thy blessings upon us, our parents, our teachers and our country.” The state’s highest court upheld the rule so long as the schools did not compel students to join in the prayer when parents objected. By a six-to-one vote (Justices Frankfurter and White did not participate), the Supreme Court held the practice “wholly inconsistent with the Establishment Clause.” The prayer, according to Justice Black, could not be interpreted as anything but a religious activity, and the establishment clause “must at least mean that it is no part of the business of government to compose official prayers for any group of American people to recite as a part of a religious program carried on by government.” Only Justice Stewart dissented. He considered that the practice did no more than recognize “the deeply entrenched and highly cherished spiritual tradition of our Nation.”

Not since Brown had the Court come under so much public criticism, much of it stemming from a misunderstanding of what the Court had said. Conservative religious leaders attacked the decision for promoting atheism and secularism. Southerners saw Engel as proof of judicial radicalism. “They put the Negroes in the schools,” Representative George W. Andrews of Alabama lamented, and “now they have driven God out.” Senator Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia summed up the feelings of many when he complained that “someone is tampering with America’s soul.”

The Court had its champions as well as critics. Liberal Protestant and Jewish groups interpreted the decision as a significant move to divorce religion from meaningless public ritual and to protect its sincere practice. The National Council of Churches, a coalition of Protestant and Orthodox denominations, praised Engel for protecting “the religious rights of minorities,” while the Anti-Defamation League, a Jewish organization, applauded the “splendid reaffirmation of a basic American principle.”

One year later the Court extended the Engel reasoning in Abington School District v. Schempp (1963), ruling that the establishment clause prohibited required reading of the Bible. A Pennsylvania law provided for the reading of at least ten verses of the Bible each day, as well as the recitation in unison of the Lord’s Prayer. In striking down the requirement, Justice Clark spoke of the “wholesome neutrality” of the Constitution toward religion, and set forth specific standards by which to judge whether the government had violated the First Amendment. To “withstand the strictures of the Establishment Clause there must be a secular legislative purpose and a primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion.”

Again, conservatives misinterpreted and attacked the Court’s decision, claiming that the justices had now expelled the Bible from school along with God. The Rev. Bill Graham professed that he was “shocked,” and claimed that “prayers and Bible reading have been a part of American public school life since the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock.” Justice Clark, however, had made it quite clear that classes could still study the Bible as literature or as a religious document; it just could not be used for proselytizing purposes or in any manner that partook of a religious exercise.

A third case following Engel and Schempp also aroused the ire of religious conservatives. The conviction of John Scopes for teaching Darwin’s theory of evolution in 1927 had not reached the Supreme Court on appeal because the Tennessee high court had dismissed the case on a technicality. As a result, the antievolution statutes in Tennessee and other states had never been subjected to constitutional scrutiny. Finally, in Epperson v. Arkansas (1968), a unanimous Court, speaking through Justice Fortas, found the Arkansas antievolution statute in conflict with the establishment clause. “Arkansas did not seek to excise from the curricula of its schools and universities all discussion of the origin of man. The law’s effort was confined to an attempt to blot out a particular theory because of its supposed conflict with the Biblical account, literally read.”

Fourth Amendment: Search and Seizure

Aside from the desegregation rulings, few decisions of the Warren Court aroused such public debate as those nationalizing the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments, and then expanding their reach. These three articles of the Bill of Rights deal with criminal procedure and protect against arbitrary action by government officers. The Warren Court not only made these protections applicable to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment’s Due Process Clause, but also fortified the rights of accused persons when confronted by the power of the state.

The Fourth Amendment expressed the Framers’ opposition to the offensive practices of the British prior to the Revolution, and it governs how police may carry out one of their major responsibilities, gathering evidence during the investigation of crimes. While it sets limits on what the police may do, the amendment recognizes the legitimacy of reasonable search and seizure and does not erect insurmountable obstacles to that process. To secure a warrant, investigating officers need merely show “probable cause” and spell out with some precision the places to be searched and the type of evidence sought.

The Vinson Court had taken the step of applying the Fourth Amendment to the states in Wolf v. Colorado (1949). But the justices split, six to three, over whether the exclusionary rule, which had been the remedy for federal violation of the warrant since 1914, should also apply to the states. In his majority opinion, Justice Frankfurter argued that the exclusionary rule, as a judge-made remedy, did not constitute part of the Fourth Amendment and therefore could not be imposed by federal courts on the states. Justice Murphy dissented, claiming that the Fourth Amendment made no sense without the exclusionary rule; he saw the rule as implicit in the amendment.

When the Warren Court came to consider this issue again in Mapp v. Ohio (1961), it adopted Murphy’s argument. To say that the Fourth Amendment applied to the states, wrote Justice Clark, but to deny the only means of enforcing it, “is to grant the right but in reality to withhold its privilege and enjoyment.” Clark noted the controversy over the exclusionary rule and admitted that in some cases the criminal might go free because the police had blundered. But a higher consideration existed, “the imperative of judicial integrity.” The government had to set an example of fidelity to the law, for if its officers ignored the law, the public would eventually do so as well.

Chief Justice Warren delivered the Court’s eight-to-one opinion in the other major Fourth Amendment case decided during his tenure, Terry v. Ohio (1968). An experienced police officer observed three men who appeared to be “casing” a store. He stopped them and, dissatisfied with their answers to his questions, frisked them. He found revolvers on two of the men and arrested them. Counsel for the men claimed that because the officer had no warrant, he had no right to search them, and that the revolvers could not be introduced as evidence. In a long and rambling opinion, the chief justice upheld the police officer, ruling that if the police had reasonable grounds and needed to act promptly, they could stop and frisk suspects without a warrant.

Fifth Amendment: Self-Incrimination

Public controversy over the Warren Court’s criminal cases dwelt less on its Fourth Amendment decisions than on how it interpreted the Fifth and Sixth. The Fifth includes what has sometimes been called “the Great Right,” that no person “shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.” The privilege came under heavy criticism during the red scare of the 1950s, as witnesses refused to answer Senator McCarthy’s questions on grounds of possible self-incrimination. “Taking the Fifth” became associated with communists, and critics charged that a truly innocent person should not hesitate to take the stand and tell the truth in criminal trials or before investigating committees.

The Court had taken an expansive view of this right since the latter nineteenth century. In Boyd v. United States (1886) and Counselman v. Hitchcock (1892), it had expanded the privilege against self-incrimination to apply to any criminal case, as well as to civil cases where testimony might later be used in criminal hearings. In 1967, the Warren Court expanded the concept of a “criminal case” to include juvenile delinquency proceedings in In re Gault. The privilege is not absolute; persons may not refuse to be fingerprinted, to have blood samples, voice recordings, or other physical evidence taken, or to submit to intoxication tests—even though all these may prove incriminating. But at a trial, the accused has the right to remain silent, and any adverse comment on a defendant’s silence, by either judge or prosecutor, violates the constitutional privilege.

Although an accused person may not be forced to testify, he or she may voluntarily confess, and the confession may be used in evidence. The old common law rule against confessions obtained by torture, threats, inducements, or promises had been reaffirmed as part of constitutional law by the Court in 1884. In modern times, the question of voluntariness had been refined, with the Court relying on the due process clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to prohibit not only physical torture but psychological brutality as well.

Beginning in 1964, the Court tied the Fifth Amendment privilege to the Sixth Amendment’s right to counsel, on the grounds that only if the accused had been properly informed of his or her rights, including the right to remain silent, could an ensuing confession be admissible. The key case was Massiah v. United States (1964). The defendant had been indicted for violating federal drug laws; he had retained a lawyer, pleaded not guilty, and been released on bail. Federal agents trailed Massiah and electronically eavesdropped on a private conversation, thus securing incriminating evidence that led to his conviction at the trial. The Court, through Justice Stewart, threw the verdict out; once the accused had a lawyer, the police could not use anything he said unless he had been advised by counsel as to the effects of those words.

Later that year, the Court ruled that the Fifth Amendment’s privilege against self-incrimination applied to the states (Malloy v. Hogan). Shortly afterward, in Escobedo v. Illinois, the Court overturned the conviction of Danny Escobedo because police would not allow him to see the attorney he had asked for until after they had secured a confession to the crime.

In 1966, a seriously divided Court handed down the landmark ruling of Miranda v. Arizona. Chief Justice Warren finally gave police and the lower courts a clear test to help them determine voluntariness. A person had to be informed in clear and unequivocal terms of the constitutional right to remain silent, and that anything said could be used in court. In addition, the officers had to tell the suspect of the right to counsel and that if he or she had no money to hire a lawyer, the state would provide one. If the police interrogation continued without a lawyer present, the chief justice warned, “a heavy burden rests on the Government to demonstrate that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination and the right to counsel.” The four dissenters—Harlan, White, Stewart, and Clark—protested against replacing the flexible totality of circumstances approach with what they considered to be rigid and inappropriate rules.

The Miranda decision unleashed a storm of criticism of the Court for its alleged coddling of criminals, and some scholars shared the minority’s view that Miranda represented a radical break in which the Court had made a “new law and new public policy.” The more progressive police departments in the country, however, lost little time in announcing that they had been following similar practices for years, and that doing so had not undermined their effectiveness in investigating or solving crimes. Felons who wanted to confess did so anyway; in other cases, the lack of a confession merely required more efficient police work to find and convict the guilty party. As to charges that the decision encouraged crime, Attorney General Ramsey Clark explained that “court rules do not cause crime.” Many U.S. attorneys agreed, and one commented that “changes in court decisions and procedural practice have about the same effect on the crime rate as an aspirin would have on a tumor of the brain.”

Sixth Amendment: The Right to Counsel

The right to counsel had been one of the first to be nationalized in Powell v. Alabama (1932). Ten years later, however, in Betts v. Brady the Court backed off, and declared that the Fourteenth Amendment had not incorporated the specific guarantees of the Sixth. A majority held that counsel for indigent defendants did not constitute a fundamental right essential to a fair trial. Rather, the justices would make a case—by—case inquiry into the totality of circumstances to see if the lack of counsel had deprived the defendant of a fair trial. Over the next twenty years, the Court heard many special circumstances and in most of the cases it determined that a lawyer should have been provided to ensure fairness.

In the great case of Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), a unanimous Court, speaking through Justice Black (who had dissented in Betts), did away with the cumbersome case—by—case adjudication and ruled that the presence of counsel was a fundamental right essential to a fair trial. The Court also took the unusual step of applying Gideon retroactively, so that states that had not originally provided counsel in felony cases now had to either retry the defendants properly, or, as often proved the case, with witnesses dispersed and evidence cold, let them go.

Gideon applied only to felony trials; not until 1972 did the Court expand the right to include misdemeanors as well. But in 1967, the Court did expand the right to counsel to include a far greater part of the criminal process. In United States v. Wade, the Court extended the right back to the lineup, ruling that the wording of the Sixth Amendment required the assistance of counsel from the time when the police investigation shifts from a general seeking after facts to an accusatory proceeding. The decision reflected the Court’s concern over growing evidence of the shoddiness and unreliability of police identification techniques. Later that year the Court extended the right in the other direction, past the determination of guilt to the sentencing phase of a trial in Mempa v. Rhay.

The whole rationale behind the Warren Court’s decisions in criminal cases reflected the belief that exercise of constitutional rights ought not to depend on a person’s wealth or education. Poor people have the same rights under the Constitution as the rich, but often they do not know about them. In Miranda and other cases, the Warren Court basically said that all Americans, at a minimum, have to know they have rights, and that police cannot trick them into forfeiting those rights by withholding that information.

The Right to Privacy

The Court’s expansion of enumerated liberties encouraged litigation by parties with special interests hoping that the mantle of constitutional protection might spread even further. In the spring of 1965, the Court decided one of a handful of cases that can truly be said to have established a new area of constitutional law. In Griswold v. Connecticut, the Court resurrected substantive due process to establish a constitutionally protected right of privacy.

Various privacy rights existed within the common law, but often they were attached to property, such as in the old adage that “a man’s home is his castle.” In the United States, the law of privacy remained poorly defined; commentators believed that a right existed, but there was practically no case law on the subject.

The Griswold case involved an 1879 statute prohibiting the use of any drug or device to prevent conception and penalizing any person who advised on or provided contraceptive materials. New Haven officials prosecuted the executive director of the Connecticut Planned Parenthood League, along with one of the doctors in the League’s clinic who had prescribed contraceptives to a married person. Justice Douglas delivered one of the most creative and innovative opinions in his thirty—six years on the bench. Most of the references to privacy in earlier cases had relied on a liberty embodied in substantive due process, which in the mid—1960s still suffered from the bad odor of Lochnerism. Douglas did not want to invoke substantive due process, so he cobbled together justifications from various parts of the Bill of Rights. The amendments “have penumbras, formed by emanations from those guarantees that help give them life and substance.” These emanations together form a constitutionally protected right of privacy; and no privacy could be more sacred, or more deserving of protection from intrusion, than that of the marital chamber.

Justice Goldberg, joined by Brennan and the chief justice, concurred, relying on the rarely cited Ninth Amendment, which reserves to the people all non-enumerated rights. The right to privacy, Goldberg maintained, predated the Constitution, and the Framers intended that all such ancient liberties should also enjoy constitutional protection. Justice White concurred on due process grounds, while Justice Stewart dissented, claiming that the Court had exceeded the limits of judicial restraint. Stewart thought the statute “an uncommonly silly law,” but he could find nothing in the Bill of Rights forbidding it.

The dissent by Justice Black and Justice Harlan’s concurrence are of special interest because they illustrate two major theories of constitutional interpretation. Although Black advocated total incorporation of the Bill of Rights, he remained in many ways a strict constructionist; he would only incorporate those rights specified in the first eight amendments. He dismissed Goldberg’s Ninth Amendment opinion scornfully, declaring that “[e]very student of history knows that it was intended to limit the federal government to the powers granted expressly or by necessary implication.”

Justice Harlan did not fear the idea of substantive due process and based his concurrence on that theme. Due process, he claimed, reflects fundamental principles of liberty and justice, but these change over time as society progresses. The Court has the responsibility of reinterpreting phrases such as “due process” and “equal protection” so that the Constitution itself may grow with the times. Harlan saw Black’s view as too rigid; both the states and the federal government needed the flexibility to experiment in means to expand the protection of individual rights.

Douglas’s result—the creation of a constitutionally protected right to privacy—and Harlan’s substantive due process rationale established the basis for the expansion of autonomy rights in the 1970s. Griswold is the forebear of Roe v. Wade (1973) (the case that legalized abortion) and many other cases enlarging personal freedoms. Griswold became the launching pad for the new substantive due process and a progenitor of the fundamental interest interpretation of the due process clause.

Conclusion: Judicial Activism and Civil Liberties

The activism of the Warren Court upset many people, including some who sympathized with the goals of its decisions. Activism on behalf of any program, critics charged, no matter how attractive, suffered from the same problems that had beset the Court during the Lochner era; judges ought to leave policy making to the political branches.

But one must always ask about any judicial opinion—did the Court get it “right”? In some cases it is hard to tell, but the Warren Court produced a string of great cases matched by no other court in our history, not even that of John Marshall. In Brown v. Board of Education (1954), it struck down Southern apartheid; in New York Times v. Sullivan, it established freedom of press as a central component of American democracy, and took the idea of freedom of expression further than it had ever gone before; despite the controversy engendered by Engel v. Vitale and Abington School District v. Schempp, the Court’s insistence on a wall of separation between church and state clearly mirrored the intention of the framers; Gideon v. Wainwright is one of the foundation stones of American constitutional history, while Miranda v. Arizona provided the prophylactic test for how police may treat persons suspected of crimes; Griswold v. Connecticut established a right that nearly all Americans hold dear, the right of privacy; while Baker v. Carr (1962) and Reynolds v. Sims (1964) redrew the political map of the United States to ensure democratic representation. Some of these cases have drawn intense criticism, yet no one denies their great and lasting impact on American life. Moreover, despite the pledges of conservative presidents to undo the activist record of the Warren Court, nearly four decades after Earl Warren retired, all of these landmark opinions are still in force.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Belknap, Michal R. The Supreme Court Under Earl Warren, 1953–1969. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2004.
- Graham, Fred. The Due Process Revolution: The Warren Court’s Impact on Criminal Law. New York: Hayden, 1970.
- Kalven, Harry. A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.
- Marion, David E. The Jurisprudence of Justice William J. Brennan, Jr. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 1997.
- Newman, Roger K. Hugo Black: A Biography. New York: Pantheon, 1994.
- Powe, Lucas A., Jr. The Warren Court and American Politics. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000.
- Schwartz, Bernard. Super Chief: Earl Warren and His Supreme Court. New York: New York University Press, 1983.
- Simon, James F. Independent Journey: The Life of William O. Douglas. New York: Harper & Row, 1980.

- Urofsky, Melvin I. The Continuity of Change: The Supreme Court and Individual Liberties, 1953–1986. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1991.
- . Felix Frankfurter: Judicial Restraint and Individual Liberties. Boston: Twayne, 1991.
- White, G. Edward. Earl Warren: A Public Life. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abington School District v. Schempp*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
Associated Press v. Walker, 389 U.S. 28 (1967)
Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 213 (1962)
Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516 (1960)
Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455 (1942)
Bond v. Floyd, 385 U.S. 116 (1966)
Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886)
Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599 (1961)
Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
Butler v. Michigan, 352 U.S. 380 (1957)
Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942)
Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U.S. 547 (1892)
Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130 (1967)
Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)
Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964)
Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967)
Konigsberg v. State Bar of California, 366 U.S. 36, 56 (1961)
Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964)
Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964)
McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420 (1961)
Mempa v. Rhay, 389 U.S. 128 (1967)
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
Regina v. Hicklin, L.R. 2 Q.B. 360 (1868)
Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)
Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)
Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)
Tinker v. Des Moines School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969)
Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 (1961)
United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)
United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)
Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25, 47 (1949)

WARREN, EARL (1891–1974)

Earl Warren grew up in Los Angeles, the son of Scandinavian immigrants. As a youth he worked for the Southern Pacific Railroad, and came to despise the power of what he called a faceless corporation that could fire men without notice and ignore the misfortunes of employees injured on the job. During his college years at Berkeley he showed his first taste for politics, and worked for the election of progressive Republican Hiram W. Johnson as governor. This experience aligned Warren with the progressive wing of the Republican Party, a position he would occupy for the rest of his life.

Neither in college nor in law school did Warren show any aptitude for academic studies. At Boalt Hall, he refused even to speak in class, claiming that in order to earn a degree he did not have to participate in discussion, but only pass the exams. He did pass, and then for a short time was in private practice, which he disliked intensely. In World War I, he enlisted in the army, and although he did not go overseas, rose in the ranks to become a first lieutenant. After his discharge he held several minor posts in state and local governments in California before becoming deputy district attorney of Alameda County in May 1920. He would remain in public service the rest of his career.

The prosecutorial experience that Warren gained, first in Alameda and later as attorney general of California proved one of the decisive influences in his later judicial philosophy. Warren had no love of criminals or radicals, and during the 1920s and 1930s gained a statewide reputation for his vigorous and successful prosecution of corrupt politicians, bootleg liquor dealers, and the like. But he also cleaned up the sheriff's office in Alameda, successfully prosecuting the sheriff and more than a half-dozen deputies for corruption. He then went on to professionalize law enforcement in the county, providing extensive training for police officers, securing legislation establishing interjurisdictional cooperation, the introduction of scientific analysis of evidence, and the centralization of information. By the time he won his second full term as Alameda district attorney in 1934, Warren had become one of the best-known prosecutors in the country.

When considering the revolution in criminal justice that Warren oversaw during his years on the Supreme Court, it is easy to trace the philosophy if not the exact details to his years in California. On the Court only he and Hugo Black had any experience in criminal law, he as a prosecutor and Black both as a prosecutor and defense attorney. They knew from firsthand experience how the system actually worked, how important a lawyer could be in the different phases of arrest, indictment, trial, and appeal. They also knew how the system discriminated against the poor, that is, those who could not afford a lawyer and had no protection from the power of the state. They also knew that while the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments protected defendants in federal courts, little of that protection existed at the state level.

Given his reputation as a civil libertarian while on the Court, there is little in his record in California to foreshadow his later position. He willingly prosecuted radicals under California's syndicalism law (the same law that would be applied to Anita Whitney), and in 1936 engaged in out-and-out red baiting to prosecute four union members charged with killing a fifth worker aboard a freighter. He denounced the men as "radicals," and it appears that the evidence used against them came from warrantless wiretaps and confessions coerced by the police who refused the men a chance to talk with their lawyer.

So popular had Warren become that by 1938 he won the Republican, Democratic, and Progressive Party nominations for the office of state attorney general, and with support from business and other antilabor groups, easily beat his opponent by a margin of four to one. Once in office, Warren went through the same pattern he had shown in the county, reorganizing his office, upgrading the qualifications and training of state police, and vigorously prosecuting gambling, prostitution, and other activities associated with organized crime, as well as political corruption in state government. By the end of his tenure, California had one of the least politically corrupt governments in the union, and Warren and Thomas E. Dewey of New York shared the reputation as best state law enforcement officers.

But once again Warren's record on civil liberties left much to be desired. He continued his attacks on aliens, and supported legislative committee witch hunts aimed at alleged communists. He fought endlessly with Democratic Governor Culbert L. Olson, who not only pardoned World War I radical and labor agitator Tom Mooney, but also commuted the sentences of the four ship workers Warren had prosecuted in 1936. Warren took this as personal criticism of him, and declared that the men had been fairly tried and convicted, and in addition "they are also revolutionaries—and Communists." When Olson wanted to appoint law professor Max Radin, a civil libertarian, advocate of labor rights, and a frequent critic of Warren's, to the state supreme court, Warren helped defeat the appointment. As some observers noted, at that time Warren could not tell the difference between a communist and a person who backed the rights of labor or defended civil liberties.

Perhaps the greatest blot on Warren's record came during World War II, when he became one of the leading advocates of the internment of Japanese Americans living in California. Despite his later comment in his Memoirs that he "had no prejudice against the Japanese" except that spawned in the aftermath of Pearl Harbor, in fact Warren had joined nativist organizations and in nearly two decades of public life prior to the war had never shown any sympathy toward Japanese or Chinese Americans. But he did admit in his memoirs that the treatment of Japanese Americans during the war was "regrettable," and that he was "conscience stricken" by the thought of little children in the internment camps.

Interestingly enough, in a decision he admitted ran counter to his support of the internment program, as attorney general Warren ruled that the state personnel board could not deprive state employees of Japanese descent of their civil service rights. While later repentant for his role in advocating and enforcing the internment, Warren nonetheless always maintained that during wartime government could restrict the rights of its citizens.

In 1942, Warren challenged Olson for the governorship, and easily defeated him; he then went on to win reelection in 1946, and for an unprecedented third term in 1950, both times by wide margins. Once again he set out to reform the administration of his office. He dismantled a secret system for taping conversations in the governor's office. He made a number of high-level appointments based on the ability of the person, often without even inquiring into their party affiliation. He sponsored a number of reforms, some of which antagonized powerful business interests and eroded his support among traditional Republicans. His record, however, won him a national reputation and he continued to enjoy enormous popular support in California.

Once again, however, his civil liberties record is mixed. He gave up red baiting, distanced himself from the red-scare tactics of Richard Nixon and Goodwin Knight in California, and even tried to protect academics in the state university system against oaths and indiscriminate firings for alleged radicalism. But he did endorse a regents' policy against the employment of communists, and after the Korean War signed a bill that imposed a loyalty oath on all state employees.

In 1948 he had run as Thomas Dewey's vice presidential candidate, and this made him one of the potential candidates for the Republican nomination in 1952. Supposedly he threw his support to Dwight D. Eisenhower in return for a promise of the first appointment to the Supreme Court. There is no evidence of any such deal, and according to Warren's Memoirs, Eisenhower initially considered him for a cabinet appointment. When that did not pan out, the president-elect called Warren and said, "I want you to know that I intend to offer you the first vacancy on the Supreme Court." In fact, in preparation for that position, Eisenhower invited Warren to become solicitor general; Warren accepted, and was packing his bags to come to Washington when Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson died. In late September 1953, Eisenhower gave Warren an interim appointment to the high court; the Senate ultimately confirmed him on March 1, 1954.

The constitutional mark left at the end of Earl Warren's term as the fourteenth chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court reflected the tremendous changes in American society during the 1950s and 1960s. These changes involved a significant expansion in the rights and liberties of individuals in the name of securing the goals of social and political equality. Warren's judicial legacy is striking in two important respects. First, the decisions of the Court he led for fifteen years contributed substantially to the expansion of the constitutional rights of Americans and to the expansion of the role of the federal government in enforcing and protecting those rights. Second, his willingness to adapt and create legal doctrines to fit his ideological beliefs and commitments represented an enhanced role for the Supreme Court in superintending governmental decision making on an order of magnitude not seen since the New Deal. Especially significant during the time of Warren's stewardship was the Supreme Court's role in eradicating vestiges of public and private discrimination, in expanding the scope of protections for individuals accused of committing crimes, in ensuring the rights of free expression and religious freedom, and in improving the processes of representation and democracy in order to ensure a more responsive and effective government.

Historians' judgment that Earl Warren ranks with John Marshall as one of the two greatest chief justices in the Supreme Court's history is based on Warren's performance as a leader of the Court during a time of tremendous social and political controversy. While scholars have struggled to carve out from Warren's decisions a discernible judicial philosophy and jurisprudential compass, Warren has never been regarded as a great jurist, as a judge who has shaped the course of the law through his written opinions. One of Warren's biographers, G. Edward White, has argued that there is indeed a coherent jurisprudential line in Warren's judicial writings. Warren, White claims, equated judicial lawmaking with neither the dictates of reason ... nor the demands imposed by an institutional theory of the judge's role, nor the alleged 'command' of the constitutional text, but rather with his own reconstruction of the ethical structure of the Constitution.

While this "ethicist" approach to judging pointed to particular judicial results—quite liberal results—it is less clear that such a description captures fully the structure of reasoning in Warren's decisions. Quite often, Warren's opinions are stolid and doctrinally underdeveloped. In other instances, notably Brown v. Board of Education (1954) and Miranda v. Arizona (1966), Warren relied on a body of empirical data and social science without explaining adequately the bases of this approach and the link between the empirical evidence and the stated doctrine. Nevertheless, Earl Warren stands out as a great chief justice, one whom Justice William J. Brennan described as the "Super-chief," because of his performance as leader of the Court. Rather than exercising influence through an outpouring of carefully crafted judicial decisions, Warren was content to affect the course of the law chiefly through the powers of the office of chief justice and especially through his considerable interpersonal skills and political savvy. His most notable victories, namely Brown, Baker v. Carr (1962), and Miranda, reflect the work of a skillful judicial leader, one with a keen sense for politics as "the art of the possible."

Earl Warren's ability as a leader was tested immediately on his appointment to the Court. By the time of his arrival, the Court had heard arguments in a consolidated series of cases challenging the constitutionality of segregated public schools. The most ambitious of the claims raised by the appellants was the call for an overruling of Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), in which the Court had enunciated the doctrine of "separate but equal" and had upheld the constitutionality of segregated public facilities. At conference following the oral argument in the first case to reach the Court in the spring of 1953, the Court was divided. On taking office, Warren presided over re-argument in the case and then set out to manufacture a unanimous Court for the proposition that segregated public schools constituted an unconstitutional deprivation of the equal protection of the laws.

Scholars who have examined closely the decision-making process in the segregation cases agree that Warren played a pivotal role in securing assent by each justice to the ruling in Brown. This road to unanimity began with Warren's expressed view in the conference held after re-argument in the first segregation cases that Plessy should be overruled. He worked on securing a unanimous result through conversations with the fence-sitting justices and through circulation of the drafts of an opinion in the case. Warren's decision for the unanimous Court in Brown concentrated on taking the doctrinal legs out from under Plessy, relying on sociological data and on a forceful explication of the view, eloquently presented to the Court by National Association for the Advancement of Colored People lawyer Thurgood Marshall, that "separate is inherently unequal."

What is clear is that aside from whatever legal arguments could be crafted by either side, Warren cut straight to the heart of the matter—segregation was so morally wrong that it could not be tolerated by the Constitution. In all the decisions between Brown in 1954 and Loving v. Virginia in 1967, which struck down laws banning interracial marriage, Warren secured a unanimous Court because he continued to emphasize the moral issues involved.

He did this again in what he considered the greatest achievement of the Warren Court—the reapportionment cases. Legislative apportionment in many ways represents the quintessential dispute over the proper role of the judiciary in ensuring fair representation. In 1946 Felix Frankfurter had warned against the judiciary getting involved in the “political thicket,” and called questions of apportionment nonjusticiable, since the courts could not devise a workable solution. In Baker v. Carr (1962), the Court decisively rejected this “political question” theory, and agreed that challenges to unfair apportionment schemes could be heard in the courts.

In 1964, the Supreme Court reached the merits of an apportionment scheme in the case of Reynolds v. Sims. Reynolds concerned an apportionment scheme in the state of Alabama in which the votes of residents of rural areas were accorded vastly more significance, because of their relative numerical weight, than voters in urban areas. The issue triggered Warren’s instincts for political fairness and equality. “How long should we have to wait?” Warren asked Alabama’s attorney who attempted to reassure the justices that Alabama would correct its representational flaws in time. Warren wrote the opinion for the Court, declaring that “legislators represent people, not trees or acres” and announcing the “one man, one vote” rule mandating that state legislative districts represent an equal number of constituents. Judicial intervention in the name of securing fair representation represented a key theme in Warren’s jurisprudence throughout his tenure.

The Court’s apportionment decisions provided both a precedent for judicial intervention into the political arrangements of states and a bright-line rule for the construction of all legislative districts except the U.S. Senate. To Warren, however, the effects of the reapportionment decisions were transformative in just the right way. The decisions represented the critical link in the Court’s efforts to limit the effects of race discrimination and the efforts to shut out minorities from effective participation in state political systems. Indeed, Warren opined that had the Court decided Baker v. Carr early on, the desegregation decisions would have proved unnecessary.

Judicial intervention in the name of securing fair representation represented a key theme in Warren’s jurisprudence throughout his tenure, and can be seen in two cases decided in Warren’s final term. In Powell v. McCormack (1969), the Court considered whether the decision by the House of Representatives to unseat Representative Adam Clayton Powell violated the Constitution. In his opinion for the Court, Chief Justice Warren explained the limited power of the House to discipline its members, stressing the right of the people to elect their representatives. Powell was and remains a rare case in which the Court invalidated an internal decision of the legislature on what amounted to democratic “fairness” grounds.

In Allen v. State Board of Elections that same term, the Court endorsed a broad interpretation of Section 5 of the 1965 Voting Rights Act. Section 5 provided that the Department of Justice review any changes in state voting schemes prior to their taking effect. The Court, in an opinion written by Warren, rejected the view that the statute was limited to only those state rules prescribing who may register to vote. Warren wrote that the act “was aimed at the subtle, as well as the obvious, state regulations which have the effect of denying citizens their right to vote because of their race.” Accordingly, he interpreted the act to subject to federal review any state voting enactment that “altered the election law of a covered State in even a minor way.”

The most controversial area in which the Warren Court changed the balance between the individual and the state was in the area of criminal law and the rights of the accused. Reflecting his pre-Court commitment to fairness in law enforcement, Warren proved willing to look closely at police conduct and to consider whether the accused had been treated fairly. In Watkins v. United States (1957), for example, Warren wrote an opinion for the Court in which he held that Congress, acting through the House Un-American Activities Committee, had improperly held Watkins in contempt of Congress for failing to disclose certain information. Congress had failed, wrote Warren, to provide the defendant with “a fair opportunity to determine whether he was within his rights in refusing to answer.” Judicial redress for the failure of the government to provide a criminal defendant with due process would represent a common theme through Warren’s constitutional jurisprudence.

The most famous of these criminal procedure decisions were Gideon v. Wainwright (1963) and Miranda v. Arizona (1966). Clarence Earl Gideon had been convicted of a robbery and denied counsel in a Florida court. In an opinion written by Hugo Black reversing more than two decades of precedent, the Court applied the Sixth Amendment to the states and held that a defendant could not have a fair trial without benefit of an attorney.

Ernesto Miranda had been arrested and questioned without being advised as to his constitutional rights, including the right to have an attorney present for questioning. In his opinion for the majority, the chief justice elaborately reviewed historical and contemporary police practices, in an attempt to persuade the reader that the so-called Miranda requirements would not unduly burden law enforcement officials. According to some scholars, Miranda was “the quintessential Warren opinion.” It was broad in scope, relied on a patched-together history, and made an impassioned plea for fairness rather than setting out a closely reasoned doctrinal story. It also imposed substantial restrictions on governmental conduct. While Miranda generated a storm of controversy at the time of the decision and for years afterward, Warren’s approach to constructing a code of police conduct in the arrest and interrogation situation has largely been vindicated; most regard the criminal process as substantially fairer as a result of Miranda.

Warren is given much less credit in the area of obscenity and the First Amendment. He usually followed the carefully constructed doctrinal rationales of his close ally and confidante, William Brennan. Warren voted to strike down a variety of government restrictions on freedom of expression and of religion, although in his early years he proved less than sensitive to the claims of minorities. There is a big difference between the early Warren who saw no restriction of free exercise by Sunday closing laws on Orthodox Jews, and the Warren who joined in the Court’s opinion requiring the states to accommodate the needs of Seventh Day Adventists.

When it came to government restrictions on allegedly obscene speech, however, Warren disagreed with the more liberal views of Black, Douglas, and Brennan. Warren believed strongly in what he called “a right of the government to maintain a decent society.” He thus gave the government great latitude to ban the circulation of allegedly pornographic materials. Warren emphasized in his obscenity opinions that the Court should defer to the local communities in their authority to combat obscenity and its effects. Warren’s struggle to carve out a special jurisprudence in the obscenity area was widely regarded as a failure, and it could not be reconciled with the Warren Court’s general commitment to freedom of expression.

Warren clearly placed his stamp on the Court’s expansive rights jurisprudence. The Court he led was committed to an expansive jurisprudence of rights protected by the Constitution. This approach, according to some scholars, reached its apotheosis in cases such as Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), in which the majority found a right to privacy in the penumbra of the Bill of Rights.

Earl Warren, while the author of some of the Court’s great opinions, played a far more important role through the leadership he provided. Many of the great cases he generously assigned to his colleagues, but there is little doubt that his masterful political skills played a key role in constructing the majorities that struck down segregation, reapportioned the states, enhanced protection of speech and religion, and triggered the due process revolution in criminal procedure. For this he deservedly earned a reputation not only as a civil libertarian but also as the “Superchief.”

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Belknap, Michal R. The Supreme Court under Earl Warren, 1953–1969. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2004.
- Cray, Edward. Chief Justice: A Biography of Earl Warren. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1997.
- Ely, John. Democracy and Distrust. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1980.
- Horwitz, Horwitz. The Warren Court and the Pursuit of Justice. New York: Hill & Wang, 1998.
- Powe, Lucas Scot. The Warren Court and American Politics. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000.
- Symposium: The Jurisprudential Legacy of the Warren Court*, Washington & Lee Law Review 59 (2002): 1055.
- Warren, Earl. Memoirs of Chief Justice Earl Warren. Garden City: Doubleday, 1977.
- White, G. Edward. Earl Warren: A Public Life. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Allen v. State Board of Elections*, 393 U.S. 544 (1969)
- Baker v. Carr*, 369 U.S. 186, 213 (1962)
- Brown v. Board of Education*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
- Gideon v. Wainwright*, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Loving v. Virginia*, 388 U.S. (1967)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- Plessy v. Ferguson*, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)
- Powell v. Texas*, 392 U.S. 514 (1968)
- Reynolds v. Sims*, 377 U.S. 533 (1964)
- Watkins v. United States*, 354 U.S. 178 (1957)

WARTIME LEGISLATION

The U.S. government has historically passed legislation and issued executive orders designed to protect national security in wartime. Such wartime legislation often restricts civil liberties in a manner not justified during peacetime. During times of war, however, the government’s rationale for these restrictions is the need to protect national interests in a time of crisis. Consequently, wartime legislation is frequently challenged in the judicial system. The courts have ordinarily taken one of three courses of action: upheld the legislation as justified in light of the national security crisis, thereby outweighing the restriction on individual liberties; struck down the legislation as unduly restrictive; or completely deferred to the judgment of the legislative and executive branches.

An early example is the Sedition Act of 1798, enacted pursuant to an impending war with France. The Sedition Act threatened imprisonment for those opposing or criticizing the president or Congress. Although the Supreme Court never ruled on the constitutionality of the Sedition Act, it is generally recognized that the act was an unconstitutional restriction on freedom of speech. In contrast, the Supreme Court upheld Executive Order 9066 in Korematsu v. United States, a case challenging Japanese internment in World War II. Despite overwhelming restrictions on liberty, the Court found the order justified due to potential security threats from Japanese Americans (although this decision has been widely criticized). Generally speaking, however, such restrictions on civil liberties are justified only in the face of an actual, imminent threat to national security.

ANN B. CHING

References and Further Reading

- Rehnquist, William H. All the Laws but One: Civil Liberties in Wartime. New York: Knopf, 1998.
 Stone, Geoffrey R. Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime from the Sedition Act of 1798 to the War on Terrorism. New York: W.W. Norton and Co., 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Korematsu v. United States*, 323 U.S. 214 (1944)
Korematsu v. United States, 584 F.Supp. 1406 (N.D. Cal. 1984)
 Sedition Act of July 14, 1798, ch. 74, 1 Stat. 596

See also Alien and Sedition Acts (1798); Communist Party; Freedom of Associations; Guantánamo Bay, Enemy Combatants, Post 9/11; Indefinite Detention; Jackson, Robert H.; Japanese Internment Cases; McCarran-Walton Act of 1952; Military Tribunals; National Security; National Security and Freedom of Speech; 9/11 and the War on Terrorism; Seditious Libel; World War I, Civil Liberties in; World War II, Civil Liberties in

WASHINGTON v. GLUCKSBERG, 521 U.S. 702 (1997)

In 1994, a group of plaintiffs sought a federal court declaration that the State of Washington's prohibition on assisted suicide was unconstitutional. Plaintiffs included four physicians who treat terminally ill patients, three gravely ill individuals, and a nonprofit organization that counsels people considering assisted suicide. Under Washington law, aiding a suicide attempt is a felony punishable by up to five years in prison and a $10,000 fine. The plaintiffs asserted "the existence of a liberty interest protected by the Fourteenth Amendment which extends to a personal choice by a mentally competent, terminally ill adult to commit physician-assisted suicide." The district court held that the Washington law violated the substantive component of the due process clause and the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Ultimately, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed on substantive due process grounds. The State appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

In a unanimous judgment, the Court reversed, holding that Washington's prohibition does not violate the due process clause. Writing for the Court, Chief Justice William Rehnquist noted that the fundamental liberty interests protected by the due process clause—marriage, procreation, and child rearing, for example—have been firmly rooted in American history and tradition. Within that tradition, however, assisted suicide has been consistently criminalized or otherwise discouraged for more than 700 years. As a result, "the asserted 'right' to assistance in committing suicide is not a fundamental liberty interest protected by the Due Process Clause." Rehnquist also distinguished the Court's holding in Cruzan v. Missouri Department of Health (1990), which presumed the right of a mentally competent individual to refuse life-sustaining medical treatment. He observed that the right to refuse treatment developed not from "abstract concepts of personal autonomy," but from the common-law rule that forced medication constitutes an unlawful battery. Thus, while the "decision to commit suicide with the assistance of another may be just as personal and profound as the decision to refuse unwanted medical treatment, ... it has never enjoyed similar legal protection." Applying traditional rational basis review, the Court noted the State's legitimate interests in the preservation of human life, in protecting the integrity and ethics of the medical profession, and in guarding against the possibility of voluntary and involuntary euthanasia.

Five justices filed concurring opinions, each suggesting that further information—about the practice of assisted suicide in other countries, the availability of palliative care for terminally ill patients, or application of the prohibition in different circumstances—could shift the balance between a patient's interests and the State's, possibly rendering the statute "an intolerable intrusion on [a] patient's freedom." All of the opinions, including the Court's, emphasized the need for further study and debate regarding the "morality, legality, and practicality, of physician-assisted suicide.” In a companion case, Vacco v. Quill (1997), the Court also reversed a decision of the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, which had invalidated New York’s prohibition on assisted suicide on equal protection grounds.

MARY SIGLER

References and Further Reading

Dworkin, Ronald. “Assisted Suicide: What the Court Really Said.” New York Review of Books 44, no. 14 (1997).
Rawls, John, et al. “Assisted Suicide: The Philosophers’ Brief.” New York Review of Books 44, no. 5, March 27, 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health, 497 U.S. 267 (1990)
Vacco v. Quill, 521 U.S. 793 (1997)
Washington Revised Code, Section 9A.36.060(1) et seq.

See also Cruzan v. Missouri, 497 U.S. 261 (1990); Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Privacy

WASHINGTON v. TEXAS, 388 U.S. 14 (1967)

In Washington, the Supreme Court held that the Sixth Amendment compulsory process clause and a criminal defendant’s right to present a defense required the abrogation of a state evidentiary rule that prevented the defendant from calling an alleged accomplice as a defense witness.

Charged with murder, Washington testified at his trial that it was his codefendant, Fuller, who fired the fatal shot. When Washington attempted to call Fuller as a defense witness, the prosecution successfully objected on the ground that state law barred codefendants from testifying in each other’s behalf. Prevented from calling Fuller, who would have testified that he indeed fired the fatal shot after Washington had fled the scene, Washington was convicted.

After the Texas state courts rejected his appeals, Washington appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which unanimously reversed the conviction. The Court first held that the compulsory process clause was a fundamental part of a defendant’s right to present a defense and, therefore, was essential to due process. The Court then held that these constitutional rights trumped a state rule barring codefendants from testifying for each other because such a rule was arbitrary and did not advance the truth-seeking function of a criminal trial. Washington thus stands for the important proposition that jurisdictions may not rely on arbitrary rules or procedures in order to exclude important defense evidence, a proposition the Court expanded in a series of later cases, including Chambers v. Mississippi (1973), Webb v. Texas (1972), and Cool v. United States (1972).

WATSON v. JONES, 80 U.S. (13 WALL.) 679 (1872)

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

Stacy, Tom, The Search for Truth in Constitutional Criminal Procedure, Columbia Law Review 91 (1991): 1369.
Westen, Peter, The Compulsory Process Clause, Michigan Law Review 73 (1974): 71.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973)
Cool v. United States, 409 U.S. 100 (1972)
Webb v. Texas, 409 U.S. 95 (1972)

See also Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973); Defense, Right to Present; Due Process; Webb v. Texas, 409 U.S. 95 (1972)

WATSON v. JONES, 80 U.S. (13 WALL.) 679 (1872)

On occasion, courts are called upon to adjudicate disputes between members of a religious organization, particularly disputes involving control of the organization’s property. For example, a local church may split into two factions over a theological issue and each faction may claim ownership of the church’s property. These cases pose serious difficulties for courts, as they raise concerns of judicial intrusion on the rights of the members of the religious organizations to define their own identity. The U.S. Supreme Court first addressed the question of the role of courts in resolving such property disputes in Watson v. Jones.

The Watson case arose when the Walnut Street Presbyterian Church in Louisville, Kentucky, divided over its denomination’s position on slavery. In May 1865, weeks after the conclusion of the Civil War, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church—the governing body of that church—instructed its local churches that when “when any person from the Southern States” should apply for membership or seek to serve as a missionary or minister, the church should determine whether such person was “guilty of voluntarily aiding the war of the rebellion” or of embracing the Southern Presbyterian church’s view that “the system of negro slavery in the South is a divine institution ... and that it is the peculiar mission of the Southern church to preserve that institution.”

The General Assembly directed that such persons should “be required to repent and forsake these sins before they could be received.” That directive helped precipitate a split in the Walnut Street church congregation, with each faction claiming exclusive use of the church property. Litigation ensued and the Kentucky state courts ruled in favor of the pro-slavery faction. But some antislavery church members who lived across the Ohio River in Indiana sued in federal circuit court, using their diversity of citizenship as a basis for federal jurisdiction. The federal circuit court ruled in their favor and the matter was appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which agreed with the federal circuit court.

The Court in Watson articulated several principles that would have a significant impact on subsequent jurisprudence pertaining to the judicial resolution of church property disputes. First, the Court concluded that if the property in question had been given to the church with the express condition that the property be “devoted to the teaching, support, or spread of some specific form of religious doctrine or belief,” then “it will be the duty of the court in such cases ... to inquire whether the party accused of violating the trust is holding or teaching a different doctrine, or using a form of worship which is so far variant as to defeat the declared objects of the trust.” But in many if not most instances, donors have not contributed church property with such an express condition. Absent the existence of an express trust, the Court determined that civil courts should not resolve the question whether there had been a departure from the doctrinal position of the original donor.

In taking this position, the Court rejected the English implied trust doctrine pursuant to which church property was deemed to be held in trust for the propagation of the particular religious doctrines of the church’s founders. Under this implied trust doctrine, civil courts, when called upon, had the responsibility to determine which group of contemporary church members maintained fidelity to those original religious doctrines—even if the founders had not expressly required such fidelity. The Court in Watson rejected this view that members of a church are impliedly bound to conform to the doctrines adhered to by the church founders and that civil courts must enforce that obligation—and that civil courts should determine whether there has been a substantial departure from such doctrines. The Court did not expressly rely on the First Amendment in reaching its conclusions, but it did note that “the structure of our government has, for the preservation of Civil Liberty, ... secured Religious liberty from the invasion of Civil Authority.”

The Court in Watson further held that absent an express condition, a civil court asked to resolve a church property dispute should examine the polity structure of the church in question. If the church is one with a congregational polity, pursuant to which each local church independently governs its own affairs, then the conflict should be resolved in accordance with the principles that govern voluntary associations, such as majority rule. In such a case, therefore, the court should simply defer to the judgment of the majority, rejecting arguments that the majority has “changed in some respect their views of religious truth.” On the other hand, if the church in question is one with a hierarchical polity, as was the case with the Presbyterian Church, pursuant to which each local church is subordinate to a broader church structure, then the civil court must defer to the position taken by the church hierarchy and “accept such decisions as final.” In sum, the Court in Watson concluded that civil courts should resolve church property disputes by deferring to the judgment of the highest appropriate authority in the church structure—which will vary depending on whether the church has adopted a congregational or a hierarchical polity. Applying this principle, the Court ruled in favor of the antislavery faction because its views were consistent with the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church.

The effect of the Watson decision was to limit the role of civil courts in the resolution of church property disputes. Although the Watson decision technically applied only to federal courts, the dictates of the decision have been widely followed by state courts confronted with similar disputes. In subsequent years, the Supreme Court has continued to rely on the framework established in Watson, although in Jones v. Wolf (1979) the Court concluded that civil courts resolving disputes over church property need not defer to the decisions of church authorities if the court can rely instead on authoritative documents that the court can interpret without having to make a religious judgment. Now, civil courts called upon to resolve disputes over church property can either defer to the highest authorities in the church structure, or apply neutral legal principles that do not require the court to make determinations about religious matters.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Gerstenblith, Patty, Civil Court Resolution of Property Disputes among Religious Organizations, American University Law Review 39 (1990): 513–72.
- Greenawalt, Kent, Hands Off! Civil Court Involvement in Conflicts over Religious Property, Columbia Law Review 98 (1998): 1843.
- Montgomery, Sarah M., Drawing the Line: The Civil Courts’ Resolution of Church Property Disputes, The Established Church, and All Saints’ Episcopal Church, Waccamaw, South Carolina Law Review 54 (2002): 203.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Jones v. Wolf, 443 U.S. 595 (1979)

See also Judicial Resolution of Church Property Disputes

WATTS v. UNITED STATES, 394 U.S. 705 (1969)

The U.S. Supreme Court has struggled with where to draw the line between free speech and personal safety. The Court has been reluctant to protect speech designed to advocate violence. In Watts v. United States, the Court held that the First Amendment does not protect “true threats” (as opposed to those implying action at an uncertain, future time) of violence.

In Watts, the petitioner (discussing the draft at a rally) stated, “If they ever make me carry a rifle, the first man I want to get in my sight is L.B.J.” He was convicted under a federal law making it a crime to threaten the president. Eventually, the Supreme Court granted certiorari to determine if Watts’s words were protected by the First Amendment. Although the Court emphasized that the law itself was constitutional, it only applied to “true threats”: Watts’s statement was mere political hyperbole and therefore protected.

In 2003, the Court revisited this issue in Virginia v. Black, which involved a Virginia statute making it a felony for anyone “with the intent of intimidating any person ... to burn ... a cross” on another’s property and mandating that such burning is prima facie evidence of an intent to intimidate. Petitioners, convicted of violating the statute, challenged its constitutionality on First Amendment grounds. In a plurality opinion, the Court held that the statute could ban cross burning with the intent to intimidate, as this constituted a “true threat” under Watts. However, the statute could not treat any cross burning as prima facie evidence of intent to intimidate.

LEE R. REMINGTON

References and Further Reading

- Alonso, Karen. Schenck v. United States: Restrictions on Free Speech. Springfield, NJ: Enslow Publishers, 1999.
- Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire*, 315 U.S. 568 (1942).
- Fuson, Harold W. Telling it All: A Legal Guide to the Exercise of Free Speech. Kansas City, MO: Andrews and McMeel, 1995.
- Jasper, Margaret C. The Law of Speech and the First Amendment. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana Publications, 1999.

O’Neil, Robert M., Rights in Conflict: The First Amendment’s Third Century, Law and Contemporary Problems 65 (2002): 7.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343 (2003)

WEBB v. TEXAS, 409 U.S. 95 (1972)

In Webb, the Supreme Court held that a state trial judge violated a criminal defendant’s due process clause right to a fair trial by so thoroughly warning a defense witness about the dangers of perjury that the witness refused to testify. The Court thus effectively recognized that such gratuitous warnings could defeat a defendant’s right to present a defense.

Webb attempted to call a single witness, Mills, to testify in Webb’s defense during his burglary trial. The trial judge warned Mills, who was already serving a prison sentence, that he would face many additional years in prison if he committed perjury and that the judge would personally take the matter to the grand jury if he lied on the witness stand. After receiving these warnings, Mills, not surprisingly, declined to testify. Webb was then convicted and sentenced to twelve years in prison.

After his appeals were rejected by the Texas state courts, Webb appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which summarily reversed his conviction by a vote of seven to two. In reversing the conviction, the Court cited Washington v. Texas (1967) for the proposition that the due process clause guarantees a defendant the right to present witnesses in his favor. The Court concluded that the judge’s threatening remarks effectively deprived Webb of that right by driving his only witness off the stand. Webb thus establishes that a judge (or a prosecutor) may not use the threat of a perjury prosecution to intimidate a defense witness from testifying.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

- Green, Bruce, Limits on a Prosecutor’s Communications with Prospective Defense Witnesses, Criminal Law Bulletin 25 (1989): 139.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967)

See also Due Process; Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967)

WEBSTER v. REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH SERVICES, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)

The Supreme Court's decision in Roe v. Wade (1973) struck down abortion laws in 46 of the 50 states. Conservative opponents of the decision became concentrated in the Republican Party, whose leaders began to pledge to appoint justices would overturn the decision. After being elected in 1980, Ronald Reagan was able to replace three justices who were part of the original seven-to-two majority, and William Rehnquist (who dissented in Roe) was promoted to chief justice. The appointment of Anthony Kennedy created the strong possibility that the Court would vote to overturn Roe, and in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services the Reagan administration filed an amicus brief asking the Court to do so. The administration was not alone in filing a brief; with the potentially momentous stakes of the case clear to both pro-choice and pro-life activists, seventy-eight amicus briefs were submitted.

The case involved four provisions of a Missouri statute that were struck down by a federal district court as being inconsistent with Roe v. Wade: (1) a preamble that declared that life began at conception, (2) a prohibition on abortion counseling by public officials and a denial of public funds for abortions not related to the life of the mother, (3) a requirement that all abortions performed after the fifteenth week be performed in state hospitals, and (4) a requirement that doctors perform tests to determine if the fetus was viable. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit argued that the denial of public funding was constitutional under Harris v. McRae (1980), but otherwise affirmed the judgment of the district court.

The initial strategy of Chief Justice Rehnquist was to propose an opinion that would uphold the Missouri law and implicitly but not explicitly overrule Roe. Perhaps in an attempt to secure the crucial swing vote of Sandra Day O'Connor, Rehnquist proposed replacing the "trimester framework" of Roe with a standard that would permit any state regulation that reasonably furthered "the state's interest in fetal life," but argued that because the regulations of the Missouri law were constitutional under the new standard there was no need address the question of whether Roe remained good law. Rehnquist's strategy, however, failed, as it was widely recognized that the new standard would permit virtually any regulation of abortion. O'Connor, while willing to replace the "trimester framework," argued for a standard that would permit abortion regulations that did not constitute an "undue burden." Nor did the attempt to avoid overturning Roe directly fool Roe's strong supporters on the Court. John Paul Stevens circulated a memo angrily criticizing Rehnquist's opinion: "As you know, I am not in favor of overruling Roe v. Wade, but if the deed is to be done I would rather see the Court give the case a decent burial instead of tossing it out the window of a fast-moving caboose."

The ultimate result, then, was a divided court that left the status of Roe undecided. Rehnquist's plurality opinion—which was joined fully by only Kennedy and White—upheld the Missouri law while arguing that "[this] case ... affords us no occasion to revisit the holding of Roe." O'Connor filed a concurrence defending her "undue burden" standard, while arguing that the Missouri law did not conflict with the relevant precedents. Antonin Scalia filed an angry concurrence, arguing that Roe should be overturned explicitly, and that "[o]f the four courses we might have chosen today—to reaffirm Roe, to overrule it explicitly, to overrule it sub silentio, or to avoid the question—the last is the least responsible." Stevens joined the Court in upholding Missouri's denial of public funding (while arguing that the ban on counseling was moot because the plaintiffs had withdrawn their complaint), but otherwise dissented, arguing that the other abortion regulations were inconsistent with Roe and that the preamble was inconsistent with the establishment clause. Blackmun—joined by Marshall and Brennan—dissented bitterly, arguing that the Missouri law conflicted with his most famous opinion and that the plurality opinion would effectively overrule Roe. He concluded with a grim prognosis for the future of Roe: "For today, the women of this Nation still retain the liberty to control their destinies. But the signs are evident and very ominous, and a chill wind blows."

With another opponent of Roe in the White House, Blackmun's analysis of its prospects seemed persuasive to all sides of the debate surrounding the right to choose, but Roe proved more durable than its opponents hoped and its supporters feared. In 1992, the Court in Planned Parenthood v. Casey would explicitly affirm Roe, using O'Connor's "undue burden" analysis.

SCOTT LEMIEUX

References and Further Reading

- Craig, Barbara Hinkinson, and David M. O'Brien. Abortion and American Politics. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House, 1993.
- Garrow, David J. Liberty & Sexuality. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
- Gorney, Cynthia. Articles of Faith. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1998.
- Greenhouse, Linda. Becoming Justice Blackmun. New York: Times Books, 2005.
- Lazarus, Edward. Closed Chambers. New York: Penguin, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)
Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

See also Abortion; Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980); Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 112 S.Ct. 2791 (1992);
 Reproductive Freedom; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

WEDDINGTON, SARAH RAGLE (1945–)

Sarah Weddington successfully argued Roe v. Wade (1973) before the U.S. Supreme Court in 1972. This landmark opinion, which protected a woman's right to choice in striking down a Texas antiabortion statute as a violation of the fundamental right to privacy, was one of the most significant and controversial decisions reached by the Court in the twentieth century. For this feat alone, she shall forever be known.

She argued the case at age twenty-six, just five years after graduating from law school, and was one of the youngest people to successfully argue a case before the Court. She was approached in 1969 by a group of University of Texas graduate students wondering if they could be charged as accomplices for telling women where they could get illegal abortions or where they could go out of state to get legal abortions. Weddington, one of only five women in her law school class, struggling to find work as a young female attorney, and with virtually no experience, asked the women why they had selected her. Informed that she was the only female attorney they knew, she agreed to their request that she represent them for free. Via friends and fellow attorneys, Weddington was referred to a Texas woman who wanted an abortion that the State of Texas made illegal. This woman would become known as Jane Roe, and Weddington filed her first contested case, albeit an historic class action suit on behalf of "all women who were or might become pregnant in the future and want the option of abortion."

Sarah Ragle Weddington was born in Abilene, Texas, in 1945, the daughter of Henry Doyle, a Methodist minister, and Lena Ragle, a teacher. Sarah graduated from high school in Canyon, Texas, at the age of sixteen, received her baccalaureate degree from McMurry College at the age of nineteen, and her J.D. from the University of Texas School of Law at the age of twenty-one.

In 1972, while litigating Roe v. Wade, Weddington became the first woman elected from Austin, Texas, to the Texas House of Representatives. Devoted to "women's issues," and serving three terms in the Texas House, she helped reform the Texas rape statutes, pass an equal credit bill for women, a pregnancy leave bill for Texas teachers, and blocked antiabortion legislation. In 1974, she was a delegate to the Constitutional Convention held for the purpose of writing a new Texas constitution.

President Jimmy Carter appointed Weddington as general counsel for the U.S. Department of Agriculture in 1977. At age thirty-two, she was the youngest person and first woman to serve as general counsel of a cabinet-level department. From 1978 to 1981, she served as assistant to President Jimmy Carter, directing the administration's work on women's issues and appointments. From 1983 to 1985, she served as the first female director of the Texas Office of State-Federal Relations where she was the chief lobbyist for the State of Texas in Washington, D.C. The American Bar Association (ABA) made her the first woman appointed to the Joint Conference of Representatives of the ABA and AMA. Weddington was also a founding member of the Foundation for Women's Resources.

For these accomplishments, she has been recognized by numerous accolades and awards. Weddington was featured in 2003 in TIME Magazine's "80 Days that Changed the World" for the Roe v. Wade decision. TIME Magazine also named her as one of the "Outstanding Young American Leaders" in 1980. Dawn Bradley Berry profiled her in The Fifty Most Influential Women in American Law in 1996. In 1980, she received the highest honor of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, the Margaret Sanger award. She was the recipient of the Leadership America's Hummingbird award for contribution toward the advancement of women's leadership 1998. In 2000 the Texas Lawyer named her as "One of the Most Influential Lawyers in the Twentieth Century." The American Association of University Women named her Speaking Out for Justice Award recipient in 2001.

Weddington holds honorary doctorates from McMurry University, Austin College, Hamilton College, and Southwestern University. She received the Distinguished Alumna Award from McMurry University in 1992. Also in 1992, Weddington authored a book, A Question of Choice, which profiles the history and aftermath of the Roe v. Wade decision.

Sarah Weddington continues to provide leadership for women via her Weddington Center and remains a nationally known attorney, lecturer, and professor at the University of Texas at Austin.

MARTIN L. LEVY

References and Further Reading

Godwin, Michelle Gerise. "The Progressive Interview: Sarah Weddington." The Progressive, 64, August 8, 2000.
 Weddington Center. Home page. <http://www.weddington-center.com>.

Weddington, Sarah, Law: The Wind Beneath My Wings, One Woman's Journey to Effectuate Change as an Attorney, Thomas M. Cooley Law Review 20 (2003): 1.
———. A Question of Choice. New York: Putnam's, 1992.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

WEEKS v. UNITED STATES, 232 U.S. 383 (1914)

In Weeks v. United States, the Supreme Court held that evidence seized during an illegal search by a federal law enforcement officer is inadmissible in a federal trial.

Two separate but related searches and seizures occurred. First, police officers went to defendant Weeks's home while he was absent and entered his home without his permission and without a warrant. They seized several letters and papers that incriminated Weeks in conducting an illegal lottery. The officers gave these items to the U.S. Marshal.

The Marshal later went to Weeks's home with police officers and searched Weeks's room, again without Weeks's knowledge or consent and without a warrant, and seized additional items.

After Weeks filed for a return of the items seized, the district court ordered a return only of those items not materially affecting the trial. The Supreme Court stated that the Fourth Amendment placed limitations and restraints on federal courts and officials, and to allow such documents to be seized without a warrant and used against the accused would be to render the Fourth Amendment useless and have the same effect as striking it from the Constitution.

The Supreme Court held that the warrant-less seizure of items by a federal officer was a violation of Weeks's Fourth Amendment rights. This created what has come to be known as the exclusionary rule. The Court did not address a remedy for the warrantless seizure by the police since, at that time, the Fourth Amendment only applied to federal officials.

SUZANNE L. DIAZ

See also Exclusionary Rule; Fourteenth Amendment; Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961); Search Warrants; Seizures; Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949)

WEEMS v. UNITED STATES, 217 U.S. 349 (1910)

Paul Weems, a disbursing officer of the Bureau of Coast Guard and Transportation of the U.S. government of the Philippines, received a sentence of fifteen years of hard and painful labor, with chains worn at all times, civil penalties extending beyond his imprisonment, and a fine, for falsifying two entries showing wages paid out to employees. He challenged this sentence, which included loss in perpetuity of the right to hold office and to vote, and to be under surveillance for life, as violating the cruel and unusual punishment clause of the Eighth Amendment.

The Eighth Amendment's text forbids the federal government from imposing excessive bail or fines and cruel and unusual punishments. The Supreme Court held that the Philippine statute was both cruel in its excess for the crime of falsification and unusual because not one American jurisdiction punished a crime similarly. Moreover, the Philippine legislature imposed the same penalty for the much greater crime of counterfeiting currency, evidencing an exercise of unrestrained and arbitrary power. It therefore overturned Weems's conviction.

In historic language, Justice McKenna wrote that the vitality of the Constitution lay in its application to unforeseen events, and that it must speak in terms of how things presently are, not how they were once. Although this expansive view of the Bill of Rights as a living, breathing document was not fundamental to the Weems ruling, McKenna's language bolstered such future claims as a constitutional right to privacy and challenges to existing capital punishment jurisprudence.

REBECCA L. BARNHART

References and Further Reading

Granucci, Anthony F., Nor Cruel and Unusual Punishments Inflicted: The Original Meaning, California Law Review 57 (1969): 839–65.

Urofsky, Melvin I., and Paul Finkelman, eds. Documents of American Constitutional and Legal History: From the Age of Industrialization to the Present, Vol. 2. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

See also Bill of Rights: Structure; Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment: Proportionality; Capital Punishment Held Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment under Certain Guidelines; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Cruel and Unusual Punishment (VIII); Cruel and Unusual Punishment (Generally)

WELCH, JOSEPH N. (1890–1960)

Joseph Welch was an accomplished trial lawyer and partner in the prestigious Boston law firm of Hale and Dorr, when he was appointed special counsel to the U.S. Army in 1954 during the Army–McCarthy hearings. Welch became a household figure during the proceedings for his genial, courtly demeanor, which masked an incisive grasp of how to manipulate the drama that unfolded on the nation's television screens during the hearings. A native Iowan, Welch earned his law degree from Harvard Law School in 1917, and subsequently went into private practice in Boston, Massachusetts.

Senator Joseph McCarthy (R-WI) had gained extensive notoriety between 1950 and 1954 for his singled-minded and reckless pursuit of communists and security risks employed by the U.S. government. When Republicans took over the executive branch in 1953, however, McCarthy's charges, which had been welcomed when leveled at the Democratic administration, became politically inappropriate. McCarthy attacked the U.S. Army in early 1954 for harboring an alleged communist dentist. In the course of his investigation, the Senator imprudently leveled a personal attack on a decorated Army general, Ralph Zwicker, accusing him of "being unfit to wear the uniform." The Army retaliated with charges that McCarthy and his chief counsel, Roy Cohn, had improperly pressured the Army to provide special privileges to Cohn's friend and "unpaid committee consultant," Private G. David Shine.

The showdown over whether the Army had, in fact, used its treatment of Shine to blackmail McCarthy into dropping his charges against the Army exploded in April 1954 in hearings televised to the nation. Secretary of the Army Robert Stevens recruited Joseph Welch to present the Army's case. Well versed in the art of litigation, Welch was the perfect foil for McCarthy's glowering, sneering behavior. Welch, expertly directing the drama, responded to McCarthy's constant interruptions with detached amusement and, at times, biting sarcasm. In a wrangle with the senator over the origin of a doctored picture of the secretary of the army standing next to Shine, Welch opined that maybe it came from a pixie. When McCarthy demanded the definition of a pixie, the Boston attorney, in a response that was quintessential Welch, replied, "Mr. Senator ... a pixie is a close relative of a fairy."

Welch's interrogations during the hearings were masterful theatrical presentations. He never really intended to focus on the issues, believing rather that it was his duty to expose the ugliness of McCarthy's tactics. His most stirring performance, long credited with ending McCarthy's reign of terror, occurred when, during the questioning of Roy Cohn, the senator interrupted with the public denunciation of a lawyer in Welch's firm who at one time had been a member of the left-leaning National Lawyer's Guild that McCarthy characterized as the legal bulwark of the Communist Party. Although an agreement had been negotiated to keep the young man's name out of the hearings, McCarthy persisted in haranguing Welch about the young attorney's background. Welch finally, with an air of rising desperation, pleaded, "Let us not assassinate this lad further, Senator. Have you no sense of decency, sir, at long last. Have you left no sense of decency?" Welch exited the hearing room to the sound of congratulatory applause. McCarthy had been fatally wounded by a man whom McCarthy had characterized earlier as "a very clever lawyer."

McCarthy would be condemned by the U.S. Senate later that year for "contempt and abuse of the Senate." Welch returned to private practice in Boston, emerging briefly in 1959 to play the trial judge in the movie, Anatomy of a Murder.

KAREN BRUNER

References and Further Reading

- Adams, John G. Without Precedent: The Story of the Death of McCarthyism. New York: W.W. Norton, 1983.
 Oshinsky, David. A Conspiracy So Immense. New York: Free Press, 1983.
 Reeves, Thomas. The Life and Times of Joe McCarthy. New York: Stein and Day Publishers, 1982.
 Welch, Joseph. "The Lawyer's Afterthoughts," Life 37, July 29, 1954, 96–110.

WELLS-BARNETT, IDA BELL (1862–1931)

The militant journalist and antilynching crusader was born into slavery as Ida Bell Wells in Holly Springs, Mississippi. She published under the name Wells-Barnett after her marriage. Her father was a skilled carpenter who designed the building that now houses the Ida B. Wells Museum in Holly Springs.

Wells attended classes at Rust College, a Methodist freedman's school in Holly Springs, and later attended summer school at Fisk University. She began to teach in rural Mississippi schools in 1878 when her parents died in the yellow fever epidemic. In 1881, she moved to Memphis, first teaching in county schools, and then from 1883 to 1891 in Memphis African-American schools.

In 1883 and 1884, she refused to move to smoking cars reserved for African Americans, and brought two lawsuits against the railroad. She won at the trial court level, but was bitterly disappointed when the Tennessee Supreme Court reversed on the pretext that the smoking car was "equal" to the first-class accommodations available for whites.

In Memphis, Wells wrote for African-American periodicals, and her growing reputation led to her election in 1887 as secretary of the National Press Association. She turned to journalism full time when she lost her teaching position due to her outspoken criticism of Memphis's policies towards African Americans. In 1889 she became co-owner and editor of the Memphis Free Speech and Headlight.

In 1892, Wells published editorials denouncing the lynching of three African-American businessmen in Memphis. She rejected the argument that lynching was a response to black rapists: "Nobody in this section of the country believes the old thread bare lie that Negro men rape white women. If Southern white men are not careful, they will overreach themselves and public sentiment will have a reaction: a conclusion will then be reached which will be very damaging to the moral reputation for their women." While she was out of town, white newspapers incited a mob to attack her office and made it impossible for her to return to Memphis.

From New York, Wells continued her antilynching crusade, publishing Southern Horrors: Lynch Law in All Its Phases (1892). Wells recognized that lynch law was the violent expression of broader cultural efforts to degrade the reputation of Negroes as a race by stereotyping black men as rapists. Her passionate prose and careful research exploded the mythology advanced to rationalize—and justify—lynching. She documented the fact that most lynchings did not involve charges of rape, and described numerous lynchings that resulted from consensual interracial relationships. She contrasted the brutal treatment of African Americans with the routine acquittal of whites who raped African Americans. Insisting that "the strong arm of the law" be brought to bear upon lynchers, she understood this would not occur until public opinion demanded such action. Meanwhile, noting that lynchings had been prevented by forceful resistance, she counseled that "a Winchester rifle should have a place of honor in every black home." Wells brought international attention to the problem of lynch violence, touring Scotland and England in 1893 and 1894.

Wells moved to Chicago in 1894, in part to be close to her future husband, Ferdinand Lee Barnett, a lawyer and publisher. There she continued her antilynching activism. In A Red Record (1895) and Mob Rule in New Orleans (1900), she recounted horrific lynchings in Texas and Louisiana, and amassed statistics of annual lynchings that documented the severity of the problem.

Proud of her race's achievements, Wells protested the exclusion of African Americans from the World's Columbian Exposition in a pamphlet coauthored in 1893 with Frederick Douglass. Barnett exposed the scandalous violence against African Americans and celebrated the history of African-American accomplishments. In later years, Wells investigated and reported on race riots in Illinois and Arkansas. She petitioned the governor to deny reappointment to the sheriff who failed to prevent racial violence in Cairo, Illinois.

In 1895, Wells married Barnett. In the 1920s, both were active in Republican politics in Illinois. Barnett was the first African-American assistant state's attorney. Wells ran unsuccessfully in 1930 as an independent for the state senate. The couple had four children.

Wells's biographer Linda O. McMurray observes that few Americans "have more consistently refused to compromise with the evil of race prejudice." Wells opposed Booker T. Washington's accommodationism. She participated in forming many civil rights organizations, including the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in 1910, although gender bias and Wells's refusal to compromise repeatedly conspired to prevent her from assuming leadership roles.

MICHAEL H. HOFFHEIMER

References and Further Reading

- Bogues, Anthony. Black Heretics, Black Prophets: Racial Political Intellectuals. New York and London: Routledge, 2003.
- Green, Helen Taylor. African American Criminological Thought. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000.
- McMurray, Linda O. To Keep the Waters Troubled: The Life of Ida B. Wells. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Schechter, Patricia. Ida B. Wells-Barnett and American Reform 1880–1930. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Wells-Barnett, Ida B. The Memphis Diary of Ida B. Wells-Barnett. Edited by Miriam Decosta-Willis. Boston: Beacon Press, 1995.
- . On Lynchings. Salem, N.H.: Ayer 1987. [Reprint of Wells's three pamphlets on lynching: Southern Horrors (1892), A Red Record (1895), and Mob Rule in New Orleans (1900).]
- Wells-Barnett, Ida B., Frederick Douglass, Irvine Garland Penn, and Ferdinand L. Barnett. The Reason Why the Colored American Is Not in the World's Columbian Exposition: The Afro-American's Contribution to Columbian Literature. Edited by Robert W. Rydell. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1999.
- Wilkinson, Brenda Scott. African American Women Writers. New York: John Wiley, 2000.

See also National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)

WEST VIRGINIA BOARD OF EDUCATION v. BARNETTE, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

In West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, the U.S. Supreme Court found that the mandatory salute of the flag and the recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance in the public schools violated the First Amendment rights of those individuals—in this case Jehovah's Witnesses—who objected to the compelled expression on religious grounds. In one of the most famous, and eloquent, defenses of vibrant individual First Amendment freedom in the Court's history, Justice Robert Jackson famously asserted:

If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion, or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein. If there are any circumstances which permit an exception, they do not now occur to us.

But to appreciate the significance of the Barnette decision, it is important to understand the precedent set just three years before, in Minersville v. Gobitis (1940), wherein the Court considered virtually the same facts, but ruled in the opposite direction.

Precedent: Minersville v. Gobitis (1940)

Gobitis involved a mandatory requirement that all public schoolchildren salute the flag or be disciplined for insubordination. The two children of Lillian and William Gobitis, Jehovah's Witnesses, refused to salute the flag, contending that the act amounted to worship of a graven image and thus violated the First Commandment. The lawsuit challenging the Minersville school board policy was successful at the district court level and on appeal. At the U.S. Supreme Court, however, Justice Felix Frankfurter argued for the Court that while "the affirmative pursuit of one's convictions about the ultimate mystery of the universe and man's relation to it is placed beyond the reach of law[.]" the "manifold character" of these relations may "bring his conception of religious duty into conflict with the secular interests of his fellowmen." He continued: "National unity" is the basis for "national security" and thus—in trademark Frankfurter fashion—if the government deemed that "the binding tie of cohesive sentiment" was best protected via the activity of a morning flag salute, then it was ultimately up to the legislature (not the Court) to draw such conclusions.

Impact of the Gobitis Decision: The Response in West Virginia

Following the Court's decision in Gobitis, the West Virginia legislature amended its statutes to require all schools therein to conduct courses of instruction in history, civics, and the state and federal constitutions for purposes of "teaching, fostering, and perpetuating the ideals, principles and spirit of Americanism, and increasing the knowledge of the organization and machinery of government." Moreover, the act required private, parochial, and denominational schools to also include courses of study akin to those of the public schools. Thus, under the direction of the West Virginia State Board of Education, specific courses of instruction were devised and the flag salute was made mandatory, with the provision that those students who refused to comply would be expelled. Interestingly and ironically—given that the United States was by now involved in World War II—the gesture toward the flag that students were expected to offer was identical (right arm extended straight, palm out) to the signature salute of members of the Nazi Party in Germany. Walter Barnette challenged the law in court on the behalf of his three children, and in a six-to-three ruling, the Court reversed course from its opinion just three years before and found the statute to be in violation of the First Amendment as applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution.

The Court's Decision

Writing for the majority, Justice Robert Jackson explained that the circumstances of this case went beyond ordinary civics; the flag salute and attendant pledge, in other words, took the situation into the realm of compelled belief and thus ran afoul of the Constitution. "Symbolism is a primitive but effective way of communicating ideas," he noted, and so the use of flag is thus a "short-cut from mind to mind" that, with the pledge, is used to instill loyalty and ultimately compels "affirmation of a belief and an attitude of mind." Moreover, Jackson argued, to accept the premise put forth by Justice Frankfurter in Gobitis—that the witnesses were free to pursue their cause through the political process—missed the point. "The very purpose of the Bill of Rights," he offered as a counter, was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials, and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections.

Significance

Barnette is significant for several reasons. For one thing, the legal doctrine of stare decisis (roughly, "let the decision stand") strongly discourages such an about-face as was evident in this opinion, especially a mere three years later. However, precedents are reassessed as conditions and circumstances warrant, and, as the United States was by then embroiled in fighting in Europe, it seems likely that the context of war figured prominently in the justices' reversal of course.

And yet, the war context did not lead the Court to contract free expression—as was the case in the World War I opinions (for example, Schenck v. United States [1919], Abrams v. United States [1919])—but rather facilitated an expansion of the domain of individual freedom. This expansion, it seems, is at least partly attributable to the nature of the enemy in World War II: the doctrine of National Socialism, specifically, but totalitarian regimes more generally. That is, the Barnette opinion portrays an understanding of political ideology that acknowledges the irony in fighting the forces of fascism and authoritarianism abroad, while mandating uniformity in thought, compelled belief, and lockstep loyalty on the home front. A truly free society, the Court instructed here, does not eradicate dissent, but rather relies on its tradition, values, and culture to generate genuinely felt loyalty among the citizenry.

BRIAN K. PINAIRE

References and Further Reading

- Mainwaring, David. Render unto Caesar. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962.
- Newton, Merlin Owen. Armed with the Constitution: Jehovah's Witnesses in Alabama and the U.S. Supreme Court, 1939–1946. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1995.
- Peters, Shawn Francis. Judging Jehovah's Witnesses. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2002.
- Rotnem, Victor, and F. G. Folsom, Jr. "Recent Restrictions Upon Religious Liberty." American Political Science Review 36 (1942): 1053–1068.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. United States*, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
- Minersville v. Gobitis*, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)
- Schenck v. United States*, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

See also American Civil Liberties Union; Bill of Rights: Structure; Flag Salute Cases; Jehovah's Witnesses and Religious Liberty

WHISTLEBLOWERS

Many cases of fraud have been uncovered and successfully prosecuted because an employee was willing to report the abuse despite fear of retaliation, including wrongful dismissal, by the employer. These employees are commonly referred to as whistleblowers, and their legal foundations lie in the qui tam doctrine of English law which allowed individuals to bring action for the king. Whistleblower activity gained importance in the United States during the Civil War with the passage of the False Claims Act in 1863 that allows whistleblowers to receive a share of the civil penalties collected for fraud against the government. Yet legal protections for the rights of whistleblowers developed slowly. In 1986, the False Claims Act was amended to provide whistleblowers acting in good faith protection from retaliation. Most states and several industries have also enacted whistleblower protection laws, yet there is wide variance in both the protections offered and the requirements necessary to qualify for protection. Courts have provided federal, state, and local government whistleblowers protection under the Civil Rights Act of 1871, First and Fourteenth Amendments, and witness protection laws. Whistleblowers in the private sector have only recently received protections through the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. In 1989, Congress eased the whistleblower's burden of proof by establishing the "contributing factor test," which requires only that retaliation be a contributing factor in a discriminatory action, not the primary factor. Yet whistleblowers' rights often remain unprotected because the whistleblowers are uninformed or caught in myriad contradicting laws.

KATHLEEN BARRETT

References and Further Reading

- Barnett, Tim. Overview of State Whistleblower Protection Statute, Labor Law Journal 43 (1998): 440–448.
- Hamilton, James, and Ted Trautmann. Sarbanes-Oxley Manual: A Handbook for the Act and SEC Rules. Chicago: CCH Incorporated, 2003.
- Kohn, Stephen M. Concepts and Procedures in Whistleblower Law. Westport, CT: Quorum Books, 2001.
- Kohn, Stephen M., and Michael D. Kohn. The Labor Lawyer's Guide to the Rights and Responsibilities of Employee Whistleblowers. Westport, CT: Quorum Books, 1988.
- Kohn, Stephen M., Michael D. Kohn, and David K. Colapinto. Whistleblower Law. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2004.

- Lander, Guy P. What Is Sarbanes–Oxley? New York: McGraw-Hill, 2004.
- Ryan, David J., The False Claims Act: An Old Weapon with New Firepower Is Aimed at Health Care Fraud, Annals of Health Law 4 (1995): 127–150.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Civil Rights Act, Act of 1871, c. 22, 17 Stat. 13
- False Claims Act, Act of March 2, 1863, c. 67, 12 Stat. 696
- Sarbanes–Oxley Act, Act of July 30, 2002, Pub. L. 107–204, 116 Stat. 745

See also Freedom of Contract; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present)

WHITE COURT (1911–1921)

The U.S. Supreme Court was guided by the leadership of Chief Justice Edward Douglass White from January 1911 to May 1921. A total of eleven justices served on the Court during what has been described by some as a time of transition in the Court's role in interpreting and applying the U.S. Constitution. Much of the Court's time was taken up with issues related to the growth and expansion of business—antitrust cases, regulation of commerce, and consideration of the rights of labor. At the same time, however, the Court issued rulings on a variety of social issues, including the reach of the national police power and the constitutionality of a number of Jim Crow policies. World War I raised issues concerning the expansion of the government's power during wartime, and gave the Court the opportunity to rule on circumstances under which civil liberties might be curtailed. It could be said that the White Court laid the groundwork for the broader role the Court would assume in subsequent decades.

Edward Douglass White, who had been appointed to the U.S. Supreme Court in 1894 by President Grover Cleveland, in 1910 became the first associate justice to be promoted to the chief justiceship. Selected by then-President William Howard Taft, he assumed the new role in January 1911, and presided for the next eleven years. The Court he led saw service by a total of twelve other justices, including John Marshall Harlan (1877–1911), Joseph McKenna (1898–1925), Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. (1902–1932), William R. Day (1903–1922), Horace Lurton (1909–1914), Charles Evans Hughes (1910–1916), Willis Van Devanter (1910–1937), Joseph R. Lamar (1911–1916), Mahlon Pitney (1912–1922), James McReynolds (1914–1941), Louis Brandeis (1916–1939), and John H. Clarke (1916–1922).

Much of the time during the early years of the White Court was consumed by cases concerning government regulation of big business. The Court made final rulings in 1911 in two major antitrust cases begun several years earlier. Its ruling in Standard Oil Company v. United States (1911) was regarded as a turning point in interpretation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act because it came down on the side of business by establishing the “rule of reason,” which decreed that only trusts that represented an unreasonable restraint of trade were to be considered in violation of the act. In a series of cases questioning the reach of the federal government in regulating interstate commerce, the White Court concluded that the Interstate Commerce Commission had broad powers, including the right to override competing state regulations under certain circumstances.

The White Court's rulings on issues related to labor provided some victories for workers, but as often sided with management. On the one hand, in upholding the Employers' Liability Law in 1912, the Court recognized that factory owners bore some responsibility for the safety and well-being of their workers. They made another step forward on behalf of labor when they approved the ten-hour day in Bunting v. Oregon (1917). On the other hand, White and his fellow justices handed labor some major defeats in cases such as Coppage v. Kansas (1915), when they outlawed state laws barring the use of yellow dog contracts, and in Hammer v. Dagenhart (1918) when they invalidated the federal Keating–Owen Child Labor Act.

Challenges to a number of pieces of Progressive legislation gave the White Court opportunities to weigh in on the reach of national police power, and the power of Congress to legislate for the health, safety, and welfare of citizens. Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States (1911) resulted in a ruling upholding the pro-consumer Pure Food and Drug Act of 1906. The Mann Act, which was passed to prevent the transport of women across state lines for immoral purposes (prostitution), was upheld by the Court in Hoke v. United States (1913), and its interpretation broadened in Caminetti v. United States (1917).

Although only limited challenges to the then-pervasive Jim Crow policies limiting the rights of African Americans were raised during the early decades of the twentieth century, the White Court was able to strike out against a few egregious policies. In Bailey v. Alabama (1911) and United States v. Reynolds (1914), the Court outlawed the use of a system of debt peonage in the southern states. In Guinn and Beal v. United States (1915), the Court required the abandonment of the use of the grandfather clause, an antiquated means of preventing blacks from voting. Two decisions in 1914 and 1917 endeavored to place restrictions on segregation as a factor in the sale of property, and in limiting access to rail transportation.

WHITE COURT (1911–1921)

Government policy resulting from the entry of the United States into World War II raised a number of constitutional questions that eventually came before the White Court. Expansion of presidential and federal authority in areas such as implementation of a draft, regulation of means of transportation, and allocation of scarce resources all prompted questions. The White Court consistently upheld the authority of the federal government to do what it needed to do to prosecute the war effectively (Selective Service Draft Law Cases [1918], Northern Pacific Railway v. North Dakota [1919]), but also required Congress to be specific in outlining guidelines for the enforcement of the policies it established (United States v. Cohen Grocery Store [1921]). Several civil liberties issues arose as a result of the passage of the Espionage and Sedition Acts aimed at controlling criticism of the war effort. In a landmark decision in Schenck v. United States (1919), Justice Holmes approved restrictions on freedom of speech and press during wartime, establishing the “clear and present danger” doctrine as a guideline for determining when such restrictions were warranted. Subsequent decisions buttressed this ruling, although dissents by Holmes and Brandeis in Abrams v. United States (1919) laid out arguments that would provide the foundations for future defenses of broad protection for free speech.

Many of the White Court’s rulings reflected the thinking and the values and priorities of the times in which they were written. Although most did not establish long-term precedents in the areas under consideration, a number did establish foundations upon which future courts would build. The White Court era is not generally regarded as one of the most important in Supreme Court history, but its history does reflect many of the struggles besetting the nation and its judiciary as it moved toward accommodating itself to the rapid changes of the modern world.

REBECCA S. SHOEMAKER

References and Further Reading

- Bickel, Alexander M., and Benno C. Schmidt, Jr. The Judiciary and Responsible Government, 1910–21. New York: Macmillan, 1984.
- Highsaw, Robert B. Edward Douglass White. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1981.
- Shoemaker, Rebecca S. The White Court: Justices, Rulings, Legacy. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO Press, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. United States*, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
- Bailey v. Alabama*, 211 U.S. 452 (1911)

- Bunting v. Oregon*, 243 U.S. 246 (1917)
- Caminetti v. United States*, 242 U.S. 470 (1917)
- Coppage v. Kansas*, 236 U.S. 1 (1915)
- Guinn and Beal v. United States*, 238 U.S. 347 (1915)
- Hammer v. Dagenhart*, 247 U.S. 251 (1918)
- Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States*, 220 U.S. 45 (1911)
- Hoke v. United States*, 227 U.S. 308 (1913)
- Northern Pacific Railway v. North Dakota*, 236 U.S. 585 (1919)
- Schenck v. United States*, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
- Selective Draft Law Cases*, 245 U.S. 366 (1918)
- Standard Oil Co. v. United States*, 221 U.S. 1 (1911)
- United States v. L. Cohen Grocery Company*, 255 U.S. 81 (1921)
- United States v. Reynolds*, 235 U.S. 133 (1914)

See also Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Clear and Present Danger Test; Harlan, John Marshall, the Elder; Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; Interstate Commerce; McReynolds, James C.; Sherman Act; World War I, Civil Liberties in

WHITE, BYRON RAYMOND (1917–2002)

Byron Raymond White’s path to Supreme Court Justice is that of a storybook tale. Born and raised in the farming community of Wellington in north-central Colorado, Byron White’s trajectory began as valedictorian of his high school class of six students. He attended the University of Colorado where he was president of the student body, and valedictorian of his university class; along the way, he earned ten varsity letters in football, basketball, and baseball. On the gridiron, Byron “Whizzer” White was also selected as a member of the 1937 All-American football team as a running back and punter and named runner-up for the collegiate football’s most prestigious award, the Heisman Trophy after leading his team to the Cotton Bowl.

After completing his undergraduate studies, Byron White was selected as a Rhodes Scholar in 1939 to attend Oxford, and later received his law degree from Yale, graduating at the top of his class; he also played three seasons of professional football being named Rookie of the Year and leading the league in rushing twice.

White’s law studies were interrupted by World War II, in which he served as a naval intelligence officer, which included investigating the sinking of PT Boat 109, the boat captained by future president of the United States, John F. Kennedy. White also survived two kamikaze attacks on ship Bunker Hill and then the attack on the Enterprise.

After graduating magna cum laude from Yale Law School, Byron White clerked for Chief Justice Fred Vinson of the U.S. Supreme Court before returning to Denver to practice law for fourteen years. White was to become the first Supreme Court clerk to subsequently become a Supreme Court Justice himself.

While in private practice, he was chosen by Robert Kennedy to head the National Citizens for Kennedy Committee in the presidential campaign against Richard Nixon. Soon thereafter, he was asked to go to Washington, D.C., as a deputy attorney general of the United States. While in that position, he became involved in leading the federal marshals in the protection of the civil rights of the Alabama Freedom Riders in Montgomery, Alabama.

In 1961, President John Kennedy nominated Byron White, who was forty-four at the time, to the U.S. Supreme Court to succeed Justice Charles Evans Whittaker who left the Court due to illness. Justice White served in that capacity for thirty-one years from 1961 to 1993 as part of a Court that addressed some of the most momentous issues of the twentieth century that set the social and political agenda for the nation, ranging from cases on segregation within schools, school prayer, Fifth Amendment implications and Miranda v. Arizona (1966), the Watergate tapes, the Pentagon papers, abortion, consensual homosexual relations, and the constitutionality of the death penalty. White's judicial philosophy cannot be placed solely in any one category in that how he viewed an issue would often be as unpredictable and as varied as were the issues that came before the Court during this tumultuous period in American history.

As a critic of Roe v. Wade (1973) with a strongly worded dissent, White appeared to be critical of the substantive due process analysis, but then clearly recognized the right of privacy in Griswold v. Connecticut (1965) by striking down laws against contraception. White also authored the opinion in the now-defunct Bowers v. Hardwick (1986) upholding Georgia's antisodomy laws stating that "proscriptions against [sodomy] have ancient roots" and "sodomy was a criminal offense at common law and was forbidden by the laws of the original 13 states when they ratified the Bill of Rights."

Justice White's view on the death penalty varied over time; he joined five other justices in Furman v. Georgia (1972) striking down many state death penalty statutes, but later upheld a capital punishment sentence of death in Gregg v. Georgia (1976). Justice White also struck down a death sentence in Coker v. Georgia (1977), which had imposed a death sentence for a conviction of rape requiring that all punishments be proportional to the crime as prescribed by the Eighth Amendment.

While Justice White's jurisprudence spread across the jurisprudential spectrum from conservative to liberal, he also wrote one of the more poignant rulings in United States v. Wade (1967) describing a criminal defense lawyer's duties: while law enforcement has "the obligation to convict the guilty and to make sure they do not convict the innocent," criminal defense counsel has no "comparable obligation to ascertain or present the truth."

Our system assigns [defense counsel] a different mission. He must be and is interested in preventing the conviction of the innocent, but, absent a voluntary plea of guilty, we also insist that he defend his client whether he is innocent or guilty.... If he can confuse a witness, even a truthful one, or make him appear at a disadvantage, unsure or indecisive, that will be his normal course.... In this respect, as part of our modified adversary system and as part of the duty imposed on the most honorable defense counsel, we countenance the required conduct which in many instances has little, if any, relation to the search for truth.

Upon his retirement in 1993 from the bench, President Bill Clinton appointed Ruth Bader Ginsburg to succeed White.

ROBERT DON GIFFORD

References and Further Reading

- Bell, Bernard W., Judging in Interesting Times: The Free Speech Clause Jurisprudence of Justice Byron R. White, Catholic University Law Review 52 (2002–2003): 893.
- , The Populism of Justice Byron R. White: Media Cases and Beyond, University of Colorado Law Review 74 (2003): 1425.
- Hutchinson, Dennis J. The Man Who Once Was Whizzer White: A Portrait of Justice Byron R. White. New York: Free Press, 1998.
- Ides, Allan, The Jurisprudence of Justice Byron White, Yale Law Journal, 103 (1993–1994): 419.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bowers v. Hardwick*, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
- Coker v. Georgia*, 433 U.S. 584 (1977)
- Furman v. Georgia*, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
- Gregg v. Georgia*, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- United States v. Wade*, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)

WHITNEY v. CALIFORNIA, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)

Whitney v. California is one of the half-dozen most important free speech cases ever decided by the U.S. Supreme Court. Its significance, however, lies less in the Court's actual decision than in the separate concurring opinion filed by Justice Louis D. Brandeis.

Brandeis's eloquent discourse on the meaning and importance of free speech in a democratic society has inspired civil libertarians ever since, and his First Amendment views occupy a prominent place in the firmament of American constitutional law.

Anita Whitney, suffragist and political radical, was convicted in 1920 under California's Criminal Syndicalism Act for her role—de minimis, as it turned out—in the formation of the Communist Labor Party in 1919. Such state "criminal syndicalism" statutes, which punished organization of or membership in an association advocating the use of violence to effect industrial or political change, proliferated in the years after U.S. entry into World War I. These statutes reflected the hostility to antiwar activism and fear of "alien" ideologies that inspired the infamous "red scare" of 1919–1920. Particularly in the western states, they were also a response to labor militancy, heralded by the increasing influence of the Industrial Workers of the World.

In affirming Whitney's conviction, the Supreme Court continued its pattern, first established in a series of cases in 1919, of upholding the constitutionality of state and federal statutes that punished seditious or subversive speech. In a series of dissenting opinions beginning in 1919, Justices Louis Brandeis and Oliver Wendell Holmes had unsuccessfully argued that the "clear and present danger" test, first devised in 1919 by Holmes as a way of reconciling First Amendment principles with government powers of self-preservation in times of war, barred the government from criminalizing speech in any but the most pressing circumstances. In his separate opinion (really a dissent, although labeled a concurrence for technical reasons) in Whitney, however, Brandeis went further and gave American free speech jurisprudence an impassioned theoretical and historical defense, rooted in venerable democratic principles.

Holmes had written eloquently in 1919 of the importance of allowing truth to emerge from an unfettered "marketplace" of ideas, but this image, like many deployed by Holmes, had coldly Darwinian overtones. Brandeis's more ebullient language in Whitney suggested that the exercise of free speech was essential to the health of a functioning deliberative democracy. To Brandeis, "[T]he greatest menace to freedom is an inert people.... [P]ublic discussion is a political duty." Thus, freedom of speech required the utmost protection, not only to safeguard the individual's thoughts and beliefs from governmental intrusion, but more importantly to make enlightened self-government possible. Brandeis's words reflected his admiration for the society of ancient Athens, in which he saw a democracy that rested on the virtue of a courageous citizenry.

In Whitney, Brandeis ascribed his majestic vision of free speech to the founders, a move as rhetorically effective as it was historically romantic:

Those who won our independence believed that the final end of the state was to make men free to develop their faculties, and that in its government the deliberative forces should prevail over the arbitrary.... They believed liberty to be the secret of happiness and courage to be the secret of liberty. They believed that freedom to think as you will and to speak as you think are means indispensable to the discovery and spread of political truth.

Less noticed amid his soaring language was Brandeis's careful and extensive reshaping of Holmes's "clear and present danger" test, construing the words "clear," "present," and "danger" so restrictively as to establish an extraordinarily high threshold for the constitutionality of governmental prohibitions of or punishment for speech.

Brandeis's separate opinion in Whitney exerted no immediate legal authority; of the other justices, only Holmes joined his opinion. But, with the advent of a more liberal Supreme Court in the 1930s and 1940s and greater public consciousness about the importance of free expression, the First Amendment views of Holmes and Brandeis were transformed within a generation into settled law. The apotheosis of Brandeis's Whitney opinion came in the 1969 case of Brandenburg v. Ohio, in which the Court explicitly overruled the decision in Whitney and struck down Ohio's criminal syndicalism statute, based largely on the arguments advanced by Brandeis in his Whitney concurrence. The "clear and present danger" test has largely disappeared from free speech jurisprudence, replaced by more refined analyses addressed to a new and different set of free speech problems. But Brandeis's opinion in Whitney remains the central twentieth-century judicial text in the American free-speech canon.

CLYDE SPILLINGER

References and Further Reading

- Blasi, Vincent, The First Amendment and the Ideal of Civic Courage: The Brandeis Opinion in Whitney v. California, William & Mary Law Review, 29 (1988): 653–697.
- Cover, Robert M., The Left, the Right, and the First Amendment: 1918–1928, Maryland Law Review, 40 (1981): 349–388.
- Kalven, Harry, A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.
- Strum, Philippa. Louis D. Brandeis: Justice for the People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1984.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brandenburg v. Ohio*, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)

WILLIAM PENN'S CASE (1670)

In 1670, William Penn, then twenty-six years old and living in London, was charged with sedition against the Crown, and if found guilty would have been executed. Penn had objected to the so-called Conventicle Act, that prohibited any “tumultuous assembly,” meaning any religious gathering, from meeting outside the Church of England. In a deliberate challenge to the law, Penn preached a sermon at Grace Church in London, which officials dubbed a “tumultuous assembly,” and promptly arrested him.

At the time, defendants charged with a crime could not have a lawyer represent them, so Penn defended himself in the trial at the Old Bailey. The judges included the lord mayor of London, and twelve citizens of the city were chosen as jurors. Because Penn had a transcript made of the trial proceedings, and later published it, we have an idea of what happened.

The judges thought the trial would be simple. Did Penn preach at Grace Church? If he did (and the facts made it quite clear that he had), then he would be guilty and the case would be over. By law, the mere fact of his preaching, by definition, had caused a “tumultuous assembly.”

But the twelve jurors apparently did not like the law, nor how the judges treated Penn. Because of his ability to question the judges on fine points of law, the court locked Penn in the “bale dock,” where the jury could hear but no longer see him.

The jury reached a unanimous verdict: “Guilty of speaking in Grace Church.” But this was not what Penn had been charged with, and the lord mayor shouted at the jury, “Was it not an unlawful assembly? You mean he was speaking to a tumult of people there?” No, the jury replied, we did not find that.

The court was furious, and the bailiff told the jury:

Gentlemen, you will not be dismissed until you bring in a verdict which the court will accept. You shall be locked up, without meat, drink, fire and tobacco. You shall not think thus to abuse the court. We will have a verdict by the help of God or you shall starve for it.

But the charge only stiffened the jurors’ resolve, and after two days the court ended the trial without accepting the verdict. It fined the jurors and sent them to Newgate prison, where they were to remain until they paid their fines. But four of the jurors, led by the foreman, Edward Bushell, refused to give in. Nine weeks passed, and finally England’s high court intervened. The lord chief justice freed the jurors in response to Bushell’s application for a writ of habeas corpus, the first time that the High Court of Common Pleas had ever issued the writ.

The courage of the jurors changed English legal history, and helped to establish the independence of the jury from domination by the Crown. In many ways, Penn’s case is one of the first recorded instances of “jury nullification,” where a jury refuses to find guilt because they disagree with the law.

In the colony that Penn founded in America, Penn reserved the death penalty only for murder and treason; at the time of his case, over two hundred different crimes in England, many of them political in nature, could warrant the death penalty. He also started the movement to free religious dissent from the label of sedition.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

Bushell's Case, 6 Howell's State Trials 999 (1670).
Dunn, Mary Maples. William Penn, Politics and Conscience. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1967.

WILLIAMS, ROGER (1603–1683)

Roger Williams, clergyman, founder of Rhode Island, and one of the first proponents of religious toleration and separation of church and state, was born sometime between 1599 and 1603. The son of a merchant tailor, he was educated at Pembroke College, Cambridge. Although ordained as a clergyman in the Church of England, he agreed with the Puritans that the Reformation in England had not gone far enough to rid the church of its Romish errors. Shunned by the Church of England’s hierarchy, he sailed in 1631 to join John Winthrop and the Puritan settlers in Massachusetts. The colony welcomed him warmly, and offered him the pastorate of the first Puritan church in Boston. Although acknowledging the honor, he declined the invitation on the grounds that he believed the Puritans should break openly with the Church of England and go their separate way. He moved from Boston to New Plymouth and later to Salem, where he farmed, traded, and preached to the Indians, all the while growing more convinced that the civil authorities lacked any power to compel religious conformity. Only God could command men’s consciences, and for the state to force people to honor the Sabbath amounted to “forced worship,” which “stinks in God’s nostrils.”

These views challenged not only prevalent thought but the very legitimacy of established churches, so the Massachusetts elders put him on trial for heresy in 1635 and found him guilty. He and twenty of his followers then fled to what is now Bristol, Rhode Island, in the winter of 1636; that spring, with the gift of land from local tribes, Williams established a settlement he named Providence.

While Williams believed in freedom of individual conscience, one cannot label him as a liberal in the modern sense. He was a man of his own times, a devout Christian who, as much as John Cotton and the Puritan divines, wanted one true religion. Unlike Cotton, however, Williams did not believe that he had found that faith, and so long as he had not, then he could not impose his will on others or force them to believe and worship in a particular manner.

Williams laid out his design for Rhode Island in 1644, when he published The Bloudy Tenent of Persecution, For Cause of Conscience, discussed in A Conference betweene Truth and Peace. Williams envisioned a Christian commonwealth in which all religious persuasions would be allowed to practice freely, while the civil authority rested in a separate realm. No religious body would dominate the civil government, and the magistrates would act according to the dictates of their individual consciences. Such a commonwealth, Williams maintained, could tolerate a great range of individual beliefs, even those of Jews, Muslims, and the most radical Christians at the time, Quakers.

In one of his most famous idioms, in his Letter to Providence (1655), he wrote:

It hath fallen out sometimes, that both Papists and Protestants, Jews and Turks, may be embarked upon one ship: upon which supposal I affirm, that all the liberty of conscience, that ever I pleaded for, turns upon these two hinges—that none of the Papists, Protestants, Jews, or Turks, be forced to come to the ship's prayers or worship, nor be compelled from their own particular prayers or worship.

In fact, the charter issued to Williams for Rhode Island by Charles II in 1663 made clear that they envisioned a colony “pursuing, with peaceable and loyal minds, their sober, serious and religious intentions, of godly edifying themselves, and one another, in the holy Christian faith and worship.” Nonetheless, the charter did allow that no one would be molested or otherwise persecuted “for any differences in opinion in matters of religion.” But the charter then emphasized that the colonists had the authority to defend themselves, not only to protect their property and rights, but against “all the enemies of the Christian faith.” While Charles II stood prepared to allow a small number of dissidents in a faraway land relatively wide latitude in religious observances, and to forego having the Church of England established there, he and the royal government still saw Williams and Rhode Island as Christian, and commanded to stay that way.

Williams, a true Christian in his own beliefs, wanted to welcome Jews and others because, in the end, he hoped to convert them to “the principles of Christianity and civility.” If Jews came to Rhode Island, Williams maintained, they would not be turned away, and neither would they be molested in their religious observances. They could never be full citizens, however, until they saw the light and converted to Christianity. Williams had a similar attitude toward Quakers, who had established a small settlement on Aquidneck Island (site of present-day Newport). In a tract entitled George Foxx Digg'd Out of His Burrowes (1676), Williams equated Quaker beliefs with Judaism and Catholicism as a means of discrediting the Friends' theology. God's grace, he wrote, “is a mystery which neither Jews nor Turks, Atheists or Papists, or Quakers know.”

Williams wanted to establish peace among the various Christian sects, and his references to Jews and Turks served as a simple rhetorical device. If even Jews and Muslims could live in peace, then so should the various Christian denominations be able to mute their differences for the sake of civil harmony. Governments had the right to impose and enforce rigorous standards for civil behavior, but they had no right to meddle in matters of conscience. Thus, when dealing with Catholics, whom Williams and many other Protestants believed could never be good citizens of a state because they owed their first allegiance to the Pope, the state could require that Catholics wear distinctive clothing and be prohibited from carrying arms, even while allowed to freely practice their religion. In modern terms, Jews, Muslims, Quakers, and other groups would enjoy toleration but not liberty.

Williams also articulated a basic principle that would be at the heart of the religious liberty that developed in the United States, the separation of church and state. So long as the state maintained an established church, there could be no freedom of religion for those who did not adhere to the teachings of that church. Dissenters might be tolerated, or even welcomed into the colony, but they would know that they would be taxed to support values contrary to their own, and at all times stood in peril that church aligned with state would move against their beliefs, their property, or even their lives.

In arguing for separation, Williams contributed a powerful metaphor that still carries enormous intellectual as well as constitutional significance, and which for many people is still a touchstone in their thinking about church–state relations:

When they have opened a gap in the hedge of or wall of separation between the garden of the church, and the wilderness of the world, God hath ever broken down the wall itself ... and made his garden a wilderness, as at this day. And that therefore if He will ever please to restore

His garden and paradise again, it must of necessity be walled in peculiarly unto Himself from the world.

For Williams, God's garden—the church—had to be protected against the secular world—the wilderness—or else its unique features would be destroyed. Where some people, such as Thomas Jefferson, wanted to keep church and state separate in order to protect the state from clericalism, Williams wanted separation in order to keep the church pure from the profane nature of the state and secular society.

The importance of separating church and state has always been clear to minorities, but over time people began to understand that such an alliance worked against the interests of both church and state, as well as against individual conscience. Without separation, not only could the church demand that the state enforce its orthodoxy, but the state could—as history had shown countless times—demand that the religious authorities enforce its programs as well. This vision of separation of church and state would remain as Roger Williams's greatest legacy.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Gausted, Edwin S. Liberty of Conscience: Roger Williams in America. Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1999.
- Miller, Perry. Roger Williams: His Contribution to the American Tradition. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1953.
- Morgan, Edmund S. Roger Williams, the Church and the State. New York: Harcourt, Brace and World, 1967.

WILSON v. LAYNE, 526 U.S. 603 (1999)

Wilson v. Layne considered whether the presence of media during the execution of a search warrant violated the petitioner's Fourth Amendment rights. Also at issue was whether the police officers had qualified immunity.

In this case, the petitioner's son was the target of a national fugitive apprehension program in which U.S. Marshals worked alongside state and local police. Marshals invited two members of the media to accompany them as part of their ride-along policy, although the warrants did not mention media presence. While executing the warrant at the petitioner's home, a confrontation ensued between police and petitioner, while the photographer took numerous pictures. When the police learned that the son was not present, they departed. The petitioner sued.

The standard for bringing third parties along in executing search warrants is whether their presence was in aid of the warrant's execution. The Fourth Amendment requires that police actions in execution of a warrant be related to the objectives of the authorized intrusion (Arizona v. Hicks [1987]).

Although the Court did not dispute the respondents' argument that bringing members of the media along served a legitimate law enforcement purpose, the standard is whether the presence of third parties furthers the purpose of the search. Because there was no such purpose, the Court held that the petitioner's rights were violated.

The Court then turned to whether the police officers were immune from liability. Whether an official with qualified immunity may be held personally liable "turns on the objective reasonableness of the action assessed in light of the legal rules that were 'clearly established' at the time it was taken" (Anderson v. Creighton [1987]). Because there was no controlling authority on this issue and the officers reasonably relied on the Marshal's ride-along policy, the legal rules were not "clearly established" and police were therefore entitled qualified immunity.

EMILY R. FROMSON

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Anderson v. Creighton*, 483 U.S. 635, 639 (1987)
- Arizona v. Hicks*, 480 U.S. 321, 325 (1987)

See also Privacy; Freedom of the Press The Modern Period (1917–Present); Search (General Definition)

WILSON, WOODROW (1856–1924)

Woodrow Wilson, the twenty-eighth president of the United States, is considered by some historians as the quintessential progressive, a man who opposed big business, favored laws that would help workers, fought against government favors to special interests, and nominated Louis D. Brandeis to the Supreme Court. Yet he was also the product of his southern upbringing, a man who approved segregation in the federal government workforce, applauded the movie "Birth of a Nation," and saw patriotism as overriding free speech and the right to dissent.

There is little in Wilson's career as a university professor, college president, or governor of New Jersey that involved civil liberties. One might argue that he did show signs of liberalism during his presidency of Princeton University, as he worked to lessen the grip of sectarianism on the school. He expanded the student body to include young men from all over the country and from many different religious persuasions, although no African American would be enrolled until the 1940s. He broke the grip of Presbyterianism on the faculty, drew in men of all Protestant denominations, and appointed the first Catholic and the first Jew to the Princeton faculty. He tried, but failed, to dislodge the exclusive eating clubs and replace them with a more democratic quadrangle system.

During the 1912 campaign, Theodore Roosevelt endorsed women's suffrage, and Wilson, as did most southerners, opposed it. Wilson, two of whose daughters were suffragists, eventually came around to the idea, and provided critical support in getting the Nineteenth Amendment through both houses of Congress. Once inaugurated as president in March 1913, Wilson filled his cabinet with southerners who shared assumptions about the inferiority of the black race. Led by Postmaster Albert Burleson, they introduced segregation into their departments. Although Wilson did not initiate these discriminatory policies, he did not attempt to stop them, believing that the daily management of government agencies belonged in the hands of department heads. Strong protests by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People succeeded in halting the effort, but the number and status of African Americans employed in the federal service fell drastically during Wilson's eight years.

Although Wilson tried to avoid American involvement in World War I, eventually the United States entered the war on the side of the Allies, and once the nation entered hostilities, the government launched the largest federal assault on civil liberties in the country's history. Although some Wilson biographers have placed the blame for these attacks on heavy-handed men like Burleson and Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer, Wilson did nothing to stop them. In fact, his own attack on Republicans in the 1918 congressional election—an attack that backfired when he implied that Republicans had not been loyal supporters of the war—is a better reflection of a man who could not accept criticism of his policies, and often took the approach that if a person or organization did not support him and his policies, then they were enemies.

Ironically, the war to make the world safe for democracy triggered the worst invasion of civil liberties at home in the nation's history. Not all Americans supported entry into the war, and in fairness, initial calls to crack down on dissidents came from Theodore Roosevelt and conservatives in the Republican Party. But Wilson, most of his cabinet, and congressional Democrats quickly endorsed a legislative program designed to stifle dissent and punish leftist thinkers, especially if they were not yet full citizens and could be deported.

The government obviously had to protect itself from subversion, but many of the laws seemed aimed as much at suppressing radical criticism of administration policy as at ferreting out spies. In the Selective Service Act, Congress authorized the jailing of people who obstructed the draft. The Espionage Act of 1917, aimed primarily against treason, also punished anyone making or conveying false reports for the benefit of the enemy, seeking to cause disobedience in the armed services, or obstructing recruitment or enlistment in the armed forces. The postmaster general received power in the Trading with the Enemy Act of 1917 to ban foreign language and other publications from the mails. The 1918 Sedition Act, passed at the behest of Western senators and modeled after Montana's statute to curb the Industrial Workers of the World, struck out at a variety of "undesirable" activities, and forbade "uttering, printing, writing, or publishing any disloyal, profane, scurrilous, or abusive language." Finally, the Alien Act of 1918 permitted the deportation of alien anarchists or those who believed in the use of force to overthrow the government.

It is certainly understandable that a government should wish to protect itself from active subversion, especially during wartime. But the evidence indicates that Wilson, preoccupied first with mobilization and then with peace making, gave little thought to the problem, and deferred to some of his conservative advisers, especially Postmaster General Albert Burleson, a reactionary who considered any criticism of the government unpatriotic. There is a suspicion that in coming down so hard on socialist newspapers, such as the Milwaukee Leader, Burleson intended to send a message to the larger, more middle-class journals that they should not get too far out of line.

The federal laws and similar state statutes caught radicals, pacifists, and other dissenters in an extensive web. The total number of indictments ran into the thousands; the attorney general reported 877 convictions out of 1,956 cases commenced in 1919 and 1920. Although the laws had been challenged early, the government had shown no desire to push for a quick decision on their constitutionality. As a result, some half-dozen cases did not reach the Supreme Court until the spring of 1919, after the end of hostilities.

These cases marked the beginning of a civil liberties tradition in American constitutional law. There had been no such tradition prior to the war, because neither the states nor the federal government had seriously restricted First Amendment rights. These cases also began the process of developing criteria for permissible limitations on speech; the dissents of Holmes and Brandeis initiated the counterprocess by which the courts ultimately became the defenders of civil liberties against the executive and legislative branches.

The speech and press cases of 1919–1920 foreshadowed the indifference to civil liberties that marked so much of the 1920s. With the peace, for example, thirty-two states enacted new sedition and criminal syndicalism laws to control supposedly dangerous ideas. But the worst outrage came with the Palmer raids, which triggered the great “red scare.”

The awkward transition from war to peace unsettled the American people. The Wilson administration, obsessed with foreign affairs after the 1918 armistice, made no effort to effect a smooth demobilization. The War Department, for example, canceled hundreds of contracts, throwing thousands of men out of work at the same time that the armed forces were discharging some 4,000 men a day from uniform. Industry used the end of the war as an excuse to cut wages or negate union recognition. As a result, some four million workers went out on strike in 1919, and by the end of the year, the public began to hear—and believe—rumors that radicals had instigated the strikes. Aside from economic strife, the summer of 1919 also witnessed bloody racial riots in both the North and South.

Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer, a Pennsylvania Quaker and formerly a Progressive congressman, saw radical plots everywhere. He urged Congress to enact peacetime sedition laws, and he decided to deport radical aliens. In June 1919, Palmer installed the young J. Edgar Hoover as head of the new General Intelligence Division of the Bureau of Investigation, with orders to collect files on radicals. On November 7, 1919, agents began raiding the headquarters of suspected subversive groups, arresting people without warrants and paying little attention to basic procedural rights. In the largest raid, on January 2, 1920, agents arrested between four and six thousand people, and detained half of them in crowded jails for long periods of time. Later that month, the New York Assembly ousted five duly elected members because they were socialists.

Fortunately for the country, the red scare receded almost as quickly as it had come. Palmer overplayed his hand, and after the widespread disruptions he had predicted for May Day 1920 failed to materialize, his credibility—and his hopes for the Democratic presidential nomination—vanished. Acting Secretary of Labor Louis F. Post managed to slow down the deportations, while prominent conservatives such as Charles Evans Hughes, as well as church and civic leaders, spoke out against the high-handed abuse of civil liberties.

How much, if anything, Wilson knew about this is hard to say. Preoccupied with trying to get the Treaty of Versailles ratified, Wilson had gone on a long campaign tour to win over the American people, and had suffered a serious stroke in September 1919. Incapacitated for several months, day-to-day decisions were either left in the hands of the cabinet or made by Wilson’s wife and his physician, Admiral Cary Grayson. But given his indifference to civil liberties during the war, and his hostility to criticism at all times, it is hard to say whether Wilson would have attempted to curb Palmer’s excesses. However laudable his vision of a world order may have been, Wilson’s record protecting the civil liberties of American citizens is atrocious.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Clements, Kendrick A. The Presidency of Woodrow Wilson. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1992.
 Cooper, John Milton, Jr. The Warrior and the Priest: Woodrow Wilson and Theodore Roosevelt. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983.
 Link, Arthur S. Woodrow Wilson: Revolution, War and Peace. Arlington Heights, IL: AMH Publishing, 1979.

WIRETAPPING LAWS

For more than half a century, federal and state governments have struggled to protect communications privacy against private wiretappers and snoops, and to spell out when law enforcement officials should be permitted to wiretap and eavesdrop. In 1968, with these two goals in mind, Congress enacted Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act (18 U.S.C. Section 2510 et seq.). States were authorized to pass similar statutes, and most, but not all, have done so. The statute has been amended and supplemented several times to reflect developments in communications technology, politics and national security. For example, the Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986 added “electronic communications” to the statute. Inevitably, however, technological advances quickly make aspects of the law outmoded.

Exceptions to General Ban

Title III and the 1986 Act make it a felony to intercept (that is, to electronically overhear, record, or download) a “wire communication” (that is, a phone conversation), an “oral communication” (that is, a face-to-face conversation), or an “electronic communication” (e-mail, use of the Internet, etc.). It is also a crime to knowingly use or disclose the contents of an unlawfully intercepted communication. Moreover, anyone who violates the statute can also be sued for monetary damages by the victim.

There are, however, several significant exceptions to this general ban.

Law enforcement officials are permitted to intercept a communication on their own authority, so long as a participant consents in advance (18 U.S.C. Section 2511(2)(c)). Thus, undercover officers, and informants and crime victims acting with the police, can secretly tape record their telephone and face-to-face conversations with the targets of an investigation. Most state laws provide the same. Section 2511(2)(d) permits a private person to do the same, on her own, so long as her purpose is not to commit a crime or a tort. Some state laws provide likewise; others forbid non-law enforcement interceptions unless all participants consent.

Although the statutes are silent on the matter, most courts have agreed that a parent who is concerned about a child's welfare has the legal right to secretly monitor a child's phone calls and e-mails. A few courts have even held that the statute does not even apply where one spouse secretly records the other spouse's phone calls, although most courts reject this reading of the law.

The law recognizes various exceptions based on the technology used to transmit communications. These exceptions sometimes create strange inconsistencies. For example, it is unlawful for an employer to secretly monitor an employee's workplace phone calls unless the employer has a specific business justification for doing so. But the same employer, without any justification or excuse, may lawfully monitor all e-mails that employees send or receive on the company's system.

Law Enforcement Interception Orders

In Katz v. United States (1967), the Supreme Court held that wiretapping is a search and seizure subject to the Fourth Amendment, and in Berger v. New York (1968), it held that a judge could issue a wiretap warrant (known as an "interception order") only if the application for the order, and the order itself, complied with the Fourth Amendment requirements for a search warrant. Nevertheless, when Congress was debating whether to enact Title III, the issue was hotly debated. To forbid law enforcement wiretapping and eavesdropping altogether would virtually give immunity to some criminals. On the other hand, the surreptitious interception of voice, wire, and electronic communications is an extraordinary intrusion into privacy; if abused, it creates enormous potential for political espionage, blackmail, and threats to the freedom of expression.

Title III represents an attempt to strike the right balance between these often conflicting interests. The statute permits law enforcement officials to seek and a judge to issue an order authorizing interception of a suspect's communications for up to thirty days; such orders may be renewed. But an order may be obtained only if the application and order comply with the constitutional requirements specified in Berger. Moreover, Congress also added several additional provisions intended to limit such surveillance and protect the privacy of those targeted.

For example, unlike a search warrant, which may be obtained to investigate any crime, an interception order may be obtained only to investigate certain serious felonies.

Next, before a federal agent may apply to a judge for an interception order, the application must first be approved by a high-level attorney in the Department of Justice. Similarly, a state application must be made or approved by a high state official (for example, the state attorney general or a district attorney) before it can be submitted to a judge.

An interception application, like a search warrant must show probable cause that evidence of a particular crime or type of crime will be found. An interception application, however, must also demonstrate that "ordinary investigative procedures have been tried and failed, or would be unlikely to succeed, or would be too dangerous." Thus, an interception order cannot be a first or routine step in an investigation.

The order must direct the agents to "minimize the interception of communications not otherwise subject to interception," that is, to avoid, if possible, hearing and recording conversations that do not relate to the crimes being investigated.

Once a search warrant has been executed, the list of what was seized becomes a public record. By contrast, intercepted communications may be disclosed only in court or for legitimate law enforcement purposes.

Other Statutes

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) (50 U.S.C. Section 1801 et seq.) regulates (among other things) the use of electronic surveillance to gather "foreign intelligence information." Although evidence obtained by FISA surveillance may be used in court, this has happened only rarely.

Title III (18 U.S.C. Section 2701 et seq.) also protects electronically stored e-mails and the like from unauthorized access, although such protection is far less rigorous than that covering the actual interception of communications.

CLIFFORD S. FISHMAN

References and Further Reading

- Alberti, Anthony. Wiretaps: A Complete Guide for the Law and Criminal Justice Professional. San Francisco: Austin and Winfield, 1999.
- Fishman, Clifford S., and Anne McKenna. Wiretapping and Eavesdropping. 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1995, and 2005 supplement.
- Lapidus, Edith J. Eavesdropping on Trial. Rochelle Park, NJ: Hayden Book Company, 1974.
- Lyon, David. Surveillance After September 11. Malden, MA: Polity Press in association with Blackwell Publishers, 2003.
- O'Harrow, Robert, Jr. No Place to Hide. New York: Free Press, 2005.
- Parenti, Christian. The Soft Cage: Surveillance in America from Slavery to the War on Terror. New York: Basic Books, 2003.
- Stevens, Gina, and Charles Doyle. Privacy: Wiretapping and Electronic Surveillance. Huntington, NY: Nova Science, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Berger v. New York*, 388 U.S. 41 (1967)
- Katz v. United States*, 389 U.S. 347 (1967)

See also Berger v. New York, 388 U.S. 41 (1967); Electronic Surveillance, Technological Monitoring, and Dog Sniffs; Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967); Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (92 Stat. 3795); Patriot Act; Privacy

WISCONSIN v. MITCHELL, 508 U.S. 476 (1993)

Wisconsin v. Mitchell marked the first time that the Supreme Court upheld a bias crime statute. The defendant, Todd Mitchell, was a nineteen-year-old black man who directed and encouraged a number of young black men and boys to attack a fourteen-year-old white boy, Gregory Riddick. Mitchell selected Riddick solely on the basis of his race. Mitchell was convicted of aggravated battery for his role in the severe beating—a crime that carried a maximum sentence of two years under Wisconsin law. His crime also implicated the Wisconsin hate crime statute, which provided for the enhanced penalty of bias-motivated crimes. Under this statute, the potential penalty for an aggravated battery was increased by five years if the perpetrator of the assault selected his victim on the basis of the victim's race.

Mitchell challenged his conviction under the bias crime statute, claiming that the enhancement of his prison term was a violation of his right to freedom of expression under the First Amendment. The Wisconsin Supreme Court reversed the conviction in an opinion announced the day after R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul (1992) was decided by the U.S. Supreme Court, and adopted much the same approach as did Justice Scalia for the majority of the Court in R.A.V. The Wisconsin court held that the penalty enhancement law “punishes the defendant’s biased thought ... and thus encroaches upon First Amendment rights.”

The U.S. Supreme Court upheld Mitchell’s sentence, including the enhanced portion. In defending its bias crime statute from constitutional attack, Wisconsin seized upon the precise form and content of that statute and the fact that the statute punishes discriminatory selection of a victim. This provided a key element in Wisconsin’s argument that its statute withstood the holding in R.A.V. Wisconsin contended that R.A.V. was concerned with the regulation of expression. The Wisconsin bias crime statute proscribed not expression but conduct—the conduct of intentional discriminatory selection of a victim.

The Supreme Court in Wisconsin v. Mitchell largely based its decision on a speech–conduct distinction. Writing for a unanimous Court, Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote that “whereas the ordinance struck down in R.A.V. was explicitly directed at expression (i.e., ‘speech’ or ‘messages’), the statute in this case is aimed at conduct unprotected by the First Amendment.”

Although scholars have criticized the speech–conduct distinction as deeply flawed, the distinction did form the basis of the Court’s decision in Mitchell to uphold the Wisconsin bias crime law. Following Mitchell, states have defended the constitutionality of bias crime laws by arguing that their statutes do not interfere with the expression of prejudicial ideas, and are addressed solely to the implementation of those views in conduct. States have asserted their ability to differentiate speech from conduct, and to protect the former while punishing the latter.

FREDERICK M. LAWRENCE

Cases and Statutes Cited

- R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul* (1992)

WISCONSIN v. YODER, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)

In the fall of 1968, authorities in New Glarus, Wisconsin, charged three Amish fathers—Wallace Miller, Jonas Yoder, and Adin Yutzy—with violating Wisconsin’s compulsory school attendance statute, which required all children to attend school until they reached the age of sixteen. The district attorney alleged that the three Amish farmers had broken the law because, in keeping with their faith's traditions, they had stopped attending school once they turned fourteen.

The charges put the Amish in an awkward position. The defendants believed that they had done nothing wrong, but they were extraordinarily reluctant to resolve their disagreement with local authorities through litigation. The Amish have a long-standing aversion to "going to law," because it violates their faith's tradition of nonresistance. It was only after several months of indecision that Miller, Yoder, and Yutzy agreed to permit themselves to be represented by counsel in court.

William Ball, the attorney who defended the Amishmen, argued that application of the school attendance statute to the Amish violated their right to the free exercise of religion. To comply with the law, he claimed, the Amish would have to forsake their religious beliefs, which included a proscription against school attendance beyond the age of fourteen. Ball asserted that the First Amendment clearly protected the Amish from being forced to sacrifice their religious freedom. An argument focusing on parental rights formed the second prong of Ball's defense strategy. He claimed that the state's action was unconstitutional because it violated the right of the Amish defendants to direct the upbringing of their children. Ball insisted that two U.S. Supreme Court opinions supported the claims of the Amish in the Wisconsin school attendance case. The high court's opinion in Sherbert v. Verner (1963) provided strong judicial safeguards for religious liberty, and its ruling in Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925) furnished stout protections for the rights of parents.

But not all judicial precedent favored Ball and his clients. Throughout the New Glarus case, the state of Wisconsin pointed out that Amish parents living in other states had made similar challenges to the constitutionality of school attendance laws, and they had lost each time. (In the most recent of these cases, resolved just two years before the Wisconsin case went to trial, the Kansas Supreme Court had ruled against an Amish father.) The state also referred to language in several U.S. Supreme Court opinions that explicitly acknowledged its right to enforce education regulations, including statutes mandating school attendance. Some of these passages appeared in the same opinions that Defense Attorney Ball cited to bolster his arguments in favor of the Amish.

Ball attempted to refute the state's claims by mounting an exhaustive defense. He brought in expert witnesses from as far away as Philadelphia to testify on behalf of his clients. Their ranks included John Hostetler, the nation's leading scholarly authority on the Amish, and an expert on public school regulation from the University of Chicago. Although the state's case was far less impressive (Hostetler's testimony alone lasted longer), a judge found the three Amish men guilty of a misdemeanor and ordered them to pay a token fine of five dollars. But Ball and the New Glarus Amish had better luck when they appealed Wisconsin v. Yoder to the Wisconsin Supreme Court in 1971. With only one justice dissenting, it reversed the convictions of Miller, Yoder, and Yutzy.

To the consternation of the state legislature, which passed a resolution asking Attorney General Robert Warren to drop the case, the State of Wisconsin appealed this decision to the U.S. Supreme Court. Although his critics suggested otherwise, Warren was not bent on punishing Miller, Yoder, and Yutzy. He simply feared that an accommodation of the Amish might open the floodgates to a torrent of similar claims from members of other religious or secular groups. If that happened, he worried, the state's ability to regulate education—and thus ensure that all children received adequate schooling—might be swept away.

The U.S. Supreme Court handed down its ruling in Wisconsin v. Yoder on May 15, 1972. Citing the protections of religious liberty conferred by the First and Fourteenth Amendments, the justices affirmed the lower court's ruling in favor of Miller, Yoder, and Yutzy. The application of the compulsory attendance law to the New Glarus Amish was unconstitutional, Chief Justice Warren Burger wrote in the Court's majority opinion, in part because the record of the case amply demonstrated that its impact on their religious liberty was "not only severe, but inescapable, for the Wisconsin law affirmatively compels them, under threat of criminal sanction, to perform acts undeniably at odds with fundamental tenets of their religious beliefs."

Many observers have lauded Chief Justice Burger's opinion in Wisconsin v. Yoder as a signal moment for religious liberty. But some critics have insisted that the U.S. Supreme Court botched the case. A legion of scholarly observers has argued that the justices plainly flouted the First Amendment's establishment clause by conferring special judicial protections on members of a single religious faith. (It should be noted that the Supreme Court itself has not agreed with this particular line of criticism. In subsequent opinions, it generally has held that legislative or judicial accommodations of religious practices are consistent with the establishment clause.) Others have concluded that the high court, by focusing its attention on shielding the religious liberty of the Amish parents, neglected the interests of those most affected by the outcome of the case—Amish children. And some commentators have faulted the justices for failing to recognize the importance of the state’s long-standing interest in furnishing and regulating education. It is perhaps a testament to Yoder’s complexity that debates over its merits have continued long after the opinion lost much of its vitality as judicial precedent. After chipping away at it for several years, the Supreme Court essentially demolished Yoder’s religious liberty holding in its controversial opinion in Employment Division v. Smith (1990). Although the justices distinguished this ruling from Yoder (they noted that the Amish case involved parents’ rights as well as religious liberty), Smith nonetheless sharply restricted protections for religious practice.

SHAWN FRANCIS PETERS

References and Further Reading

- Kraybill, Donald. The Riddle of Amish Culture. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2001.
- Peters, Shawn Francis. The Yoder Case: Religious Liberty, Education, and Parental Rights. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.
- Smith, Steven D., Wisconsin v. Yoder and the Unprincipled Approach to Religious Freedom, Capital University Law Review 25 (1996): 805.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Pierce v. Society of Sisters*, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
- Sherbert v. Verner*, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)

WITTERS v. WASHINGTON DEPARTMENT OF SERVICES FOR THE BLIND, 474 U.S. 481 (1986)

Public funding of religious education implicates the establishment clause of the First Amendment, but it also raises issues of religious liberty. Such funding might impair religious voluntarism by encouraging religious over nonreligious educational alternatives. It might also intrude on the conscience of taxpayers who object to supporting religious beliefs they do not share. Conversely, the denial of funding can raise competing concerns. It might discourage religious choices, or at least deny equal respect to religious decisions and thereby impair the value of religious neutrality. Influenced by these and other constitutional values, the Supreme Court sometimes has ruled that the establishment clause precludes the funding of religious education. Since the 1980s, however, it increasingly has found such funding permissible. Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind, decided in 1986, provides an early example of this trend. It also exemplifies, more specifically, the Court’s general approval of neutral funding programs that extend aid to religious schools or colleges only indirectly, as a result of private choice.

In preparation for a religious career as a pastor, missionary, or youth director, Larry Witters was attending a private Christian college in Spokane, Washington. Because he suffered from progressive blindness, he was eligible for special financial aid under the terms of a Washington statute designed to “assist visually handicapped persons to overcome vocational handicaps.” Noting the religious nature of his education, however, the Washington Commission for the Blind denied Witters any aid, asserting that it would be unconstitutional for the commission to use “public funds to assist an individual in the pursuit of a career or degree in theology or related areas.” Witters sued for relief, but the Washington Supreme Court ruled against him, citing the establishment clause.

In a unanimous decision, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed. Writing for the Court, Justice Thurgood Marshall emphasized that the program of funding was neutral and nondiscriminatory. It did not target religion for special advantage. Instead, the aid was broadly available to students pursuing various careers. In addition, the aid was not in the form of “direct subsidies” to religious institutions. Instead, it was paid to the disabled students themselves, who transmitted it to the colleges of their choice. Thus, any aid that flowed to religious institutions did so “only as a result of the genuinely independent and private choices of aid recipients,” thereby avoiding any implication that the state itself was sponsoring or promoting religion.

Justice Marshall also noted that “no more than a minuscule amount of the aid awarded” under this program flowed to religious education. This factor was not critical to the Witters decision, however, a point that the Supreme Court reiterated in its 2002 decision in Zelman v. Simmons-Harris. In Zelman, the Court approved a neutrally drawn school vouchers program, even though most of the voucher parents were choosing religious schools. The Court cited Witters as a relevant precedent, suggesting that Witters now stands for the broad proposition that states generally are free, if they wish, to include religious education in neutrally drawn programs of indirect funding.

At the same time, the Supreme Court has made it clear in another recent decision, Locke v. Davey (2004), that the constitutional doctrine of Witters and Zelman is permissive, not mandatory. According to Locke, states—as a matter of state law—can maintain a stronger separation of church and state than that required by the establishment clause, and, in so doing, they have some discretion to exclude religious beneficiaries from funding programs even when the establishment clause would permit them to be included.

DANIEL O. CONKLE

References and Further Reading

Conkle, Daniel O. Constitutional Law: The Religion Clauses. New York: Foundation Press, 2003.
Nowak, John E., and Ronald D. Rotunda. Constitutional Law. 7th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712 (2004)
Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

See also Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses

WOLF v. COLORADO, 338 U.S. 25 (1949)

Dr. Wolf stood trial for conspiring with Mildred Cairo to perform an abortion. The prosecution sought to introduce Wolf's appointment book to show that Wolf and Cairo had been in contact. Wolf claimed that it had been seized in violation of Colorado law. The book was introduced over Wolf's objection and he was convicted.

Before the U.S. Supreme Court, Wolf's arguments relied on the 1914 case, Weeks v. United States. Here the Court created the exclusionary rule. Under this rule, illegally seized evidence could not be used in federal court. Wolf argued that the Fourteenth Amendment demanded that the rule be applied in state court as well.

In the Court's opinion, Justice Frankfurter wrote that the Fourth Amendment right to be free from illegal searches and seizures is "basic to a free society." Further, the states had an obligation, under the Fourteenth Amendment, to sanction the police when the police violated a citizen's rights. Frankfurter acknowledged that the exclusionary rule was one way to sanction the police for illegal searches and seizures, but he argued that this rule was not the only means to control such illegal activity and he declined to impose this approach on the states. The exclusionary rule was simply a judge-made remedy, not part of the Fourth Amendment. Further, he was persuaded by the fact that forty-seven states had considered the exclusionary rule and thirty had rejected it.

In 1961, Wolf v. Colorado was reversed by Mapp v. Ohio. Mapp applied the exclusionary rule to state courts.

KAY HENRIKSEN

References and Further Reading

Friendly, Fred W., and Martha J.H. Elliott. The Constitution—That Delicate Balance. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1984.
Hall, Kermit L., ed. The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
Urofsky, Melvin I. A March of Liberty—A Constitutional History of the United States. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914)

See also Bill of Rights: Structure; Due Process; Exclusionary Rule; Incorporation Doctrine

WOLMAN v. WALTER, 433 U.S. 229 (1977)

This case involved the perennial battle between those who believe the government may accommodate religion in a neutral way and those who fear that such accommodation opens the way for government establishment of religion.

In the 1970s, Ohio intended to provide non-public school pupils with (1) secular textbooks; (2) standardized testing, speech, hearing, psychological, therapeutic, career guidance, and remedial services; (3) instructional materials (such as maps) "incapable of diversion to religious use"; and (4) drivers and vehicles for secular field trips. Various anti-aid groups like the American Civil Liberties Union and Americans United for Separation of Church and State appealed to the Supreme Court, which pondered whether government could avoid endorsing religion while not discriminating against those who practice religion. The attempt to carve out neutral support for religious students ran afoul of "absolute separationists" who saw almost any form of aid to sectarian schools as eroding in the presumed absolute wall of separation between church and state.

Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justices Harry Blackmun, Lewis Powell, William Rehnquist, Potter Stewart, and Byron White concurred that state provision of secular books (provision 1) did not violate the First Amendment establishment clause. With William Brennan, Thurgood Marshall, and John Paul Stevens dissenting, the Court thus upheld Board of Education v. Allen (1968), which allowed such provision.

As for provision 2, the plaintiffs and Court dissenters had two primary concerns: fear of government entanglement with religion, and that involved staff might seek to impose a religious influence while under state subsidy. Blackmun, writing for the majority, argued that, since non-public school personnel neither drafted nor received payment for administering state tests, there was no avenue for using tests for religious teaching, no requirement of state supervision that might give rise to excessive church-state entanglement, and thus no direct aid to religion. Eight justices also held that speech, hearing, and psychological diagnostic services did not violate the Establishment Clause. All justices except Brennan and Marshall held provision of therapeutic, guidance (excluding course selection), and remedial services permissible. Referring to Board v. Allen, Roemer v. Maryland (1976), and Meek v. Pittenger (1975), Blackmun noted the constitutionality of state provision of church-related schools with secular, neutral, or nonideological services, facilities, and materials.

This judgment contradicted that part of Meek, wherein state authorization of remedial and diagnostic services was ruled unconstitutional because teachers might fail to separate religious instruction from secular obligations, and state efforts to guard against non-neutral aid might result in excessive church/state entanglement. In Wolman, the Court distinguished between diagnostic services, with little educational content and minimal student contact, and teaching and counseling roles. The Court concluded that diagnostic staff working on private campuses would have little opportunity to proselytize. To ensure religious neutrality, remedial/diagnostic services would be provided off campus.

As for provisions 3 and 4, neutral accommodation of religion halted when it came to instructional materials and equipment. The Court ruled, with Burger, Rehnquist, and White dissenting, that the state could not provide instructional materials, since it was presumably impossible to separate secular from sectarian educational functions in church-related schools and since maps and tape recorders could not be isolated to student possession. Nor could the state fund field trips since teachers might be tempted to foster religion during trips. State supervision to guarantee religious neutrality would create excessive church/state entanglement—thus field trips failed constitutional muster.

The diverse opinions in Wolman revealed the divided character of the Court's establishment clause rulings since World War II. Strict separationists saw most of the Ohio statute unconstitutional.

Accommodationists Burger, Rehnquist, and White viewed none of the statute unconstitutional. They agreed, in Committee for Public Education & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist (1973), that "the Establishment Clause does not forbid governments ... to enact a program of general welfare under which benefits are distributed to private individuals, even though many of those individuals may elect to use those benefits in ways that 'aid' religious instruction."

The Court returned to neutral (nonendorsement) accommodation in recent cases, overruling portions of Wolman precluding aid. The Court ruled that the following did not violate the establishment cause: (1) tax breaks for church-related school tuition costs (Mueller v. Allen [1983]); (2) vocational scholarships including aid for private school students majoring in pastoral studies (Witters v. Washington [1986]); (3) state provision of sign language interpreters for religious school students (Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District [1993]); (4) government loans of "non-ideological" educational material and equipment to sectarian schools (Mitchell v. Helms [2000]); and (5) state vouchers subsidizing parents choosing private/religious schools for their children (Zelman v. Simmons-Harris [2002]).

L. SUE HULETT

References and Further Reading

- Agostini v. Felton*, 521 U.S. 203 (1997).
- Alley, Robert. The Constitution and Religion: Leading Supreme Court Cases on Church and State. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1999.
- Levy, Leonard. The Establishment Clause. New York: Macmillan, 1986.
- McConnell, Michael, John H. Harvey, and Thomas C. Berg. Religion and the Constitution. New York: Aspen Publishers, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Education v. Allen*, 392 U.S. 236 (1968)
- Committee for Public Education & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist*, 413 U.S. 756 (1973)
- Meek v. Pittenger*, 421 U.S. 349 (1975)
- Mitchell v. Helms*, 530 U.S. 793 (2000)
- Mueller v. Allen*, 463 U.S. 388 (1983)
- Roemer v. Maryland Board of Public Works*, 426 U.S. 736 (1976)
- Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind*, 474 U.S. 481 (1986)
- Zelman v. Simmons-Harris*, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)
- Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District*, 509 U.S. 1 (1993)

See also Accommodation of Religion; Aid to Religion; American Civil Liberties Union; Americans United for Separation of Church and State; Burger, Warren E.;

Catholics and Religious Liberty; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; First Amendment and PACs; Marshall, Thurgood; Powell, Lewis Franklin, Jr.; Rehnquist, William H.; Stevens, John Paul; Stewart, Potter; White, Byron Raymond

WONG SUN v. UNITED STATES, 371 U.S. 471 (1963)

James Toy and Wong Sun were arrested for the fraudulent and knowing transportation and concealment of heroine. Both were later convicted based on (1) statements made by Toy in his bedroom at the time of arrest; (2) heroin seized by agents from Johnny Yee; and (3) Toy and Sun's pretrial unsigned confessions. The court of appeals affirmed the convictions, although it found that the arrests of Toy and Sun were illegal because there was neither probable cause nor reasonable grounds for detention.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed. The Court, while agreeing that Toy's arrest was illegal, found that statements made by Toy after his arrest were inadmissible against him including statements that led to the finding of heroin on Johnny Yee. Under the Court's analysis, the evidence was an "exploitation" of the original unlawful arrest. The Court went on to conclude that the unsigned confessions, although admissible at trial, were not enough to convict Toy because they could not be independently corroborated, and statements implicating Toy in Sun's confession were also inadmissible since they were not in furtherance of a conspiracy.

The Court found that although Sun's arrest was also unlawful, his unsigned confession was admissible at trial because while he may never have confessed but for the unlawful arrest any link between the arrest and the confession had been broken due to the fact that it was made voluntarily, after release from arrest and with Sun knowing of his rights to counsel and to remain silent.

MARCEL GREEN

References and Further Reading

Israel, Jerold H., Yale Kamisar, and Wayne R. LaFare. Criminal Procedure and the Constitution. St. Paul, MN: West, 2005.

Taslitz, Andrew E., and Margaret L. Paris. Constitutional Criminal Procedure. Los Angeles: Foundation Press, 2003.

See also Exclusionary Rule; Fruit of the Poisonous Tree

WORLD WAR I, CIVIL LIBERTIES IN

Woodrow Wilson, like Thomas Jefferson over a century earlier, had hoped to ignore foreign affairs and concentrate on domestic reform. But Europe went to war in August 1914, and although the United States tried to avoid involvement, the country finally declared war on Germany in April 1917. The president therefore had to deal with war-related problems of enormous magnitude. Some of the constitutional problems raised during the Civil War appeared again during World War I, but in a far more extensive and worrisome manner, and the Wilson administration's record constitutes the greatest infringement on civil liberties up to that time.

The Draft Cases

Wilson had implicitly assumed that the decision to go to war belonged to the chief executive as commander-in-chief; once the nation entered the war, however, he explicitly assumed that he would receive an unusual degree of deference from Congress not only in managing the war but also in the proposals he would send to the legislature for enactment. In his war message, he told Congress that he would send them bills for the raising of and support of a larger army and navy and for the mobilization of the country's economic resources. Wilson hoped "that it will be your pleasure to deal with them as having been framed after very careful thought by the branch of Government upon which the responsibility of conducting the war and safeguarding the nation will most directly fall." The administration then began sending one sweeping bill after another to Congress, including an espionage measure allowing for large-scale government censorship of the press, the creation of a food administration, and a draft of young men for the army.

Despite their resentment at Wilson's high-handedness, members of Congress recognized that conscription would be necessary, and on May 17, 1917, Congress enacted Wilson's draft law, which opponents of the war immediately challenged. Lower courts expedited the various draft cases; men could not be allowed to die should the law be unconstitutional, nor could the government's mobilization be derailed if it were valid. Six suits, grouped together as the Selective Draft Law Cases (1918) came before the Court for argument in December 1917. All involved convictions for obstructing or resisting conscription.

Harris F. Taylor, the chief counsel for the defendants, berated Congress for expanding the executive power. Wilson had already become a political dictator, Taylor charged, and his decision to commit American troops abroad—a power nowhere found in the Constitution—had plunged the country into a military dictatorship as well. Taylor claimed that the militia clause (Article I, Section 8) limited their use “to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions.” Militia troops could not be used, therefore, to prosecute foreign conflicts.

The Court handed down its decision the first week of January 1918; in almost summary fashion, it unanimously dismissed all the arguments raised against the law. Chief Justice White noted Congress’s explicit powers in Article I to “provide for the common Defence,” “to raise and support Armies,” “to provide and maintain a Navy,” and “to declare War.” “As the mind cannot conceive an army without the men to compose it,” White asserted, “on the face of the Constitution the objection that it does not give power to provide for such men would seem too frivolous for further notice.” The Court also made short shrift of the argument that the Constitution only allowed a volunteer army and did not authorize conscription. The chief justice noted that just as the government owed certain obligations to its citizens, so the people had reciprocal duties to the state, including rendering military service, which the government could compel. Beyond that, Congress could deploy the army anywhere it deemed necessary, even overseas.

Most Americans had expected the Court to sustain the draft law. It would have been difficult, declared one journal, “to conceive how any other view could ever have been seriously argued by anyone familiar with constitutional law or the Anglo—Saxon principles of free institutions.” A writer in a respected legal journal, anticipating the impatience later shown toward free speech, charged that those who had challenged the laws belonged to “that treacherous hostile propaganda with which we now know our country has been menacingly infiltrated.” Yet even if the antidraft arguments failed to persuade a single member of the Court, they did raise at least two issues that would eventually receive more serious attention.

First, the act allowed the president to delegate nearly all the tasks involved in selecting and processing the conscripts to local draft boards. The Court had held laws involving delegation of powers constitutional ever since the question first came before it in Field v. Clark (1892), but none of the previous statutes had been as vague in prescribing guidance or oversight. In the various war statutes, Congress merely set out general goals and gave the president carte blanche to carry them out. At some point, the Court would have to determine how much power Congress could delegate and how much discretion the president could exercise.

A second issue involved the generous exemption from the draft that Congress allowed ordained ministers and theology students, as well as exemption from combat granted to members of some sects that opposed war on religious grounds. The Court shrugged off a challenge that this provision violated the First Amendment because it amounted to an establishment of religion. White casually derided the unsoundness of the claim as well as a collateral argument that the limited exemptions violated the free exercise clause. In the future, the Court would wrestle with the problem of conscientious objectors in a number of cases.

Women’s Suffrage

The Nineteenth Amendment reflected the progressive faith that greater participation in the political process would ensure better government, and its passage was also a result of the war. The drive to give women the right to vote had begun much earlier, of course, and had been articulated in the manifesto of the 1848 Seneca Falls Convention. Women activists such as Susan B. Anthony, Lucretia Mott, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and Lucy Stone had labored diligently in the cause, but although they had effected some improvements in the legal status of women, the right to vote remained beyond their grasp.

Because suffrage had always been considered a matter of state power (even the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments had left the primary control of voting to the states), women began by lobbying state legislatures for the ballot. The Wyoming Territory gave women the vote in 1869, but by 1900 only four states had granted women full political equality. The movement picked up steam during the Progressive era, especially after 1912 when Alice Paul, a Quaker and social worker, returned from an apprenticeship with the militant suffragists of England. Adopting the techniques she had learned in the mother country, she led a march in Washington on the day before Wilson’s inauguration to promote the new goal of the movement—a constitutional amendment. When unruly opponents broke up the parade, the suffragists suddenly had the publicity they needed. By 1916, the Republican Party had endorsed the amendment, and eleven states had given women the franchise.

Wilson, who had extremely traditional views about women, opposed giving them the vote. He refused to endorse the proposed amendment, insisting that states should control the suffrage. But the president found himself in a rapidly shrinking minority. Under Alice Paul's leadership, the new Women's Party regularly picketed the White House, provoked arrests, and went on well—publicized hunger strikes in prison. When the United States entered the war, allegedly to save democracy, political wisdom dictated that one could not send Americans to fight and die for an ideal overseas while denying it to half the population at home. Wilson finally capitulated, and he went before Congress on September 30, 1918, to recommend a constitutional amendment. Congress had turned down similar proposals ever since Reconstruction, and the Senate now rejected the amendment again, once in 1918 and twice in 1919. With Wilson's backing, however, Congress finally approved the Nineteenth Amendment on June 4, 1919, and Tennessee became the thirty-sixth state to ratify on August 18, 1920, in time for women to vote in that fall's presidential election.

The Nineteenth Amendment doubled the number of eligible voters, but whether it had any qualitative effect on American politics is doubtful. Some reformers believed that the moral purity of women would lead to some sort of cleansing process, but nearly all studies show that women voted just about the same as men of comparable class and sector. In all, the presence of women at the polls neither destroyed family life nor purified the political process, but it did make American government more representative and took women one large step down the road to the elusive goal of equality.

Free Speech in Wartime

Ironically, the war to make the world safe for democracy triggered the worst invasion of civil liberties at home in the nation's history. The government obviously had to protect itself from subversion, but many of the laws seemed aimed as much at suppressing radical criticism of administration policy as at ferreting out spies. In the Selective Service Act, Congress authorized the jailing of people who obstructed the draft. The Espionage Act of 1917, aimed primarily against treason, also punished anyone making or conveying false reports for the benefit of the enemy, seeking to cause disobedience in the armed services, or obstructing recruitment or enlistment in the armed forces. The postmaster general received power in the Trading with the Enemy Act of 1917 to ban foreign language and other publications from the mails. The 1918 Sedition Act, passed at the behest of western senators and modeled after Montana's statute to curb the Industrial Workers of the World, struck out at a variety of "undesirable" activities, and forbade "uttering, printing, writing, or publishing any disloyal, profane, scurrilous, or abusive language." Finally, the Alien Act of 1918 permitted the deportation of alien anarchists or those who believed in the use of force to overthrow the government.

It is certainly understandable that a government should wish to protect itself from active subversion, especially during wartime. But the evidence indicates that Wilson, preoccupied first with mobilization and then with peace making, gave little thought to the problem, and deferred to some of his conservative advisers, especially Postmaster General Albert Burleson, a reactionary who considered any criticism of the government unpatriotic. There is a suspicion that in coming down so hard on socialist newspapers, such as the Milwaukee Leader, Burleson intended to send a message to the larger, more middle-class journals that they should not get too far out of line.

The federal laws and similar state statutes caught radicals, pacifists, and other dissenters in an extensive web. The total number of indictments ran into the thousands; the attorney general reported 877 convictions out of 1,956 cases commenced in 1919 and 1920. Although the laws had been challenged early, the government had shown no desire to push for a quick decision on their constitutionality. As a result, some half-dozen cases did not reach the Supreme Court until the spring of 1919, after the end of hostilities.

These cases marked the beginning of a civil liberties tradition in American constitutional law. There had been no such tradition prior to the war, because neither the states nor the federal government had seriously restricted First Amendment rights. These cases also began the process of developing criteria for permissible limitations on speech; the dissents of Holmes and Brandeis initiated the counter-process by which the courts ultimately became the defenders of civil liberties against the executive and legislative branches.

The Speech Tradition before Schenck

Although modern speech jurisprudence begins with the Holmes opinions in Schenck v. United States (1919) and Abrams v. United States (1919), a jurisprudence of free speech did exist prior to 1919. Various writers and groups tried to put forward theories that would be speech-protective, but they had little success. One reason may have been their identity. The International Workers of the World, the feared and radical "Wobblies," put forward an extensive rationale for speech completely free from any governmental regulation. Today we would find that rationale not very different from that put forward by contemporary jurists; before World War I only fellow radicals took the IWW seriously.

The scholar David Rabban has also identified what he terms a “lost tradition of libertarian radicalism,” which defended as a primary value individual autonomy against the power of church and state. This tradition reaches back before the Civil War in various movements, including abolitionism, labor reform, and women’s rights. With the arrival of the Comstock Acts in 1873 and 1876 to censor materials moving through the mails, the libertarian radicals organized in such groups as the National Defense Association (1878) and the Free Speech League (1902), the latter actively involved in defending those whose speech had been restricted, usually radicals such as Emma Goldman and Margaret Sanger. The leader of the Free Speech League, Theodore Schroeder, worked out a philosophy of free speech premised on the belief that everyone had a right to say whatever they wished, and that government had no business acting as a censor. Schroeder rejected earlier theories of speech and press that would allow governmental interference should the speech have a “bad tendency,” or which would allow publication but then provide punishment.

Despite the best efforts of the Free Speech League as well as writers like Schroeder and Ernst Freund, the overwhelming weight of judicial opinion before the war, in both federal and state jurisdictions, did little to recognize the notion that the First Amendment meant speech should not be curtailed. Speech, or at least the expression of unpopular or strange views, received little sympathy from the public at large or the men who sat on the bench.

Most judges relied on Sir William Blackstone, who in his Commentaries argued that the right of free speech precluded prior restraint (that is, the government could not stop a person from speaking or publishing ideas), but that the law could punish speakers and writers if their expressions tended to harm the public welfare. In the leading Supreme Court opinion of this time, Patterson v. Colorado (1907), Justice Holmes closely followed Blackstone’s analysis. Thomas Patterson could hardly be described as a radical. A U.S. Senator from Colorado and a newspaper publisher, he had actively supported a referendum that provided home rule for Denver. He became outraged when the Republican legislature enlarged the state supreme court and packed it with judges who overturned the results of the referendum. His newspapers carried editorials, cartoons, and letters ridiculing the court. The state attorney general brought criminal contempt proceedings against Patterson on behalf of the supreme court, which in turn fined him and his publishing company $1,000 without allowing him to prove truth as a defense.

Patterson appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, but Holmes rejected all of his arguments about the nature of free speech. The First Amendment, Holmes declared, “prevents all previous restraints upon publications,” but allows “the subsequent punishment of such as may be deemed contrary to the public welfare.” Interestingly, Holmes dismissed the notion of truth as a defense. “The preliminary freedom extends to the false as to the true; the subsequent punishment may extend as well to the true as to the false.” The Court heard only a few other First Amendment cases before the wartime convictions reached it on appeal in 1919, and all of them essentially followed Blackstone as explained by Holmes in Patterson.

Clear and Present Danger

In the first case, Schenck v. United States, the secretary of the Philadelphia Socialist Party had been indicted for urging resistance to the draft. He had sent out circulars condemning conscription as despotic and unconstitutional and calling on draftees to assert their rights and refuse induction. Under the terms of the Espionage Act, Schenck had urged unlawful behavior. But did the Constitution’s guarantee of free speech protect him? Holmes attempted to develop a standard based on the common law rule of proximate causation, and he took a fairly traditional view of speech as a limited right. One could not, he pointed out, falsely shout “Fire!” in a theater. In a famous passage, Holmes attempted to define the limits of speech:

The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent. It is a question of proximity and degree. When a nation is at war, many things that might be said in time of peace are such a hindrance to its effort that their utterance will not be endured so long as men fight and no Court could regard them as protected by any constitutional right.

The “clear and present danger” test became the starting point for all subsequent free speech cases, and within a week, the Court sustained two other convictions under this rule. In Frohwerk v. United States (1919), a German-language newspaper had run articles attacking the draft and challenging the constitutionality of the war, whereas in Debs v. United States (1919), Holmes accepted a jury finding that in a militant antiwar speech, Debs had intended interference with mobilization.

The three decisions, as well as the clear and present danger test, upset defenders of free speech, especially because they had come from a man they believed to be an ardent libertarian. Legal scholars such as Zechariah Chafee, Jr., Ernst Freund, and others attacked Holmes for his insensitivity to the larger implications of free speech. "Tolerance of adverse opinion is not a matter of generosity," Freund declared, "but of political prudence." In an influential article (later expanded into a book) titled "Free Speech in the United States," Chafee insisted that the framers of the First Amendment had more in mind than simple censorship. They intended to do away with the common law of sedition and make it impossible to prosecute criticism of the government in the absence of any incitement to lawbreaking. In none of these three cases could one argue that the defendants had been attempting to incite active lawbreaking; for Chafee, Learned Hand's test in Masses Publishing Company v. Patten (1917) made far more sense. Hand, then a district judge, displayed considerable solicitude for free speech in his opinion and would allow all but speech that directly incited unlawful action.

Holmes, stung by this criticism, agreed to meet with Chafee. The Harvard professor convinced Holmes that free speech served broad social purposes and that the national interest would suffer more from restrictions on speech than from some alleged and vague dangers posed by unpopular thought. Moreover, through a clever, if somewhat inaccurate reading of history, Chafee convinced Holmes that his phrase "clear and present danger" had not only historical roots, but actually was very speech protective. Chafee's missionary work bore fruit at the next term, when Holmes, along with Brandeis, began reformulating the clear and present danger test.

The Beginnings of the Free Speech Tradition

In Abrams, the defendants had distributed pamphlets in Yiddish and English criticizing the Wilson administration for sending troops to Russia in the summer of 1918. The government had no way to prove that such leaflets actually hindered the war with Germany, but a lower court judge found that they might have caused revolts and strikes and thereby diminished the number of troops available to fight the Germans. Seven members of the Court, led by Justice John H. Clarke, agreed that the government had provided sufficient proof to support this charge and that the conviction could be sustained under the Schenck test of clear and present danger.

Both Holmes and Brandeis disagreed, and in an eloquent dissent, Holmes limned one of the great defenses of free speech. The "silly leaflets" hardly posed a danger to society, and the fact that the ideas expressed were unpopular or even considered dangerous made no difference:

When men have realized that time has come to upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out. That at any rate is the theory of our Constitution. It is an experiment, as all life is an experiment.

Holmes's dissent in the Abrams case is often seen as the beginning of the Court's concern with free speech as a key right in democratic society, and it put forward the notion of democracy resting upon a free marketplace of ideas. Some ideas might be unpopular, some might be unsettling, and some might be false. But in a democracy one had to give all ideas an equal chance to be heard, in the belief that the false, the ignoble, and the useless would be crowded out by the right ideas, the ones that would facilitate progress in a democratic manner. Only if society took the guaranty of the First Amendment seriously could that happen.

Four months later the Court announced its decision in Schaeffer v. United States (1920). All five defendants had been connected with a German—language newspaper in Philadelphia accused of publishing unpatriotic articles critical of the Allies and favorable to the Central Powers. McKenna, for the majority, did not mention clear and present danger, but used a more permissive standard, the "bad tendency" test. Did the words intend a proscribed action? If so, that would be enough to sustain the conviction.

Now Brandeis led the dissent. Although he had been uncomfortable with Holmes's arguments in Schenck, he had not been sure what other options the Court had. Chafee's article gave him his clue, and he had gladly joined Holmes in Abrams. With Schaeffer he entered the debate and helped refine clear and present danger so that it would serve more as a protection for free speech than as a license for government repression. He set forth the utility of free speech in a democratic society: Even though it could be abused, the benefits of untrammelled discourse far outweighed any inconvenience. Above all, basic rights should not be crippled because of wartime hysteria. An intolerant majority, he declared, "swayed by passion or fear, may be prone in the future, as it has often been in the past, to stamp as disloyal opinions with which it disagrees. Convictions such as these, besides abridging freedom of speech, threaten freedom of thought and of belief."

The last of the major Espionage Act cases came down soon after: Pierce v. United States (1920) involved prosecution of three Socialists for distributing a strongly antiwar pamphlet. Justice Mahlon Pitney quickly disposed of the constitutional arguments, merely citing the string of cases from Schenck through Schaeffer to sustain the conviction. But he then went to great length to disprove the allegations made in the pamphlet, especially that the war had economic causes. Such a false view, he claimed, could not help but have an adverse, even if indirect, effect on the successful prosecution of the war. (Interestingly, six months earlier Woodrow Wilson had stated: "Who does not know that the seed of war in the modern world is industrial and commercial rivalry. This was a commercial and industrial war." By the Pierce opinion, the president could have been prosecuted under the Espionage Act!)

Brandeis, again joined by Holmes, entered a long and thorough dissent, claiming the government had failed to prove that the publication had posed any danger to the war effort. To urge men to better their lot by creating new laws and institutions could not be labeled a criminal act "merely because the argument presented seems to those exercising judicial power to be unfair in its portrayal of existing evils, mistaken in its assumptions, unsound in reasoning, or intemperate in language." The "falsity" of one's view, according to the interpretation of free speech Brandeis and Holmes advocated, had nothing to do with one's right to promote that view.

One other excess of the Espionage Act came before the Court later that term in the Milwaukee Leader case. Congress had given the postmaster general the authority to close the mails to any newspaper violating the act, and Albert Burleson had revoked the second-class mailing privileges of the socialist Milwaukee Leader. The government charged the paper with publishing false reports with the intent to hinder American military operations, obstruct recruiting, and aid the enemy. Speaking for the majority, Justice Clarke upheld the government's action and rejected the defense claim that the First Amendment's protection of a free press had been violated. The First Amendment, Clarke declared, is not intended "to serve as a protecting screen for those who while claiming its privileges seek to destroy it."

For Brandeis, whose dissent Holmes joined, the question did not involve distinctions between war and peace, but the basic right of a free press. Even where Congress had previously declared certain materials unmailable, only issues containing that type of material had been excluded. Here the postmaster had banned all issues, becoming in effect "the universal censor." Freedom of the press could not be limited either directly or, as in this case, indirectly by denying the mailing privilege. "In every extension of governmental function," he warned, "lurks a new danger to civil liberty."

Despite the justifiable applause with which civil libertarians had greeted Holmes's Abrams dissent in 1919, by the end of the 1920 term Brandeis had emerged as the Court's most powerful defender of free expression. Holmes had the gift of generalization, of the quotable phrase, but the more stolid Brandeis built the foundation of future constitutional protection of free speech with facts, logic, and, on occasion, impassioned and eloquent language as well. Such an occasion arose in Gilbert v. Minnesota (1920), when Holmes went along with the majority in sustaining a conviction under a state sedition law that prohibited the teaching or advocacy of certain ideas. Gilbert had made a speech questioning American democracy, declaring that "if they conscripted wealth like they have conscripted men, this war would not last over forty—eight hours." His appeal claimed that the federal sedition law had preempted the field and that his conviction under state law violated his right to free speech. Justice McKenna, for the majority, denied that the state had no power, and said it "would be a travesty" to allow Gilbert to find protection within the Constitution.

Brandeis dissented along with White, although the chief justice's only objection was his belief that the federal law preempted the field. To Brandeis, the Minnesota law posed a far greater danger to speech than did the federal law, because it applied in peacetime as well as in wartime; it banned pacifism, among other ideas, for all time. Only the federal government had the power to curtail free discussion in the national interest; moreover, he believed that the personal protections ensured in the Bill of Rights should apply to the states as well as to the federal government. "I cannot believe that the liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment," he told his colleagues, "includes only liberty to acquire and to enjoy property." Brandeis's dissent pointed the way to the future, in which the Bill of Rights would in fact be "incorporated" through the Fourteenth Amendment so as to limit state action. The majority had not foreclosed that possibility; it had just not reached the issue. Five years later, in Gitlow v. New York (1925), the Court began coming around to the Brandeisian point of view.

Beginnings of the American Civil Liberties Union

The restrictions on speech and press worried many people even during the war. Newspaper publishers and editors naturally worried about any restrictions on their right to print news or to editorialize, but they did not want to be seen in any way as unpatriotic. After all, nearly all of the major English-language papers and periodicals supported the war. But who would stand up for those who opposed war, whose opinions ran against the grain? The American Union Against Militarism, one of the nation's leading pre-war pacifist organizations established a National Civil Liberties Bureau in October 1917, and its members included social workers (many of them pacifists), Protestant clergy (also mainly pacifist), and conservative lawyers, most of whom supported the war but also venerated the Constitution and were outraged by what they saw as the administration's violations of free speech and due process. Albert DeSilver, an outspoken, pro-war patriot, declared that "my law-abiding neck gets very warm under its law-abiding collar these days at the extraordinary violations of fundamental laws which are being put over." Independently wealthy, DeSilver quit his law practice and devoted his time to helping the bureau defend radicals, often putting up the war bonds he had purchased for their bail.

During the war the bureau had plenty to keep it occupied as the Wilson administration attempted to muzzle the foreign-language press, close off the mails to dissidents, and punish antiwar speech. When the bureau printed a pamphlet explaining why it defended what it called "war's heretics," the postal service seized that as well, and it took nearly a year in court to force the release of the material.

The bureau represented the defendants in nearly all of the major cases that eventually made their way to the Supreme Court. The bureau and its head, Roger Baldwin, attacked the administration policies as a violation of old-fashioned American liberties, but the fact of the matter is that defense of the First Amendment, at least as we know it today, did not exist at the time. The tradition did not permit prior restraint of speech, but did allow the full strength of the government to come down on those whose views offended the majority. Unwittingly, perhaps, the bureau helped to convince Holmes and Brandeis, and later a majority of the Court, that a free society must allow even unpopular speech. After the war Baldwin transformed the bureau into the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) and would head it for more than two decades. Eventually the ACLU became the chief defender of freedom of speech, and eventually expanded its activities into other areas of civil liberties and civil rights. In the conservative years of the 1980s it would be attacked repeatedly, but also would be imitated by many other groups working in the public interest on both liberal and conservative sides.

Red Scare

The speech and press cases of 1919–1920 provide a transition from the war to the decade that followed. On the one hand, the Court upheld the powers of the government, as it had on the draft and economic regulations; on the other, the decisions foreshadowed the indifference to civil liberties that marked so much of the 1920s. With the peace, for example, thirty—two states enacted new sedition and criminal syndicalism laws to control supposedly dangerous ideas, and many of the more notorious speech cases of the decade involved prosecution of people who held ideas different from those of the majority. In New York, the infamous Lusk Committee directed raids on the headquarters of allegedly radical groups, whose only "crime" had been to expound unpopular doctrines. But the worst outrage came with the Palmer raids, which triggered the great "red scare."

The awkward transition from war to peace unsettled the American people. The Wilson administration, obsessed with foreign affairs after the 1918 armistice, made no effort to effect a smooth demobilization. The War Industries Board, for example, closed shop on January 1, 1919, and its chairman, Bernard Baruch, had to lay out his own money so his aides could travel home. The War Department canceled hundreds of contracts, throwing thousands of men out of work at the same time that the armed forces were discharging some 4,000 men a day from uniform. Industry used the end of the war as an excuse to cut wages or negate union recognition. As a result, some four million workers went out on strike in 1919, and by the end of the year, the public began to hear—and believe—rumors that radicals had instigated the strikes.

Seattle Mayor Ole Hansen denounced the general strike of 60,000 workers in his city as a Bolshevik plot. The great four—month strike in the steel mills certainly had its share of radicals among the strike leaders. On September 9, 1919, most of Boston's police force went on strike. Governor Calvin Coolidge called up the National Guard to maintain order, broke the strike, and then refused to take the men back on the force. He gained national approval when he declared, "There is no right to strike against the public safety by anybody, anywhere, any time."

Aside from economic strife, the summer of 1919 witnessed bloody racial riots in both the North and South. In July, whites invaded the black section of Longview, Texas, looking for a black man who had been accused of a liaison with a white woman. A week later reports of black attacks on white women in the nation's capital brought out white mobs who rampaged for four days. But the worst came in the Chicago riots of late July, which left 38 people dead and 537 injured. Racial tensions continued over the next few years, and in 1921 another major race riot broke out in Tulsa, Oklahoma.

Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer, a Pennsylvania Quaker and formerly a Progressive congressman, saw radical plots everywhere. He urged Congress to enact peacetime sedition laws, and he decided to deport radical aliens. In June 1919, Palmer installed the young J. Edgar Hoover as head of the new General Intelligence Division of the Bureau of Investigation, with orders to collect files on radicals. On November 7, 1919, agents began raiding the headquarters of suspected subversive groups, arresting people without warrants and paying little attention to basic procedural rights. In the largest raid, on January 2, 1920, agents arrested between four and six thousand people, and detained half of them in crowded jails for long periods of time. Later that month, the New York Assembly ousted five duly elected members because they were socialists.

Fortunately for the country, the red scare receded almost as quickly as it had come. Palmer overplayed his hand, and after the widespread disruptions he had predicted for May Day 1920 failed to materialize, his credibility—and his hopes for the Democratic presidential nomination—vanished. Acting Secretary of Labor Louis F. Post managed to slow down the deportations, while prominent conservatives such as Charles Evans Hughes, as well as church and civic leaders, spoke out against the high-handed abuse of civil liberties. It had been in this milieu of the “scare” that the Supreme Court had decided the Espionage Act cases, but by the end of January 1920, the justices signaled their displeasure at federal abuse of constitutionally protected rights in the case of Silverthorne Lumber Company v. United States (1920).

Two men had been arrested after indictment by a grand jury. The Justice Department, without a warrant, then ransacked their office, removing books, papers, and other documents. Holmes, writing for the Court, branded the government's action an “outrage” and blocked any use of the illegally seized material by the government in legal proceedings. Holmes's insistence that the documents “shall not be used at all” helped expand the “exclusionary rule” that the Court had first propounded in Weeks v. United States (1914). In Weeks, Silverthorne, and other cases, the Court stressed two themes: the exclusionary rule provided the only effective means of protecting Fourth Amendment rights and judicial integrity required that the courts not sanction illegal search by admitting the fruits of this illegality into evidence.

Within a short time, liberal lower court judges picked up on the Holmes statement to block deportations based on illegally seized materials and overturn arrests carried out without proper warrants. In Colyer v. Skeffington (1920), federal judge George W. Anderson chastised the Justice Department for its “hang—first—and—try—afterward” techniques. “A mob is a mob,” he declared, “whether made up of government officials acting under instructions from the Department of Justice or of criminals, loafers, and the vicious classes.” Unfortunately, such common sense came too late to save hundreds of aliens from being illegally deported from the United States.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Chafee, Zechariah, Jr. Free Speech in the United States. New York: Harcourt, Brace, and Howe, 1920.
Milwaukee Publishing Co. v. Burleson, 255 U.S. 407 (1921).
 Murphy, Paul L. World War I and the Origin of Civil Liberties in the United States. New York: Norton, 1979.
 Polemberg, Richard. Fighting Faiths: The Abrams Case, the Supreme Court, and Free Speech. New York: Viking, 1987.
 Preston, William, Jr. Aliens and Dissenters: Federal Suppression of Radicals, 1903–1933. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1963.
 Stid, Daniel. The President as Statesman: Woodrow Wilson and the Constitution. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1998.
 Walker, Samuel. In Defense of American Liberties: A History of the ACLU. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. United States*, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
Colyer v. Skeffington, 265 Fed. 17 (D. Mass. 1920)
Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (1919)
Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649 (1892)
Frohwerk v. United States, 249 U.S. 204 (1919)
Gilbert v. Minnesota, 254 U.S. 325 (1920)
Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 562 (1925)
Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten, 244 Fed. 535 (S.D.N.Y. 1917)
Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U.S. 454 (1907)
Pierce v. United States, 252 U.S. 239 (1920)
Schaeffer v. United States, 251 U.S. 466 (1920)
Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
Selective Draft Law Cases, 245 U.S. 366 (1918)
Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385 (1920)
Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914)

WORLD WAR II, CIVIL LIBERTIES IN

World War II had a lasting impact on civil liberties in the United States, accelerating the development of some and retarding others. The war implicated these issues: political speech under the First Amendment; immigration, naturalization, and deportation; treason and sedition; conscientious objectors; and the race-centered questions that would soon come to be known as “civil rights.”

This entry will treat the World War II era as beginning with the German invasion of Poland, September 1939, and concluding with Winston Churchill’s “Iron Curtain” speech, March 1946, to include some of the war’s later reverberations. This entry excludes discussion of Japanese internment and civil rights issues, which are covered elsewhere.

All three branches of the federal government, as well as the states, affected civil liberties during the war. The executive branch seemed to work at cross-purposes. Attorneys General Robert H. Jackson and Frank Murphy created a civil rights division in the Department of Justice. But President Franklin D. Roosevelt aggressively supported prosecution of Trotskyites, as well as Bundists and fascists. Congress for its part enacted the draconian Smith Act of 1940, a criminal-syndicalism statute that also banned organizing and belonging to groups seeking overthrow of government by force and violence. The House of Representatives created the Dies Committee, forerunner of the House Un-American Activities Committee, which harassed the American left.

The U.S. Supreme Court was similarly ambivalent about the freedom of political expression. In Bridges v. California (1941), which involved the immigrant leftist labor leader Harry Bridges, the Court required an “extremely serious” danger with an “extremely high imminence” before political discourse can be suppressed by states. A companion case, Times-Mirror Co. v. California (1940), held that the press cognate of the First Amendment’s freedom of speech clause similarly protects published expressions of political opinion, especially those in the news media. The speech-protective holding of Bridges was reaffirmed after the war in Pennekamp v. Florida (1946).

The Supreme Court’s most salient wartime contribution to speech doctrine had a long-term restrictive effect, however. In Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire (1942), Justice Frank Murphy invented the “categorization” doctrine, identifying entire categories of speech—“the lewd and obscene, the profane, the libelous, and the insulting or ‘fighting’ words”—as lying entirely outside the protection of the First Amendment. Where the clear and present danger test construed in Bridges evolved in a speech-protective direction, the new categorization approach introduced an unwelcome potential, occasionally realized later, to repress speech solely on the basis of its abstract category, not its effect on the public peace.

Yet in concurrent prosecutions of Nazis and Bundists, the Court construed federal speech-repressive statutes strictly, limiting the power of prosecutors to suppress unpatriotic, racist, and anti-Semitic speech, even when it was clearly propaganda for the enemy (Viereck v. United States [1943], Hartzel v. United States [1944]). The Court extended Chief Justice John Marshall’s stringently narrow definition of treason (along with generous procedural protections for those accused of it), and rejected expansive definitions of sedition (Cramer v. United States [1945], Haupt v. United States [1947]).

Labor organizing activities, especially picketing, emerged as a new speech issue. By compelling management to negotiate with unions, the Labor-Management Relations Act (Wagner Act) of 1935 implicitly sanctioned union actions like meetings, hand-billing, parades, and picketing. These constituted communicative activities that Justice Felix Frankfurter would soon characterize as “speech plus”: expression of ideas combined with some physical act. Such physical acts, Frankfurter insisted, could be regulated by the state even if speech could not. Frankfurter’s speech-action dichotomy contained an ominous potential to suppress political communication.

The Court struck down a crude municipal attempt to obstruct all labor organizing activity in Hague v. CIO (1939). This decision is the leading precedent construing and protecting the seldom-invoked First Amendment right of assembly.

In Thornhill v. Alabama (1940), the Court created nearly absolute First Amendment protections for nonviolent picketing in labor disputes. But it steadily receded from Thornhill during and after the war, as Frankfurter’s emphasis on the non-speech components of union organization prevailed over the Thornhill approach treated all communication, whatever its form, as protected by the First Amendment. During and after the war, the Court adopted Frankfurter’s approach in upholding state power to regulate union action. States could ban “violent conduct” (Milk Wagon Drivers Union v. Meadowmoor Dairies [1941]) and secondary picketing (Carpenters’ and Joiners’ Union v. Ritter Café [1942]). By 1955, only an echo of Thornhill’s expansive protection for picketing remained. Yet in that same era, the Court continued Hague’s protection for union organizational activities that did not include picketing in Thomas v. Collins (1945), holding states to a stringent Bridges-like clear and present danger standard when they attempt to regulate how workers may organize.

Property-related questions impacted Americans' civil liberties during the war. The War Powers Acts of 1941 and 1942, plus the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, gave the president unprecedented powers to regulate and control the nation's economy. In addition to permitting wartime censorship, the statutes authorized wage, price, and rent controls, rationing, and bans on trading with the enemy, to be administered by new agencies with final appeal only to a special court created ad hoc for that purpose, the Emergency Court of Appeals.

The Supreme Court found all these economic control measures permissible in Lockerty v. Phillips (1943), Yakus v. United States (1944), and Steuart v. Bowles (1944). The Court sustained an increase in Congress's regulatory authority under the dormant commerce power in Southern Pacific Co. v. Arizona (1945). (The distantly related issue of wartime censorship, pervasive though it was, did not come before the Court directly in a major controversy.) After the war, in United States v. Causby (1946), the Court did sustain a Fifth Amendment-based challenge to the federal government's wartime activities, finding a compensable taking where military overflights interfered with the plaintiff's egg farm. But dicta suggested that nothing in the holding would interfere with civilian aviation, which sharply restricted the scope of property rights in airspace. Those who see property claims as an integral part of civil liberties have criticized the World War II decisions, although they concede the military necessity that lay behind them.

The powers of the federal government and the president have always expanded dramatically in wartime at the expense of the states, other branches of government, and sometimes of civil liberties. Previously, however, that inflation of power was temporary, and receded after the war. World War II was different. All of American society was regimented for prosecution of total war after 1941, yet the nation managed to avoid some of the extreme incursions on civil liberties experienced in World War I.

The growth of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's wartime power amounted to what Clinton Rossiter called a "constitutional dictatorship." FDR exploited the executive agreement in unprecedented ways, and was upheld in United States v. Belmont (1937) and United States v. Pink (1942). Under his powers as commander-in-chief of the armed forces, FDR created military tribunals to try German saboteurs. In Ex parte Quirin (1942), the Supreme Court upheld the powers of these military adjudicative bodies, despite the threat they posed to individual liberties, including habeas corpus. This partially eclipsed the hallowed precedent of Ex parte Milligan (1866), which had mandated jury trial for civilians in civil courts. The Supreme Court refused to review war crimes tribunals for German and Japanese defendants (In re Yamashita [1946], Homma v. Patterson [1946]).

The most severe impact of military power on civilian society occurred in the territory of Hawaii, where the army imposed a regime of martial law and military rule that for a time entirely displaced civilian government, including its courts. The military governor suspended the writ of habeas corpus and created a system of military provost courts that had both criminal and civil jurisdiction. The quality of justice encountered there was far inferior to that in civilian courts: the judges were laymen, evidence was admitted that would have been inadmissible in civil courts, and sentences in criminal cases were harsh. Aside from these courts, the military government imposed censorship, regulated prices and wages, imposed curfews, and regulated labor relations to the advantage of management. In Duncan v. Kahanamoku (1946), the Supreme Court held that trials in the provost courts were illegal. Duncan affirmed the primacy of civilian over military rule, warning about the evils of unconstrained military government.

The constitutional status of aliens posed civil liberties problems during the war. Beliefs or activities tolerable in a citizen became cause for deportation of an alien or a naturalized citizen. But Schneiderman v. United States (1943) rebuffed the efforts of the federal government to denaturalize and deport a Russian-born American Communist whose only offense was party membership. For a few years afterwards naturalized citizens were immune from the excesses of the World War I era. That changed with the onset of the Cold War, however. In Knauer v. United States (1946), the Court upheld denaturalization on evidence not much more persuasive than in Schneiderman's case.

Aliens not naturalized were more vulnerable than citizens. Harry Bridges returned several times to the Court's docket thanks to persistent efforts of the federal government to deport him. Frustrated by the Supreme Court's refusal to countenance what amounted to a bill of attainder action by Congress that enabled Bridges's deportation, his opponents continued to seek his eviction through the early years of the Cold War, without success. He was the exception, though; most deportation efforts succeeded after 1947 if the target was a leftist.

Conscientious objectors posed a special problem in a conflict as widely popular as World War II. In the Selective Service Act of 1940, Congress had exempted from the military draft anyone "conscientiously opposed" to service "by reason of religious training and belief.” Even when Jehovah’s Witnesses and pacifists got draft exemptions, though, they encountered administrative complications and state-imposed impediments, such as denial of admission to the bar. The Supreme Court sustained the state inhibitions and required that conscientious objector applicants exhaust all administrative processes, including showing up for induction, before they could resort to courts to contest their classification.

Religion provided the other major growth area for civil liberties during the war. With only one major exception (Reynolds v. United States [1878]), the Supreme Court had not construed the First Amendment’s religion clauses before World War II. In 1940, the Court “incorporated” the free exercise and establishment clauses (Cantwell v. Connecticut), meaning that the clauses’ provisions were now just as binding on the states as they were on the federal government. With that doctrine in place, the justices then dealt with the numerous free exercise issues churned up by the social impact of the war. (The Court’s first establishment clause case was not handed down until 1947.) Jehovah’s Witnesses generated nearly all free exercise controversies because of their religiously grounded refusal to salute the American flag and because their proselytizing techniques were obnoxious to their gentile neighbors.

In the tense atmosphere of 1940, refusal to salute the flag, even on sincerely held religious grounds, was deeply unpopular. Legislatures, school boards, and mobs tried to force the Witnesses to salute. Justice Frankfurter upheld the power of school boards to expel nonsaluting Witness children in a hyperpatriotic opinion, Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940). He ignored the clear and present danger test that would have been applicable in speech cases, and instead balanced state legislative power against individual liberties, coming out as he usually did on the side of power against liberty. After Gobitis, mobs brutalized Witnesses and legislatures enacted more draconian measures to compel conformity.

When the Court revisited this issue in the 1943 case of West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, though, it reversed Gobitis and sustained Witness children in their conscientious refusal. It thereby extended broad protections to religious liberty for the first time. Rejecting Frankfurter’s deferential posture, Justice Robert H. Jackson instead deployed free speech doctrines to protect what was essentially religious freedom. He condemned the “coercive elimination of dissent.” Fundamental rights, including those guaranteed by the First Amendment, “may not be submitted to vote.” The “majestic generalities of the Bill of Rights” required judicial protection, to protect “the right to differ as to things that protect the heart of the existing order.” (Frankfurter dissented in an opinion striking for its embittered self-pity.)

A long string of decisions extending from 1939 through 1946 sustained the freedom of Witnesses to promote their religious beliefs, no matter how offensive or annoying such proselytizing activity was to other denominations. Early decisions involving the Witnesses, like Chaplinsky (1942), were hostile to their freedoms. That changed too in 1943, when in five companion cases, Murdock v. Pennsylvania being the most important, the Court supported the rights of religious emissaries to go door-to-door preaching their doctrines. In other decisions, the Court limited administrative discretion to refuse permits for outdoor preaching. After 1946, the Court held states to strict scrutiny of all regulations that burdened religious freedom, thus greatly expanding the sphere of civil liberties in the religious context.

The overall impact of World War II on civil liberties confirmed two major long-term trends. First, the protection of personal liberty had become the primary responsibility of courts, rather than of legislatures or local communities. Second, the national government, rather than states or localities, became the principal arena where these issues were contested. Neither of these trends guaranteed that personal liberties would be immune from government intrusion, as the Cold War was soon to prove. But after the war, the struggle over civil liberties was judicialized, and the sites of contests over personal freedom were federal courts.

The major threat to personal freedoms during and after the war came from an expanded executive power within the federal government and from expanded federal power vis-à-vis the states. Quirin and the internment of Japanese-Americans were pivotal events here, laying the foundations of the national-security state that was to emerge after 1947. For the next generation, this growth came at the expense of civil liberties.

Offsetting this regressive innovation, however, was the remarkable expansion of liberties protected by the First Amendment. Compared with World War I, the Court from 1940 through 1946 was unusually solicitous of speech freedoms. From 1950 through 1957, it would regress, but the Justices then resumed the expansive trend, so that by 1968, political discourse enjoyed nearly absolute protection. This confirmed the “preferred position” of civil liberties suggested by then-Justice Harlan F. Stone before the war.

Finally, in religious matters the Supreme Court began developing doctrines under the free exercise clause that protected not only beliefs but religious practices of sects that were unwelcome to local majorities. In tandem with postwar developments under the establishment clause, these innovations made federal courts the principal guardians of religious freedoms.

Although wars and fears of war had often proven inimical to personal freedoms in the past, World War II paradoxically produced a long-term expansion of freedom in American society.

WILLIAM M. WIECEK

References and Further Reading

- Corwin, Edward S. Total War and the Constitution: Five Lectures Delivered ... at the University of Michigan, March 1946. New York: Knopf, 1947.
- Irons, Peter H. Justice at War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Murphy, Paul L. The Constitution in Crisis Times, 1918–1969. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.
- Peters, Shawn F. Judging Jehovah's Witnesses: Religious Persecution and the Dawn of the Rights Revolution. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2000.
- Pritchett, C. Herman. Civil Liberties and the Vinson Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1954.
- Simon, James F. The Antagonists: Hugo Black, Felix Frankfurter and Civil Liberties in Modern America. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1989.
- Urofsky, Melvin I. Division and Discord: The Supreme Court under Stone and Vinson, 1941–1953. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.
- Urofsky, Melvin I. Felix Frankfurter: Judicial Restraint and Individual Liberties. Boston: Twayne, 1991.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bridges v. California*, 314 U.S. 252 (1941)
- Cantwell v. Connecticut*, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
- Carpenters and Joiners Union v. Ritters Café*, 316 U.S. 708 (1942)
- Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire*, 315 U.S. 568 (1942)
- Cramer v. United States*, 325 U.S. 1 (1945)
- Duncan v. Kahanamoku*, 327 U.S. 304 (1946)
- Ex parte Milligan*, 71 U.S. 2 (1866)
- Ex parte Quirin*, 317 U.S. 1 (1942)
- Hague v. CIO*, 307 U.S. 496 (1939)
- Hartzel v. United States*, 322 U.S. 680 (1944)
- Haupt v. United States*, 330 U.S. 631 (1947)
- Homma v. Patterson*, 327 U.S. 759 (1946)
- In re Yamashita*, 327 U.S. 1 (1946)
- Knauer v. United States*, 328 U.S. 654 (1946)
- Lockerty v. Phillips*, 319 U.S. 182 (1943)
- Milk Wagon Drivers Union v. Meadowmoor Dairies*, 312 U.S. 287 (1941)
- Minersville School District v. Gobitis*, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)
- Murdock v. Pennsylvania*, 319 U.S. 105 (1943)
- Pennekamp v. Florida*, 328 U.S. 331 (1946)
- Reynolds v. United States*, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)
- Schneiderman v. United States*, 320 U.S. 118 (1943)
- Southern Pacific Co. v. Arizona*, 325 U.S. 761 (1945)
- Steuart v. Bowles*, 322 U.S. 398 (1944)
- Thomas v. Collins*, 323 U.S. 516 (1945)
- Thornhill v. Alabama*, 310 U.S. 88 (1940)
- Times-Mirror Co. v. Superior Court*, 310 U.S. 623 (1940)

- United States v. Belmont*, 301 U.S. 324 (1937)
- United States v. Causby*, 328 U.S. 256 (1946)
- United States v. Pink*, 315 U.S. 203 (1942)
- Viereck v. United States*, 318 U.S. 236 (1943)
- West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette*, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)
- Yakus v. United States*, 321 U.S. 414 (1944)
- Smith Act: Act of 28 June 1940, Chapter 439, 54 Stat. 670
- Wagner Act (National Labor Relations Act): Act of 5 July 1935, Chapter 372, 49 Stat. 449
- War Powers Acts: Acts of 18 December 1941, Chapter 593, 55 Stat. 838; 27 March 1942, Chapter 199, 56 Stat. 176
- Emergency Price Control Act: Act of 30 January 1942, Chapter 26, 56 Stat. 23
- Selective Training and Service Act: Act of 16 September 1940, 720, 54 Stat. 885

WRITS OF ASSISTANCE ACT

Writs of assistance were court-issued general warrants that permitted English customs officers to search for contraband within the ships, warehouses, and domiciles of suspected smugglers. Parliament first authorized the writs in 1660 and made them permanent in the 1662 Act for Preventing Frauds. A 1696 law extended the power to employ writs of assistance to customs officials in the American colonies, helping them to enforce the royal Navigation Acts. Customs officials in the colonies rarely requested writs of assistance, however, until the Seven Years War (1756–1763), when the superior courts of New Hampshire and Massachusetts issued them to help officials enforce British laws prohibiting trade with enemy nations—France and Spain, in this case.

In 1760, Massachusetts merchants sued royal customs collectors for abusing the writs, accusing them of trespass. In the following year their advocate, James Otis, testified in Massachusetts Superior Court against the constitutionality of the statutes themselves, arguing that they arbitrarily infringed on the privacy and property rights of British subjects. The court upheld the statutes' legitimacy, and the issue lay dormant for several years. In 1767, the Townshend Acts authorized customs officers throughout the colonies to use writs of assistance to enforce the collection of import duties. The law also provided that such writs could only be issued by the supreme court of each American province, and in nine colonies, judges, following the logic of James Otis's argument, routinely rejected applications for the writs as violations of the British Constitution. In the 1770s, five states outlawed them in their constitutions, and in 1789 the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution prohibited federal courts from issuing general warrants and officials from engaging in warrantless searches.

DAVID A. NICHOLS

References and Further Reading

Gipson, Lawrence Henry. The Coming of the Revolution, 1763–1775. New York: Harper & Row, 1954.
Smith, Maurice Henry. The Writs of Assistance Case. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1978.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Act for Customs Search Warrants, 1660, 12 Car. 2, c. 19
Act for Preventing Frauds and Regulating Abuses in His Majesty's Customs, 1662, 13 and 14 Car. 2, c. 11
Act for Preventing Frauds and Regulating Abuses in the Plantation Trade, 1696, 7 and 8 Gul. 3, c. 22

See also General Warrants; Otis, James

WYMAN v. JAMES, 400 U.S. 309 (1971)

When welfare rights activists wrote out their national agenda in the 1960s, putting a stop to unannounced home visits by government social workers was near the top of the list. Federal law did not require such visits, but many local jurisdictions conducted them, ostensibly to protect children from abuse and to monitor welfare fraud. California went so far as to sponsor early-morning mass raids upon welfare recipients' homes.

In contrast, New York City's practice, reviewed by the Supreme Court in Wyman v. James, was relatively mild. On May 8, 1969, Barbara James, a welfare recipient, received a letter indicating that a caseworker would visit her home a few days later. James phoned the worker to refuse access to her home, although she offered to arrange for a meeting elsewhere. When James continued to refuse access, New York City initiated proceedings to terminate her welfare payments.

Assisted by legal services lawyers, James challenged the termination as a violation of her Fourth Amendment right to be free of illegal search. The Supreme Court's six-to-three majority opinion, the first written by newly appointed Justice Harry A. Blackmun, upheld the City's position that the visit was not forced, since James could simply decline welfare altogether rather than submit to the inspections. The Court concluded that the government could use such warrantless searches to ensure that its welfare funds were being appropriately spent. In adopting this approach, the majority distanced itself from the Court's recent decision in Goldberg v Kelly (1970), which analogized welfare rights to property rights, thereby according welfare recipients greater control over their benefits. Unannounced home visits remain a part of welfare administration in some jurisdictions, and Wyman has also been cited to support sweeps of public housing and drug testing of welfare recipients.

MARTHA F. DAVIS

References and Further Reading

Burt, Robert A., Forcing Protection on Children and Their Parents: The Impact of Wyman v. James, Michigan Law Review 69 (1971): 1259–1310.
Greenhouse, Linda, Becoming Justice Blackmun. New York: Henry Holt & Co., 2005.
Wasby, Stephen L., Justice Blackmun and Criminal Justice: A Modest Overview, Akron Law Review 28 (1995): 125–186.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970)

See also Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471 (1970); Privacy

WYOMING v. HOUGHTON, 526 U.S. 295 (1999)

After stopping an automobile occupied by three individuals for traffic offenses, a policeman observed a hypodermic syringe in the driver's shirt pocket. When the driver admitted he used the syringe to take drugs, the officer gained probable cause to believe the car contained illegal drugs, and he searched the passenger compartment. On the rear seat, he found a purse belonging to one of the passengers. Inside the purse he discovered drug paraphernalia and methamphetamine.

When police have probable cause to believe an automobile contains contraband or evidence, they may conduct a warrantless search of that vehicle without violating the Fourth Amendment (Carroll v. United States [1925]). Such a search may include containers that might conceal the object of the search (United States v. Ross [1982]). In Wyoming v. Houghton, the U.S. Supreme Court clarified the permissible scope of such an automobile search. It held that a search is not limited to items belonging to the driver; rather, police may also search a container they know (or should know) belongs to a passenger, even if they do not suspect the passenger of criminal activity. The Court found no historical evidence admitting a distinction among containers based upon ownership. It also reasoned that passengers possess a reduced expectation of privacy with respect to property they transport in automobiles and that effective law enforcement would be appreciably impaired if police could not search a passenger's belongings when they have probable cause to believe contraband or evidence of criminal wrongdoing is hidden in the vehicle.

DAVID S. RUDSTEIN

References and Further Reading

Dery, George M., III, Improbable Cause: The Court's Purposeful Evasion of a Traditional Fourth Amendment Protection in Wyoming v. Houghton, Case Western Reserve Law Review 50 (2000): 3: 547–597.

LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment, Vol. 3. 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thompson-West, 2004.

LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thompson-West, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925)

United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798 (1982)

See also Automobile Searches; California v. Acevedo, 498 U.S. 807 (1990); Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925); Incorporation Doctrine; Probable Cause

Y

YATES v. UNITED STATES, 354 U.S. 298 (1957)

Yates v. United States involved questions regarding the First Amendment. The ruling in Yates provided a further interpretation of a statute cited in Dennis v. United States (1951), a ruling that applied the Smith Act.

Sections 2 and 3 of the Smith Act banned the willful advising, teaching, or advocacy of the overthrow of any government in the United States by force or violence, and conspiring to do so. In Dennis, the Supreme Court allowed this act to survive by different interpretations of the “clear and present danger” test, despite the objections in support of free speech and free assembly found in the First Amendment. The Department of Justice’s interpretation of this ruling in the 1950s was that the Communist Party was an organization dedicated to the overthrow of the U.S. government by force or violence. Therefore, the Department felt that the Party’s leaders and members could be constitutionally punished. Fourteen Communist Party leaders were convicted under the Smith Act in a jury trial in the district court for the Southern District of California. The defendants appealed to the Supreme Court in Yates v. United States.

The Court was faced with questions as to whether the convictions were a violation of the First Amendment. The previous interpretation in Dennis left the interpretation of the Smith Act as an abstract principle. In a six-to-one decision, the Supreme Court reversed the convictions in Yates and remanded the case back to the district court for a retrial. The Supreme Court cited the need to clearly cite examples of the advocacy of the overthrow of the U.S. government. Otherwise, speech and assembly were protected by the First Amendment. The Court clarified the Smith Act, distinguishing between the abstract principle of teaching the overthrow of government and the teachings of concrete action for the foreseeable overthrow of any government in the United States.

CAROL WALKER

References and Further Reading

- Kauper, Paul. Civil Liberties and the Constitution. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1962.
- Pollack, Harriet, and Alexander Smith. Civil Liberties and Civil Rights in the United States. St. Paul, MN: West, 1978.
- Spicer, George. The Supreme Court and Fundamental Freedoms. 2nd ed. New York: Appleton-Century Crofts Press, 1967.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Dennis v. United States*, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)

YOUNG v. AMERICAN MINI THEATRES, INC., 427 U.S. 50 (1976)

For the first time, the Supreme Court adopted an explicit secondary effects doctrine with regard to commercial establishments providing sexually oriented entertainment or selling sexually explicit material. Under the doctrine, governments may adopt policies to counter the adverse effects of adult entertainment such as declining property values, increased crime, and prostitution, regardless of whether the entertainment would be obscene based on Miller v. California (1973).

The City of Detroit adopted two zoning provisions amending its Anti-Skid Row Ordinance to deter the negative neighborhood impacts created by concentrations of adult bookstores or movie theaters. Establishments exhibiting material depicting specific sexual activities or human “anatomical areas” as outlined by the ordinances therefore could not be located within 500 feet of a residential area or 1,000 feet of two other regulated uses that included such businesses as bars, pawnshops, pool halls, and shoeshine parlors.

American Mini Theatres operated two theatres that violated these requirements and challenged the constitutionality of the amendments. A federal district court judge upheld the ordinances but the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, arguing the ordinances imposed prior restraint on protected speech and denied equal protection by classifying theaters according to the content of the films they exhibited. The Supreme Court, by a plurality, reversed the Circuit Court and upheld the constitutionality of the ordinances. Stevens (who replaced Douglas in December 1975) wrote the opinion and was joined by Burger, White, and Rehnquist. Powell, concurring with the judgment, developed his own rationale for the judgment. Stewart and Blackmun wrote separate dissents; each joined the other’s dissent, and Brennan and Marshall also joined both dissents.

Stevens dismissed the respondent’s argument that the ordinances were impermissibly vague. The only vagueness that he conceded existed was the amount of sexually explicit depictions of the kind specified in the ordinances that establish the “emphasis” of films or other material that affect the classification of a theater or bookstore as “adult.” This uncertainty, however, is limited and easily resolved in the state courts through “narrowing construction.” The circuit court’s concerns regarding prior restraint are in Stevens’s view also misplaced. The ordinances’ restrictions on the location of adult theaters or bookstores, which do not apply to other theaters or bookstores, are no different than other zoning and licensing requirements, and are “not sufficient reason for invalidating” the ordinances.

Although Detroit’s ordinances classified businesses according to the “adult content” of their entertainment, the laws did not run afoul of the Court’s rule that laws affecting protected speech must be content neutral. In the instance of obscenity, the “paramount obligation of neutrality” is not violated because the “regulation of the places where sexually explicit films may be exhibited is unaffected by whatever ... message a film may be intended to communicate....” Moreover, Stevens added, it is “manifest” that society’s interest in protecting erotic materials with “some arguably artistic value” is of a lesser magnitude than its concerns for “untrammelled political debate.” It follows, he concluded, that the line drawn by the ordinances between theaters and bookstores according to the sexual emphasis of their business is justified by Detroit’s interest in preserving the quality of its neighborhoods.

Powell wrote a concurring opinion to explain his different approach to the case. In brief, Powell adopted the four-part test from United States v. O’Brien (1968) to determine whether Detroit’s ordinances, despite their “incidental impact upon First Amendment interests,” could nonetheless be justified under this test. One effect of this test is that as long as a law does not suppress expressive activity and is content neutral, intermediate and not strict scrutiny can be applied.

Powell’s approach gains a majority in City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc. (1986) with a very similar fact situation to Young. Powell’s concurrence also forms the core of the plurality’s decision in Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc. (1991), where it is extended beyond the zoning context, and in City of Erie v. Pap’s A.M. (2000). Both cases upheld ordinances requiring nude dancers to wear pasties and a G-string in order to combat the negative secondary effects associated with nude dancing in commercial establishments.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc.*, 501 U.S. 560 (1991)
- City of Erie v. Pap’s A.M.*, 529 U.S. 277 (2000)
- City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc.*, 475 U.S. 41 (1986)
- Miller v. California*, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
- United States v. O’Brien*, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)

YOUNGER v. HARRIS, 401 U.S. 37 (1971)

Younger v. Harris creates an important exception to the federal enforcement of civil rights. Younger held that a federal court could not enjoin an ongoing state criminal prosecution, even when the statute under which the prosecution was occurring violated federal constitutional rights. Instead, the federal court was required to “abstain” from hearing the case, and allow the constitutional issues to be addressed in the criminal proceeding. Subsequent cases have expanded the scope of this doctrine, generally called “Younger abstention.”

The case arose in 1966, when John Harris Jr. was passing out Progressive Party leaflets suggesting that a Los Angeles police officer had murdered a Watts resident, that local factories failed to employ Watts residents, and that people should take action. Harris was indicted for violating California’s antisyndicalism law. The law made illegal the advocacy of doctrines that sought the violent overthrow of industrial ownership or the political order; it was, in essence, anticommunism legislation. Shortly afterward, Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969) declared nearly identical legislation unconstitutional under the First and Fourteenth Amendments (see Brandenburg v. Ohio), but Harris did not have the benefit of that case. Harris unsuccessfully raised the statute’s unconstitutionality in the criminal proceedings. Facing an imminent trial, he turned to federal court. He sued the county prosecutor, Evelle Younger, seeking an injunction that prohibited Younger from prosecuting him.

A three-judge district court held the statute constitutionally vague and issued the injunction. Younger appealed. The Supreme Court held that the injunction should not have been issued. Writing for the Court, Justice Black focused on two reasons. First, retreating into history, the Court noted that injunctions were a remedy available only in equity. An injunction could not be issued if an adequate remedy existed in common law; in particular, equity did not issue injunctions against criminal proceedings. Second, Justice Black feared that federal injunctions against ongoing state proceedings would interfere with “an even more vital consideration, the notion of ‘comity,’ that is, a proper respect for state functions....” Justice Black famously encapsulated, and capitalized, this argument by discussing the need to “remain loyal to the ideals and dreams of ‘Our Federalism.’” Justices Brennan and Marshall concurred. There were no dissents.

Later cases have defined the contours of Younger abstention. It has been extended to some civil proceedings, especially quasicriminal enforcement proceedings. Younger abstention also applies when the federal case is filed first, but the state case is filed shortly afterwards.

The idea that federal courts must decline to enforce federal constitutional rights seems counterintuitive. The constitutional right can be raised in the state proceeding, and thereafter the Supreme Court might hear the issue on certiorari. Younger also stated that a federal court need not abstain if the prosecution threatens an irreparable injury or if it is undertaken in bad faith. Nonetheless, Younger means that, in many cases, no federal court will hear a claim of federal constitutional violation.

Harris himself received his vindication in state court. In light of Brandenburg, a California court ordered him released from custody in 1971.

JAY TIDMARSH

References and Further Reading

Fallon, Richard H., Jr., Daniel J. Meltzer, and David L. Shapiro. Hart & Wechsler’s The Federal Courts and the Federal System. 5th ed. New York: Foundation Press; St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2003.
Harris v. Younger, 281 F.Supp. 507 (C.D. Cal. 1968).
In re Harris, 97 Cal.Rptr. 844 (Cal. App. 1971).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)

Z

ZABLOCKI v. REDHAIL, 434 U.S. 374 (1978)

Zablocki v. Redhail is one of a handful of modern Supreme Court cases, the most famous being Loving v. Virginia (1967), exploring the constitutional right to marry. Zablocki stands out, however, because it provokes this central question: In what precise sense is marriage, by some accounts a purely positive creation of the state, a constitutional right?

In Loving, the Court held that a statute banning mixed-race marriages could not withstand the strict scrutiny required under the equal protection clause for classifications based on race. It then briefly added that the statute also violated due process by abridging the “fundamental freedom” to marry.

Zablocki concerned a challenge to a Wisconsin statute that forbade residents with support obligations to noncustodial minor children from marrying unless they could demonstrate, among other things, that they were complying with those obligations. Unlike Loving, Zablocki did not involve a “suspect class.” Nevertheless, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Marshall, still approached the case by way of its equal protection jurisprudence, relying this time on the “fundamental rights” prong of that doctrine. The Court, citing Loving and dicta in both older substantive due process cases and recent cases on the right to privacy, held that the freedom to marry was “fundamental” for equal protection purposes. It then subjected the statute to strict scrutiny and struck it down. Chief Justice Burger wrote a concurring opinion.

Justices Stewart, Powell, and Stevens concurred in the judgment. Justice Rehnquist dissented.

Although the Court held squarely that marriage was a fundamental right, it skirted the question whether that right was a basic entitlement, like the right to speech, or only a right of equal access, like the right to vote. Justice Stewart’s opinion faced this issue more directly. He argued that the case did not involve equal protection at all, but rather a liberty protected as a matter of substantive due process. This reading was subsequently confirmed, at least weakly and indirectly, in Turner v. Safley (1987).

Whatever the nature of the right to marry, there remains the problem of defining the scope of the right in view of the many restrictions to which marriage has traditionally been subject. The majority distinguished between incidental regulations, which would not require strict scrutiny, and rules that “interfere directly and substantially with the right to marry,” which would. Justice Stewart responded that there was no “right to marry” as such, in that the law could prohibit some marriages, but that “in regulating the intimate human relationship of marriage, there is a limit beyond which a State may not constitutionally go.” Justice Powell’s concurrence emphasized that the state “has an undeniable interest in ensuring that its rules of domestic relations reflect the widely held values of its people.”

The issues raised in Zablocki echo in contemporary debates about marriage. Most obviously, they are crucial to whether there might be a right to same-sex marriage. More intriguingly, since some have argued that the government should abolish civil marriage entirely, or replace it with “civil unions” open to all, it now becomes a matter of more than theoretical interest whether marriage is the sort of entitlement to which persons could claim a right even as against an effort at its total, nondiscriminatory, abolition.

PERRY DANE

References and Further Reading

- Cain, Patricia A., Imagine There's No Marriage, Quinnipiac Law Review 16 (1996): 27.
- Dane, Perry. “The Intersecting Worlds of Religious and Secular Marriage.” In Law and Religion: Current Legal Issues, vol. 4, edited by Richard O'Dair & Andrew Lewis. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Nolan, Laurence C., The Meaning of Loving: Marriage, Due Process and Equal Protection (1967–1990) as Equality and Marriage, from Loving to Zablocki, Howard Law Journal 41 (1998): 245.
- Sunstein, Cass R., The Right to Marry, Cardozo Law Review 26 (2005): 2081.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Loving v. Virginia*, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)
- Turner v. Safley*, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)

See also Due Process; Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967); Privacy; Right of Privacy; Same-Sex Marriage Legalization; Substantive Due Process; Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)

ZACCHINI v. SCRIPPS HOWARD BROADCASTING COMPANY, 433 U.S. 562 (1977)

This is the only U.S. Supreme Court right of publicity case. Unlike most such cases, unauthorized use of a person's identity for commercial purposes was not involved (see White v. Samsung Electronics [1993]).

Zacchini performed a “human cannonball” act. The entire act lasted fifteen seconds. A film clip of the act, unauthorized by Zacchini, was shown on a television news program. Zacchini sued, claiming misappropriation of his act, in violation of Ohio's right of publicity statute. The Ohio Supreme Court ruled that the First Amendment precluded recovery. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed that decision. It held that an unauthorized broadcasting of the performance “is similar to preventing petitioner from charging an admission fee” and that the First Amendment does not “immunize the media when they broadcast a performer's entire act without his permission.”

The Court considered the performance entertainment, not news. Zacchini's act was a form of intellectual property, “owned” by him. To make a living charging people to see him shot out of a cannon, he could not allow people to see it without charge on television; a similar situation occurs when owners of professional football games impose a “blackout” on local television broadcasts when the stadium is not sold out. The Supreme Court thus held that there was no First Amendment right to effectively eviscerate Zacchini's property interest in his act by filming and broadcasting it without his permission.

The Court also noted, however, that the media remained free to report “newsworthy facts about petitioner's act” so its decision did not infringe on freedom of the press. It said Zacchini did not “seek to enjoin the broadcast of his performance; he simply wants to be paid for it.” The case stands for the proposition that the right of publicity is a property interest that may be protected by the law but not if enforcement will interfere with First Amendment rights (see Cardtoons, L.C. v. Major League Baseball Players Association [1996]).

GERALD J. THAIN

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cardtoons, L.C. v. Major League Baseball Players Association*, 95 F.3d (10th Cir. 1996)
- White v. Samsung Electronics*, 989 F.2d 1512 (9th Cir. 1993)

ZELMAN v. SIMMONS-HARRIS, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

Zelman v. Simmons-Harris concerned a taxpayer challenge to an Ohio program that provides publicly funded scholarships or “vouchers” for students to use at private religious and nonreligious schools. Plaintiffs alleged that the transfer of public funds to religious schools through vouchers violates the establishment clause of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution by funding religious instruction and worship. Lower federal courts struck down the program on establishment clause grounds, but the U.S. Supreme Court reversed, ruling that a neutrally designed voucher program survives constitutional scrutiny.

Zelman v. Simmons-Harris arose in 1996 after the Ohio legislature enacted the Ohio Pilot Scholarship Program to provide publicly funded vouchers for lower-income children in the city of Cleveland that could be used at qualifying private and public schools. Because no public school district chose to accept voucher students, the program resulted in the overwhelming bulk of the vouchers (96 percent) being used at religious schools, which at the time of litigation accounted for 82 percent of the participating private schools. Plaintiff taxpayers, represented by a coalition of education and civil rights groups including the National Education Association, the American Civil Liberties Union, Americans United for Separation of Church and State, and People for the American Way, initially challenged the program in state court, alleging violations to both the U.S. and Ohio Constitutions. After the Ohio Supreme Court struck down the program on state law grounds and the Ohio legislature reenacted a revised version of the program in 1999, the plaintiffs brought suit in federal court, prevailing on establishment clause grounds at the district court and court of appeals levels before losing at the Supreme Court.

The plaintiffs alleged that the Ohio Pilot Scholarship Program violated the establishment clause by providing public support for religious-based education at religious and parochial schools. They relied on various Supreme Court decisions from the 1940s to the 1980s holding unconstitutional public support for educational functions of religious schools. In contrast, the State of Ohio and intervenor parents, represented by the Institute for Justice, pointed to a more recent series of Supreme Court decisions upholding forms of indirect public aid for educational expenses that relied on the “private choices” of recipients to direct the public resources to religious schools.

A sharply divided Supreme Court ruled that the latter line of authority permitting indirect aid through private intermediaries controlled. Writing for a five-member majority, Chief Justice William Rehnquist highlighted two factors as being crucial to its holding that vouchers for private religious schools do not contravene the establishment clause: program neutrality and private choice. First, the Court held that eligibility under the scholarship program, both as to participating schools and student eligibility, was religiously neutral, meaning that the program neither favored religion nor created incentives for religious use. Examining the face of the statute rather than its effect in application, the Court emphasized that the scholarship was part of a general undertaking to provide educational services, that it conferred its benefit to a broad class of individuals without reference to religion, and that it permitted participation of all schools within the Cleveland and adjoining school districts, public and private alike. As Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote: “[G]overnment programs that neutrally provide benefits to a broad class of citizens defined without reference to religion are not readily subject to an Establishment Clause challenge.”

Second, the Court emphasized the element of private choice, finding that the public aid reaches religious schools only as a result of genuine and independent choices of private individuals.... Where a government aid program ... provides assistance directly to a broad class of citizens who, in turn, direct government aid to religious schools wholly as a result of their own genuine and independent private choice, the program is not readily subject to challenge under the Establishment Clause.

The Court found irrelevant the fact that 96 percent of the vouchers were redeemed at religious schools, holding that the “constitutionality of a neutral educational aid program simply does not turn on whether ... at a particular time, most private schools are [religious], or most recipients choose to use the aid at a religious school.” The Court found no evidence that the scholarship program failed to provide “genuine opportunities” for parents or coerced them into sending their children to religious schools.

Justice Sandra Day O’Connor, providing the crucial fifth vote for the majority, wrote a concurring opinion that disputed arguments by dissenting Justice David Souter that the aggregate amount of public funds flowing to the religious schools distinguished the case from earlier decisions upholding insubstantial amounts of aid. Justice Souter, writing a dissenting opinion for himself and three other justices, argued that the voucher program contravened the establishment clause by providing substantial aid to religious education and failing to offer truly genuine choices to eligible parents.

Zelman is a landmark case in religion clause jurisprudence on several levels. First, the decision authorized the use of publicly funded vouchers at private religious schools, a matter that had been highly controversial in education and legal circles for several decades. Although since 1983 the Court had intimated that programs providing aid based on neutral criteria and through private individuals were generally constitutional, the Court had never upheld such a large transfer of public monies for religious education. Furthermore, the earlier aid programs upheld had generally involved discrete forms of aid that had supplemented the secular side of religious school programs, rather than providing unrestricted aid that could be spent on religious education. For opponents of religious school funding, Zelman effectively undermined fifty years of establishment clause jurisprudence through the aegis of “private choice.”

Equally as significant as the specific holding, Zelman indicated a dramatic shift in the Court’s religion clause jurisprudence away from a model of no-aid separationism to one of neutrality toward religion and religious institutions. Whereas for forty years the Court's apparent motif had been to treat religion distinctively with respect to general government benefits and burdens, sometimes requiring exemptions for religion from government regulations while denying religion the benefits of government support, neutrality theory instructs that government is to treat religious institutions and motivations in an evenhanded manner with nonreligious counterparts. Although neutrality theory as the substitute to separationism had been on the ascent for the decade prior to Zelman, the decision solidified its dominant position with the Court.

STEVEN K. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Agostini v. Felton*, 521 U.S. 203 (1997).
 Bolick, Clint. Voucher Wars. Washington, D.C.: Cato Institute, 2003.
Committee for Public Education v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756 (1973).
 Green, Steven K., The Illusionary Aspect of "Private Choice" for Constitutional Analysis, Willamette Law Review 38 (2002): 549–577.
 Jeffries, John C., and James E. Ryan, A Political History of the Establishment Clause, Michigan Law Review 100 (2001): 279–370.
 Lupu, Ira C., and Robert W. Tuttle. Zelman's Future: Vouchers, Sectarian Providers, and the Next Round of Constitutional Battles, Notre Dame Law Review 78 (2003): 917–994.
Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000).
Mueller v. Allen, 463 U.S. 388 (1983).
 Peterson, Paul E., ed. The Future of School Choice. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution Press, 2003.
 Sugarman, Stephen D., and Frank R. Kemerer, eds. School Choice and Social Controversy: Politics, Policy, and Law. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution Press, 1999.
 Tushnet, Mark. Vouchers After Zelman, Supreme Court Review 2000 (2000): 1–39.
 Underkuffler, Laura S., Vouchers and Beyond: The Individual as Causative Agent in Establishment Clause Jurisprudence, Indiana Law Journal 75 (2000): 167–191.
Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind, 474 U.S. 481 (1986).
Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District, 509 U.S. 1 (1993).

ZENGER TRIAL (1735)

The Zenger trial is a landmark in the history of civil liberties, although its impact on civil liberties has been disputed by scholars. John Peter Zenger was a German immigrant who arrived in New York City in 1710 and ultimately became a printer. In November 1733, Zenger began publishing the New York Weekly Journal, the first opposition newspaper in American history. The paper was founded after a group of disgruntled politicians mounted a challenge to the administration of Sir William Cosby, the New York colony's new governor. This group included the former chief justice of the colony, Lewis Morris, the former acting governor, Rip Van Dam, and two leading lawyers, William Smith and James Alexander.

The controversy began in 1732 when Cosby arrived in New York some thirteen months after he had been appointed governor of the colony. During the interim Van Dam had been acting governor of the colony. When Cosby arrived, the legislature voted him a bonus equal to almost all of the salary that he would have been paid had he been in the colony for the previous year. In addition, there was a large accumulation of fees and other emoluments that were waiting for Cosby. Unsatisfied with this amount, Cosby demanded that Van Dam turn over half the salary he had collected while Cosby had been in England. Van Dam refused to do this, and Cosby then asked the New York Supreme Court to sit as an exchequer court so that he could sue Van Dam. Exchequer courts did not use juries or follow common law rules, and were thus seen as arbitrary tools of the government. When the case came before the Court, Chief Justice Morris summarily ruled that it could not sit as an exchequer court and dismissed the case. He then published his opinion, which Cosby correctly saw as an attack on him. A few days later, Cosby fired Morris and replaced him with James DeLancey, a young judge with little experience, but a reliable ally of Cosby.

Morris, Van Dam, and Van Dam's attorneys, Smith and Alexander, then organized an anti-Cosby political faction, and quickly won seats in the colonial legislature and the New York City government. They also hired Zenger to publish his paper, which continuously attacked Cosby and his administration. The Weekly Journal was humorous, satirical, and philosophical. The paper ridiculed Governor Cosby through innuendo and satire while at the same time reprinting high-level discourses on philosophy, political theory, and the lessons of history. The Weekly Journal also provided an articulate defense of the idea of a free press.

Cosby tried to have Zenger indicted for seditious libel, but no grand jury would bring an indictment, although one did order that certain issues of the paper be burned. Cosby was corrupt, venal, and obnoxious. Most New Yorkers hated him, and Zenger's paper had great popular support. Finally, in November 1734 the governor had Zenger arrested and jailed while the colony brought his paper before yet one more grand jury. Zenger could not afford the high bail that Chief Justice DeLancey demanded. His supporters, Morris, Van Dam, and Alexander, could have posted the bail, but did not because they assumed that Zenger would be released in December when the grand jury ceased to sit. They were correct in understanding that the grand jury would not indict him. But, on the last day of the grand jury, the attorney general charged Zenger with seditious libel by information. This procedure avoided a grand jury indictment, but only allowed Zenger to be tried for a misdemeanor.

At the first hearing in the case, Zenger's attorneys, Smith and Alexander, challenged the right of DeLancey to sit as a justice because of the way he had been appointed. Shortly after this, DeLancey disbarred both men and appointed John Chambers, an ally of Cosby, to defend the printer. At the next stage of the proceedings, the sheriff brought in a list of potential jurors that included a number of Cosby's friends and people who did business with him, including his baker, tailor, shoemaker, and candlemaker. Even though he was an ally of Cosby, Chambers exposed these irregularities because he clearly wanted to win his case, as most lawyers do. In this sense, Chambers may have been the first "civil liberties lawyer" in America, defending a client he did not agree with in a free speech case.

The trial did not take place until August 1735. By this time, Zenger had been in jail for more than eight months. At the time, the legal issues in libel cases were divided between the judge and jury. The jury determined if the allegedly libelous paper was published or written by the defendant—that is, the jury determined the "facts" of the case. The judge decided if the paper or writing was actually libelous—the "law" of the case. Truth was not considered a defense to a libel charge, and in fact, English courts had asserted that the "greater the truth, the greater the libel" on the theory that true statements that undermined support for the government are more dangerous than false ones. The traditional defense to the libel charge was that the defendant was not the publisher, or that the defendant may have printed the offensive publication, but did not actually know what was in it.

As the trial opened, Zenger had a new attorney, Andrew Hamilton, of Philadelphia, the most famous lawyer in the colonies. Working from a brief written by James Alexander, Andrew Hamilton offered a surprise defense. Hamilton began by admitting that Zenger had published the newspapers, but argued that what he published was true, and therefore not libel. He then offered to prove the truth of everything in the paper. The prosecutor objected that truth was not a defense, and in the end the judge sustained this position but not before Hamilton was able to argue in court that truth ought to be a defense. The judge directed the jury to convict Zenger of publication, since he had admitted that, and leave the issue of libel up to the judge. Hamilton told the jurors that they had the right to issue a general verdict of not guilty, which the judge could not overrule. The jurors followed Hamilton's advice, and Zenger was acquitted. A year later Zenger published A Brief Narrative of the Tryal of John Peter Zenger, which was, in fact, written by James Alexander.

The Zenger case has long stood as monument to a free press. Zenger criticized the government and a jury of citizens acquitted him of libel. But, in fact the long-term legal significance of the case is less certain. This was a decision by a jury in a colony distant from England. It had no value as a legal precedent, and was vigorously attacked by legal experts in England and some of the other colonies. Zenger was clearly guilty under the existing law of libel. His acquittal was a form of jury nullification, in that the jury knew that he was guilty under the law, but the jury did not like the law. A runaway jury in a faraway colony could not change the law of England.

However, as a political precedent and a historical precedent, the Zenger trial was enormously important. After Zenger's case, no governor in the American colonies ever dared to bring a libel case against a colonial printer. There was simply no hope of winning. By the time of the American Revolution, the Zenger case was etched in the minds of the patriots as an example of how arbitrary government could trample the liberties of Americans. A number of provisions of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights fight their roots in the Zenger case. The case highlighted the need for an independent judiciary that served during the good behavior, rather than at the pleasure, of the governor. Thus, the U.S. Constitution provides life terms for judges. The case underscored the value of grand jury indictment, to prevent the government from trying its enemies. The Fifth Amendment would do just that. Zenger sat in jail for over eight months because the politically motivated judge demanded such a high bail. The Eighth Amendment addressed that issue. Zenger's lawyers were disbarred because they insulted the judge. The Sixth Amendment right to counsel helps prevent that. The sheriff tried to stack the jury, but the Sixth Amendment provides for an impartial jury. Finally, of course, Zenger was prosecuted for publishing attacks on the governor; the First Amendment presumably prevents such prosecutions.

Zenger's demand that truth be a defense to libel is still part of American law. However, during the sedition crisis of 1798 Americans learned that truth was not always clear, and that one man's truth, especially in politics, was another's libel. Thus, in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964), the Supreme Court could find that the press could publish false statements about politics and not be subject to libel, as long as the false statements were not intentional or published with reckless disregard for the truth.

The history of Zenger—indeed what we might call the myth of Zenger as a great victory for freedom of the press—has served as a guidepost for advocates of liberty in England and the United States. Zenger published his narrative of the case in 1737. It was reprinted in England in 1765 during the controversy over free speech and press surrounding John Wilkes. During and immediately after the Revolution, printers republished the Zenger narrative. During the debates over the ratification of the Constitution opponents of the Constitution talked about Zenger's case in the context of the lack of a bill of rights. In 1799, during the sedition act crisis, Zenger's narrative was once again reprinted. It would reappear on the eve of World War II, and during the McCarthy witch-hunt days of the 1950s. In New York Times v. Sullivan, Justice Arthur Goldberg would cite Zenger's case for the idea that a free press was essential to a democracy. The modern court has also cited it for the importance of the right to counsel. The case and the Zenger Narrative remain a monument to the value of a vigorous press and fair trials in a free society.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

Paul Finkelman, ed. A Brief Narrative of the Tryal of John Peter Zenger. New York: Brandywine Press, 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)

ZENGER, JOHN PETER

See Zenger Trial (1735)

ZOBREST v. CATALINA FOOTHILLS SCHOOL DISTRICT, 509 U.S. 1 (1993)

In Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District, the U.S. Supreme Court continued the shift in its establishment clause jurisprudence that began in the mid-1980s by upholding the constitutionality of a government-funded interpreter assisting a deaf child in a religious school.

For the previous forty years, one of the most complicated and frequently litigated establishment clause issues has been the constitutionality of government funding to religious schools. During the 1970s and the early 1980s, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down most forms of government financial assistance to religious schools. But during the late 1980s and early 1990s, the Court began to alter its jurisprudence in this area. The Zobrest case is one of a number of highly significant decisions in recent years in which the Court has permitted government aid to religious schools so long as the aid reaches the school by means of private choice and is “neutrally” available to religious and nonreligious schools alike.

The Zobrest case involved the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA), a federal statute pursuant to which deaf children in certain circumstances are entitled to a state-provided interpreter who assists the child in school by translating the spoken word into sign language that the child is able to understand. James Zobrest, a deaf child, attended a Roman Catholic school in Arizona, but the state, charged with administering IDEA, refused to provide him with an interpreter on the grounds that to do so would violate the establishment clause. Zobrest sued. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit agreed with the state, finding that the interpreter “would act as a conduit for the religious inculcation of James—thereby, promoting James’s religious development at government expense,” which violated the establishment clause.

In a five-to-four decision, the Supreme Court reversed. Chief Justice William Rehnquist’s opinion for the majority did not analyze the case as simply government aid to a religious school. Rather, the majority emphasized the fact that the government-funded interpreter wound up in a religious school as a result of private choice. Rehnquist wrote,

By according parents freedom to select a school of their choice, the statute ensures that a government-paid interpreter will be present in a sectarian school only as a result of the private decision of individual parents. In other words, because the IDEA creates no financial incentive for parents to choose a sectarian school, an interpreter’s presence there cannot be attributed to state decisionmaking.

Zobrest marked an important shift in the Court’s jurisprudence. Whereas in a pair of 1985 cases, Aguiar v. Felton (1985), and School District of Grand Rapids v. Ball (1985), the Court, in five-to-four decisions, had disallowed state-funded teachers of secular subjects from working in a religious school, the Court in Zobrest permitted the state-funded interpreter to do that which the Court had denied eight years earlier. In subsequent cases, the Court would build on the Zobrest precedent by allowing further government aid to religious schools, so long as that aid arrived by virtue of the decision of a private person. For example, when the Court sustained the constitutionality of the use of publicly funded school vouchers in religious schools in Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002), the Zobrest case served an important precedent.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Lindeman, Devora L., Comment: Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District: Private Choices and Public Funding Under the Establishment Clause, Rutgers Law Review 47 (1995): 839–904.
- Stiltner, Jeffrey W., Note: Rethinking the Wall of Separation: Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District. Is the End of Lemon?, Capital University Law Review 23 (1994): 823–861.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Aguilar v. Felton*, 473 U.S. 402 (1985)
- School District of Grand Rapids v. Ball*, 473 U.S. 373 (1985)
- Zelman v. Simmons-Harris*, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

See also Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; State Aid to Religious Schools

ZONING AND RELIGIOUS ENTITIES

The U.S. Constitution

The First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution states in pertinent part: “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion [establishment clause] or prohibiting the free exercise thereof [free exercise clause].” In effect, these clauses limit the constitutionally allowed scope of local regulation and decision making vis-à-vis religious structures, uses, and displays. In Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971), the U.S. Supreme Court devised a three-part test to determine whether a law or government action violated the establishment clause. The so-called Lemon test states that to be constitutional, a law or governmental action must (1) have a secular purpose that neither advances nor prohibits religion—commonly referred to as the purpose prong; (2) have a direct and immediate effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion—commonly referred to as the effect prong; and (3) avoid excessive entanglement with religion—commonly referred to as the entanglement prong. Thus, to be constitutionally valid, a law or governmental activity must satisfy all three prongs.

Zoning Defined

Privately owned land is held subject to restrictions imposed by the state (through its police power), the common law, or other individuals (in some combination). One of the state’s restrictions is implemented via zoning ordinances. These ordinances are justified as protecting the health, safety, morals, or welfare of the public by restricting land use and development.

American modern zoning is a creation of the City Beautiful Movement in the 1890s—a movement of private citizens seeking to improve the appearance and comfort of their communities. In 1916, New York City passed the country’s first zoning ordinance. As a result, zoning spread to the entire United States throughout the 1920s and 1930s. A city’s ability to zone must be created by the state passing a “zoning enabling act.” The Standard Zoning Establishment Act (SZEa) and the New York City plan provided the template upon which most—if not all—fifty states first based their zoning enabling law(s). The SZEa was published in 1923 by the U.S. Department of Commerce. The first step is to adopt a comprehensive (or master) plan for the entire city. Under this plan, various uses within the city are determined and located/pinpointed within specified zones or zoning districts—fixed geographic areas in a somewhat checkerboard pattern. Examples of categories of use are single-family housing; multifamily housing; light industrial; retail; commercial; recreational/parks; agricultural; height, bulk, and area restrictions; and open space. The comprehensive plan serves as a present and future guide for development: it has been described “as a planning, thinking document.”

In general, three separate governmental bodies within a city effectuate zoning: the city council (the legislative body that can amend the zoning code and its ordinances); the planning commission (providing expert advice as part of the legislative process); and the board of zoning adjustment (a quasijudicial body that decides applications from individual landowners for relief from the zoning ordinances).

In 1955, the New Jersey State Supreme Court aptly stated that “the essence of zoning is territorial division in keeping with the character of the lands and structures and their peculiar suitability for particular uses, and uniformity of use within the division.”

In state courts, most of the cases involving both free exercise and land use arise from issues concerning zoning ordinances. Although the majority of state decisions hold that zoning may not ban churches from a particular residential area, in practice, churches are permitted in residential zones through the granting of a special permit. A key underlying question is whether a particular structure or activity at a particular location amounts to the exercise of religion.

The Supreme Court and Congress: A “Battle” over Religion

By 2005, the U.S. Congress and the U.S. Supreme Court had been in a rhetorical battle over the free exercise clause and government interference with or limitation of this right for approximately fifteen years. The first in what would lead to an exchange of actions (both judicial and legislative) was taken by the Court in its decision in the case of Employment Division v. Smith (1990).

The Smith case involved the firing of two men (Smith and Black, respondents) from their jobs as a result of their use of peyote (a cactus plant that when chewed or ingested has hallucinogenic effects)—which was considered a controlled substance. The respondents stated that they ingested the drug as part of a religious service and as a sacrament of their church, the Native American Church. The respondents later applied for unemployment compensation through the State of Oregon (petitioner) and were denied due to “work-related misconduct.” The Court ultimately held in the Smith case that it was not a violation of the free exercise clause for a state to determine that sacramental and ceremonial peyote use was in violation of its drug control laws, and therefore, deny unemployment compensation for firing for this drug use. Thus, neutral, generally applicable laws that—in application or enforcement—burden a person’s free exercise of religion, do not violate the free exercise clause. In addition, the refusal by the government to grant special accommodation to people who are incidentally burdened does not require strict scrutiny review. Prior to Smith, the Court had generally held that a law of general applicability may violate the free exercise clause where the law, as applied, (1) significantly burdens religious beliefs or practices, (2) is not justified by a compelling state interest, and (3) is not the least restrictive means available.

Congress responded by passing the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA) (42 U.S.C.A. sections 2000bb–2000bb-4); the act was signed into law by then-President Clinton. Congress’s findings stated that in Smith, “the Supreme Court virtually eliminated the requirement that the government justify burdens on religious exercise imposed by laws neutral towards religion.” Further, the purpose of this federal law was, in part, to “restore the compelling interest test ... and to guarantee its application in all cases where free exercise of religion is substantially burdened.” As a result, the act requires a compelling governmental interest and the least restrictive means. Notably, the RFRA applied retroactively (“this chapter applies to all Federal law, and the implementation of that law, whether statutory or otherwise, and whether adopted before or after November 16, 1993”).

In addition, as a direct reply to the Smith decision (and citing Smith in its findings), in 1994, Congress amended the American Indian Religious Freedom Act of 1978 (AIRFA) (42 U.S.C.A. section 1996a) to specifically exempt Indians who for “bona fide traditional ceremonial purposes in connection with the practice of traditional Indian religion” in relation to their religious sacrament use, possess or transport peyote from being prosecuted under federal drug laws.

Four years after the passage of RFRA, in City of Boerne v. Flores (1997), the Court struck down the provisions of RFRA as they apply to the states. This case involved the denial of a building permit (to expand and renovate the current church building) to the Catholic archbishop due to local historic preservation zoning ordinances (namely, the building had been designated a historic landmark). The Court held that (1) Congress had exceeded its enforcement powers in the passage of RFRA, (2) RFRA was a considerable congressional intrusion into State action, and (3) the Court found that there had been no pervasive religious bigotry requiring RFRA’s sweeping application. Justice Kennedy, writing for the majority, described RFRA as “the most demanding [strict scrutiny] test known to constitutional law.” Contrarily, religious leaders and supporters of RFRA stated that this action “left religious groups in general, and religious minorities most particularly, without the constitutional protections that have made religious experience in America so unique and remarkable.” In sum, the Boerne case has been labeled “the most important religious freedom case the Supreme Court has ever had to decide [to date].”

The first congressional response to Boerne came two years later. The Religious Liberty Protection Act of 1999 (RLPA) was passed by the House of Representatives (1999 U.S. H.B. 1691), but failed in the Senate (RLPA expired in committee). RLPA was criticized as being too broad—in the same manner as RFRA.

In the next legislative session (the 106th Congress), the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA) was introduced and ultimately passed by Congress and signed into law by then-President Clinton (PL 106-274, 114 Stat. 803; 42 U.S.C.A. sections 2000cc–2000cc-5). Based on congressional fact finding, the hearing record states that “churches in general, and new, small, or unfamiliar churches in particular, are frequently discriminated against on the face of zoning codes and also in the highly individualized and discretionary processes of land use regulation.” The “general rule” as stated in RLUIPA is that “no government shall impose or implement a land use regulation in a manner that imposes a substantial burden on the religious exercise of a person including a religious assembly or institution” without demonstrating that the burden furthers a compelling governmental interest in the least restrictive way. It should be noted that RLUIPA purposely patterns RFRA, but is limited in scope/application to religious land uses and the free exercise of religion rights of institutionalized people. The limited scope is specified in section 2000cc(a)(2) to where

- (A) the substantial burden is imposed on a program or activity that receives Federal financial assistance...
- (B) the substantial burden affects, or removal of that substantial burden would affect, commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, or with Indian tribes...
- (C) the substantial burden is imposed in the implementation of a land use regulation...

The Christian Law Association in a post-RLUIPA publication titled, A Major Threat to Churches: Zoning Law,² advises that when appearing for a zoning hearing churches address the following issues: (1) whether the church will diminish the surrounding property values, (2) whether the church will cause excessive traffic for the community, (3) whether there be ample off-street parking for the church, and (4) whether the church will be operating a mission on church property.

As a way to ensure compliance with RLUIPA, some local jurisdictions have created and are utilizing the so-called Religious Land Use Plan (RLUP). In general, the RLUP seeks to explain legal principles, including RLUIPA, state and local zoning laws, and constitutional issues.

Challenges to zoning ordinances under RLUIPA are beginning to be litigated through the court system. As of May 2005, the Court had not taken up or decided on the constitutionality of RLUIPA's zoning-related provisions. Based on the fifteen-year history of this debate, the Court will undoubtedly be heard on this issue once again.

CYNTHIA G. HAWKINS-LEÓN

References and Further Reading

- American Atheists. Flashline: Supreme Court Strikes Religious Freedom Restoration Act, June 25, 1997. <http://www.atheists.org/flash.line/rfra2.htm>.
- Blaesser, Brian W., and Alan C. Weinstein, eds. Land Use and the Constitution: Principles for Planning Practice. Chicago: Planners Press, 1989.
- Boyer, Ralph E., Herbert Hovenkamp, and Sheldon F. Kurtz. The Law of Property: An Introductory Survey. 4th ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing, Co., 1991.
- Chemerinsky, Erwin. Court Adds Class Actions, Religion to Docket, Trial 41 (2005): 66–68.
- Christianity Today. “The End of Church Zoning Disputes?” Christianity Today, September 4, 2000. <http://www.christianitytoday.com/ct/2000/010/12.25.html>.
- Christian Law Association. A Major Threat to Churches: Zoning Laws. 1999–2001. http://www.christianlaw.org/zoning_threat.html.
- Connor, Susan Marie. Zoning and Matters of Age: Tots, Teens, and Seniors, Probate and Property January/February (2005): 61–66.
- Cutter v. Wilkinson, 349 F.3d 257 (6th Cir. 2003), cert. granted, 125 S.Ct. 308 (2004).
- Dukeminier, Jesse, and James E. Krier. Property. 5th ed. New York: Aspen Publishers, 2002.
- Hiller, Amanda. “Zoning of Religious Land Uses: The Impact of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000.” In Trends in Land Use Law from A to Z: Adult Uses to Zoning, edited by Patricia E. Salkin, 97–124. Chicago: American Bar Association, 2001.
- Johnson v. Martin, 223 F.Supp.2d 820 (USDC, W.D. Mich. 2002).
- Katobimar Realty Co. v. Webster, 20 N.J. 114 (1955).
- Mauk, John, and Wendy Smith. “Locals Risk Lawsuits over Church Zoning.” American City and County, 2004. http://www.americancityandcounty.com/mag/government_locals_risk_lawsuits.
- Midrash Sephardi, Inc. v. Town of Surfside, 366 F.3d 1214 (11th Cir. 2004).
- Nolon, John R., and Jessica A. Bacher. Westchester Day School v. Village of Mamaroneck, April 21, 2004. <http://www.law.pace.edu/landuse/DaySchool.html>.
- Paisner, Michael. Boerne Supremacy: Congressional Responses to City of Boerne v. Flores and the Scope of Congress's Article I Powers, Columbia Law Review 105 (2005): 537–82.
- Pelham, Thomas G. “The Church Next Door: Zoning Religious Uses.” In Sex, Religion and the Press: First Amendment Law for Local Government and Land Use Lawyers. Tallahassee: The Florida Bar, 2000.
- Rathkopf, Arden H., and Daren A. Rathkopf. The Law of Zoning and Planning. Vol. 2. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2003, and 2004 supplement.
- Stein, Gregory M., Early Land Use Cases, Continued Uncertainty. Probate and Property January/February (2005): 38–43.
- Stoebuck, William B., and Dale A. Whitman. The Law of Property. 3rd ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.

Willis, Clyde E. Student's Guide to Landmark Congressional Laws on the First Amendment. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2002.

Young, Kenneth H. Anderson's American Law of Zoning. 4th ed., vol. 2. Deerfield, IL: Clark Boardman Callaghan, 1996, and 2004 supplement.

Cases and Statutes Cited

American Indian Religious Freedom Act Amendments of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103-344, 108 Stat. 3125 (1994), 42 U.S.C.A. section 1996a

City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)

Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)

Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)

Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993, 42 U.S.C.A. sections 2000bb–2000bb-4

Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000, PL 106-274, 114 Stat. 803; 42 U.S.C.A. sections 2000cc–2000cc-5

Religious Liberty Protection Act of 1999, 1999 United States House Bill No. 1691 (as passed by the U.S. House of Representatives; and later denied by the U.S. Senate)

See also Accommodation of Religion; Application of First Amendment to States; Compelling State Interest; Defining Religion; Drugs, Religion, and Law; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; State Constitution Distinctions

ZONING LAWS AND “ADULT” BUSINESSES DEALING WITH SEX

The authority of local governments to regulate the location and operation of commercial enterprises by means of zoning is well established. When the regulated business is engaged in expressive activity protected by the First Amendment, however, this authority may be called into question. And when the expression takes the form of sexually oriented but nonobscene “adult” books, videos, or dancing, significant tension can arise between First Amendment freedoms and community values.

In addition to specifying particular geographical areas in which sexually oriented businesses must operate, zoning codes commonly require such enterprises either to be separated by a certain distance from other, similar businesses (as well as from schools, homes, parks, and churches) or, alternatively, to be clustered together into sexually oriented “combat zones.” Either strategy will usually be upheld if the regulation has the primary purpose of preventing adverse community impacts, is not aimed at suppressing a certain type of communication (that is, is content neutral), and does not unreasonably foreclose the public’s access to the protected expressive activity.

Standards of constitutionality in this field are somewhat tentative, in part because of the prevalence of highly fractionated Supreme Court cases decided by narrow majorities or pluralities. The Court was first asked to review a local zoning restriction of adult-oriented businesses in a 1976 case, Young v. American Mini-Theaters, Inc. In a plurality opinion authored by Justice Stevens, the Court upheld a Detroit ordinance requiring adult businesses to be separated by at least 1,000 feet from each other, and from residential properties. Oddly, the Stevens plurality applied the mid-level standard of review normally applied in equal protection cases not involving suspect classes, even though the ordinance had been challenged under the First Amendment. American Mini Theaters established that the Court would not afford adult entertainment the same degree of protection under the First Amendment as higher-valued forms of expression, such as political debate, but would nevertheless apply a meaningful level of scrutiny. This case also coined the doctrine of “secondary effects,” holding that local governments have a legitimate interest in controlling negative social activities and conditions that tend to accompany the operation of adult businesses.

The same rationale was applied to nude dancing establishments in Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim, a decision that yielded five different opinions, none of which commanded more than three votes; and was instrumental in City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc. The City of Renton’s zoning banned adult theaters from 95 percent of the city’s area. The Court upheld this ordinance because it was ostensibly aimed at mitigating negative secondary effects, although the city had not conducted a study to determine whether such effects were actually present. Finally, in 2003, a plurality of the Court upheld an adult-business dispersal ordinance in City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc. But a four-justice dissent called for striking down such laws as impermissible regulation of expressive content, and Justice Kennedy’s concurrence emphasized that dispersing the secondary effects of adult businesses must not have the effect of reducing protected speech.

R.S. RADFORD

References and Further Reading

Jelsema, Mindi M., Note: Zoning Adult Businesses after Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, St. Louis University Law Journal 47 (2003): 1117.

Mandelker, Daniel R., and John M. Payne. Planning and Control of Land Development: Cases and Materials. 5th ed. New York: Lexis, 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc., 535 U.S. 425 (2002)

City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., 475 U.S. 41 (1986)

Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61 (1981)

Young v. American Mini-Theaters, Inc., 427 U.S. 50 (1976)

See also Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; First Amendment and PACs; Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., 475 U.S. 41 (1986); Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61 (1981); Young v. American Mini-Theaters, Inc., 427 U.S. 50 (1976)

ZONING LAWS AND FREEDOM OF SPEECH

Zoning laws, which regulate how real property may be developed and used, can affect freedom of speech for three types of land uses: signs and billboards, adult entertainment businesses, and religious uses, including worship or study in homes. Zoning regulation of the freedom of expression associated with religious uses is, however, normally discussed in the context of religious freedom, rather than freedom of expression.

Courts closely scrutinize zoning laws that seek to ban or impose restrictions on uses associated with expressive activities because such activities are protected under the First Amendment. First Amendment law is complex and the Supreme Court has not developed a single standard of scrutiny or analytical test for determining when a zoning law that regulates speech violates the Constitution. Rather, depending on the nature of the regulation under review, the Court will judge zoning regulation of speech using one of several different tests that apply standards ranging from intermediate to strict scrutiny.

Several factors play a major role in determining the standard of scrutiny that a court will apply to a given zoning regulation. Zoning laws that differentiate on the basis of the content of expression, or that seek to ban a type of expression entirely, or that impose the requirement that one obtain discretionary governmental approval prior to engaging in speech will be subject to the strictest judicial scrutiny. This treatment is illustrated by the bans on real estate signs and on lawn signs struck down in Linmark Associates, Inc. v. Township of Willingboro (1977) and City of Ladue v. Gilleo (1994), respectively. In contrast, regulations that, regardless of content, merely control the “time, place, or manner” in which expression occurs, or which regulate commercial speech, or which merely require that one meet objective non-discretionary standards for a permit prior to engaging in “speech,” will be subject to some form of intermediate scrutiny. This treatment is illustrated by decisions upholding locational restrictions on adult entertainment businesses and commercial billboards in City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres (1986) and Metromedia, Inc. v. City of San Diego (1981), respectively.

While the strict scrutiny standard applied to content-based zoning regulations or to a content-neutral regulation that totally bans a distinct mode of expression is fairly straightforward, that is not the case when the Court applies intermediate, rather than strict, scrutiny. In these cases, the Court has applied slightly different versions of intermediate scrutiny depending on the focus of the zoning regulation. Thus, zoning regulations of commercial speech, such as business signs and commercial advertising billboards, as seen in Metromedia, and content-neutral “time, place or manner” zoning regulations of the location of adult entertainments businesses, as seen in City of Renton, are analyzed under slightly differing versions of intermediate scrutiny first announced in the Central Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York (1980) and United States v. O'Brien (1968) cases, respectively. Both tests focus, however, on whether the challenged zoning regulation has the effect of imposing only a minimal restriction on speech in an effort to advance a legitimate state interest that is unrelated to the suppression of lawful speech.

ALAN C. WEINSTEIN

References and Further Reading

Blaesser, Brian W., Alan C. Weinstein, and Daniel R. Mandelker. Federal Land Use Law and Litigation. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2005.

Mandelker, Daniel R., and Rebecca L. Rubin, eds. Protecting Free Speech and Expression: The First Amendment and Land Use Law. Chicago: ABA Publishing, 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Central Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York, 447 U.S. 557 (1980)

City of Ladue v. Gilleo, 512 U.S. 43 (1994)

City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, 475 U.S. 41 (1986)

Linmark Associates, Inc. v. Township of Willingboro, 431 U.S. 85 (1977)

Metromedia, Inc. v. City of San Diego, 453 U.S. 490 (1981)

United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)

ZORACH v. CLAUSON, 343 U.S. 306 (1952)

Thomas Jefferson wrote, in a famous letter in 1802, that the religious clause of the First Amendment was intended to create “a wall of separation” between church and state. Zorach v. Clauson is a significant case because the Court says that government must be separate from religion, but not hostile or unfriendly toward it.

The earliest cases on the topic were Cochran v. Louisiana (1930)—the state provided free textbooks to parochial school students on the same basis as it supplied books to public school students—and Everson v. Board of Education (1947)—a local school board subsidized the cost of public transportation for parochial school students on the same basis as public school students. In both cases, the Court reasoned that the primary beneficiaries were the students, not the church, so the wall of separation was not breached. The Everson decision has a comprehensive historical review of the establishment clause. Everson also holds that the First Amendment’s two religious proscriptions apply to the states because of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The next cases to reach the Supreme Court dealt with challenges to nonfinancial assistance to religious education programs—so-called “released time” programs. An Illinois statute allowed religious teachers to come into public schools during the school day once a week to provide religious instruction. Parents could request that their children attend such a religious class. Students without such parental consent would go elsewhere in the school for other activities. In the 1948 case of McCullum v. Board of Education, the Court struck down this program, saying that the combination of the use of tax-supported school buildings and the school system’s administration of attendance at these classes breached the required wall of separation.

In Zorach v. Clauson, the Court considered a New York program with one feature that differed from the Illinois arrangement. Here, parents could elect to have their children leave the public school forty-five minutes or an hour before the end of the school day to attend religious education classes at a religious institution. Students not participating in this program stayed in school for secular activities. The religious schools would report weekly about the attendance of students who were released to attend the religious classes.

The Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the New York program, distinguishing McCullum by pointing out that the religious instruction was taking place outside the public schools, and that they saw no evidence that students were coerced to participate.

Justice Douglas said that the First Amendment separation of church and state should be absolute, but that meant only that there should be no interference with the “free exercise” of religion nor should there be an “establishment” of religion. He summarized this argument with an oft-quoted phrase: “We are a religious people whose institutions presuppose a Supreme Being.” Douglas saw no problem with a government program that “respects the religious nature of our people and accommodates the public service to their spiritual needs.”

Douglas’s decision is interesting because it anticipated many cases that have more recently arisen. Douglas argued that if the Court were to disallow the New York program, one might carry the concept of separation to its logical extreme:

Municipalities would not be permitted to render police or fire protection to religious groups. Policemen who helped parishioners into their places of worship would violate the Constitution. Prayers in our legislative halls; the appeals to the Almighty in the messages of the Chief Executive; ... “so help me God” in our courtroom oaths—these and all other references to the Almighty that run through our laws, our public rituals, our ceremonies would be flouting the First Amendment. A fastidious atheist or agnostic could even object to the supplication with which the Court opens each session: “God save the United States and this Honorable Court.”

Three justices dissented. Justice Black said that when the state used “its compulsory education laws to help religious sects get attendants presumably too unenthusiastic to go unless moved to do so by the pressure of this state machinery.... This is not separation but combination of Church and State.”

Justice Frankfurter dissented because he thought it was likely that teachers pressured students to participate in the released time programs. Frankfurter said that the majority opinion relied on the absence of evidence of coercion in upholding the program. However, he pointed out, the trial court had barred any testimony on the subject of coercion, saying it was not relevant to the constitutional issue. This meant that the majority opinion was based on a faulty premise.

Justice Jackson noted that no real educational activity occurred during the released time, in order to prevent the students who stayed in school from forging ahead of those who attended the religious programs. Compulsory attendance in a school where no meaningful education was occurring meant, said Jackson, meant that the school would serve “as a temporary jail for a pupil who will not go to Church.”

Released time programs were probably at their peak in popularity at around the time of the decision in Zorach v. Clauson, with 2 million students nationwide participating in such programs. These programs have steadily declined since then, but several organizations that promote released time estimate that today there are still about 250,000 students in released time programs, in 1,000 school districts.

ELI C. BORTMAN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Cochran v. Louisiana State Board of Education, 281 U.S. 370 (1930)

Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)

McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203 (1948)

See also Application of First Amendment to States; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Establishment Clause: Theories of Interpretation; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clause; Pledge of Allegiance (“Under God”); Release Time from Public Schools (For Religious Purposes)

ZURCHER v. STANFORD DAILY, 436 U.S. 547 (1978)

Zurcher v. Stanford Daily is a noteworthy U.S. Supreme Court decision calibrating First and Fourth Amendment values. Zurcher also illustrates interaction among the Court, Congress, and the states.

Zurcher arose from a protest occasioned by Stanford University Hospital dismissing two employees—a black janitor and a Chicano neurosurgeon. On April 9, 1971, when law enforcement officials attempted to remove demonstrators occupying the hospital’s administrative offices, nine police were injured by demonstrators wielding sticks and clubs. One of officers saw someone photographing the encounter. That person was a Stanford Daily staffer. On April 11, the Daily published a special edition covering the confrontation including photographs the staffer had taken. Acting under a warrant, police searched the Daily offices. The warrant contained no assertion that members of the Daily staff were involved in unlawful acts at the hospital.

Zurcher contested the constitutionality of this “third-party” search.

Writing for a majority of five, Justice White sided with police chief James Zurcher. After observing that “[w]here ... materials sought to be seized may be protected by the First Amendment, ... requirements of the Fourth Amendment must be applied with ‘scrupulous exactitude.’” White concluded that “‘preconditions for a warrant ... afford sufficient protection against ... harms ... assertedly threatened by warrants for searching newspaper offices.’”

In 1980, responding to Zurcher, Congress adopted the Privacy Protection Act (PPA). The PPA states that government may not search a newsroom for the purpose of obtaining work product or documentary materials relating to a criminal investigation or criminal offense, if there is reason to believe that the work product belongs to someone who will publish it in a public communication...

Nine states also expanded legal protection against such third-party searches.

JAMES C. FOSTER

References and Further Reading

Bell, Bernard W., Judge White and the Exercise of Judicial Power: The Populism of Justice Byron R. White: Media Cases and Beyond, University of Colorado Law Review 74 (2003): 1425.

Marcus, Philip H., Comment: A Fourth Amendment Gag Order—Upholding Third Party Searches at the Expense of First Amendment Freedom of Association Guarantees, University of Pittsburgh Law Review 47 (1985): 257.

Meltzer, Daniel J., Jurisdiction and Remedies: Congress, Courts, and Constitutional Remedies, Georgetown Law Journal 86 (1998): 2537.

INDEX

A

A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure"
v. Massachusetts, 1–2, 1118
Cain v. Kentucky and, 212
Ginzburg v. United States and, 689
Miller test and, 1012–1013
Mishkin v. New York and, 1023
Rabe v. Washington and, 1255
AACU. See Association of American Colleges and Universities
AASS. See American Anti-Slavery Society
AAUP. See American Association of University Professors
ABA. See American Bar Association
Abandonment, 963
ABC-TV, 661
Abington Township School District v. Schempp, 2–4, 90, 131–133, 408, 533
Becker amendment, 117–118
Board of Education v. Allen and, 155
Clark, T., and, 309
Engel v. Vitale and, 502
establishment clause and, 530
evolution and, 1619
free exercise and, 1246
“In God We Trust” and, 1067
Lemon test and, 533
non-preferentialism standard and, 1109
school prayer and, 1196
separationism and, 767
Stone v. Graham and, 1563–1564
Wallace v. Jaffree and, 1736
Warren Court and, 1757, 1760
Ableman v. Booth, 1589
Abolitionism, of capital punishment, 232–233, 239–242
Abolitionism, of slavery, 4–7
Anthony and, 65
Bingham and, 145
Constitution and, 7
early, 53
Emancipation Proclamation and, 924
First Amendment and, 4–5
free speech and, 648–649
gag rules and, 66, 648
Garrison and, 676
Giddings and, 681
Kendall and, 883–884
Lovejoy and, 935
Mott and, 519
Rush and, 1386, 1387
Stanton and, 519, 1522
timeline of, 7
Walker and, 1734
Abolitionist Synagogue, 1485

Aboud v. Detroit Board of Education, 7, 1515
forced speech and, 601–602
University of Wisconsin v. Southworth and, 1700
Abortion, 8–11. See also Partial birth abortion; Roe v. Wade
ABA and, 432–433
ACLU and, 50
AFLA and, 29–30
Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health and, 34–35
ALI and, 433
AMA and, 432–433
Ashcroft and, 85
Bellotti v. Baird and, 281
Bigelow v. Virginia and, 330
Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic and, 180–181
Breyer and, 183
Burger Court and, 198–199
clinics, 34–35
coercion and, 1173
Colautti v. Franklin and, 324
commercial speech and, 330
Comstock and, 342
consent, 35
counseling, 673–674, 700, 712, 951 decisional privacy and, 828 dilation and evacuation, 10 dilation and extraction, 10
Doe v. Bolton and, 432–433
Douglas and, 445–446
due process clause and, 714
establishment clause and, 11–12
extremist groups and, 565
FACE Act and, 633–634
Falwell and, 575
federal funding of, 115–116, 746–747
Frisby v. Schultz and, 666
gag rules and, 672–674
government funding and, 951
Harris v. McRae and, 673, 1320, 1321, 1373
history of, 147
hospitals and, 1183
Hyde Amendment and, 1134
ICMCA and, 1061
implied rights and, 802
incest and, 951
indigents and, 115, 951
Internet and, 819–820
intrusion and, 836
Jackson Amendment and, 1134
Kennedy, A., and, 885
key cases, 1320–1322
Lambert v. Wicklund and, 905–906
laws, 8, 11–12
Lemon test and, 534
Madsen v. Women's Health Center, 948–949
Maher v. Roe and, 673–674, 725, 1320, 1321, 1324, 1388, 1389

INDEX

- Abortion (cont.)
 - marriage and, 966
 - McCorvey and, 987–988
 - Medicaid and, 12, 115–116, 746–747, 951, 1062
 - medical treatment and, 433
 - minors and, 34–35, 121–122, 250, 725, 905–906, 1284, 1321–1322, 1368–1369
 - NARAL and, 1061–1062
 - NOW and, 1068
 - O'Connor and, 1126
 - Operation Rescue and, 1133–1135
 - parental consent for, 250, 1173
 - parental notification and, 725, 905–906
 - personal autonomy rights and, 1533
 - physicians and, 324
 - picketing and, 1168–1169
 - Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth* and, 1172
 - Planned Parenthood v. American Coalition of Life Activists* and, 1653
 - Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft* and, 1475
 - Poelker v. Doe* and, 1183
 - poverty and, 747
 - privacy and, 1225, 1542
 - privileges and immunities and, 1231
 - protests, 12–13, 66–67, 633–634
 - rape and, 951
 - Rawls on, 1273
 - regulation of, 324
 - religion and, 11–12
 - Rush and, 1367
 - Rust v. Sullivan* and, 672–674, 1322, 1324, 1387–1388, 1674
 - Scalia and, 1416
 - Simopoulos v. Virginia* and, 1475
 - spousal consent and, 1173
 - stem cell research and, 1552
 - Stenberg v. Carhart* and, 1287, 1288, 1554–1555
 - substantive due process and, 608
 - Thomas and, 1650
 - Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists* and, 1652
 - Tribe and, 1668
 - as victimless crime, 1709
 - Victorian Age, 1368
 - viewpoint discrimination and, 1714, 1717
 - waiting periods, 35
 - Webster v. Reproductive Health Services* and, 1770
 - White, B., and, 1779
 - Wolf v. Colorado* and, 1790
- Abortion clinics, 34–35
 - McCorvey and, 988
- Abortion: The Clash of Absolutes* (Tribe), 1668
- Abrahamson, Shirley, 1545
- Abrams, Jacob, 13, 658
- Abrams v. United States*, 13–14, 1281, 1282, 1450
 - Brandeis and, 174
 - free speech and, 1794–1795
 - freedom of expression and, 1160, 1163
 - freedom of press and, 658
 - freedom of speech and, 644, 1642
 - Hand and, 736
 - Holmes and, 658, 771, 1795–1796
 - incitement of criminal activity and, 652–653
 - marketplace of ideas theory and, 962
 - Taft Court and, 1597
 - truth and, 994
- Vinson and, 1722
 - West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette*, 1776
 - White Court and, 1778
- Absolute disparity, 872
- Absolutism, 14–15
 - balancing test and, 100
 - royal, 505
 - states' rights and, 27
- Abstinence only, 148
- Abu Ghraib, 15–16
 - Amnesty International and, 60
 - War on Terror and, 1095
- Abuse
 - at Guantanamo Bay, 716
 - hostile environment harassment and, 777–778
 - marital, 795, 965
 - spousal murder and, 974–975
- Abuse of discretion, 1460
- Abzug, Bella, 677
- Academic freedom, 16–20, 1505–1506
 - censorship and, 1507
 - individual, 18–19
 - institutional, 19
 - in lower federal courts, 19–20
 - national security and, 1074
 - Scopes trial and, 1425
- Accademia delle Arte del Disegno, 1051
- Access
 - freedom of press and, 661–662
 - Internet, 821–822, 825
- Accommodation
 - history of, 22–23
 - modern standard of, 24
 - or religion, 22–24
 - theories of, 23
- Accomplices
 - confessions and, 24–25
 - felony murder, 236
 - proportionality and, 245
- Accountability, 62
- Accused
 - protections for, 1539–1540
 - rights of, 172, 1359–1361, 1363, 1764
 - Victim's Bill of Rights and, 1540
- Acevedo, Charles, 214–215
- Acevedo-Delgado v. Rivera*, 1515
- Ackerman, Bruce, 494
- Ackies v. Purdy*, 98
- ACLJ. See American Center for Law and Justice
- ACLU. See American Civil Liberties Union
- Acquired immune deficiency syndrome. See AIDS
- Acquittals. See also Autrefois acquit
 - jury nullification and, 869
- Act for Preventing Frauds of 1662
 - Writs of Assistance Act and, 1803
- Act of Settlement of 1701, 507
 - English Bill of Rights and, 503
 - Glorious Revolution and, 691
- ACT UP (AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power), 25–26
- Acton, James, 1707
- Acton, Lord John, 26–27, 150
- Actual malice standard, 27
 - New York Times Co. v. Sullivan* and, 403
 - public figures and, 1242–1243
 - public officials and, 1245

- Actus reus, 1185
- ADA. See Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990
- Adair v. United States*, 465
 - government intervention and, 928
- Adams, Abigail, 846
- Adams, John, 1750
 - Alien Acts and, 37–38
 - Bache and, 95–96
 - Biblical law and, 127
 - Boston Massacre and, 166, 308
 - compulsory process clause and, 344
 - Cushing and, 644
 - election of, 36
 - freedom of press and, 1206
 - Jefferson and, 845, 847
 - Kentucky Resolves and, 887
 - Madison and, 945
 - Marshall, J., and, 970
 - Otis and, 1139
 - People v. Croswell* and, 733
 - Sedition Act of 1798 and, 642–643
 - Virginia Resolves and, 887
- Adams, John Quincy
 - abolitionism and, 648
 - Calhoun and, 214
 - gag rules and, 66
 - Giddings and, 681
 - Jackson, A. and, 832
 - Petition Campaign and, 1156
 - right to petition and, 1353
 - slavery and, 1486
- Adams, Samuel, 1750
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1264, 1265
 - Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641 and, 979
 - Otis and, 1139
- Adams Theatre Co. v. Keenan*, 1381–1382
- Adams v. Howerton*, 773
- Adams v. Texas*, 932
- Adams v. Williams*, 1444
 - Michigan v. Summers* and, 1006
- Adamson v. California*, 74
 - Bill of Rights and, 1632
 - Bingham and, 145
 - Black, H., and, 263
 - Brandeis and, 176
 - due process incorporation and, 607–608
 - Frankfurter and, 618
 - Griswold v. Connecticut* and, 713
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803
 - overturning of, 618
 - Vinson Court and, 1720
- Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña*
 - Burger and, 205
 - Japanese internment and, 841
 - O'Connor and, 1127
 - race-based classifications and, 611
- ADC. See Aid to Dependent Children
- Addams, Jane, 256
- Adderly v. Florida*, 15
- Addington v. Texas*, 43
- ADEA. See Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967
- Adjudications
 - impartiality and, 799–800
 - juvenile, 396
- Adkins, Janet, 888
- Adkins v. Children's Hospital*, 465
 - due process and, 1580
 - freedom of contract and, 637
 - government intervention and, 928
 - Hughes Court and, 782
 - Taft Court and, 1596, 1601
- ADL. See Anti-Defamation League
- Adler v. Board of Education*, 17
 - free speech and, 1361
 - freedom of association and, 635
 - loyalty oaths and, 1612
- Administrative law, 183
 - judges, 799
- Administrative law judges (ALJs), 799
- Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 (APA), 799
 - FOIA and, 641
- Administrative process, 800
- Adolescent Family Life Act (AFLA), 29–30
 - Bowen v. Kendrick* and, 167
- Adoption
 - AFLA and, 29
 - child custody and, 279–280
 - consent and, 279
 - fathers and, 279–280
 - joint, 1398
 - notice of, 279–280
 - same-sex, 678, 1398–1399
 - second parent, 1398
 - veto, 279
- Adoption and Safe Families Act, 1463
- Adult bookstores
 - Pope v. Illinois* and, 1191
 - Schad v. Mt. Ephraim* and, 1418
 - zoning and, 1121
- Adult entertainment
 - secondary effects doctrine and, 1436
 - Vance v. Universal Amusement Co., Inc.* and, 1706–1707
 - Young v. American Mini Theatres* and, 1807
 - zoning and, 1121, 1820–1821
- Adultery
 - Bible and, 130
 - Hamurabi and, 1492
 - Kingsley International Pictures Corporation v. Regents of the University of New York* and, 891–892, 1042
 - Naim v. Naim* and, 1059
 - Patterson v. New York* and, 1150
 - punishments for, 1540
 - sexual orientation and, 1223
 - as victimless crime, 1709
- Advertising
 - alcohol, 614
 - antismoking, 1708
 - appropriation of name or likeness and, 77
 - Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp.* and, 161, 331
 - Braun v. Soldier of Fortune Magazine* and, 659
 - campaign financing and, 219
 - Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corporation v. Public Service Commission of New York* and, 257
 - Central Hudson* test and, 331
 - commercial speech v., 330
 - corporate speech and, 650
 - drugs and, 114
 - e-mail, 820
 - forced speech and, 602
 - 44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island* and, 614

INDEX

- Advertising (cont.)
 - Ginzburg v. United States* and, 688–689
 - Internet and, 819–820
 - Johanns v. Livestock Marketing Association* and, 602
 - lawyers and, 910
 - legal services and, 114
 - misleading, 332
 - obscenity and, 956–957, 1012
 - parodies, 575, 787
 - political, 632
 - Posadas de Puerto Rico v. Tourism Company* and, 1191–1192
 - professional, 1235–1236
 - by professionals, 1235–1236
 - smoking, 332
 - taxes on, 714
 - Virginia Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens' Consumer Council* and, 330–331
- Advocacy
 - of action, 1488
 - free speech and, 1415
 - of ideas, 1488
 - illegal, 178
 - of violence, 1488, 1511
- Adware, 820
- AEDPA. See Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996
- Aeropagitica* (Milton), 1450
- AFDC. See Aid to Families with Dependent Children
- Affirmations
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 360
 - U.S. Constitution and, 352
- Affirmative action, 30–31
 - ADL and, 70
 - Breyer and, 184
 - Burger and, 206
 - Gratz v. Bollinger* and, 688, 1443
 - Kennedy, A., and, 886
 - Marshall, T., and, 972–973
 - O'Connor and, 1127
 - Regents of the University of California v. Bakke* and, 973, 1284
- Affirmative rights. See Positive rights
- Afghanistan invasion, 1295
 - Ashcroft and, 85
 - AUMF and, 1520
 - enemy combatants and, 1346–1347
 - extradition and, 563
 - Lindh and, 790
 - media access and, 996
 - U.S. Constitution and, 355
- AFL. See American Federation of Labor
- AFLA. See Adolescent Family Life Act
- AFL-CIO
 - creation of, 337
 - Goldberg and, 695
 - Nike v. Kasky* and, 332
- AFPS. See American Fund for Public Service
- African Americans, 1511. See also National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Segregation
 - AASS and, 45–46
 - ABA and, 1571
 - ACLU and, 49
 - American Revolution and, 53
 - bail and, 1257
 - Baldus study and, 986
 - Beauharnais v. Illinois* and, 753
 - Bell and, 1773–1774
 - capital punishment and, 225–226, 228–229
 - choke holds on, 935
 - Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
 - Civil Rights Act of 1875 and, 300
 - cocaine and, 424, 1257
 - in congress, 1277–1278, 1294
 - cross burning and, 382–383, 1271
 - Darrow and, 394
 - death penalty and, 1257–1258
 - DeWitt and, 418
 - Dred Scott v. Sandford* and, 451–452, 790
 - drugs and, 1745
 - Emancipation Proclamation and, 493–494
 - felon disenfranchisement and, 583–584
 - Fisher v. Hurst* and, 1391
 - Fugitive Slave Act and, 353
 - Harlan, I. and, 738
 - Helper and, 760
 - immigration and, 1259
 - incorporation doctrine and, 802
 - Internet access of, 821
 - interracial cohabitation and, 991
 - interstate commerce and, 827
 - Jackson, A. and, 833
 - as jurors, 1539
 - jury nullification and, 876
 - jury trials and, 877–878
 - juveniles, 1255, 1258
 - KKK and, 895, 1420
 - La Follette and, 901
 - Loving v. Virginia* and, 936
 - lynching and, 243, 1442
 - marriage laws and, 964
 - Marshall, T., and, 971
 - miscegenation laws and, 1022–1023
 - miscegenation statutes for, 936
 - Mormons and, 1037
 - NAACP v. Alabama* and, 1058
 - NAACP v. Button* and, 1058
 - Omosegbon v. Wells* and, 1700
 - orphans, 1712
 - parole and, 1257
 - peonage laws and, 770
 - picketing and, 1167
 - Plessy v. Ferguson* and, 1181
 - police and, 1256, 1257, 1258
 - political patronage and, 1190
 - as prisoners, 1463
 - in prisons, 1257
 - privileges and immunities and, 1230
 - prosecution of, 1257
 - punishment and, 1646
 - racial discrimination and, 1256, 1257
 - racial profiling and, 675
 - rape and, 1257
 - restrictive covenants and, 368–369, 1324
 - Rush and, 1387
 - Scottsboro trials and, 1427–1428
 - sit-ins and, 412
 - Southern Poverty Law Center and, 1501
 - Storey and, 1570
 - suffrage of, 1541

- Swain v. Alabama* and, 1590
 Universal Negro Improvement Association and, 1262
 Vinson Court and, 1718, 1720
 Voting Rights Act of 1965 and, 1729–1730
 voting rights and, 890, 1257, 1562, 1725, 1726–1727
 Walker and, 1734–1735
 War on Drugs and, 1256, 1257
 White Court and, 1777
 Wilson, W., and, 1784
 African Charter of Human and Peoples' Rights, 1640
 freedom of expression and, 637
 African Episcopal Church of St. Thomas, 1387
 African Methodist Episcopal (AME) Church, 1734
 African National Congress, 791
Afroyim v. Rusk dual citizenship and, 456
 expatriation and, 562
 Agamben, Giorgio, 1032
 Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967
 (ADEA), 71
Age of Federalism, The (Elkins and McKittrick), 643
Age of Reason II, The (Paine), 96
Age of Reason, The (Paine), 1143
 Agee, Philip
 CIA and, 730
 Intelligence Identities Protection Act and, 817
 Age-of-consent law, 1550
 gay and lesbian rights, 678
 Aggravating factors, 109, 231
 death penalty and, 227
 Georgia and, 232
 Godfrey v. Georgia and, 691
 jury nullification and, 870
 Zant v. Stephens and, 237
 Aggressive patrolling, 1446
 Agitators, 507
Agostini v. Felton, 31–32, 1527
 Burger Court and, 199
 government funding and, 542
 Hunt v. McNair and, 785
 Mitchell v. Helms and, 1024–1025
 reversal of, 33
 Souter and, 1496
 Agreement of the People, 505
 English liberties and, 507
 Agricultural Labor Relations Board, 275
 Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee (AWOC), 275
 Agriculture Adjustment Administration, 603
 Agriculture, forced speech and, 602
Aguilar v. Felton, 32–33, 1527
 Agostini v. Felton and, 31–32
 Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet
 and, 157
 Burger Court and, 199
 establishment clause and, 537, 542
 probable cause and, 1235
 Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District and, 1816
Aguilar v. Texas, 1435
Ah Kow v. Numan, 586
Ahrens v. Clark, 1390–1391
 Aid and comfort, 1665
 Aid to Dependent Children (ADC), 965
 Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC), 168, 1396
 abolishment of, 693
 Dandridge v. Williams and, 393
 Goldberg v. Kelly and, 692
 Shapiro v. Thompson and, 1466
 AIDS, 1400, 1406. See also HIV/AIDS
 ACT UP and, 25–26
 ADA and, 71
 assisted suicide and, 888
 Cohn and, 323
 drugs, 26
 gay and lesbian rights and, 677
 Helms Amendment and, 759
 prostitution and, 1463
 AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power. See ACT UP
 Aimster, 823
 Air Force
 free exercise clause and, 698–699
 Goldman v. Weinberger and, 852, 1007, 1303
 Reid v. Covert and, 1290–1291
 AIRFA. See American Indian Religious Freedom Act
 AIRFAA. See American Indian Religious Freedom Act Amendments Airports
 as nonpublic forums, 1245
 as public forums, 1663
 searches, 33–34 speech regulations, 417
 warrants and, 1752
 AJC See American Jewish Committee
Ake v. Oklahoma, 235
Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 9, 34–35, 1475
 abortion and, 673
 Eisenstadt v. Baird and, 484
 establishment clause and, 11–12
 Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft and, 1174
 Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists and, 1652
 Alabama
 Equal Justice Initiative and, 1499
 establishment clause and, 1737
 NAACP and, 1064
 NAACP v. Alabama and, 1057
 New York Times Co. v. Sullivan and, 1088, 1754
 prayer and, 1438
 voting in, 1729–1730
 Voting Rights Act of 1965 and, 1729
 Wallace v. Jaffree and, 1737
Alabama and Coushatta Tribes of Texas v. Trustees of Big Sandy Independent School District, 1307
Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 1064
 Alabama Public Services Commission, 348
 Alamo Foundation, 571
 Alan Guttmacher Institute, 633
 Alaska
 civil liberties and, 1545, 1546
 marijuana and, 1744
 non-funding provisions in, 153 personal autonomy rights and, 1533
 privacy and, 1531
 search and seizure in, 1532
 voting in, 1729–1730
 Alaskan Natives, 51
Alberts v. California, 1117
Albertson v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 1454 Alcohol. See also Bootlegging; Liquor licensing abuse, 452–453
 automobile searches and, 91

INDEX

- Alcohol (cont.)
 - Breithaupt v. Abram* and, 181
 - checkpoints and, 1004
 - days of religious observance and, 399
 - DWI and, 469
 - Federal Railway Administration and, 452
 - Field and, 586
 - Hester v. United States* and, 763
 - intoxication defense and, 814
 - labeling, 332
 - McCarthy and, 985
 - moonshine, 1239
 - nudity and, 111
 - Olmstead v. United States* and, 1129
 - Powell v. Texas* and, 1193
 - pregnancy and, 1322
 - pricing, 332
 - Prohibition and, 1238–1239
 - Quinlan and, 1254
 - statutory religion-based exemptions and, 559–560
 - taxes on, 1684
 - War on Drugs and, 1739
- Alcohol advertising, 614
 - 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island* and, 1708
 - FCC and, 1708
- Alcohol testing
 - California v. Trombetta* and, 217
 - DWI and, 470
 - Jacobson v. Massachusetts* and, 836
- Alcorn College, 548
- Alcorta v. Texas*, 35
 - Napue v. Illinois* and, 1061
- Alexander, Clarence, 80
- Alexander, James, 1814
 - freedom of press and, 1202
 - Zenger and, 734
- Alford, Henry C., 1111
- Alger, Horatio, Jr., 248
- Alger, Jonathan, 221
- Ali, Muhammad
 - conscientious objection and, 350, 1474–1475
 - Covington and, 372
- ALI. See American Law Institute
- Alibis, of Sacco and Vanzetti, 1395–1396
- Alien(s). See also Immigrants; Noncitizens; Undocumented migrants
 - Bible and, 129
 - civil liberties of, 40–41
 - Congress and, 792
 - due process and, 798
 - due process protection for, 461
 - Fong Yue Ting v. United States* and, 600
 - Hoover and, 774
 - Hughes and, 783
 - Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Lopez-Mendoza* and, 798
 - INA and, 983
 - plenary power doctrine and, 893
 - rights of, 792
 - smuggling, 295
- Alien Act of 1798, 790, 945–946
- Alien Act of 1918
 - free speech and, 1794
 - noncitizens and, 1105–1106
 - Palmer and, 1144
 - Wilson, W., and, 1784
- Alien and Sedition Acts, 36–40, 1636
 - Adams, J. and, 642–643
 - Bache and, 96
 - Debs and, 400
 - Jefferson and, 846
 - Kentucky Resolves and, 887–888
 - national security and, 1072
 - naturalization and, 294
 - Virginia Resolves and, 887–888
 - White Court and, 1778
- Alien Contract Labor Act of 1885, 288
- Alien Enemies Act, 37
- Alien Friends Act, 37–38
- Alien Immigration Act, 1073
- Alien Land Use Cases*, 1107
 - Butler and, 209
- Alien Registration Act of 1940, 68. See also Smith Act of 1940
 - Biddle and, 134
 - freedom of association and, 635
 - Harisiades v. Shaughnessy* and, 737, 792
 - New Deal and, 1083
- Alire v. Jackson*, 809
- Alison D. v. Virginia M.*, 1407
- Alito, Samuel
 - appointment of, 11
 - ODWDA and, 1137
- ALJs. See Administrative law judges
- All deliberate speed formula, 619
- All Eyez on Me* (Shakur), 764
- All the Laws but One: Civil Liberties in Wartime* (Rehnquist), 646–647, 842, 1636
- Allegheny College, 394
- Allegheny County v. Greater Pittsburgh American Civil Liberties Union*
 - endorsement test and, 938
 - O'Connor and, 1126
- Allen, Teresa Carol, 709
- Allen v. Illinois*, 43
 - Estelle v. Smith* and, 544
- Allen v. State Board of Elections*, 1764
- Allgeyer v. Louisiana*
 - due process and, 1580
 - economic rights and, 478
 - Field and, 586
 - Peckham and, 1633
 - substantive due process and, 465, 1633
- Alliance of Baptists, 909
- Alligood, Clarence, 1501
- Allison, Robert, 1053
- Almeida-Sanchez v. United States*, 380
- “Alone Again (Naturally)” (O’Sullivan), 764
- Altgeld, John Peter, 394
- Althusser, Louis, 1032
- Alton Observer*, 1486
 - Lovejoy and, 935
- Alzheimer’s disease
 - physician-assisted suicide and, 888
 - Reagan and, 1553–1554
 - stem cell research and, 1551
- A&M Records v. Napster*, 1002
- AMA. See American Medical Association
- Amalgamated Food Employees Union Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza*, 44
 - First Amendment and, 926

- Lloyd Corporation v. Tanner* and, 926
Marshall, T., and, 972
Amalgamated Woodworkers' International Union, 394
Amar, Akhil Reed
 Bingham and, 147
 exclusionary rule and, 957
Amaru, Tupac, 306
Amazon.com one-click system, 824
Ambach v. Norwick, 41, 44–45
Ambiguity, vagueness doctrine and, 1705
AME. See African Methodist Episcopal Church
Amerasia, 322
America Online (AOL), 45
 CDA and, 336
American Academy of Family Physicians, 1398
American Academy of Pediatrics, 1398
American Academy of Pediatrics v. Lungren, 1533
American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Organization, 46
American Anti-Slavery Society (AASS), 4, 45–46, 883, 1485
 Anthony and, 65
 Petition Campaign and, 1155–1156
American Association of People with Disabilities v. Hood, 1357
American Association of People with Disabilities v. Smith, 1357
American Association of University Professors (AAUP), 16, 1505 American Bar Association (ABA)
 abortion and, 432–433
 African Americans and, 1571
 Bork and, 165
 Burger and, 205–206
 Canons of Professional Ethics, 910 on criminalization of civil wrongs, 382
 on discrimination, 228
 homosexuality and, 1405
 Judicial Canon 35 and, 662
 mandatory fees for, 602
 Model Code of Judicial Conduct, 859
 Model Code of Professional Responsibility, 910
 Model Rule of Professional Conduct, 1481
 In re Griffiths and, 812
 status offenses and, 1550
 Weddington and, 1771
American Birth Control League, 1411
American Booksellers Association, Inc., et al v. William H. Hudnut II, 46–47, 660, 943
 Dworkin and, 470
 free speech and, 1642
 pornography and, 1121
American Center for Law and Justice (ACLJ), 286 American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), 47–50
 abortion and, 50
 ACLJ and, 286
 African Americans and, 49
 airport searches and, 33–34
 anticommunism and, 104
 attorneys and, 1059
 Baldwin and, 101–105
 Becker Amendment and, 118
 beginnings of, 1798
 Berhanu v. Metzger and, 1502
 CDA and, 336–337
 censorship and, 48, 1317–1318
 civil liberties and, 47
 death penalty and, 240
 DHS and, 416
 Emerson and, 498
 evolution and, 48
 formation of, 658
 founder of, 101
 Frankfurter and, 617
 Free Speech Committee, 498
 freedom of speech and, 47–48
 Gilmore and, 684
 Ginsburg and, 686–687
 Hardwick and, 168
 Hentoff and, 760
 Jews and, 852
 labor unions and, 48
 Lambda and, 904
 Lee v. Weisman and, 911
 Marshall, T., and, 971
 McCain-Feingold law and, 220
 Meese and, 997
 Meiklejohn and, 999
 Minersville School District v. Gobitis and, 591–593
 Miranda and, 1021, 1456
 Murphy and, 1047
 NAACP v. Button and, 1059
 Naier and, 307
 NARAL and, 1062
 New Deal and, 1083
 pornography censorship and, 942
 Quakers, 103
 religion and, 48–49 religious school funding and, 1527
 Reno and, 1317–1318
 in Reno v. ACLU, 660, 663, 819, 1279, 1315–1317
 RICO and, 1334, 1335
 same-sex marriage and, 1402
 Scopes trial and, 103, 1425
 Smith Act and, 104
 Strossen and, 1573
 terrorism and, 50
 Watergate scandal and, 50
 Wolman v. Walter and, 1790
 women's rights and, 50
 Women's Rights Project, 686–687
 Zelman v. Simmons-Harris and, 1813
American Civil Liberties Union v. Capital Square Review and Advisory Board, 343
American Civil Liberties Union v. City of Stow, 371
American Civil Liberties Union v. Jennings, 219
American College of Obstetricians, 1554
American Colonization Society, 45
American Commonwealth, The (Bryce), 343
American Communication Association v. Douds, 51
 CPUSA and, 338
 Vinson and, 1722
 Vinson Court and, 1719
American Conservative Union, 219
American Convention on Human Rights
 data privacy and, 1223
 Declaration of Principles on Freedom of Expression and, 640
 freedom of expression and, 637
American Declaration of Human Rights and Duties of Man, 1639
 data privacy and, 1223
 Declaration of Principles on Freedom of Expression and, 640
 freedom of expression and, 637
 Inter-American Court and, 638
American Enterprise Institute, 166
American Family Association, 909

INDEX

- American Federation of Labor (AFL), 337. See also AFL-CIO
- KKK and, 897
- American Freedom and Catholic Power* (Blanshard), 56
- American Fund for Public Service (AFPS), 103
- American Heritage Dictionary of the English Language*, 608–609
- American Hospital Association, 166
- American Indian Religious Freedom Act (AIRFA), 51–52, 454, 1818
 - Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association* and, 939
 - Native Americans and, 1078
- American Indian Religious Freedom Act Amendments (AIRFAA), 501
- American Indians. See Native Americans
- American Jewish Committee (AJC), 852
- American Jewish Congress
 - AFLA and, 29
 - Becker Amendment and, 118
 - religious school funding and, 1527
- American Jurist, The*, 1584
- American Law Institute (ALI), 9
 - abortion and, 433
 - entrapment by estoppel and, 510
 - insanity defense and, 814
 - Model Code of Pre-Arrest Procedure of, 1444
 - Model Penal Code, 9, 196, 433, 510, 1320, 1329
 - sodomy and, 1405
- American Law Review*, 769
- American Legion, 593
- American Library Association
 - CDA and, 336
 - CIPA and, 825
 - national security and, 1074
- American Medical Association (AMA)
 - abortion and, 8, 432–433
 - Anslinger and, 64
 - Bowen v. American Hospital Association* and, 166
 - Committee on Ethics, 8
 - partial birth abortions and, 1554
 - PAS and, 1164
- American Newspaper Guild, 694
- American Peace Society, 1584
- American Protective League, 1518
- American Psychiatric Association (APA)
 - future dangerousness and, 110
 - homosexuality and, 1405
- American Psychological Association, 1405
- American Psychology/Law Society (AP/LS)
 - lineups and, 567, 925
- American Railway Union (ARU), 1472
 - Darrow and, 394
 - Debs and, 400
- American Republic
 - Bible and, 125–130
 - freedom and, 126–127
- American Revolution, 52–55, 1296, 1352
 - Baptists and, 108
 - bills of attainder and, 135
 - Burke and, 207
 - capital punishment and, 239
 - Cato and, 994
 - church property after, 291–292
 - economic rights and, 475–476
 - English Toleration Act and, 505
 - establishment clause and, 525
 - freedom of association and, 634
 - historical interpretation of, 54–55
 - Invalid Pensioners Act and, 844
 - Jews in, 851
 - liberty and, 135
 - lynching and, 242
 - Madison and, 943
 - Marshall, J., and, 969
 - Maryland Toleration Act and, 976
 - Mason and, 977
 - military chaplains and, 268
 - right to bear arms and, 1338–1339
 - right to petition and, 1352
 - slave marriages after, 964
- American Society of Newspaper Editors (ASNE), 661
- American Steel Foundries v. Tri-City Central Trades Council*, 1601
- American Sugar Refining Company, 1471
- American Supreme Court, The* (McCloskey), 1634
- American territories
 - grand juries in, 740
- American Tobacco Company, 1471
- American Union Against Militarism (AUAM), 1798
 - Baldwin and, 102
- American Veterans for Equal Rights, 1461
- American Woman Suffrage Association, 1522
- Americanism, 1280
- Americans for Democratic Action, 1269
 - Biddle and, 134
- Americans United for Separation of Church and State (Americans United), 56–57, 285
 - Dawson and, 397
 - Wolman v. Walter* and, 1790
- Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA), 71
 - voting rights and, 1356
- AmeriCorps VISTA program, 422
- Amherst College
 - Marshall, T., and, 971
 - Meiklejohn and, 998
- Amici curiae, 457
- Amish, 57–58
 - autopsies and, 93
 - education and, 1541
 - statutory religion-based exemptions and, 560
 - taxes and, 629
 - Torcaso v. Watkins* and, 1044
 - United States v. Lee* and, 629, 1684
 - Wisconsin v. Yoder* and, 628, 1470, 1586, 1787
- Amistad, The, 1572
- Ammann, Jacob, 57
- Amnesty, for undocumented migrants, 1675
- Amnesty International, 59–60
 - chain gangs and, 263
- Amos, Christine, 1302
- Amphetamines, 1743
- Amsterdam, Anthony G., 60
 - Witherspoon v. Illinois* and, 240
- Anal intercourse. See Sodomy
- Anarchy, 67–69, 1395
 - Gitlow and, 1186
- Anatomy of a Murder* (movie), 1773
- Anders v. California*, 60–61
- Anderson v. Creighton*, 1783
- Andresen v. Maryland*, 1435
- Andrews, George W., 1756
- Andros, Edmond, 979

- Anglicans. See Church of England
- Anglo-American law
obscenity and, 1115
privileges and immunities and, 1230
- Anglo-Saxon law, 97
- Animal sacrifice, 289
- Annan, Kofi, 716
- Annapolis Convention, 944
- Anonymity, free speech and, 62–63
- Anonymous proxies, 63
- Anonymous remailers, 63
- Anslinger, Harry Jacob, 63–64, 1742
- Ansonia Board of Education v. Philbrook*, 1301
- Antebellum period, 6
- Antelope, The*, 342
- Anthony, Daniel, 64
- Anthony, Susan B., 64–65, 520, 1522
IWSA and, 256
marriage laws and, 964
Sumner and, 1585
women's suffrage and, 1793
- Anti-Anarchy Act, 689, 1395
- Anti-anarchy statutes, 67–69
- Anti-Cybersquatting Consumer Protection Act, 824
- Anti-Defamation League (ADL), 69–70
Becker Amendment and, 118
Engel v. Vitale and, 852
hate crime laws and, 750
Internet and, 819
Southern Poverty Law Center and, 1502
- Anti-discrimination laws, 70–71
Boy Scouts of America v. Dale and, 170, 1363, 1381
Kunstler and, 898
national security and, 789–790
- Anti-Federalism, 1205
- Antifederalist Paper No. 84*, 1632
- Anti-Federalists, 1264, 1267, 1314, 1340
Bill of Rights and, 140, 143, 1325, 1326, 1339–1340
confrontation clause and, 345
Madison and, 141, 1326
- Anti-gun control. See Guns
- Anti-Imperialist League, 1571
- Anti-Injunction Act, 867
- Anti-mask statutes
hate crime laws and, 749
KKK and, 897
- Antimiscegenation statutes, 406, 964. See also Miscegenation laws
elimination of, 966
Loving v. Virginia and, 518, 1368
Warren and, 936
- Antinomianism, 61
- Antipolygamy laws, 72–73
- Antipornography ordinances
Dworkin and, 470
MacKinnon and, 942–943
- Antirape movement, 434
- Anti-Semitism
ADL and, 69
extremist groups and, 565
Order No. 11 and, 709
- Anti-Skid Row Ordinance, 1808
- Anti-Slavery Society
Douglass and, 448
Petition Campaign and, 1156
- Antisubversion laws, 134
- Anti-Syndicalism Act, 689, 1395
- Anti-syndicalism statutes, 67–69
- Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA), 233–234, 1623
habeas corpus and, 727
Muslims and, 1052–1053
USA PATRIOT Act and, 1148
- Antitrust laws
Breyer and, 183
Stevens and, 1555
- Antiwar movement
Kunstler and, 898
marriage and, 965
Mitchell and, 1026
- AOL. See America Online
- APA. See Administrative Procedure Act of 1946
- Apartheid
miscegenation laws and, 1022
race-based classifications and, 611
- AP/LS. See American Psychology/Law Society
- Apodaca, Robert, 73
- Apodaca v. Oregon*, 73
Harlan, I, and, 743
incorporation doctrine and, 803
- Apology* (Socrates), 1451
- Appeal* (Walker), 1734
- Appeal to Reason* (Debs), 400
- Appeals. See also Right of appeal costs of, 710–711
double jeopardy and, 230
habeas corpus petitions and, 230 interlocutory, 868 late, 324–325
legal counsel and, 60–61
Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania and, 230
- Appellate review, automatic, 230
- Apple Computers, Inc. v. Doe*, 664
- Apportionment. See Reapportionment
- Apprendi, Charles, 76
- Apprendi v. New Jersey*, 76
Stevens and, 1558
- Appropriation of name or likeness, 77
Hustler Magazine v. Falwell and, 787
- Appropriations clause, 296
- Aptheker, Herbert, 77
- Aptheker v. Secretary of State*, 77–78
CPUSA and, 338
Goldberg and, 697
- Arab Americans. See also Muslims
after 9/11, 1259
detention of, 1626
FBI and, 50
racial profiling of, 1623
- Arabian Nights, The*, 649
- Arabs. See also Muslims deportation of, 1625 detention of, 1625–1626
hate crimes on, 789–790
- Arbitrariness
Eighth Amendment and, 234
jury trials and, 875
mandatory death sentences and, 953
protections against, 236–237
- Arcara v. Cloud Books*, 363

INDEX

- Archer, Glen, 57
- Areopagitica* (Milton), 815
 - marketplace of ideas theory and, 962
- Argersinger v. Hamlin*, 1350, 1351
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803
- Aristide, Jean, 390
- Aristophanes, 163
- Aristotle, 1242
 - civil liberties and, 1026
 - civil rights and, 1638
- Arizona
 - Alien Land Law in, 1107
 - privacy and, 1531
 - Ricketts v. Adamson* and, 1333–1334
 - undocumented migrants and, 1675
 - voting in, 1729–1730
- Arizona v. Evans*, 1686
- Arizona v. Fulminante*, 78
- Arizona v. Hicks*, 78
 - plain view and, 1171
- Wilson v. Layne* and, 1783
- Arizona v. Roberson*, 209
- Arizona v. Youngblood*, 79
 - Brady v. Maryland* and, 173
 - California v. Trombetta* and, 217
 - United States v. Agurs* and, 1679
- Ark, Wong Kim, 293
- Arkansas
 - Alien Land Law in, 1107
 - evolution and, 1438
 - NAACP and, 1064
 - Rock v. Arkansas* and, 1366–1367
 - slavery and, 1485
- Arkansas Department of Corrections, 932
- Arkansas Educational Television Commission v. Forbes*, 1279
 - viewpoint discrimination and, 1715
- Arkansas National Guard, 187
- Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corporation*, 611
- Armstrong, Herbert W., 366
- Armstrong v. United States*, 1533, 1605
- Army
 - McCarthy and, 984
 - polygamy and, 1034–1036
 - segregation, 418
- Army War College, 418
- Army-McCarthy hearings, 309, 984
 - Cohn and, 323
 - Welch and, 1772–1773
- Arnold, Thurman, 603
- Aronow v. United States*, 1067
- Arraignments, 79–80
 - prompt, 991
- Arrest(s), 80–81
 - illegal, 665–666
 - in-home, 976
 - Orozco v. Texas* and, 1137
 - probable cause and, 1234, 1444–1445, 1698
 - Salvation Army and, 1397
 - seizures and, 1444–1445
 - United States v. Watson* and, 1698
 - without warrants, 79, 82–83, 598
 - warrants and, 81, 1752
 - Wong Sun v. United States* and, 1792
- Arrest warrants, 81
 - arrests without, 79, 82–83, 598
 - Gerstein v. Pugh* and, 679
 - Monroe v. Pape* and, 1030
- Art
 - Bruce and, 188–189
 - censorship of, 1051–1052
 - fair use doctrine and, 572
 - free speech and, 1451
 - sexual expression as, 894
- Articles of Confederation, 55
 - Chase and, 274
 - criticism of, 357
 - double jeopardy in, 438
 - freedom of press and, 1205
 - Mason and, 978
 - Petition Campaign and, 1155
 - privileges and immunities and, 1230
- Articles of Confederation of the United Colonies of New England, 326–327
- Articles of War, 268
- Artificial insemination, 1398
 - lesbians and, 1400
- ARU. See American Railway Union
- Aryan Nations, 566
- ASA. See Association for the Study of Abortion
- As-applied challenge, 1024
- Ashcroft, John, 84–86
 - assisted suicide and, 87
 - FOIA and, 662
 - NRA and, 1071
 - ODWDA and, 1137
 - PAS and, 1166
 - surveillance and, 1519
 - TIPS and, 1520
- Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union*, 660
 - Internet and, 819
 - Internet filtering and, 824–825
 - Miller test and, 1012
 - New York v. Ferber* and, 1092
 - obscenity and, 1125
 - sexually explicit materials and, 1120
- Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition*, 83–84, 252, 283, 284
 - Breyer and, 183
 - child pornography and, 283, 660
 - obscenity and, 1120, 1125, 1228
 - overbreadth doctrine and, 1139
- Ashcroft v. Tennessee*, 316
- Ashe v. Swenson*, 441
- Asian American citizenship, 293
- Asians
 - antimiscegenation statutes for, 936
 - immigration and, 1259
 - INA and, 796–797, 983
 - miscegenation laws and, 1022
 - Murphy and, 1047
- ASNE. See American Society of Newspaper Editors
- Assassination, 1260
 - CIA and, 258
 - of foreign leaders, 1519
 - of King, 890
 - of Lincoln, 924
 - of Long, 934
 - by Ray, 959
- Assault rifles, 1523

- Assembly. See also Open-air assembly
 - Salvation Army and, 1396
 - slavery and, 1483
- Assembly of God, 85
- Assisted suicide, 86–88. See also Euthanasia; Physician-assisted suicide
 - active euthanasia and, 547–548
 - Ashcroft and, 85
 - Kevorkian and, 888–889
 - legal context, 86–87
 - political context, 87–88
 - Scalia and, 1416
- Associated Press, 307
- Associated Press v. United States Department of Defense*, 800
- Associated Press v. United States District Court for the Central District of California*, 1428
- Associated Press v. Walker*
 - public figures and, 1242
 - Warren Court and, 1755
- Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, 1239
- Association for the Study of Abortion (ASA), 1061–1062
- Association of American Colleges and Universities (AACU), 1505
- Association. See Freedom of association
- Asylum, 88–89
- Atheism, 89–91
 - Bible reading and, 132
 - Communism and, 254
 - Warren Court and, 1756
- Atkins v. Virginia*, 224, 241, 386
 - Breyer and, 183
 - mental retardation and, 232
 - O'Connor and, 1127
 - Stevens and, 1558
- Atlantic Monthly*, 617
- Attica Correctional Facility, 898–899
- Attorney-client privilege, 708
- Attorneys
 - ACLU and, 1059
 - advertising and, 910
 - appointed, 125
 - Bradwell v. Illinois* and, 273
 - disciplining, 420
 - extrajudicial statements by, 420
 - Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada* and, 679
 - In re Griffiths* and, 812
 - ineffective assistance of counsel and, 810
 - judgeship of, 859
 - legal service, 1324
 - mandatory fees and, 602
 - NAACP v. Button* and, 1058
 - out-of-court statements of, 671
 - personal injuries and, 1236
 - private, 704
 - professional advertising by, 1235–1236
 - religious garb worn by, 1306
 - right to counsel and, 1345–1346
 - slaves and, 1483, 1484
- Attucks, Crispus, 166
- Atwater v. Lago Vista*, 1497
- AUAM. See American Union Against Militarism
- Audi, Robert, 1027, 1296
- Auditing, 286
- Augustine, Saint, 361
- Augustinian Fathers, 291
- AUMF. See Authorization for Use of Military Force
- Aurora*, 96
- Austin v. James*, 263
- Austin v. Michigan*, 201
- Austin v. United States*, 296
- Australia
 - same-sex unions in, 1404
 - women and, 1728
- Austria, judicial review in, 865
- Austrian Socialist party, 639
- Authoritarianism, 1295
- Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF), 1520
 - Hamdi v. Rumsfeld* and, 731
 - War on Terror and, 1094
- Autobiography* (Jefferson), 845
- Autobiography* (Mill), 1011
- Autobiography of Malcolm X* (Malcolm X), 1495
- Automobile searches, 91–92. See also Fourth Amendment; Vehicles
 - Carroll v. United States* and, 251
 - checkpoints and, 275–276
 - City of Indianapolis v. Edmond* and, 806
 - Delaware v. Prouse* and, 412
 - DWI and, 469
 - Florida v. Jimeno* and, 597
 - Florida v. White* and, 598
 - fruit of the poisonous tree and, 667
 - Illinois v. Krull* and, 793–794
 - Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz* and, 1004
 - suspicionless, 412
- Automobiles. See also Vehicles
 - impoundment of, 92
 - Wyoming v. Houghton* and, 1804
- Autonomy
 - free speech and, 1451, 1643
 - privacy and, 1225
- Autopsies, 92–93
- Autrefois acquit*, 437
- Autrefois convict*, 437
- Autry, James, 1551
- Autry v. McKaskle*, 1551
- Aware Woman Center for Choice, 66
 - Operation Rescue and, 1134
- AWOC. See Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee
- Axson-Flynn v. Johnson*, 19
 - free exercise and, 1246
 - public schools and, 1246
- AZT, profiteering and, 26

B

- Bache, Benjamin Franklin, 95–96
- Backup copies, 822
- Backus, Isaac, 109, 1314
- Bad tendency test, 96–97, 1510
 - in 1930s, 659
 - Masses Publishing Company v. Patten* and, 980
- Bader, Celia, 684–685
- Bader, Nathan, 684
- Baehr v. Lewin*, 405, 1401
 - don't ask, don't tell policy and, 677
- Baehr v. Miike*, 1401
- Bagshaw, Elizabeth, 1134
- Bail, 97–99
 - 1689 English Bill of Rights and, 1537
 - African Americans and, 1257

INDEX

Bail (cont.)

- concept of, 97
- decisions, 98–99
- in drug cases, 1745
- excessive, 1207
- federal law and, 97–98
- Hispanics and, 1257
- history of, 97
- preventative detention and, 1207
- proportional punishment and, 1241
- reductions, 99
- schedules, 98
- Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723
- Zenger and, 1814–1815

Bail Reform Act of 1966, 97–98

Bail Reform Act of 1984, 98

- material witnesses and, 981

Bailey, Gamaliel, 1486

Bailey v. Alabama, 1649

- Holmes and, 770
- Hughes and, 783
- White Court and, 1777

Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Company, 1601

Bailyn, Bernard, 55

Bair v. Shippensburg University, 1188–1189

Baker, C. Edwin, 1449

Baker, Eric, 59

Baker v. Carr, 496

- Frankfurter and, 619–620
- Harlan, I. and, 742
- political question doctrine and, 868
- reapportionment and, 1275, 1276, 1728
- Warren and, 1763, 1764
- Warren Court and, 1760

Baker v. City of Fairbanks, 1545–1546

Baker v. F & F Investment, 1579

Baker v. Nelson, 1400

Baker v. State of Vermont, 1402, 1409

Bakery and Pastry Drivers Local v. Wohl, 1562

Bakeshop Act, 928

Bakke v. Regents of the University of California, 1443

Balanced treatment statutes, 1616

- Powell, Lewis, and, 1194

Balancing test, 99–100, 100–101, 1511

- exclusionary rule and, 798
- freedom of press and, 662
- Hamdi v. Rumsfeld* and, 731
- Vinson and, 414

Baldus, David C., 101, 229

- Baldus study and, 986

Baldus study, 101, 229

- McCleskey v. Kemp* and, 225, 986

Baldwin, Roger, 47, 101–105

- ACLU and, 1798

Baldwin, William, 102

Ball, William, 1788

Ballard, Guy, 1476

Ballard v. United States, 1720

Ballew v. Georgia, 105

Ballot initiatives, 105–106

Balsys, Aloyzas, 1679

Baltimore & Ohio Railroad v. United States, 604

Baltimore City Department of Social Services v. Bouknight, 106, 1455

Bancroft, George, 54

Bank(s)

- deposits, 1430
- McCulloch v. Maryland* and, 988
- NSEER and, 1053
- reasonable expectation of privacy and, 882
- taxes on, 988

Bank of the United States, 732

Banner, Stuart, 1309

Banning, Lance, 1263, 1264

Baptist Association v. Hart's Executors, 1712

Baptist Bible College, 575

Baptist College at Charleston, 785

Baptist Joint Committee on Public Affairs

- Becker Amendment and, 118
- Dawson and, 397
- Equal Access Act and, 356–357

Baptists, 107–109

- belief action and, 627
- Bill of Rights and, 141
- “Bloody Tenent, The” and, 153
- in colonial America, 525–526
- Dawson and, 397
- free exercise clause and, 624
- Jefferson and, 119
- King and, 889
- religious tests for office holding and, 1314

Barbeau v. British Columbia, 1403

Barbie dolls, 1414

Barbiturates, 1743

- PAS and, 1165

Barclay v. Florida, 109

Bare suspicion, 1433

Barefoote v. Estelle, 109–110

Barenblatt, Lloyd, 110

Barenblatt v. United States, 110–111

- civil liberties and, 1635

Barker v. Wingo, 1516–1517

Barnes v. Glen Theatres, Inc., 111

- content-neutral regulation and, 364
- O’Brien test and, 450
- Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton* and, 1148
- United States v. O’Brien* and, 1114
- Young v. American Mini Theatres* and, 1808

Barnett, Randy, 1221

Barnette, Walter, 593, 1775

Barron, John, 112

Barron v. Mayor of City of Baltimore, 73, 112, 122, 176, 1596

- Bill of Rights and, 643, 1349, 1632
- incorporation doctrine and, 802
- Marshall Court and, 968–969
- Marshall, J., and, 970
- privileges and immunities clause and, 607
- takings clause and, 1604

Barrows v. Jackson, 1324–1325

Barsky v. Board of Regents, 780

Barta v. Oglala Sioux Tribe, 807

Bartkus, Alfonse, 112

Bartkus v. Illinois, 112–113

Bartlett, Donald L., 306

Bartnicki v. Vopper, 113

- news-gathering torts and, 661

Baruch, Bernard, 1798

Baseball, 858

Basfield, Titus, 145

Bastwick, John, 919

- Bataillon, Joseph F., 486
 Bates, Ruby, 1427
Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 114 lawyer advertising and, 910
 professional advertising and, 1235
 Warren Court and, 1753
 BATF. See Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms
 Baton Rouge, martial law in, 934
Batson v. Kemp, 986
Batson v. Kentucky, 114–115, 225
 Holland v. Illinois and, 769
 peremptory challenges in, 873–874, 877–878
 Swain v. Alabama and, 1590
 Battered woman's syndrome (BW), 1449, 1463 of wives, 1465
Battle Hymn of the Republic, 190
 Battle of Bull Run, 146
 Baylor University, 397
Beal v. Doe, 115–116
 Beale, Robert, 1748
 Beard, Charles, 55
 Beasley, Myrlie, 549
 Beat culture, 188
 Beatles, The, 185
 Beatty, John, 845
 Beauharnais, Joseph, 116
Beauharnais v. Illinois, 14, 116–117
 group libel and, 715, 753
 hate speech and, 753
 obscenity and, 1117
 Beccaria, Cesare, 238–239
Beck v. Alabama, 235, 385
Beck v. Ohio, 679
 Becker Amendment, 117–118, 356
 Becker, Frank, 117
 school prayer and, 356
 Becket, Thomas à, 437
 Beckwith, J.R., 1681
Bedford Cut Stone Co. v. Journeymen Stone Cutters Association
 Brandeis and, 174
 Taft Court and, 1596
 Beecher, Henry Ward, 342, 649
 Beecher, Lyman, 1588
Beecher v. Wetherby, 342
 Beecher-Tilton Scandal, 649
 Behavioral Sciences Unit (BSU), 1236
 Beheadings, 566
 Belgium
 euthanasia and, 547
 same-sex marriage and, 1403
 Belgrade Conference on Human Rights, 693, 697–698 Belief-action, 118–120, 1470
 free speech and, 1415
 Reynolds v. United States and, 627
Bell v. Burson, 463
Bell v. Wolfish, 202
 Bellah, Robert, 297–298
 Bellamy, Francis, 1177
 Pledge of Allegiance and, 1178
Belle Terre v. Boraas, 120–121
Beller v. Midendorf, 885
 Bellesiles, Michael, 720
 Bellingham, Richard, 978–979
 Bellis, Isadore, 121
Bellis v. United States, 121
Bellotti v. Baird, 9, 34, 121–122, 281
 Burger Court and, 198
 parental notification of abortion and, 725
 Benenson, Peter, 59
 Benevolent neutrality, 23
 Benham, Flip, 1135
Bennis v. Michigan, 213
 Bentham, Jeremy, 239
 Mill and, 1010
 punishment and, 1645
 Bentley, Elizabeth, 1270
Benton v. Maryland, 122–123
 Bullington v. Missouri and, 195 double jeopardy clause and, 440
 incorporation doctrine and, 803
 procedural due process and, 463
 Stewart, P., and, 1559
Berea College v. Kentucky, 466
 Berenson, Lori, 306
 Berg, Alan, 1503
Berg v. State, 68
 Berger, Ralph, 123
Berger v. California, 345
Berger v. New York, 123
 Brandeis and, 177
 Taft Court and, 1599
 wiretapping and, 1786
 Berger, Warren
 in United States v. Lee, 58 in Wisconsin v. Yoder, 58 in Wooley v. Maynard, 702
Berhanu v. Metzger, 1502
Berkemer v. McCarty, 123–124
 Berkowitz, David, 1494
 Berlin, Isaiah, 1638
 Enlightenment and, 1027
Berman v. Parker, 120
 public use and, 1604
Bernal v. Fainter, 612
 Berrigan, Philip, 306
 Berry, Dawn Bradley, 1771
 Best interests of the child, 1398
 Bestiality, 1492
Bethel School District v. Fraser, 124, 1576
 First Amendment and, 284
 Tinker v. Des Moines School District and, 1658
Betts v. Brady, 125
 Frankfurter and, 618
 Gideon v. Wainwright and, 682, 1350
 Roberts, O., and, 1364
 Stone Court and, 1562
 Warren Court and, 1759
Beulah Mae Donald, as Executor of the Estate of Michael Donald, Deceased v. United Klans of America et al., 1501
 “Beyond Speech Codes: Harmonizing Rights of Free Speech and Freedom from Discrimination on University Campuses”
 (Coleman & Alger), 221
Bhandari v. First National Bank of Commerce, 129
 Bias crime, 1787
 Bias. See Judicial bias
 Bible, 1437
 Abington Township School District v. Schempp and, 1757 in American law, 125–130
 Bryan and, 1426
 creationism and, 1616

INDEX

Bible (cont.)

defamation in, 402
Donahoe v. Richards and, 1293
Doremus v. Board of Education and, 1609–1610 Douay, 132
 double jeopardy in, 439
Edwards v. Aguillard and, 377, 481
 establishment clause and, 132
 “eye for an eye” in, 1329
Genesis in, 1329
 homosexuality and, 1492
 in judicial proceedings, 861
 King James, 131, 1563, 1621
King James v. Douay, 1293
Leviticus 24 in, 1329
 literalism of, 376–377
 Oaths and, 1267, 1315
 public schools and, 131–133, 1197, 1292–1293, 1294
 Revised Standard, 132
 school prayer and, 356
 segregation and, 1442
 separationism and, 127
 Seventh Day Adventists and, 1461
 slavery and, 129
 Stanton and, 1523
State ex rel. Weiss v. District Board and, 1294 study class, 132–133 study clubs, 133
 in twentieth century, 127–128
 U.S. Constitution and, 352
 Warren Court and, 1756–1758
 Williams and, 153
 as word of God, 1425
 Bible reading, 356
 defiance of court bans on, 408–409
 Freund and, 665
 Lemon test and, 533
 Mozert v. Hawkins County Board of Education and, 1044
 in school, 2–4
 Bible wars, 1293–1294
 Biblical creationism, 1616
 Bickel, Alexander, 294
 on Goldberg, 697
 Biddle, Francis Beverley, 133–134
 New Deal and, 1083, 1084, 1085
Biddle v. Perovich, 1145–1146
 Big Bang theory, 1438
 Bigamy. See Polygamy
Bigelow v. Virginia
 commercial speech and, 257, 330
 Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc. and, 1724
 Bigotry, 163
 Bill for Establishing a Provision for Teachers of the Christian Religion, 425
 Bill for Establishing Religious Freedom, 90, 119, 425
 Bill of Rights. See also English Bill of Rights abolitionist movement and, 6
 Adamson v. California and, 1632
 adoption of, 139–142
 aliens and, 40
 Anti-Federalists and, 140, 143, 1325, 1326, 1339–1340
 Barron v. Mayor of City of Baltimore and, 643, 1349, 1351, 1632
 Bible and, 128
 Black, H., and, 1632

Cardozo and, 1632
 challenges to, 1635–1636
 Chase and, 274
Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad v. Chicago and, 1632
City of Shreveport v. Levy and, 1311, 1312
 civil liberties and, 1631–1632
 civil trials and, 360
 Constitutional and, 357–361, 1263, 1264–1265, 1266, 1269
 creation of, 54, 139–140
 cruel and unusual punishment and, 383
 double jeopardy and, 438–439, 440
 enforcement power and, 613
 English tradition and, 505
 Federalism and, 1289, 1308, 1341, 1351, 1363
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 605–613
 free exercise clause and, 136, 623–624
 free speech law and, 815
Gittlow v. New York and, 1632
 Goldberg and, 1633
 Hamilton and, 1263–1264, 1266, 1268, 1306, 1308, 1326, 1340, 1344
 Henry and, 140, 142, 1340
 history of, 135–139
Hurtado v. California and, 1632
 ICRA and, 806–807
 incorporation doctrine and, 802–804 incorporation of, 532–533, 606–607, 1632–1633
 Iredell and, 1315, 1325–1326
 Jefferson and, 846, 1632
 limitations of, 144
 Madison and, 1315, 1325, 1326–1327, 1340, 1348–1349, 1632, 1635, 1751
 Magna Carta and, 949
 Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641 and, 979
 Meese and, 997
 military law v., 1006
 Montesquieu and, 1031–1032
 Native Americans and, 1254, 1258
 New Hampshire Constitution of 1784 and, 1086
 noncitizens and, 1105–1106
 North Carolina Constitution of 1776, 1111
Palko v. Connecticut and, 1633
 Palmer and, 1280
 Pinckney and, 143, 1326
 privacy and, 1634
 procedural due process and, 462
 promises of, 145
 property ownership and, 476–477
 quartering of troops and, 1252
 ratification of, 141, 360, 642
 religion and, 135–136
 Rutledge, W. and, 1633
 Sherman and, 352, 1326
Slaughterhouse Cases and, 1632
 states and, 112, 968 structure, 143–145
 trial by jury and, 1666
 Virginia Constitution of 1776 and, 508
 Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723–1724
 Warren and, 1633
 Wilson, J., and, 144, 1326
 Bills of attainder, 134–135, 297
 Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 359
 corruption of blood and, 370
 Field and, 586

- substantive due process and, 464
- United States v. Lovett* and, 1686–1687
- U.S. Constitution and, 352
- Bingham, Charles, 1097
- Bingham, Hugh, 145–146
- Bingham, John, 145–147
 - Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
 - incorporation doctrine and, 802
- Bingham, Thomas, 145–146
- Bioterrorism, compulsory vaccination and, 837
- Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, 220
 - PACs and, 588
- Birch, John, 854
- Birmingham Post-Herald*, 1014
- Birney, James G., 5, 1486
- Birth, citizenship by, 293–294
- Birth control, 147–148. See also Contraception
 - banning of, 1541
 - Carey v. Population Services International* and, 281
 - Comstock Act and, 649
 - Comstock and, 342
 - Eisenstadt v. Baird* and, 1493
 - forms of, 147
 - Griswold v. Connecticut* and, 1582
 - marriage and, 965, 966
 - as obscenity, 1539
 - privacy and, 1542
 - Sanger and, 1410–1411
 - sexually explicit materials and, 1120
- Birth control pill, 8
- Birth mothers, 1407
- Birth of a Nation*, 896
- Bishop, Bridget, 1250
- Bivens v. Six Unknown Names Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics*, 148–149
 - implied rights and, 867
- Bivens, Webster, 148
- Black bag jobs, 775–776
- Black, Charles L., 294
 - Emerson and, 499
 - Gideon v. Wainwright* and, 1759
 - Poe v. Ullman* and, 1183
 - Warren Court and, 1753, 1759
 - Zorach v. Clauson* and, 1822
- Black Codes, 228
 - Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
 - segregation and, 1442
 - Sumner and, 1585
- Black, Galen W., 500
- Black, Hugo L., 1560
 - Adamson v. California* and, 74
 - Adderly v. Florida* and, 15
 - Americans United and, 56
 - balancing test and, 100
 - Barenblatt v. United States* and, 110
 - Beauharnais v. Illinois* and, 14
 - Betts v. Brady* and, 125
 - Bill of Rights and, 1632
 - Bingham and, 145
 - Board of Education v. Allen* and, 155
 - Chambers v. Florida* and, 263–264, 783
 - Cox v. Louisiana* and, 15
 - criticism of, 551
 - Dawson and, 397
 - Dennis v. United States* and, 415, 655
 - Douglas and, 444
 - Engel v. Vitale* and, 502, 1298
 - establishment clause and, 550–551
 - Everson v. Board of Education* and, 75, 199, 549, 987, 1527
 - on forced confessions, 263
 - Frank and, 615
 - Frankfurter and, 617
 - freedom of expression and, 1159
 - Frisbie v. Collins* and, 665
 - Gideon v. Wainwright* and, 318, 682, 1016, 1373
 - Ginzburg v. United States* and, 688
 - Griswold v. Connecticut* and, 713
 - Hughes Court and, 782
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803–804
 - on Japanese internment, 496, 841
 - Katz v. United States* and, 882
 - Konigsberg v. State Bar of California* and, 14
 - Korematsu v. United States* and, 518, 839, 1365, 1374
 - McCullum v. Board of Education* and, 987
 - Meiklejohn and, 999
 - New York Times v. United States* and, 1089
 - obscenity and, 1118
 - privacy and, 1219
 - Roberts, O., and, 1365
 - Roosevelt, F., and, 1372–1373, 1374
 - on separationism, 533
 - Smith v. California* and, 1634–1635
 - Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District* and, 15
 - Vinson Court and, 1718
 - wall of separation and, 1736
- Black market, 709
- Black Muslims, 455
- Black Panther Party
 - Branzburg v. Hayes* and, 179
 - COINTELPRO and, 1518
 - Hoover and, 776
 - Kunstler and, 898
- Blackballing, 150
- Blackledge v. Perry*, 149
- Blacklisting, 150–151
 - CPUSA and, 338
 - McCarthy and, 984–985
- Blackmail, 1450
- Blackmun, Harry A.
 - on abortion rights, 802
 - Board of Education v. Pico* and, 156–157
 - Bowers v. Hardwick* and, 169
 - Burger Court and, 198
 - Callins v. Collins* and, 224
 - ceremonial deism and, 259
 - City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc.* and, 1316, 1317, 1318
 - County of Allegheny v. ACLU* and, 42
 - on death penalty, 1393–1394
 - “In God We Trust” and, 1067
 - New York Times v. United States* and, 1090
 - New York v. Ferber* and, 1092
 - NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago* and, 1100
 - no endorsement test and, 1104
 - O'Connor and, 1126
 - Osborne v. Ohio* and, 1138
 - Pell v. Procunier* and, 1151
 - Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps* and, 1158
 - Plyler v. Doe* and, 1182

INDEX

- Blackmun, Harry A (cont.)
Poelker v. Doe and, 1183
Pope v. Illinois and, 1191
 proportional punishment and, 1241
R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul and, 1271
Regents of the University of California v. Bakke and, 1284
Roe v. Wade and, 9, 1220–1221, 1320, 1322, 1367, 1368
Roemer v. Maryland Board of Public Works and, 1369–1370
Texas Monthly v. Bullock and, 1628–1629
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services and, 1770
Wolman v. Walter and, 1790
- Blackstone, Henry, 434
- Blackstone, William, 38, 127, 151, 1073, 1439, 1580, 1603, 1748, 1795
 civil liberties and, 1629
 corruption of blood and, 369
 Enlightenment and, 1027
 freedom of press and, 647, 658, 1204
 Holmes and, 770
 Jefferson and, 847
 licensing and, 815
 prior restraints and, 1075, 1209
 property ownership and, 475
 on sodomy, 169
- Blaine Amendment, 151–153, 1294, 1526
Mitchell v. Helms and, 930
 school prayer and, 356
- Blaine, James G., 151–152, 1294, 1526
- Blair Amendment, 1526
- Blair, Henry W., 356
- Blakeley v. Washington*, 76
 Scalia and, 1417
- Blameworthiness, 245
- Bland, Marie, 1142
- Blanshard, Paul, 56
- Blasphemy, 1115, 1202
 free speech law and, 815
- Blatchford, Samuel, 370
- Bleeding Kansas, 146
- Bloch, Emanuel, 1377–1378
- Blockburger* test, 441
Blockburger v. United States, 441
- Blockbuster, 1043
- Blockbusting, 1210
- Bloggers, 664
- Blom-Cooper, Louis, 59
- Blood, exemplars and, 558
- Blood samples, compulsory extraction of, 1421–1422
- Bloods gang, 1744
- Bloudy Tenent of Persecution, For Cause of Conscience, discussed in A Conference between Truth and Peace, The* (Williams, R.), 153–154, 1782
- Blow, Peter, 451
- Blue laws. See also Sunday closing laws
 Bible and, 127
- Blue wall of silence, 154
- Blume, John, 128
- BMW v. Gore*
 Breyer and, 183
 due process and, 1583
- B'nai B'rith, 69–70
- Board of Commissioners of Wyandotte Co. v. The First Presbyterian Church of Wyandotte*, 288
- Board of Directors of Rotary International v. Rotary Club of Duarte*, 1381
 freedom of association and, 636, 1382
 private discriminatory association and, 1226
- Board of Education, Island Trees Union Free School District No. 26 v. Pico*, 1065
- Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet*, 31, 157–158
 establishment clause and, 530
 Satmar Hasidic Jews and, 852
 Souter and, 1496
- Board of Education of Cincinnati v. Minor*, 343
- Board of Education of Independent School District No. 92 of Pottawatomie County v. Earls*, 155–156, 1746
 drug testing and, 266, 453
- Board of Education of the Westside Community Schools v. Mergens*, 3, 154, 1299
 ACLJ and, 286
 EAA and, 133, 512
 Equal Access Act of 1984 and, 408–409
 equal access and, 535
- Board of Education of Westside Schools v. Mergens*
 religious speech and, 1229
 school prayer and, 1197
- Board of Education v. Allen*, 155, 1424, 1527
Mueller v. Allen and, 1045
Wolman v. Walter and, 1791
- Board of Education v. Minor*, 852
- Board of Education v. Pico*, 156–157, 163–164, 1575
 Powell, Lewis, and, 1195
- Board of Immigration Appeals, 773
- Board of Regents of the University of Wisconsin System v. Southworth*, 1574, 1699
 forced speech and, 602
 government speech and, 703
- Board of Regents v. Roth*, 609
- Board of Trustees of the University of Alabama v. Garrett*, 193
- Board of Trustees v. Fox*, 331
- Bob Jones University, 158–159
- Bob Jones University v. United States*, 23, 158–159
 free exercise clause and, 629
 freedom of association and, 636
- Bodily correction, 1202
- Boerhaave, Hermann, 1387
- Boggs Act, 1743
- Boggs, Lilburn, 1037
- Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corporation*, 160–161
 captive audiences and, 247
Central Hudson test and, 331
- Bolling v. Sharpe*
 Burton and, 208
 Japanese internment and, 841
 substantive due process and, 466–467
- Bolshevik Revolution, 1742
Abrams v. United States and, 13
 Palmer and, 1144
- Bolshevism
 Communist Party and, 339
 KKK and, 896
- Bond, Julian, 161–162
 Southern Poverty Law Center and, 1500
 Warren Court and, 1753
- Bond schedules, 98

- Bond v. Floyd*, 161–162
 - Warren Court and, 1753
- Bond v. United States*, 1430
- Bone marrow transplant, 1552
- Bonham's Case*, 798
- Bonnell v. Lorenzo*, 20
- Book(s)
 - banning, 162–164
 - Board of Education v. Pico* and, 163–164
 - burning, 162
 - on CIA, 730
 - Comstock Act and, 649
 - fair use doctrine and, 572
 - free speech and, 1451
 - obscenity in, 1488–1489
 - offensive, 156
 - in parochial schools, 155
 - removals, 162–164
 - Wolman v. Walter* and, 1790
- Book of Mormon*, 1035
- Bookmaking, 960
- Boorstin, Daniel, 1039
- Boos v. Barry*, 1436
 - content-neutral regulation and, 364
 - picketing and, 1168
 - public forum doctrines and, 1243
- Booth, John Wilkes, 146
 - Lincoln and, 924
- Bootlegging, 251
- Bordenkircher v. Hayes*, 164–165
 - guilty pleas and, 718
 - post-trial convictions and, 718
- Border control, 806
- Boring v. Buncombe County Board of Education*, 1612
- Bork, Robert, 165–166, 1642
 - Frank and, 616
 - on free speech, 1451
 - Kennedy, A., and, 885
 - Red Lion Broadcasting Co., Inc. v. FCC* and, 1279
 - Roe v. Wade* and, 1221
 - VPPA and, 1713
- Bosnia, 1295
- Boston Boy* (Hentoff), 760
- Boston Female Anti-Slavery Society, 5
- Boston Gazette*, 705
- Boston Globe*, 306
- Boston Massacre
 - Adams, J. and, 308
 - trial, 166
- Boston Strangler, 240
- Boston Tea Party
 - Adams, S., and, 979
 - Mason and, 977
- Boston University, 889
- Bouguereau, William, 1052
- Bouknight, Jacqueline, 106
- Bounds v. Smith*, 202
- Bourjaily v. United States*, 25
 - compulsory process clause and, 344
- Boutillier v. Immigration & Naturalization Service*, 773, 1405
 - gay and lesbian rights and, 676–677
- Bowen v. American Hospital Association*, 166–167
- Bowen v. Kendrick*, 29–30, 167
 - Bradfield v. Roberts* and, 172
 - Lemon* test and, 918
- Bowen v. Roy*, 168, 1470
 - free exercise clause and, 629, 939
 - Native Americans and, 1077
- Bowers, Michael, 168
- Bowers v. Hardwick*, 436, 1405, 1493, 1521, 1583
 - 168–170
 - Burger Court and, 199
 - family values movement and, 578
 - Griswold v. Connecticut* and, 713
 - Kennedy, A., and, 885, 1222
 - Lambda and, 904
 - Lawrence v. Texas* and, 909
 - O'Connor and, 1126
 - overruling of, 678
 - Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton* and, 1148
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
 - Rehnquist and, 1222
 - Scalia and, 1222
 - sexual orientation and, 1222
 - sodomy and, 677
 - Stevens and, 1558
 - Thomas and, 1222
 - Tribe and, 1668
 - White, B., and, 1779
- Bowers v. Texas*, 1194
- Bowers, William, 228
- Bown v. Gwinnett County School District*, 1029
- Boy Scouts of America, homosexuality and, 1497
- Boy Scouts of America v. Dale*, 170
 - freedom of association and, 304, 636, 1363, 1382
 - Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston* and, 786
 - private discriminatory association and, 1226
 - Title VII and, 1660
- Boy Spies of America, 1518
- Boyce Motor Lines, Inc. v. United States*, 464
- Boycotts
 - bus, 855
 - LOD and, 914
 - NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware* and, 302
 - picketing and, 1169
- Boyd v. United States*, 171, 1453, 1455
 - exclusionary rule and, 957
 - Fisher v. United States* and, 589
 - Hale v. Henkel* and, 730
 - Olmstead v. United States* and, 1129
 - PPA and, 1223
 - privacy and, 1218
 - Warden v. Hayden* and, 1747
 - Warren Court and, 1758
- Boykin, Edward, 172
- Boykin v. Alabama*, 172
 - guilty pleas and, 718
- Boynton v. Virginia*, 1443
- Boys from Brazil, The* (Levin), 313
- BP (British Petroleum), 331
- Bradbury, Ray, 162
- Bradfield v. Roberts*, 172–173
 - Fuller Court, 668
- Bradley, Joseph
 - Boyd v. United States* and, 171
 - Bradwell v. Illinois* and, 273
 - Civil Rights Cases* and, 301
 - Slaughterhouse Cases* and, 465
 - Wynehamer v. People* and, 1580

INDEX

- Bradwell v. Illinois*, 8, 273
- Brady Bill. See Brady Handgun Violence Protection Act
- Brady Campaign Against Handgun Violence, 721. See also Handgun Control, Inc.
- Brady Handgun Violence Protection Act, 721, 1589
- impact of, 722
- NRA and, 1070
- Brady, James, 721
- Brady, Robert, 774
- Brady, Sarah, 721
- Brady v. Maryland*, 35, 173
- California v. Trombetta* and, 217
- exculpatory evidence and, 899
- Giglio v. United States* and, 683
- Kyles v. Whitley* and, 899
- Napue v. Illinois* and, 1061
- United States v. Agurs* and, 1678
- Bragg v. Swanson*, 1188–1189
- Bram v. United States*
- Hopt v. Utah Territory* and, 777
- self-incrimination and, 1017
- Branch Davidian Church, 306, 1731–1732
- FBI standoff with, 1461–1462
- Brandeis, Louis D., 173–177, 1556, 1560
- Abrams v. United States* and, 14, 652–653
- assisted suicide and, 87
- Baldwin and, 101–102
- clear and present danger test and, 312, 771
- dissent and, 658
- Douglas and, 443, 446
- Fourteenth Amendment and, 176
- Frankfurter and, 617
- free speech and, 1598
- Freund and, 664
- hate speech and, 754
- Hughes Court and, 782
- legal realism and, 913
- Meiklejohn and, 999
- national security and, 1073
- New York ex rel. Bryant v. Zimmerman* and, 1087
- Olmstead v. United States* and, 802, 1129, 1368, 1521, 1629
- privacy and, 1218, 1590–1592
- Schaeffer v. United States* and, 1796
- Senn v. Tile Layers Protective Union* and, 175–176
- Stone and, 1564
- United States ex rel. Bilokumsky v. Tod* and, 1018
- Vinson and, 414, 1722
- Warren Court and, 1753
- White Court and, 1777
- Whitney v. California* and, 654, 771, 1642, 1779–1780
- Wilson, W., and, 1783
- Brandenburg, Clarence, 178
- Brandenburg test, 178, 655
- Brandenburg v. Ohio* and, 659
- gag orders and, 671
- incitement of criminal activity and, 659
- Brandenburg v. Ohio*, 14, 178, 1420, 1511–1512
- clear and present danger test and, 415
- DeJonge v. Oregon* and, 411
- exclusion and, 789
- group libel and, 715
- Hand and, 736
- Hess v. Indiana* and, 763
- incitement of criminal activity and, 655
- incitement test and, 401
- Masses Publishing Company v. Patten* and, 980
- national security and, 1073–1074
- obscenity and, 1118
- offensive speech and, 117
- Rice v. Paladin* and, 1332
- serious and imminent threat test and, 659
- syndicalism and, 68
- Warren Court and, 1753
- Whitney v. California* and, 1780
- Younger v. Harris* and, 1808
- Brando, Marlon, 898
- Brandon v. Board of Education*, 512
- Branti v. Finkel*, 178–179
- Erlod v. Burns* and, 493
- political patronage and, 1189
- Branzburg v. Hayes*, 179, 1319, 1415, 1579
- Burger Court and, 202
- Douglas and, 1561
- Emerson and, 499
- journalistic sources and, 859, 1319
- news gathering and, 994
- reporter's privilege and, 664
- shield laws and, 1473
- Braschi v. Stahl Associates Company*, 1407
- Braswell, Randy, 180
- Braswell v. United States*, 180
- Fifth Amendment privilege and, 706
- Braun v. Soldier of Fortune Magazine*, 659
- Braunfeld v. Brown*, 1470, 1587
- Frankfurter and, 619
- free exercise clause and, 543
- Orthodox Jews and, 851–852
- Warren Court and, 1756
- Brause v. Bureau of Vital Statistics*, 1401
- Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic*, 180–181
- Operation Rescue and, 1134
- Bray v. Ylst*, 277
- Breaking the Vicious Circle: Toward Effective Risk Regulation* (Breyer), 183
- Breard v. Alexandria*
- commercial speech and, 329
- Vinson and, 1722
- Brecher, Edward, 1741
- Brecht v. Abrahamson*
- harmless error and, 745
- Breedlove v. Suttles*
- Butler and, 209
- Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections* and, 745–746
- Breen, Joseph, 756
- LOD and, 914
- Breithaupt v. Abram*, 181
- Bremer, Paul, 15
- Brennan, William J., Jr., 1495, 1545
- Adams Theatre Co. v. Keenan* and, 1381–1382
- Aguilar v. Felton* and, 32
- appointment of, 309
- Baker v. Carr* and, 620
- Board of Education v. Pico* and, 156
- A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure"* v. Massachusetts and, 1–2
- burden of proof and, 1410
- Burger Court and, 198
- Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co.* and, 213
- ceremonial deism and, 258
- City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc.* and, 1318–1319

- civil liberties and, 1630
- clergy in public office and, 921
- on community standards, 836
- Corporation of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos* and, 368
- Corporation of Presiding Bishop v. Amos* and, 270
- Eisenstadt v. Baird* and, 9, 483–484
- on electric chair, 485
- Francis v. Franklin* and, 615
- free exercise and, 1216
- Frontiero v. Richardson* and, 518, 521
- Furman v. Georgia* and, 223, 232
- Ginzburg v. United States* and, 688
- Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier* and, 756
- “In God We Trust” and, 1067
- on incorporation of, 533
- Keyishian v. Board of Regents* and, 18
- legislative chaplains and, 267
- legislative prayer and, 915
- Lynch v. Donnelly* and, 288, 343, 861
- Maher v. Roe* and, 951
- Marsh v. Chambers* and, 967
- McCleskey v. Kemp* and, 229
- Miller v. California* and, 1012
- Mishkin v. New York* and, 685, 1023
- NAACP v. Button* and, 1058
- New York Times Co. v. Sullivan* and, 39, 660
- New York Times v. United States* and, 1090
- New York v. Belton* and, 1091
- NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago* and, 1100
- non-preferentialism standard and, 1109
- obscenity and, 1117
- on obscenity test, 659–660
- overbreadth doctrine and, 1139
- Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton* and, 851, 1283
- Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps* and, 1158
- Poelker v. Doe* and, 1183
- Powell, Lewis, and, 1193
- prisoners and, 1216
- privacy and, 1219
- Redrup v. New York* and, 1282–1283
- Regents of the University of California v. Bakke* and, 1284
- Rhode Island v. Innis* and, 1331
- right to travel and, 801
- Roth v. United States* and, 1382–1383
- Rowan v. United States Post Office Department* and, 1384
- Sherbert v. Verner* and, 628
- stay of execution and, 1551
- Stewart, P., and, 1560
- Texas Monthly v. Bullock* and, 1628–1629
- Texas v. Johnson* and, 361, 590
- Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Hardison* and, 1300
- United States v. Ash* and, 1344
- United States v. O'Brien* and, 1114
- viewpoint discrimination and, 1716
- Warren and, 1763, 1765
- Warren Court and, 1754
- Wolman v. Walter* and, 1790
- Brenner, Yul, 1621
- Brewer, David J.
 - Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States* and, 287–288, 342
 - Fuller Court and, 667
 - O'Neil v. Vermont* and, 739
 - Patterson v. Colorado* and, 740
 - takings clause and, 1605
- Brewer v. Williams*, 182
- Breyer, Stephen, 182–184
 - balancing and, 100
 - Bartnicki v. Vopper* and, 113
 - Board of Education v. Earls* and, 156
 - City of Littleton v. Z.J. Gifts D4, LLC* and, 926
 - Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission* and, 328
 - Miller-El v. Dretke* and, 874
 - Mitchell v. Helms* and, 1025
 - on PAS, 87
 - Ten Commandments and, 1621–1622
 - transnationalism and, 184
- Bribery
 - FECA and, 194
 - Prohibition and, 1239
 - XYZ Affair and, 37
- Brickner v. Normandy Osteopathic Hospital*, 128
- Bridenbaugh v. O'Bannon*, 398
- Bridge Whist Club, 1239
- Bridges, Harry, 1566, 1800, 1801
- Bridges v. California*, 1800
- Bridges v. Wixon*, 1566
- Brief Narrative of the Tryal of John Peter Zenger, A* (Zenger), 1815
- Briggs Initiative, 932
- Bright, Stephen, 1499
- Bright-line rule
 - fair use doctrine and, 572
 - Florida v. Royer* and, 598
 - Michigan v. Summers* and, 1006
 - Minnick v. Mississippi* and, 482
 - New York v. Belton* and, 1091
 - O'Connor and, 1126
 - United States v. Robinson* and, 1691–1692
- Brinegar v. United States*
 - probable cause and, 1234
 - Vinson Court and, 1720
- British Columbia, Canada, 1403
- British East India Company, 1010
- British Empire, 52–53
- British law. See also Common law
 - judicial review and, 865
 - libel and, 815
 - licensing under, 815
 - Magna Carta and, 950–951
- British Parliament
 - Burke and, 207
 - Charles I and, 505–506
 - Church of England and, 921
 - freedom of speech of, 916
 - Habeas Corpus Act of 1679 and, 726
 - Mason and, 977
- Broadcast Bureau, 185
- Broadcasters. See also Cable television; Radio; Television
 - equal time rules and, 1052
 - fairness doctrine and, 573
 - FCC v. League of Women Voters* and, 578
 - forced speech and, 601
 - freedom of speech and, 650–651
 - indecentcy and, 651
 - licensing of, 650
 - prior restraint and, 659
 - Prometheus Radio Project v. FCC* and, 580
 - regulation of, 184–185

INDEX

- Broadrick v. Oklahoma*, 1520–1521
 overbreadth doctrine and, 1139
- Bronson v. Kinzie*, 477
- Brookhart v. Janis*, 344
- Brooks, Preston, 1585
 Sumner and, 146
- Brooks v. Tennessee*, 185
- Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, 399–400
- Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Virginia ex. rel. Virginia State Bar*, 185–186
- Brown, Ed, 315
 Nixon, R. and, 1098
- Brown, H. Rap, 306
- Brown, Henry, 515
- Brown, John
 Douglass and, 448
 extremism and, 566
 Helper and, 759
 treason and, 1665
- Brown, Pat, 277–278
- Brown University
 Meiklejohn and, 998
 Meiklejohn Lecture of, 258
- Brown v. Allen*, 727–728
- Brown v. Board of Education*, 186–187, 1442, 1443, 1585
 ACLU and, 49
 Burton and, 208
 Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, 301
 Clark, T., and, 309
 Emerson and, 498
 equal protection and, 516–517
 Evers and, 548
 Frank and, 616
 Harlan, I. and, 741
 Harlan, II, and, 741
 Japanese internment and, 841
 Johnson, L., and, 855
Loving v. Virginia and, 936
 Marshall, T., and, 972
 miscegenation laws and, 1022
 NAACP and, 1063, 1571
Naim v. Naim and, 1060
Plessy v. Ferguson and, 1181
 Powell, Lewis, and, 1193
 protests and, 959
 race-based classifications and, 611
 stare decisis and, 1524
 Vinson Court and, 1719, 1721
 Warren and, 1763
- Brown v. Gilmore*
 moments of silence statutes and, v
Wallace v. Jaffree and, 1737
- Brown v. Gwinnett County School District*, 1737
- Brown v. Hot, Sexy and Safer Productions, Inc.*, 1246
- Brown v. Illinois*, 666–667
- Brown v. Kendall*, 1467
- Brown v. Legal Foundation of Washington*, 183
- Brown v. Li*, 19
- Brown v. Louisiana*, 604
- Brown v. Mississippi*, 187–188, 235, 1455
 Black, H., and, 263
 coerced confessions and, 315, 1018
 coercion after, 316–317
 procedural due process and, 463
 unchecked power and, 320
- Brown v. Ohio*, 441
- Brown v. Socialist Workers '74 Campaign* campaign finance reform and, 219
- Brown v. Vance*, 799
- Brown v. Walker*, 668
- Brown v. Woodland Joint Unified School District*, 163
- Bruce, Lenny, 188–189
 Kunstler and, 898
- Brussel, James A., 1236
- Bruton v. United States*, 25
 compulsory process clause and, 344
- Bruzilius, Anders, 686
- Bryan, Samuel, 1264
- Bryan v. United States*, 858
- Bryan, William Jennings, 189–190, 1426, 1601, 1741
 Darrow and, 395
 La Follette and, 903
 McReynolds and, 992
 Scopes trial and, 1425
- Bryant, Anita, 190
- Bryant v. Zimmerman*, 635
- Bryce, Lord, 343
- BSU. See Behavioral Sciences Unit
- Buccal cells, 430
- Buchanan, David, 191
- Buchanan, James, 663
- Buchanan v. Kentucky*, 191
- Buchanan v. Warley*, 191–192, 1442, 1596
Corrigan v. Buckley and, 368
 economic rights and, 479
 equal protection and, 516
 Storey and, 1571
- Buck, Carrie, 192–193, 772, 1600
- Buck v. Bell*, 192–193
 Brandeis and, 177
 Butler and, 209
 eugenic sterilization and, 545, 1319–1320
 Holmes and, 772
 Taft Court and, 1600, 1601
- Buckley, James L., 193–194
 campaign finance reform and, 219
- Buckley, John, 368
- Buckley v. Valeo*, 193–194, 328, 1190
 Burger Court and, 200
 campaign finance reform and, 219–220
 Marshall, T., and, 973
NAACP v. Alabama and, 1058
 PACs and, 588
 Thomas and, 1650
- Bucy, Pamela, 1335
- Buddhism, 1619
 Title VII and, 1660
- Buddhists, as prisoners, 1214
- Buffer zones, 66–67, 181
 injunctions and, 1211
Madsen v. Women's Health Center and, 949
 picketing and, 1168
 TPM and, 1664
- Bufford, Charles, 1187
- Buggery. See Sodomy
- Bugs. See Wiretapping
- Bulingham, Charles Culp, 735
- Bull Moose Party, 903
- Bullington v. Missouri*, 195
 resentencing and, 226

- Bullying, homosexuality and, 1398
- Bunting v. Oregon*, 1596
 - White Court and, 1777
- Burch v. Louisiana*, 803
- Burdeau v. McDowell*, 195
- Burden of proof, 195–197
 - Batson v. Kentucky* and, 225
 - Sandstrom v. Montana* and, 1410
- Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms (BATF)
 - Branch Davidian Church, 1731
 - Ruby Ridge and, 1384–1385
- Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, 1253
- Bureau of Drug Abuse Control, 1743
- Bureau of Indian Affairs, 1253
- Bureau of Investigation, 774
- Bureau of Land Management, 51
- Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs, 1743
- Bureau of Prisons, 1625
- Bureau of Prohibition, 64
- Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands, 964
- Burger Court, 198–202
 - civil rights and, 1544, 1545
 - effect of, 206
 - Emerson and, 499
 - Francis v. Henderson* and, 325
 - habeas corpus and, 233–234, 727
 - judicial review and, 865
 - Marshall, T., and, 972
 - Rehnquist Court and, 1286–1287, 1288
 - Roe v. Wade* and, 198, 1367–1368
 - Wainwright v. Sykes* and, 325
- Burger, Warren, 203–206, 1416
 - Aguilar v. Felton* and, 32–33
 - bail and, 98
 - Bivens v. Six Unknown Names Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics* and, 149
 - Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet* and, 158
 - Board of Education v. Pico* and, 157
 - Bowen v. Roy* and, 168
 - Bowers v. Hardwick* and, 169
 - Buckley v. Valeo* and, 194
 - Cain v. Kentucky* and, 212
 - Coker v. Georgia* and, 386
 - death of, 205
 - equal protection and, 517
 - First Amendment and, 206, 1299–1300
 - Hudson v. Palmer* and, 781
 - Hutchinson v. Proxmire* and, 788
 - legislative chaplains and, 267
 - Lemon test and, 918
 - Marsh v. Chambers* and, 966
 - Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo* and, 1003–1004
 - Miller v. California* and, 1012–1013, 1283
 - New York Times v. United States* and, 1090
 - Nixon, R. and, 203–204, 1384
 - NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago* and, 1100, 1301–1302
 - nomination of, 204
 - obscenity and, 1118, 1124
 - Pell v. Procunier* and, 1151
 - Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps* and, 1158
 - Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth* and, 1173
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
 - on proportionality, 245
 - Rabe v. Washington* and, 1255
 - Regents of the University of California v. Bakke* and, 206, 1284
 - religious accommodation and, 23
 - on religious symbols, 938
 - retirement of, 10
 - Rowan v. United States Post Office Department* and, 1384
 - sexual orientation and, 1223
 - Wallace v. Jaffree* and, 1737
 - Walz v. Tax Commission* and, 1738–1739
 - Wisconsin v. Yoder* and, 628, 1788
 - Wolman v. Walter* and, 1790
 - Zablocki v. Redhail* and, 1811
- Burgh, James
 - Jefferson and, 847
 - wall of separation and, 1735
- Buritica v. United States*, 296
- Burke, Edmund, 207
- Burks, David, 207–208
- Burks v. United States*, 207–208, 1655
 - Hudson v. Louisiana* and, 781
- Burleson, Albert
 - free speech and, 1794
 - Wilson, W., and, 1784
- Burling, John, 842
- Burnett, Henry L., 146
- Burns Baking Company v. Bryan*, 209
- Burns v. Wilson*
 - military law and, 1007
- Burnside, Ambrose, 646
 - Ex parte Vallandigham* and, 552–553
- Burr, Aaron
 - Hamilton and, 733
 - Marshall, J., and, 970
 - treason and, 1664–1665
- Burroughs, Wellcome, 26
- Burroughs, William S., 1051
- Burson v. Freeman*
 - hate speech ordinances and, 657
 - Mills v. Alabama* and, 1014
- Burstyn v. Wilson*
 - Code of 1930 and, 756
 - obscenity and, 1123
- Burton, Harold, 208
 - Vinson Court and, 1721
- Burton, Richard, 1039
- Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority*, 606
- Bush, George H.W.
 - Diversity Immigrant Visa Program and, 427
 - drugs and, 1744
 - Falwell and, 575
 - mandatory minimum sentences and, 954
 - NAACP and, 1064
 - NRA and, 1070
 - Public Health Service Act and, 674
 - Souter and, 1495
 - Supreme Court and, 1287
- Bush, George W., 1318
 - abortion and, 10–11
 - Amnesty International and, 60
 - Ashcroft and, 84
 - AUMF and, 731
 - birth control and, 148

INDEX

Bush, George W. (cont.)

- Charitable Choice and, 269
- Christian Coalition and, 285
- data privacy and, 1222
- DHS and, 415
- drugs and, 1744
- enemy combatants and, 495
- freedom of press and, 662
- Guantanamo Bay and, 716
- Hamdan v. Rumsfeld* and, 355
- HAVA and, 1356
- Intelligence Reform Bill and, 1053
- Lemon* test and, 918
- Lindh and, 790
- Log Cabin Republicans and, 933
- military law and, 1007
- military tribunals and, 1008
- O'Connor and, 1127
- ODWDA and, 1137
- PAS and, 1166
- Plame and, 817
- Protection of Lawful Commerce in Arms Act and, 722–723
- reporter's privilege and, 179
- same-sex marriage and, 1402
- Sherman Act and, 1472
- stem cell research and, 1553
- Supreme Court and, 1323
- terrorism and, 1519
- War on Terror and, 1094

Bush v. Gore, 1287. See also Election, general, of 2000

- Kennedy, A., and, 885
- New York Times v. United States* and, 1089
- O'Connor and, 1127
- Souter and, 1498
- Stevens and, 1558
- television and, 662
- Tribe and, 1668

Bush v. Lucas, 149

Bushell, Edward, 1781

Busing

- boycott, 855
- equal protection and, 517
- King and, 889
- limitations on, 1546

Butes, Joseph, 1461

Butler Bill, 1425

Butler, Nicholas Murray, 1564

Butler, Pierce, 209–210

- Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 358
- Schwimmer v. United States* and, 1141
- Stone and, 1564

Butler v. McKellar, 208–209

Butler v. Michigan, 1382

- obscenity and, 1123
- Warren Court and, 1755

Buttino, Frank, 1317

Buxton, Thomas, 499

BW. See Battered woman's syndrome

Byars v. United States, 1598

Bybee, Jay S., 16

Byers, Patsy, 210

Byers v. Edmondson, 210

Byrd, Robert C., 1756

Byrnes, James, 316, 1561

- equal protection and, 516

C

Caban v. Mohammed, 279

Cable modems, 211

Cable News Network (CNN), 1076

Cable News Network, Inc. v. Noriega, 1076

Cable Privacy Protection Act, 347

Cable television

- balancing and, 99
- FCC licensing and, 663
- forced speech and, 601
- National Cable & Telecommunications Association v. Brand X Internet* and, 580
- obscenity and, 1124
- regulation, 211–212
- Turner Broadcasting Sys., Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission* and, 1669–1670
- United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group* and, 1689–1690

Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act of 1992, 211–212, 1669

Cadwalader, George, 923

Café au Go-Go, 188

Caffeine, 1739

CAFRA. See Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act of 2000

Cagney, James, 775

Cain v. Kentucky, 212

Cairo, Mildred, 1790

Calder v. Bull, 212–213

- Chase and, 274
- ex post facto laws and, 553
- natural rights and, 1080
- Thomas and, 1650

Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 213

Calhoun, John C., 214

- Jackson, A. and, 832

Califano v. Goldfarb, 687

California

- ballot initiatives and, 105
- civil liberties and, 1543, 1545
- death penalty and, 1545, 1546
- domestic partnership registration and, 1409
- free speech and, 1506, 1536
- grand juries in, 704
- homosexual discrimination and, 1405
- indigents and, 482
- informational privacy and, 1534
- prisons in, 1415
- privacy and, 1531
- Proposition 22 in, 1403
- same-sex adoption and, 1398
- same-sex marriage and, 1403–1404
- same-sex partners and, 1408
- search and seizure in, 1532–1533
- SLAPP and, 1481
- three strikes law and, 1653, 1654
- undocumented migrants and, 1675
- U.S. Constitution and, 1546
- Victim's Bill of Rights and, 1540
- Warren and, 1761–1762

California Criminal Syndicalism Act of 1919, 175, 1597

California Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, 215–216

California Domestic Partnership Code, 1408

California Federal Savings & Loan Association v. Guerra, 1069

California First Amendment Coalition v. Woodford, 22

California Privacy Protection Act, 277

- California Supreme Court, 1402
- California v. Acevedo*, 92, 214–215
 - Scalia and, 1417
- California v. Byers*, 1455
- California v. Carney*, 91
 - warrants and, 1751
- California v. Ciraolo*
 - Florida v. Riley* and, 597
 - privacy and, 1220
- California v. Greenwood*, 215, 1532, 1745
 - reasonable expectation of privacy and, 882
- California v. Hodari D.*
 - Bible and, 128
 - Scalia and, 1417
- California v. LaRue*, 111, 215–216
- California v. Ramos*, 216
- California v. Stewart*, 1456
- California v. Trombetta*, 79, 217
- Call, The* (newspaper), 1410
- Callahan, William Washington, 1428
- Callender, James T., 733
- Callender, John, 274
- Callins v. Collins*, 224
- Callous indifference objection, 1439
- Calvert, Cecil
 - free exercise and, 622
 - Maryland Toleration Act and, 975
- Calvert, George, 975
- Calvert, Leonard, 975–976
- Calvert, Lord, 622
- Calvin, John, 1249
- Calvinism, 126
- Camara v. Municipal Court of the City and County of San Francisco*, 27–28, 217
 - searches and, 1752
- Cambridge Board of Health, 836
- Cambridge University, 26
- Camden, Lord, 459
- Cameras
 - Chandler v. Florida* and, 265
 - in court rooms, 218, 662
 - Estes v. Texas* and, 545
- Camfield v. City of Oklahoma*, 1713
- Caminetti v. United States*
 - Mann Act and, 955
 - White Court and, 1777
- Cammack v. Waihee*, 399
- Campaign financing
 - Bryan and, 189
 - Buckley v. Valeo* and, 193
 - Burger Court and, 200–201
 - corporations and, 632
 - disclosure, 218
 - Hatch Act and, 748
 - labor unions and, 218
 - Marshall, T., and, 973
 - reform, 218–220, 1452
 - Scalia and, 1417
- Campari Liqueur
 - advertisements for, 1413
- Campbell, John, 272, 1285
- Campbell v. Acuff-Rose Music, Inc.*, 1414
 - fair use doctrine and, 572
- Campbell v. Tammany Parish School Board*, 163
- Campbell v. Wood*, 384
- Camus, Albert, 240
- Can Spam Act, 820
- Canada
 - CIA v., 1270
 - Operation Rescue and, 1134
 - pacifists and, 1411
 - same-sex marriage and, 1403
- Canadian Charter of Rights and Responsibilities, 1403
- Canajoharie Academy, 64
- Canan, Penelope, 1480
- Canine sniffs. See Dogs, sniffing
- Canterbury Tales, The* (Chaucer), 649
- Cantrell v. Forest City Publishing, Co.*, 574
- Cantwell, Jesse, 782
- Cantwell, Newton, 222, 849
- Cantwell v. Connecticut*, 75, 116, 222, 1802
 - Covington and, 372
 - establishment clause and, 528
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 989
 - free exercise clause and, 119, 625, 627–628
 - Hughes Court and, 782
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803
 - Jehovah's Witnesses and, 849–850, 1364
 - Roberts, O., and, 119, 222, 627–628, 782, 849, 1364
 - substantive due process and, 466
 - Torcaso v. Watkins* and, 1662
- Cantwell v. United States*, 654
- Canty v. Alabama*, 971
- Capari liquor, 787
- Capital punishment, 222–224, 384–385. See also Death penalty; Execution(s)
 - abolishment of, 223
 - African Americans and, 228–229
 - Amsterdam and, 60
 - Baldus Study and, 101
 - Barclay v. Florida* and, 109
 - Breyer and, 183
 - Bullington v. Missouri* and, 195
 - challenges for cause and, 873
 - Chessman and, 277–278
 - cruel and unusual punishment and, 231–232
 - Darrow and, 395
 - deterrent effect of, 240
 - developments, 223–224
 - DNA evidence and, 224
 - due process and, 234–235
 - due process limits and, 234–235
 - Eighth Amendment and, 223, 235–237, 1545
 - equal protection clause and, 228–229
 - errors, 932
 - Estelle v. Smith* and, 543
 - evolving standards of decency and, 1668–1669
 - exemptions, 246
 - expansion of, 239
 - extradition and, 563–564
 - for felony murder, 230–231
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 223, 228
 - Francis v. Franklin* and, 615
 - Furman v. Georgia* and, 669
 - Gardner v. Florida* and, 675
 - Gilmore and, 684
 - Godfrey v. Georgia* and, 691–692
 - Gregg v. Georgia* and, 710
 - history of, 222–223, 238–242
 - incompetence to stand trial and, 235

INDEX

- Capital punishment (cont.)
innocents and, 237–238
Jurek v. Texas and, 866
jury nullification and, 870, 990
juveniles and, 224, 885
Kennedy, A., and, 885
late appeals and, 324–325
Lockett v. Ohio and, 931
lynching and, 242–243
Marshall, T., and, 973
McGautha v. California and, 989–990
mental defects and, 224
methods, 222, 243–244
mitigating factors and, 246, 990
O'Connor and, 1127
politics of, 238–242
Powell, Lewis, and, 1195
Prejean and, 1200
Proffitt v. Florida and, 1238
proportionality and, 245–246, 1241
proportionality review and, 1242
Pulley v. Harris and, 1249
race and, 224
racial discrimination and, 225–226, 228–229
rape and, 323
religion and, 239–240
resentencing and, 226–227
reversed, 232–233
right of appeal and, 230
Ryan and, 237, 1393
sentencing and, 227
slavery and, 225, 239
sodomy and, 1223, 1493
Sonnier and, 1200
states and, 1539, 1540
stay of execution and, 1550–1551
terrorism and, 233–234
treason and, 223
victim impact statements and, 1709
Weems v. United States and, 1772
White, B., and, 1779
- Capitalism equality and, 609–610
laissez-faire, 1337
Meiklejohn and, 999
- Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette*, 246–247, 1314
cross burning and, 383
endorsement test and, 938
establishment clause and, 529
religious speech and, 1229
- Caplin & Drysdale v. United States*, 1745
- Capone, Al, 720
- Captive audience doctrine
FCC v. Pacifica Foundation and, 579
hostile environment harassment and, 778
vulgar speech and, 1248
- Carbon monoxide, 888
- Cardozo, Albert, 248
Bill of Rights and, 1632
preferred position rule and, 1199
- Cardozo, Benjamin N., 248–249
appointment of, 248
on exclusionary rule, 555
Hamilton v. Regents of the University of Southern California and, 74–75 on Hand, 735
on implied rights, 801
Palko v. Connecticut and, 75, 122, 617
penumbras and, 1153
Rauh and, 1269
- Cardozo Law School, 237
- Cardtoons, L.C. v. Major League Baseball Players Association*
Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co. and, 1812
- Care services, 29
- Carey v. Brown*
picketing and, 1167
viewpoint discrimination and, 1714
- Carey v. Population Services International*, 249–250, 281 contraceptive access and, 714
- Carhart, Leroy, 1554
- Carlin, George
FCC v. Pacifica Foundation and, 579, 1316
obscenity and, 1124
- Carmen Baby*, 1255
- Carnahan, Mel, 84
- Carnal Knowledge*, 850
- Carnegie Hall, 188
- Carolina Charter of 1663, 327
- Carpenters' and Joiners' Union v. Ritter's Café*, 1800
Frankfurter and, 618
Stone Court and, 1562
- Carpenters v. Scott*, 180
- Carr, Frank, 984
- Carroll, Charles, 273
- Carroll, Daniel, 359
- Carroll Doctrine, 251
- Carroll v. President & Commissioners of Princess Anne*, 1211
- Carroll v. United States*, 91, 214, 251
Florida v. White and, 598
Taft Court and, 1598
Wyoming v. Houghton and, 1804
- Carter, Jimmy
Baldwin and, 105
Ginsburg and, 687
Goldberg and, 693, 697–698
Johnson, L., and, 855
marijuana and, 1743
Weddington and, 1771
- Carter, Stephen, 1296
- Carter v. Kentucky*, 710
- Carver, Allen, 323
- Carver, Elnita, 323
- Casals, Pablo, 603
- Case, Belle, 901
- Case of the Officers of Excise* (Paine), 1143
- Cases and controversies, 1520
- Castells v. Spain*, 640
- Cat in the Hat, The* (Seuss), 1414
- CAT. See United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment
- Categorical approach, 252
- Categorization doctrine, 1800
- Catholic Church
Bible reading and, 131
“Bible wars,” 1293–1294
birth control and, 147
Blaine amendment and, 152
Burke and, 207
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist and, 333

- Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1309
- cremation and, 93
- flag saluting and, 591
- Harris v. McRae* and, 747
- heresy and, 1452
- James II and, 1667
- KKK and, 896
- LaRocca v. Lane* and, 1306
- League of Decency and, 756
- McCorvey and, 988
- movies and, 1041
- Murray and, 1049–1050
- NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago* and, 537, 1100, 1301–1302
- Operation Rescue and, 1133
- Quick Bear v. Leupp* and, 1253–1254
- religious garb and, 1306
- religious incorporation of, 291
- religious liberty and, 253–255
- religious tests for office holding and, 1314
- Roe v. Wade* and, 1367, 1368
- same-sex marriage and, 1403–1404
- schools of, 1525
- Sisters of Charity and, 172
- Ten Commandments and, 1622
- Title VII and, 1660
- Catholics
 - LOD and, 914
 - Maryland Toleration Act and, 975–976
 - as prisoners, 1214
- Cato, 994
- Cato's Letters*, 1202
- Catt, Carrie Chapman, 256
- Catt, George, 256
- Caucasians
 - capital punishment and, 225–226
 - death penalty and, 1258
 - prosecution and, 1257
 - Regents of the University of California v. Bakke* and, 1284
- Causation, police power and, 1185
- Cauthen, James N.G., 1545
- CBS
 - Herbert v. Lando* and, 761
 - Kevorkian and, 888–889
- CBS, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee*, 663
 - Burger Court and, 202
- CBS, Inc. v. FCC*, 202
- CDA. See Communications Decency Act of 1996
- Cell 2455 Death Row* (Chessman), 277
- Celler, Emanuel, 118
- Censorship
 - AASS and, 46
 - abridged speech and, 1052
 - ACLU and, 48, 1317–1318
 - in Beauharnais v. Illinois, 116
 - CLB and, 102
 - in England, 506
 - FCC and, 185
 - freedom of press and, 1202
 - hate speech codes and, 221
 - Hays and, 755–756
 - Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier* and, 756–757
 - Hentoff on, 760
 - hip-hop music and, 764–765
 - Kingsley International Pictures Corporation v. Regents of the University of New York* and, 892
 - LOD and, 914
 - Long and, 934
 - of mail, 46
 - movie ratings and, 1041–1043
 - of movies, 755–756, 1054–1055
 - museums and, 1051–1052
 - Mutual Film Corporation v. Industrial Commission of Ohio* and, 1054–1055
 - of pornography, 941–942, 1574
 - prior restraints and, 1075
 - with prisoners, 1217
 - prisons and, 1131
 - slavery and, 1485
 - Thornburgh v. Abbott* and, 1651
- Censure, of McCarthy, 985
- Census of the Manufactures, 346
- Census of the Population, 346
- Center for the Study of Sexual Minorities in the Military, 1461
- Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York*, 100, 161, 257
 - Central Hudson* test and, 331
 - Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, Inc.* and, 293
- commercial speech and, 201
- low value speech and, 937
- zoning and, 1821
- Central Hudson* test, 201, 257, 331–332
 - 44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island* and, 614
- Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), 257–258
 - Abu Ghraib and, 16
 - brainwashing by, 1270
 - Canadian citizens v., 1270
 - CHAOS and, 1518
 - Haig v. Agee* and, 730
 - Intelligence Identities Protection Act and, 817
 - McCarthy and, 984
 - MERRIMAC and, 1518–1519
 - prior restraints and, 1076
 - RESISTANCE and, 1519
 - Snepp and, 1491
 - Snepp v. United States* and, 1212
 - spying and, 1518
 - War on Terror and, 1095
- Ceremonial deism. See Religious speech
- Certiorari, writ of
 - Berhanu v. Metzger* and, 1502
 - common law and, 458
 - Lawrence v. Texas* and, 909
 - Spano v. New York* and, 1504
 - stay of execution and, 1551
 - Supreme Court jurisdiction and, 868
 - United States v. Schwimmer* and, 1692–1693
 - Virginia v. Black* and, 1724–1725
- CFAA. See Computer Fraud and Abuse Act
- Chadha, Jagdish, 797
- Chadha v. United States*, 884
- Chae Chan Ping v. United States*, 40, 259–260, 791
 - Alien Registration Act of 1940 and, 792
 - due process and, 460
 - Fong Yue Ting v. United States* and, 600, 1259
- Chafee, Zechariah, Jr., 261–262, 498, 1796
 - clear and present danger test and, 311, 658
 - free speech laws and, 816
 - freedom of speech and, 642
 - Holmes and, 771
 - New Deal and, 1083

INDEX

- Chafee, Zechariah, Jr. (cont.)
 on Palmer raids, 261, 1281
 on seditious libel, 644
- Chain gangs, 263
- Chalifoux v. New Caney Independent School District*, 1307
- Challenges for cause, 873. See also Peremptory challenges
- Chambers, Ernest, 267
- Chambers, Leon, 264
- Chambers v. Florida*, 263–264, 316
 Griffin v. Illinois and, 711
 Hughes Court and, 782–783
 Marshall, T., and, 971
- Chambers v. Maroney*, 91
- Chambers v. Mississippi*, 264, 407
 Michigan v. Lucas and, 1005
 Taylor v. Illinois and, 1610
 Washington v. Texas and, 1767
- Chambers, Whittaker, 265
 Hiss and, 765
 HUAC and, 265, 780, 1376–1377
- Chandler et al v. Florida*, 218, 265
 Estes v. Texas and, 545
 freedom of press and, 662
- Chandler v. Miller*, 266, 1480
 drug testing and, 453, 1746
- Chandler, Walker L., 266
- Channing, William Ellery, 1584
- Chanukah
 County of Allegheny v. ACLU and, 42, 1313
- CHAOS, 1518
- Chaplains
 legislative, 267, 297, 966–967
 legislative prayer and, 914–915
 Marsh v. Chambers and, 861
 military, 268–269
- Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire*, 116, 1382 categorization doctrine and, 1800 fighting words and, 587, 1511
 free speech and, 1671
 Jehovah's Witnesses and, 849
 low value speech and, 937
 Murphy and, 1048
 obscenity and, 1116, 1117
 Stone Court and, 1562
 viewpoint discrimination and, 1716
 vulgar speech and, 1248
 Warren Court and, 1754
- Chapman, Leo, 256
- Chapman v. California*, 78
 harmless error and, 745
- Chappell v. Wallace*, 1007, 1303
 Goldman v. Weinberger and, 699
- Charitable Choice, 173, 269–271
 Christian Coalition and, 285
 discrimination and, 422 provisions, 423
 sexual orientation and, 423
 staffing under, 422
- Charities
 Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue and, 761
 Muslims and, 1053
 religion and, 703
- Charles I, king of England
 coerced confessions and, 1017
 English Revolution and, 505–506
 general warrants and, 678
 Lilborne and, 919
 overthrow of, 621
 Petition of Right and, 1157
- Charles II, king of England, 108, 1667
 English liberties and, 507
 establishment clause and, 525
 free exercise and, 622
 Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641 and, 979
 Quakers and, 1251
 Williams and, 1782
- Charter of Liberties and Privileges, 704
- Charter of the Forest, 950
- Charter of Virginia of 1609, 326
- Charters of Liberties, 437
 Quakers and, 1252
- Charters of Privileges of 1701, 623
- Chase Court, 271–273
- Chase, Salmon, 271–273
 “In God We Trust” and, 1066
- Chase, Samuel, 273–274
 Calder v. Bull and, 212
 Ellsworth Court and, 491
 Ex parte Milligan and, 552
 ex post facto clause and, 553–554
 Marshall Court and, 968
 Sedition Act and, 39
- Chase, Thomas, 273
- Chastisement, 434
- Chastity Act, 918
- Chaucer, Geoffrey, 163
- Chavez, Cesar, 274–275
- Chavez, Librado, 274
- Checkpoints, 275–276, 1433, 1446 border, 1680
 City of Indianapolis v. Edmond and, 806
 DWI and, 470
 Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz and, 1004
 profiling and, 1623
 search and seizure and, 1004
 seizures and, 1444
 Voting Rights Act of 1965 and, 1729
- Checks and balances, 945
- Chemerinsky, Erwin, 276–277
- Cheney, Dick, 860
- Cheney v. United States District Court*, 860
- Cherokee Nation, 807
- Chesney, Robert, 1624
- Chessman, Caryl, 240, 277–278, 1551
- Chevron v. Natural Resources Defense Council*, 1557
- Chic, 764
- Chicago and Southern Airlines v. Waterman Steamship Corp.*, 311
- Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway Co. v. Chicago*
 Bill of Rights and, 1632
 economic rights and, 478
 Fuller Court and, 667–668
 incorporation doctrine and, 803
 takings clause and, 1604
- Chicago Daily News*, 854
- Chicago Haymarket riot, 394
- Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Ry. Co. v. Minnesota*, 464
- Chicago Police Department v. Mosley*, 1714
- Chicago Seven trial, 278
- Chicago Times*, 649
- Chicago Tribune*, 237

- Chicago v. Morales*, 278–279
- Child abuse
- cultural defense and, 391
 - Stanley v. Illinois* and, 281
 - victims of, 1417
- Child custody
- adoption and, 279–280
 - domestic violence and, 435
 - foster care and, 280–282
 - Harris v. Harris* and, 1491
 - mother's preference in, 1523
 - same-sex adoption and, 1399
 - same-sex partners and, 1407
- Child labor
- FLSA and, 571
 - Prince v. Massachusetts* and, 1208
- Child molestation, 758
- Child Online Protection Act (COPA), 1120
- American Civil Liberties Union v. Ashcroft* and, 660
 - Internet and, 819, 1316
 - obscenity and, 1125
- Child pornography, 282–283, 660
- computer-generated, 283, 284
 - Ginsberg v. New York* and, 685
 - Jacobson v. United States* and, 837
 - New York v. Ferber* and, 284, 1091
 - nonobscene, 283
 - obscenity and, 1119–1120, 1124
 - Osborne v. Ohio* and, 1521
 - overbreadth doctrine and, 1140
- Child Pornography Prevention Act of 1996 (CPPA), 83, 283
- obscenity and, 1120, 1125
- Child Protection Act of 1984, 283
- New York v. Ferber* and, 1091
- Child Protection and Obscenity Enforcement Act, 1092
- Child rearing, 1541. See also Child custody
- NOW and, 1069
 - personal autonomy rights and, 1533
 - privacy and, 1225
 - states and, 1540
- Child support
- same-sex adoption and, 1398, 1399
- Child Welfare League of America, 1398
- Children. See also Adoption; Juvenile(s)
- anti-child labor laws and, 474
 - born out of wedlock, 792
 - COPA and, 660, 819, 1318
 - custodial liberties of, 281–282
 - domestic violence and, 435
 - family unity for noncitizens and, 576
 - First Amendment and, 284
 - implied rights and, 801
 - Internet and, 819, 1120, 1557
 - of Jehovah's Witnesses, 1284
 - nonmarital, 585
 - NRA and, 1070
 - patriotism and, 592
 - protection for, 1541
 - In re Gault* and, 812, 1350–1351
 - religion and, 1284
 - religious education and, 1291–1292
 - sexually explicit materials and, 1120
 - testimony of, 976–977
- Children's Internet Protection Act (CIPA)
- Internet filtering and, 825–826
 - obscenity and, 1125
 - United States v. American Library Association* and, 660
- Children's Online Privacy Protection Act, 801
- Childs v. Duckworth*, 291
- Chimel v. California*, 284–285
- New York v. Belton* and, 1091
 - protective sweep and, 976
 - United States v. Robinson* and, 1691–1692
 - warrants and, 1752
- Chin Poy, 1132
- China
- drugs and, 1740
 - extradition and, 563
 - Nixon, R. and, 1098
 - War on Drugs and, 1740
- Chinese Americans
- Chinese Exclusion Act and, 259–260, 1259
 - Field and, 586
 - restrictive covenants and, 1324
- Chinese Exclusion Act, 259–260, 791, 1259, 1530
- Fong Yue Ting v. United States* and, 600
 - INA and, 796
 - Chinese Exclusion Case. See* Chae Chan Ping v. United States
- Chinese Exclusion Extension Act, 260
- Chinese nationals, citizenship denied to, 1259
- Chippewa Indians, 808
- Chisolm v. Georgia*, 844
- Choice Not an Echo, A* (Schlafly), 1421
- Choke holds, 935
- Choper, Jesse, 625
- Christian Broadcasting Network, 285
- school prayer amendment and, 356
- Christian burial speech, 182
- Christian Coalition, 4, 285–286
- Americans United and, 57
 - family values movement and, 577
- Christian Front, 69
- Christian Knights of the Ku Klux Klan v. District of Columbia*, 758
- Christian Law Association, 1819
- Christian Legal Society, 357
- Christian nation, 342–344
- Christian right, 4
- First Amendment and, 1296–1297
- Christian Scientist Board v. Evans*, 1663
- Christian Scientist Board v. Robinson*, 1663
- Christian Scientists, 559–560
- Christian socialism, 1035
- Christianity
- Christmas and, 1312, 1313
 - colonial charter and, 326–328
 - common law and, 1309
 - cremation and, 93
 - Department of Defense and, 268
 - fetus and, 1553
 - Henry and, 526
 - history of, 1035
 - KKK and, 896
 - marriage and, 963
 - Maryland and, 1538
 - Maryland Toleration Act and, 975–976
 - Ohio and, 1538
 - religious liberty and, 1309–1310
 - religious tests for office holding and, 1314, 1315
 - taxation and, 1309
 - Vidal v. Giard's Executor* and, 1712

INDEX

- Christianity (cont.)
 Williams, R. and, 1782
- Christian-Socialist Party, 640
- Christmas
 ACLU and, 49
Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette and, 246–247
 Christianity and, 1312, 1313
 coercion and, 1102
County of Allegheny v. ACLU and, 42, 1313
Lynch v. Donnelly and, 41, 536, 937–938, 1312–1313 as national holiday, 398
 no endorsement test and, 1104 trees, 938, 1194
Van Orden v. Perry and, 536
- Chuck D, 763–764
- Church(es) disestablishment of state, 425–426, 766 doctrine, 61
 property, 291–292 property disputes of, 861–863 splitting of, 856–857, 862 and state, separation of, 1274, 1289, 1299, 1308–1309, 1389–1390
Church & State, 56
 Church Committee, 1519
 Church, Frank, 1519
 Church of England, 1309
 British Parliament and, 921
 in colonial America, 622
 Cromwell and, 382
 English Toleration Act and, 504
 establishment and, 525, 531
 establishment of, 621
 Maryland Toleration Act and, 976
 prayer and, 1196
 Puritans and, 107, 1249
 Quakers and, 1251
 religious incorporation of, 291 religious tests for office holding in, 1314 Rogers and, 1781
 special status of, 623
 Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. See Mormons Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye v. Hialeah, 73, 289–290, 1496
 free exercise and, 627, 1246
 freedom of religion and, 368
 strict scrutiny test and, 626
 Church of Satan, 291
 Church of Scientology, 286–287
 free exercise clause and, 366–367
 Graham v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue and, 703
 IRS and, 761–762
Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, 287–288, 343
 Church of the New Song (CNS), 290–291
 Churchill, Winston
 Stalin and, 150
 World War II and, 1800
Chy Lung v. Freeman, 1530
 CIA. See Central Intelligence Agency
Cicenia v. Lagay, 292
 CIFA. See Counterintelligence Field Activity
 Cincinnati revolt, 1070
Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, Inc., 292–293
Cinderella Career and Finishing Schools v. FTC, 799–800
 CIO. See Congress of Industrial Organizations
 CIPA. See Children's Internet Protection Act
Circuit City v. Adams, 1557
 Circuit riding, 843
 Circumcision, 1035
 Cisler, Lucinda, 1062
Citizens Against Rent Control v. Berkeley, 200–201
 Citizens' Savings and Loan Association of Cleveland, 927–928
 Citizens, spying on, 1518–1520
 Citizenship, 293–294. See also Denaturalization; Naturalization
 Alien Acts and, 37
 Ambach v. Norwick and, 44
 by birth, 1232
 Chinese nationals denied, 1259
 civil death and, 297
 communists and, 1390 dual, 455–456
 expatriation and, 562
 family unity for noncitizens and, 576 through fathers, 1465
 Fiallo v. Bell and, 585
 Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) and, 1669 juries and, 872
 jury trials and, 875
 loss of, 413
 Nazis and, 1390
 pacifists and, 1141
 privileges and immunities and, 607, 1230 revoking, 730
 slavery and, 451–452
 of states, 1482
 United States v. Schwimmer and, 1692–1693
 Citizenship clause, 293
 City Beautiful Movement, 1817
City of Boerne, Texas v. Flores, 52, 159–160, 1471, 1549, 1589
 copyright law and, 367
 enforcement power and, 613
 free exercise clause and, 630, 768, 1215
 Native Americans and, 1078
 O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz and, 1131
 privileges and immunities and, 1233
 RFRA and, 501, 626, 630, 1304, 1305, 1307, 1818
 Scalia in, 1311
 statutory religion-based exemptions and, 560
City of Castle Rock v. Gonzalez, 282
City of Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen, 1601
City of Chicago v. Morales gang ordinances and, 674–675
City of Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, Inc.
 Central Hudson test and, 331
 low value speech and, 937
City of Erie v. Pap's AM, 111, 523
 content-neutral regulation and, 364
 O'Brien test and, 450, 523
 United States v. O'Brien and, 1114
 Young v. American Mini Theatres and, 1808
City of Houston v. Hill, 588
City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 806
City of Ladue v. Gilleo, 1821
City of Littleton v. Z.J. Gifts D4, LLC, 926
 FW/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dallas and, 670
City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc., 1318, 1820
City of Los Angeles v. Lyons, 935
City of Newport, Kentucky v. Iacobucci, 216
City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., 1318–1319, 1436, 1820
 Burger Court and, 201, 1318

- content-neutral regulation and, 364, 1318
- Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, in, 1318
- First Amendment and, 1316, 1318
- low value speech and, 937
- Rehnquist in, 1318
- Young v. American Mini Theatres* and, 1808
- zoning and, 669, 1121, 1318, 1821
- City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co.*
 - race-based classifications and, 611–612
- City of Richmond v. J.A., Croson Co.*
 - Kennedy, A., and, 886
- City of Shreveport v. Levy*, 1310
- City seals, 370–372
- Civic republicanism, 1028
- Civic virtue, 175
- Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act of 2000 (CAFRA), 213, 296, 1678
- Civil assets, forfeiture of, 295–296
- Civil disabilities. See Collateral consequences
- Civil disobedience
 - Operation Rescue and, 1134
 - United States v. Schoon* and, 1692
- Civil law, criminal law v., 380–381
- Civil liberties
 - abuse of, 36
 - ACLU and, 47
 - Alaska and, 1545, 1546
 - of aliens, 40–41
 - Ashcroft and, 84
 - Bible and, 128–129
 - Bill of Rights and, 1631–1632
 - blacklisting and, 150
 - Buchanan v. Warley* and, 192
 - Burger and, 206
 - California and, 1543, 1545
 - challenges to, 1635–1636
 - in Civil War, 923–924
 - classified information and, 311
 - in colonial America, 508
 - colonial charters and, 327–328
 - common law and, 335–336
 - constitutional basis of, 1631
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 357–358, 1263–1264, 1265, 1266, 1267, 1268
 - definition of, 1629–1630
 - deflection of, 150–151
 - democracy and, 1028
 - DHS and, 416
 - Diversity Immigrant Visa Program and, 427
 - double security of, 1544
 - in emergencies, 494–496
 - English tradition of, 505–508
 - Enlightenment and, 1026–1027
 - extremist groups and, 564–567
 - Florida and, 1545
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 605
 - Harlan, II, on, 742
 - Hawaii and, 1545, 1546
 - Hentoff and, 760
 - history of, 52
 - immigration and, 1529
 - international, 1637–1640
 - justice and, 1272–1273
 - Lambert v. California* and, 905
 - Madison and, 139, 143
 - Magna Carta and, 1537
 - Marshall Court and, 968–969
 - Marshall, J., and, 1541
 - Massachusetts and, 1545
 - mental illness and, 1001
 - in military, 1006–1007
 - modern philosophy of, 1026–1028
 - national, 1537–1538
 - national security and, 1071
 - New Deal and, 1082–1085
 - New Jersey and, 1545
 - noncitizens and, 380–381, 1105–1107
 - O'Connor and, 1126
 - Oregon and, 1543, 1545
 - people's rights and, 1640
 - Petition Campaign and, 1154
 - property rights v., 1028
 - protections, 353–354
 - public health and, 836
 - public opinion and, 1543
 - punishment and, 1645
 - in ratification debate, 1263–1269
 - Rawls on, 1272–1273
 - Rehnquist on, 1289
 - Roberts, O., and, 1363–1364
 - Roosevelt, F., and, 1372, 1373–1374
 - Sherman and, 143
 - slavery and, 1483, 1484–1487, 1542
 - state constitutions and, 1535–1536, 1536–1544, 1544–1547
 - state courts and, 1682
 - Stone and, 1565
 - Stone Court and, 1561
 - Supreme Court and, 1543, 1544, 1634–1635
 - terrorism and, 790, 1622–1627
 - test oaths and, 1627
 - theories of, 1629–1640
 - threats to, 353
 - uniformity of, 1535
 - U.S. Constitution and, 353, 1536
 - USA PATRIOT Act and, 1150
 - Vinson and, 1721
 - Vinson Court and, 1719
 - void-for-vagueness and, 1706
 - in war, 84
 - Warren Court and, 1561, 1760
 - Wilson, J., and, 143
 - Wilson, W., and, 1374, 1784
 - for women, 1522
 - in World War I, 1792–1799
 - World War II and, 1800–1803
 - Zenger and, 1814–1816
- Civil Liberties Act of 1988, 1374
- Civil Liberties Bureau (CLB), 102
- Civil Liberties for Urban Believers v. Chicago*, 1308
- Civil Liberties University, 416
- Civil penalties. See Collateral consequences
- Civil procedure, 616
- Civil Procedure in Sweden* (Ginsburg & Bruzilius), 686
- “Civil Religion in America” (Bellah), 297–298
- Civil Right Act of 1871, 1030
- Civil rights
 - assisted suicide and, 87
 - Burger Court and, 1544, 1545
 - definition of, 994
 - Emerson and, 498

INDEX

Civil rights (cont.)

- Fourteenth Amendment and, 1542
- freedom of speech and, 301–304
- goal of, 301
- hate crime laws and, 749
- Hughes and, 783
- limits on, 40
- military discretion v., 1007
- picketing and, 1168
- police and, 1256
- positive vs. negative, 1631
- property rights and, 478
- protest movement and, 161–162
- Rehnquist Court and, 1544
- Warren Court and, 1544
- Younger v. Harris* and, 1808
- Civil Rights Act of 1865, 1442
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 605
- Civil Rights Act of 1866, 299
 - Buchanan v. Warley* and, 191–192
 - economic rights and, 478
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 514, 605
 - miscegenation laws and, 1022
 - privileges and immunities and, 1232
 - veto of, 146
- Civil Rights Act of 1871
 - Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic* and, 180
 - Burger Court and, 202
 - deprivation clause of, 181
 - enforcement power and, 613
 - hindrance clause of, 180–181
 - Operation Rescue and, 1134
 - whistleblowers and, 1776
- Civil Rights Act of 1875, 300, 515
 - Civil Rights Cases* and, 301
 - interstate commerce and, 826
 - miscegenation laws and, 1022
 - privileges and immunities and, 1232
- Civil Rights Act of 1957, 1610
- Civil Rights Act of 1964, 71, 300–301, 1659
 - ADL and, 70
 - Brown v. Board of Education* and, 186
 - Charitable Choice and, 270
 - commerce clause and, 827
 - Connor and, 348
 - Corporation of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos* and, 367, 629–630, 1302
 - Cox v. Louisiana* and, 372–373
 - equal protection and, 517
 - Freund and, 665
 - interstate commerce and, 826–827
 - marriage and, 965
 - McCleskey v. Kemp* and, 229
 - NOW and, 1068
 - political correctness and, 1188–1189
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1195
 - privileges and immunities and, 1232
 - Title VI of, 423
 - Title VII statute, 422, 1284, 1299, 1300–1301, 1302, 1303
- Civil Rights Act of 1968
 - ADL and, 70
 - Clark, R., and, 306
- Civil Rights Cases*, 301, 1442
 - Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
 - Civil Rights Act of 1875 and, 300
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 515
 - Harlan, I, and, 738
 - interstate commerce and, 826
 - Patterson v. Colorado* and, 740
 - privileges and immunities and, 1232
 - state action and, 605–606
 - state action doctrine and, 1524
 - Waite Court and, 1733
- Civil Rights Memorial, 1500
- Civil rights movement, 302
 - Bible and, 127
 - Connor and, 347–348
 - cross burning and, 382–383
 - Hoover and, 776
 - injunctions and, 1210
 - jury nullification and, 869
 - KKK and, 897
 - marriage after, 965
 - NAACP v. Alabama* and, 828
 - New York Times Co. v. Sullivan* and, 330, 1088
 - Southern Poverty Law Center and, 1500
- Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1987, 71
- Civil trials. See also Torts
 - burden of proof and, 197
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 359–360
 - corruption of blood and, 369
 - federal court jurisdiction and, 867
 - group libel in, 715
 - juries for, 872
 - peremptory challenges and, 874, 878
 - right to jury and, 139
- Civil Union Act, 1402, 1403
- Civil unions
 - marriage v., 933
 - Zablocki v. Redhail* and, 1811
- Civil War, 1297
 - abolitionist movement and, 5
 - Acton and, 27
 - capital punishment and, 239
 - Chase Court and, 271
 - civil liberties in, 923–924
 - Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
 - Civil Rights Cases* and, 301
 - Comstock and, 341
 - Dred Scott v. Sandford* and, 864
 - drugs and, 1740
 - economic regulation and, 473
 - Emancipation Proclamation, 494
 - emergency powers and, 495
 - equal protection and, 514
 - Ex parte Milligan* and, 551
 - felon disenfranchisement and, 583
 - Field and, 585
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 605
 - freedom of speech and, 646–647
 - gun ownership before, 720
 - habeas corpus suspension and, 272, 352
 - Harlan, I, and, 738
 - Holmes and, 769
 - KKK and, 895
 - Lincoln and, 922–924
 - military chaplains and, 268
 - Mormons and, 1037
 - national security and, 1072
 - obscenity and, 1123

- privileges and immunities and, 1231
- whistleblowers and, 1776
- Civil War Amendments, 1630
- Civil wrongs, 381–382
- Civilian Conservation Corps, 965
- Civilian Exclusion Orders, 839
- Civilian review boards, 305
- Claffin, Tennessee, 342
- Claimed rights, 1416
- Clans, social groups and, 89
- Clansmen, The*, 896
- Clarendon, Assize of, 705
- Clark, Edward Kleagle Young, 774
- Clark, H.B., 127
- Clark, Ramsey, 305–308
 - Clark, T., and, 308
 - Johnson, L., and, 856
 - Miranda v. Arizona* and, 1759
- Clark, Tom, 305, 308–309
 - Abington Township School District v. Schempp* and, 2–4
 - Breithaupt v. Abram* and, 181
 - Douglas v. California* and, 443
 - Engel v. Vitale* and, 408, 502
 - Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson* and, 1042
 - Manual Enterprises, Inc. v. Day* and, 956
 - on movies, 858
 - Redrup v. New York* and, 1282
 - Roth v. United States* and, 1–2
 - Sicurella v. United States* and, 1474
 - Smith Act of 1940 and, 414
 - United States v. Seeger* and, 1693
 - Vinson Court and, 1721
 - Wieman v. Updegraff* and, 17
- Clark v. Community for Creative Non-Violence*
 - content-neutral regulation and, 362
 - Marshall, T., and, 972
 - symbolic speech and, 1594
 - United States v. O'Brien* and, 1113
- Clark v. Jeter*, 613
- Clarke, John H., 107, 1796
 - Abrams v. United States* and, 13, 771
 - White Court and, 1777
- Class action litigation, 912
- Class of '74*, 523
- Classification systems, 252
 - race-based, 688
- Classified information, 310–311
- Clay, Cassius. See Ali, Muhammad
- Clay, Henry, 883
- Clay v. United States*, 350
- Clayton Act, 1595
- CLB. See Civil Liberties Bureau
- CLEAR Act. See Clear Law Enforcement for Criminal Alien Removal Act
- Clear and present danger test, 14, 311–312
 - in 1950s, 659
 - adoption of, 642
 - bad tendency test and, 96–97
 - balancing test and, 100–101
 - Brandenburg v. Ohio* and, 415, 655
 - Bridges v. California* and, 1800
 - Cardozo and, 249
 - Debs v. United States* and, 401
 - Dennis v. United States* and, 414, 655, 690
 - free speech theory and, 816
 - gag orders and, 671
 - Gitlow v. New York* and, 690
 - Hand on, 736
 - Herndon v. Lowry* and, 784
 - Holmes and, 771, 1510
 - Hughes Court and, 782
 - Masses Publishing Company v. Patten* and, 653
 - Meiklejohn and, 999
 - national security and, 1071
 - reformulation of, 771
 - Schenck v. United States* and, 652, 980
 - Terminiello v. Chicago* and, 654
 - Vinson and, 1722
 - Vinson Court and, 1719
 - White Court and, 1778
 - Whitney v. California* and, 654, 1780
 - World War I and, 1795–1796
 - Yates v. United States* and, 1807
- Clear Law Enforcement for Criminal Alien Removal (CLEAR) Act
 - Muslims and, 1053
- Cleborne v. Cleborne Living Center*
 - rational purpose test and, 610
- Cleland, John. See A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Massachusetts
- Clemency
 - felon disenfranchisement and, 583
 - Kennedy, A., and, 886
 - pardons and commutations and, 1145
- Clergy
 - benefit of, 166
 - disqualification statute, 989
 - "Memorial and Remonstrance" and, 947
 - in public office, 921–922, 989
 - training, 536
- Clergy-penitent privilege, 560
- Cleveland, Grover
 - Debs and, 400
 - La Follette and, 902
 - Sherman Act and, 1472
- Cleveland Survey, 1184
- Clickstream data, 820
- Clifford, Nathan, 928
- Clinton, Bill, 1399
 - AEDPA and, 728
 - Brady Bill and, 721
 - Breyer and, 182
 - CDA and, 336
 - Chavez and, 275
 - Clark. R., on, 307
 - death penalty and, 241
 - don't ask, don't tell policy and, 435–436
 - Executive Order No. 13007, 52
 - Ginsburg and, 687
 - impeachment of, 1288
 - Martin Luther King, Jr. Federal Holiday and Service Act, 891
 - Native Americans and, 1077
 - Operation Rescue and, 1134
 - Public Health Service Act and, 674
 - Reno, and, 1317–1318
 - RLUIPA and, 1308
 - Sister Souljah and, 765
 - stem cell research and, 1553
 - Whitewater investigation and, 706–707
- Clinton, Hillary, 764–765

INDEX

- Clinton v. Jones*
 - compulsory process clause and, 345
 - Stevens and, 1558
- Cloning, 313–314
 - law and, 314
 - stem cell research and, 1553
 - therapeutic, 1553
- Closed containers, 597
- Closed forums, 1699
- Closed-circuit television (CCTV)
 - technology monitoring and, 488
- Clothing
 - Goldman v. Weinberger* and, 629, 698–699, 852
 - jury trials and, 544
 - statutory religion-based exemptions and, 559–560
 - trial, 544
- Cloud, Morgan, 188
- Clubs
 - discriminatory policies of, 606
 - religious, 154
- Clyatt v. United States*, 1649
- CNN. See Cable News Network
- CNS. See Church of the New Song
- Coalition Provisional Authority, 15
- Cobbett, William, 1387
- Cobham, Lord, 757
- Coca-Cola, 1740
- Cocaine, 1743
 - African Americans and, 1257
 - cruel and unusual punishment and, 744
 - discriminatory laws and, 424, 1257
 - drug testing and, 453
 - Florida v. Jimeno* and, 597
 - Minnesota v. Dickerson* and, 1015
 - proportional punishment and, 1241
 - War on Drugs and, 1739
- Cochran v. Louisiana State Board of Education*, 1527
- Zorach v. Clauson* and, 1822
- Cockburn, Alexander, 1286
- Cockrill v. California*, 1108
- Code of Federal Regulations*, 1146
- Code of Hittites, 1492
- CODIS (Combined DNA Index System), 428
- Coerced confessions, 25, 187–188, 263–264, 314–321
 - Brown v. Mississippi* and, 1018
 - common law and, 1017
 - Edwards v. Arizona* and, 482
 - false confessions and, 573–574
 - Hardy v. United States* and, 1017–1018
 - law of, 1455
 - Leyra v. Denno* and, 919
 - Lynum v. Illinois* and, 940
 - Marshall, T., and, 971
 - Miranda v. Arizona* and, 1016
 - procedural due process and, 463
 - psychiatrists and, 919
 - slaves and, 1483
 - Ziang Sung Wan v. United States* and, 1018
- Coercion, 1101–1103. See also Torture
 - after Brown v. Mississippi, 316–317
 - Colorado v. Connelly* and, 328
 - deceit and, 320
 - establishment clause and, 531
 - eugenic sterilization and, 546
 - Illinois v. Perkins* and, 794
 - indirect, 319
 - interrogation and, 1005–1006
 - jailhouse informants and, 838
 - moments of silence statutes and, 1029–1030
 - permissible, 318–319
 - physical, 1455
 - Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth* and, 1173
 - Pledge of Allegiance and, 1178
 - prayer and, 1412, 1416
 - psychological, 316, 1455
 - school prayer and, 1196, 1198
 - of search consent, 1422
- Coercion test
 - application of, 540
 - establishment clause and, 530
- Coffee, 1740
- Coffee, Linda
 - McCorvey and, 987
- Coffin, William Sloan, Jr., 306
- Cohabitation
 - Edmunds Act and, 1039
 - interracial, 991
 - without marriage, 964
- Cohen, Benjamin, 1269
- Cohen, Dan, 322
- Cohen, Felix, 913
- Cohen, Morris, 913
- Cohen, Paul, 321
- Cohen v. California*, 321
 - Burger Court and, 201
 - captive audiences and, 247
 - FCC v. Pacifica Foundation* and, 579
 - fighting words and, 587
 - free speech and, 1643
 - Harlan, II, and, 742
 - offensive speech and, 117
 - vulgar speech and, 1248
- Cohen v. Cowles Media Co.*, 322
 - confidentiality and, 661
 - journalistic sources and, 859
- Cohens v. Virginia*
 - Marshall and, 970
 - Marshall Court and, 968
- Cohn, Al, 322
- Cohn, Avern, 343
- Cohn, Dora, 322
- Cohn, Roy, 322–323
 - Kaufman and, 883
 - McCarthy and, 984, 1773
- COINTELPRO. See Counter Intelligence Program
- Coit v. Geer*, 438
- Coke, Edward, 1440, 1580, 1748
 - Bonham's Case* and, 798
 - double jeopardy and, 437, 439
 - due process and, 456
 - English liberties and, 506
 - Jefferson and, 847
 - judicial review and, 863
 - on Magna Carta, 950
- Coker, Ehrlich Anthony, 323
- Coker v. Georgia*, 241, 246, 323, 385
 - disproportionality principle and, 236
 - Eighth Amendment and, 232

- invalidation of, 231
- proportionality and, 245, 246
- White, B., and, 1779
- Colautti v. Franklin*, 324
- Colby, William, 1732
- Cold War
 - ACLU and, 49
 - CIA and, 257
 - Communism and, 337–339
 - Communist Party and, 339
 - Fortas and, 603
 - McCarthy and, 985
 - Rauh and, 1269–1270
 - Truman and, 1377
 - Vinson and, 1722
- Cole, David, 33, 495
- on terrorism, 790
- Colegrove v. Green*, 1275, 1392
 - Frankfurter and, 619
 - Rutledge, W., in, 619, 1389
- Coleman, Arthur, 221
- Coleman, Roger, 324–325
- Coleman v. Thompson*, 324–325
 - habeas corpus restrictions and, 728
- Colgate v. Harvey*, 1232
- Collateral bar rule, 1210–1211
- Collateral consequences, 325–326
 - felon disenfranchisement and, 583
- Collateral estoppel, 441
 - duty to obey court orders and, 469
- Collateral sanctions. See Collateral consequences
- Collective bargaining
 - DHS and, 416
 - freedom of association and, 634
 - mandatory fees, 602
 - New Deal and, 1083
 - NLRB and, 1066
 - Wagner Act and, 635
- College of New Jersey, 1386
- College of Philadelphia, 1386
- College of William and Mary
 - Jefferson and, 845
 - Marshall, J., and, 969
- Colliflower v. Garland*, 807
- Collin v. Smith*, 117
- Colombia, 1744
- Colon, Chava, 1200
- Colonial America
 - capital punishment in, 238–239
 - civil liberties in, 508
 - Commentaries on the Laws of England* and, 645
 - extremist groups in, 564
 - habeas corpus in, 726
 - interracial marriage in, 936
 - jury trials in, 875
 - Puritanism in, 621–622
 - religion in, 525, 621–622
 - statutory religion-based exemptions in, 559
- Colonial charters, 326–328
- Colonial codes, 326–328
- Colorado
 - free speech and, 1536
 - Lucas v. Forty-Fourth General Assembly of Colorado* in, 1276
 - Republican Party, 328
- Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission*, 328
 - Thomas and, 1650
- Colorado River Water Conservation District v. United States*
 - federal court jurisdiction and, 868
- Colorado Supreme Court, 67
- Colorado v. Connelly*, 328–329
- Columbia Insurance Co. v. Seescandy.com*, 62–63
- Columbia Law School
 - Cardozo and, 248
 - Douglas and, 443
 - Ginsburg and, 686
 - Stone and, 782
- Columbia University
 - Chambers and, 265
 - Cohn and, 322
 - Experimental College and, 998
 - International Procedure Project, 686
- Colyer v. Skeffington*, 1799
- Coma, 1254
- Combat Applications Groups, 1732
- Combatant status review tribunals (CSRTs), 800. See also Military tribunals
 - Guantanamo Bay and, 716
 - War on Terror and, 1094
- Combined DNA Index System. See CODIS
- Combined Federal Fund, 1715
- Comedy, 188–189
- Commandeering principle, 167
- Commentaries on American Law* (Kent), 769–770
- Commentaries on the Common Law* (Coke)
 - in colonial America, 508
- Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States* (Story), 409
 - freedom of speech and, 645
 - privileges and immunities and, 1231
- Commentaries on the Laws of England* (Blackstone), 127, 151, 1073, 1603, 1795
 - Bowers v. Hardwick* and, 169
 - colonial America and, 645
 - freedom of press and, 658
 - Holmes and, 770
 - prior restraints and, 1075
 - property ownership and, 475
- Commerce. See also Interstate commerce
 - Magna Carta and, 949
 - Protection of Children Against Sexual Exploitation Act of 1977 and, 283
 - United States v. Carolene Products* and, 250
- Commerce clause
 - antidiscrimination laws and, 71
 - Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, 827
 - Edwards v. California* and, 482
 - expanse of, 475
 - federalization of criminal law and, 580
 - Freund and, 665
 - gender-motivated violence and, 435
 - Harlan, I., on, 739
 - RLUIPA and, 160
 - segregation and, 971
- Commerce Department, 1270
- Commercial purposes
 - appropriation of name and likeness for, 787
- Commercial speech, 329–333. See also Central Hudson test
 - 44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island* and, 614
 - abortion and, 331

INDEX

- Commercial speech (cont.)
 Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp. and, 160–161
 Burger Court and, 201
 Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, Inc. and, 293
 definition of, 330
 low value speech and, 937
 Posadas de Puerto Rico v. Tourism Company and, 1191–1192 professional advertising and, 1235
 protection from, 257
 Valentine v. Chrestensen and, 1706
 vice products and, 1708
 Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc. and, 1724 Commission for Public Education & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 1246–1247
 free exercise and, 1246
Commission of Customs
 National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab, 452 Commission on Civil Rights reauthorization of, 71
Commission on Obscenity and Pornography, 1115
 New York v. Ferber and, 1091
Commission on Pornography
 Miller test and, 1013
 New York v. Ferber and, 1092
Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians, 841
Commission on Wartime Relocations, 842
Commission to Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce
 Goldberg and, 694–695
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 333–334, 1527
 Burger Court and, 199
 Lemon test and, 1527
 Wolman v. Walter and, 1791
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist Liberty v. Nyquist
 free exercise and, 1246
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Regan, 334–335
Committee for the Suppression of Vice, 1592
Committee of Style, 360
Committee on Academic Freedom and Academic Tenure
 1915 General Report of, 16
Committee on Detail, 139
Committee on Government Operations
 McCarthy and, 984
Committee on Un-American Activities
 New Deal and, 1084
Committee to Defend Reproductive Rights v. Myers, 1533
Committee to Re-Elect the President (CREEP)
 Nixon, R. and, 1099
Commodity Futures Trading Commission v. Shor
 Kennedy, A., and, 884
Common enemy rule
 California v. Ramos and, 216
Common law, 335–336. See also English law arrest and, 80
 Brandeis and, 1591
 Christianity and, 1309
 coerced confessions and, 1017 conspiracy and, 350
 due process and, 458, 1580
 Enlightenment and, 1027
 freedom of contract and, 636–637
 group libel and, 715
 informed consent and, 389
 Internet privacy and, 821 jury trials, 739
 Lilborne and, 920
 Magna Carta and, 950–951
 marital rape exemption and, 960
 marriage and, 963
 Marshall Court and, 968
 media access to judicial proceedings and, 995
 miscegenation laws and, 1022
 open fields and, 1133
 prerogative writs of, 458
 privacy and, 1225, 1759
 trial by jury and, 1666
 truth and, 887
 Warren and, 1591
Common Law, The (Holmes), 770
Common schools, 1525
Common Sense (Paine), 1143
Commons Journal
 English liberties and, 506
Commonwealth of Virginia v. Turner, 129
Commonwealth v. Alger, 1467, 1468
Commonwealth v. Baird
 Eisenstadt v. Baird and, 483
Commonwealth v. Blanding
 freedom of press and, 645
Commonwealth v. Davis
 Holmes and, 770
Commonwealth v. Dillon, 1017
 coerced confessions and, 314–315
Commonwealth v. Holmes
 obscenity and, 1122
Commonwealth v. Hunt
 freedom of association and, 634
 Shaw and, 1467
Commonwealth v. Kneeland, 1311
Commonwealth v. Sharpless
 obscenity and, 1122
Communication
 freedom of expression and, 1159
 verbal, 1437
Communications Act of 1934
 dial-a-porn services, 418
 FCC and, 579, 663
 FCC v. League of Women Voters and, 578
 Nardone v. United States and, 1061
 obscenity and, 1124
Communications Decency Act of 1996 (CDA), 336–337, 1120
 FCC and, 579
 Fifth Amendment and, 1316
 First Amendment and, 1316
 Frist/Fifth Amendment and, 337
 Internet and, 336–337, 819, 1315–1317
 obscenity and, 1124
 Reno and, 1317–1318
 Reno v. ACLU and, 660, 1315–1317
 Zeran v. America Online and, 45
Communism
 Baldwin and, 104
 Catholic Church and, 253–254
 Clark, T., and, 308
 Cold War and, 337–339

- Falwell and, 575
- freedom of expression and, 1051
- Gitlow v. New York* and, 689–690
- Hoover and, 775
- immigration and, 1280
- INA and, 983
- investigation of, 1454
- JBS and, 854
- McCarthy and, 984–985
- public schools and, 1611
- Rauh and, 1269–1270
- Russian Revolution and, 1280
- United Order v., 1036
- Communist Control Act, 635
- Communist Labor Party, 1597
 - Whitney v. California* and, 1780
- Communist Manifesto*, 689
- Communist Party, 339–340
 - Aptheker and, 77
 - Barenblatt and, 110
 - California Criminal Syndicalism Act of 1919 and, 175
 - Chambers and, 265
 - Clark, T., and, 309
 - clear and present danger test and, 312
 - Cohn and, 322
 - COINTELPRO and, 1518
 - Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction* and, 1361
 - DeJonge v. Oregon* and, 74, 411, 784
 - Dies and, 419
 - FBI and, 339, 1269, 1270
 - Hand and, 737
 - Harisiades v. Shaughnessy* and, 737
 - Harlan, II, and, 741
 - hearsay evidence and, 757
 - Herndon v. Lowry* and, 209, 249, 784, 1364
 - Hiss and, 265, 1376–1377
 - Hoover and, 339, 776, 1269
 - HUAC and, 780
 - INA and, 983
 - Kent v. Dulles* and, 886–887
 - in Konigsberg v. State Bar of California, 895
 - McCarthy and, 984–985
 - National Labor Relations Act and, 51
 - Palmer and, 1144
 - Rosenbergs and, 1377, 1378
 - Scottsboro trials and, 1427
 - Smith Act and, 1376, 1415, 1487–1488
 - Stromberg v. California* and, 782
 - Vinson and, 1722
 - Vinson Court and, 1719
 - Warren Court and, 1753
 - Whitney v. California* and, 1510
 - Yates v. United States* and, 1807
- Communist Party of the United States (CPUSA), 337–339
 - Dennis v. United States* and, 414, 446
 - Great Sedition Trial and, 1488
- Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board*
 - freedom of association and, 635
- Communists
 - citizenship and, 1390
 - Hollywood blacklist and, 150
- Community Services Block Grant Act of 1998
 - Charitable Choice and, 269
- Community Services Organization (CSO), 274
- Community standards
 - Jenkins v. Georgia* and, 850
 - obscenity and, 825
 - Roth* test and, 836
- Commutations. See Pardons and commutations
- Compact theory, 887
 - Madison and, 946
- Company towns, 340
- Comparative analysis
 - Ginsburg on, 688
- Compassion in Dying, 1165
- Compassion in Dying v. Washington*
 - PAS and, 1165
- Compelled speech
 - Johanns v. Livestock Marketing Association* and, 602
- Compelling interest test
 - McDaniel v. Paty* and, 989
 - prisoners and, 1217
 - RFRA and, 630, 1549
- Compelling purpose test, 610–611
- Compelling state interest, 340–341
 - hostile environment harassment and, 778–779
- Compensation, 1541
- Competency to stand trial
 - capital punishment and, 543–544
 - death penalty and, 692
 - Dusky v. United States* and, 468
 - Estelle v. Smith* and, 543–544
 - Godinez v. Moran* and, 692
 - Jackson v. Indiana* and, 831–832
- Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, 1743
- Compulsory process clause, 264, 344–345
 - Cool v. United States* and, 407
 - Taylor v. Illinois* and, 407
 - Washington v. Texas* and, 407, 1767
- Compulsory school attendance, 1787–1788
 - Pierce v. Society of Sisters* and, 1170
- CompuServe
 - CDA and, 336
- Computer Fraud and Abuse Act (CFAA), 346
 - Adams v. Howerton* and, 773
 - privacy and, 821
- Computer Pornography and Child Exploitation Act, 1092
- Computers
 - child pornography and, 283, 660
 - libraries and, 660
- Comstock Act of 1873, 649
 - CDA and, 336
 - obscenity and, 956, 1054, 1116, 1123
 - Swearingen and, 1592
 - U.S. Constitution and, 353
- Comstock, Anthony, 147, 341–342, 1592
 - Beecher-Tilton Scandal and, 649
 - obscenity and, 1116, 1123
- Comstock law, 1410
- Comstock, Thomas Anthony, 341
- Concealed weapons, 1070
- Concerned Women for America
 - family values movement and, 577
 - Operation Rescue and, 1134
- Concurrence of mens rea
 - police power and, 1185
- Concurrent jurisdiction, 1547

INDEX

- Condoms
 - Bolger v. Youngs Drugs* and, 331
- Conductor Generalis*, 1749
- Confederate flags
 - political correctness and, 1188–1189
- Confederate States of America, 1647
- Conference on the Cause and Cure of War, 256
- Confessional Unmasked; Shewing the Depravity of the Romanish Priesthood, the Iniquity of the Confessional and the Questions Put to Females in Confession*, 1116
- Confessions, 1455. See also Coerced confessions
 - accomplices, 24–25
 - Arizona v. Fulminante* and, 78
 - Brown v. Mississippi* and, 187–188, 235
 - Colorado v. Connelly* and, 328–329
 - Crane v. Kentucky* and, 375
 - deceit and, 320
 - Dickerson v. United States* and, 419
 - enemy combatants and, 320–321
 - exclusionary rule and, 991
 - false, 573–574
 - force and, 1455
 - Fulminate v. Arizona* and, 320
 - guilty pleas and, 718
 - Hopt v. Utah Territory* and, 777
 - hypnosis and, 919
 - inadmissible, v, 319
 - injunctions and, 1213
 - jailhouse informants and, 838
 - Miranda and, v
 - Motes v. United States* and, 1040
 - Nix v. Williams* and, 1097
 - permissible, 318–319
 - promises and, 319
 - self-incrimination and, 920
 - torture and, 1758
 - unlawful detentions and, 991
 - unnecessary delay and, 952
 - voluntariness of, 375
 - voluntariness standard for, 992
 - voluntary, 831
 - Warren Court and, 1758
 - Wong Sun v. United States* and, 1792
- Confessions* (Augustine), 1495
- Confidential* (magazine), 1117
- Confidential informants
 - search warrants and, 1435
- Confidential information
 - disclosure of, 1491
- Confidentiality
 - Branzburg v. Hayes* and, 179, 1319
 - broken, 661
 - of journalistic sources, 859
 - journalists and, 322
 - reporter's privilege and, 663–664
 - Sunday Times v. United Kingdom* and, 639
- Confinement
 - competency to stand trial and, 831
- Confiscation Acts, 1647
- Confrontation clause, 264, 344–345, 345–346
 - closed-circuit television testimony and, 976–977
 - Davis v. Alaska* and, 396
 - Fuller Court and, 667
 - Lilborne and, 920
 - Lilly v. Virginia* and, 920
 - Maryland v. Craig* and, 976–977
- Congar, Yves, 254
- Congregationalism, 107
 - Baptists and, 108
- Congress
 - abolitionist movement and, 6
 - African Americans in, 1277–1278
 - aliens and, 792
 - appellate jurisdiction and, 866–867
 - chaplains in, 267
 - civil religion and, 297
 - classified information and, 310–311
 - commerce regulation and, 1684
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 357–360, 1263
 - constitutionality and, 1327–1328
 - criminal powers of, 581
 - death penalty and, 385
 - enforcement powers of, 160, 613
 - flag burning and, 590
 - freedom of speech of, 916–917
 - gun control and, 719–720
 - Hispanics in, 1277–1278
 - immigration and, 40–41, 1259
 - immunity of, 916
 - Indian Civil Rights Act and, 1258
 - interstate commerce and, 826–827
 - legislative chaplains and, 861, 966–967
 - legislative veto and, 797
 - limitations on, 541
 - lottery tickets and, 955
 - LSC created by, 1324
 - mandatory minimum sentences and, 954
 - McCulloch v. Maryland* and, 988
 - military and, 354–355
 - military tribunals and, 1008
 - negative rights and, 144
 - Ninth Amendment and, 1325, 1326, 1327, 1328
 - obscenity and, 955
 - overseas powers of, 354–355
 - PACs and, 588
 - plenary power of, 792
 - power of, 988
 - privacy protection and, 346–347
 - on right to counsel, 1346
 - right to petition and, 1352–1353
 - salary of, 142
 - size of, 142
 - staff of, 916–917
 - values of, 346
- Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), 337. See also
 - AFL-CIO
 - Communist Party and, 339
 - Goldberg and, 693–695
 - Hague and, 729
- Congress of Racial Equality (CORE)
 - Brown v. Board of Education* and, 959
- Congressional Record*
 - ERA and, 521
- Congressional Research Service
 - marriage and, 1406
- Congruence and proportionality test, 160
- Conley, Patrick T., 55
- Conn. DPS v. Doe*
 - Paul v. Davis* and, 1150
- Connally, John, 347–348

- Connally v. General Construction Co.*
substantive due process and, 464
- Connally v. Georgia*, 347–348
- Connecticut
birth control in, 1655–1656
Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1326
Petition Campaign and, 1155
Poe v. Ullman and, 1182
same-sex partners and, 1408
- Connick v. Myers*, 1508 government employees and, 674
government speech and, 702
public concern standard and, 982
teacher speech and, 1614–1615
- Connor, Eugene “Bull,” 348
- Conscience Whigs, 1584
- Conscientious objection, 349–350. See also Pacifism
CLB and, 102
definition of religion and, 409–410
Murphy and, 1048
Murray and, 1050
selective, 1050
Selective Service Act of 1940 and, 1801–1802
Sicurella v. United States and, 1474–1475
United States v. Macintosh and, 784
United States v. Seeger and, 1693–1694
Universal Military Training and Service Act of 1948 and, 1693
Vietnam War and, 1143
- Consciousness of guilt, 1396
- Conscription. See Draft
- Consent decree, 879
- Consent, to search, 1422
- Conservatism
Burger and, 205–206
Butler and, 209–210
JBS and, 854
Kennedy, A., and, 884–885
Roe v. Wade and, 4
- Consolidated Edison v. Public Service Commission*
captive audiences and, 247
viewpoint discrimination and, 1714
- Conspiracy, 350–351, 379–380
Bray v. Alexandria Women’s Health Clinic and, 180–181
Ex parte Milligan and, 551
theories, 854
- Constant, Benjamin, 1026
- Constantine, Roman emperor, 1586
- Constitution(s), 135–139. See also U.S. Constitution Article IV in, 1275
Maryland, 137, 1309, 1310, 1311, 1312
Montana, 1352
New Jersey, 1310
New York, 1292, 1311
overseas, 354–355
ratification debate on, 1263–1269
Rehnquist on, 1288, 1289, 1290
Reid v. Covert and, 1291 religious liberty under eighteenth-century, 1308–1311
right to bear arms and, 1338
Roe v. Wade and, 1320–1322
slavery and, 138–139
state, 135–139
of states, 1535–1536
Texas, 908, 1328
Vermont, 135
of Vermont, 135
Virginia, 746, 1310
- Constitution, a Proslavery Document, The* (Phillips), 46, 1158
- Constitution of the Fifth Republic, 865
- Constitutional adjudication, 100
- Constitutional convention
Speech and Debate clause and, 916
- Constitutional Convention of 1787, 357–361, 1263–1269
Adams, S., and, 1264, 1265
Bill of Rights and, 357–361, 1263, 1264–1265, 1266, 1267, 1268, 1545
Chase and, 274
civil liberties and, 357, 1263–1264, 1265, 1266, 1267, 1268
Connecticut and, 1326
copyright clause and, 358
economic regulation and, 473
Federalism and, 1264, 1267, 1268, 1315, 1325
freedom of press and, 358, 1263, 1264, 1265
habeas corpus and, 358, 1263, 1265, 1266–1267
Hamilton, Alexander, and, 732, 1263, 1268
Hamilton and, 732
Henry and, 1266–1267
jury trial right and, 358, 1263, 1264, 1268
Madison and, 944
Massachusetts and, 1264, 1265–1266
militia and, 357–358
New York and, 1263, 1264, 1267–1268
North Carolina and, 1326
Pennsylvania and, 1264–1265, 1326
Pinckney and, 358, 1263, 1326
privileges and immunities and, 1230
Randolph, Edmund, and, 1266–1267
religion and, 1309
religious tests for office holding and, 358, 1315
Virginia and, 541, 1263, 1264, 1266–1267, 1340
Wilson, J., and, 1264, 1265, 1268
- Constitutional crisis of 1937, 784
- Constitutional liberties, unenumerated, 1497
- Constitutional rights, unarticulated, 1337
- Constitutional violations, 148–149
- Construction Construed and Constitutions Vindicated* (Taylor)
Jefferson and, 847
- Constructionism
Bork and, 165
Douglas and, 444
- Consumer protection laws
FCRA and, 569–570
- Consumer reports
FCRA and, 569–570
- Consumers’ League
ERA and, 520
- Contempt
civil, 706–707
criminal, 707
- Content neutrality, 656–657
hostile environment harassment and, 778
intermediate scrutiny test and, 818 protest injunctions and, 948
- Continental Congress
Chase and, 273
military chaplains and, 268
right to petition and, 1352
Rush in, 1386
- Contraband, automobile searches and, 92

INDEX

- Contraception, 8, 1410. See also Birth control; Birth control pill equity, 1323
FDA and, 1323
Griswold v. Connecticut and, 712–713, 1320 hormonal, 1411
implied rights and, 802
marriage and, 1479
Murray and, 1050
NARAL and, 1062
obscenity and, 1116
penumbras and, 1153
personal autonomy rights and, 1533
“Plan B,” 1323
Poe v. Ullman and, 1182
privacy and, 9, 1219, 1225
reproductive rights and, 1321 rights, 87
Tilestone v. Ullman and, 1655–1656
as victimless crime, 1709
Warren Court and, 1759
- Contraceptives
access to, 714
Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp. and, 160–161
Eisenstadt v. Baird, 483–484
Emerson and, 499
for minors, 250
parental consent for, 250
pill, 148
- Contract Labor Law of 1885, 1530
- Contract with the American Family, 285
- Contracts clause
Bronson v. Kinzie and, 477
Dartmouth College Case and, 477
Dartmouth College v. Woodward and, 969
economic rights and, 477
elimination of, 475
Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell and, 474
Marshall Court and, 477, 968
Marshall, J., and, 477
Taney Court and, 477
- Contributing factor test, 1776
- Controlled Substances Act (CSA), 88, 1533
ODWDA and, 1137
- Conventicle Act, 1781
- Convention on Freedom of Information, 1676
- Convention on Torture, 16
Amnesty International and, 60
- Convention Parliament, 690
- Convictions. See also Autrefois convict
false, 1240
guilty pleas and, 718 post-trial, 718
reversals of, 831
wrongful, 925
- Conway, Thomas, 1386–1387
- Conyers, John, 890
- Cook County, Illinois, 1189
- Cook, Walter Wheeler
legal realism and, 913
- Cookies, 821
- Cool v. United States*, 407
Washington v. Texas and, 1767
- Cooley, Thomas, 1186–1187
economic rights and, 478
on First Amendment limitations, 645–646
freedom of press and, 1207
privacy and, 1218, 1591
- Coolidge, Calvin, 1798
eugenic sterilization and, 545–546
Hand and, 736
La Follette and, 904
- Coolidge, Edward H., Jr., 365
Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 365, 1435
plain view and, 1171
- Cooper, Henry Morgan, Jr., 73
Cooper v. Aaron
Marshall, T., and, 972
Cooper v. Eugene School District, 1306–1307
Cooper v. Oklahoma, 235
Cooper v. Pate, 291
- COPA. See Child Online Protection Act
- Coppage v. Kansas*, 465 government intervention and, 928
White Court and, 1777
- Copy-protection technology, 823
- Copyright
infringement, 822, 1001
Copyright Act of 1790, 484
Copyright Act of 1976
fair use doctrine and, 572
hip-hop music and, 764
limitations of, 572
- Copyright clause
Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 358
Eldred v. Ashcroft and, 484–485
- Copyright law
Church of Scientology and, 366–367
fair use doctrine and, 572
free exercise clause and, 366–367
Metro-Goldwyn Mayer Studios v. Grokster and, 1001
religious ceremonies and, 366–367
- Copyright Term Extension Act of 1998 (CTEA), 484
- Copyrights
Digital Millennium Copyright Act, 817
Eldred v. Ashcroft and, 484–485
extension of, 484
First Amendment and, 485
first sale doctrine, 823
free speech clause and, 764
freedom of expression and, 1159
hip-hop music and, 763–764
intellectual property rights and, 816
Internet and, 211–212, 822–823
No Electronic Theft Act and, 823 royalties, 1001
SLAPP and, 1480
U.S. Constitution and, 352, 484
- Coram nobis cases, 842
- Corcoran, Thomas, 1269
- CORE. See Congress of Racial Equality
- Corfield v. Coryell*, 1231, 1355
- Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense & Education Fund, Inc.*
limited public forum and, 922
public forum doctrines and, 1244
religious organizations and, 699
viewpoint discrimination and, 1715
- Cornell University, 1272, 1317
Ginsburg and, 686
Meiklejohn and, 998
- Cornerstone principle, 1029

- Coronado Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers*, 1595
- Coronation Charter, 950
- Corporate speech, 650
- Corporation(s)
- campaign financing and, 218
 - Fifth Amendment and, 706, 730
 - free speech in, 632–633
 - freedom of association and, 634–635
 - freedom of speech and, 650
 - PACs and, 632
 - private v. religious, 292
 - self-incrimination and, 668, 740, 1453
- Corporation for Public Broadcasting (CPB)
- Christian Coalition and, 285
- Corporation of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos*, 367–368, 1302
- Charitable Choice and, 270
 - neutrality in, 561
 - Title VII and, 1659
- Corporation of Presiding Bishop v. Amos*
- free exercise clause and, 629–630
- Corrections. See also Prisons; specific agencies; specific institutions
- racial discrimination and, 1257
- Corrigan, Irene, 192, 368
- Corrigan v. Buckley*, 368–369
- Brandeis and, 177
 - Buchanan v. Warley* and, 192
 - equal protection and, 516
- Corruption
- La Follette and, 901–902
 - police, 154
- Corruption of Blood, 297, 369–370, 1665
- Cosby, William, 644
- Hamilton and, 734
 - national security and, 1072
 - sedition libel and, 1440
 - Zenger and, 869, 1814
- Cosmology, 1011
- Costello, Frank
- Feiner v. New York* and, 582
- Costello v. United States*
- grand jury indictments and, 705
- Cotton, John, 61, 1782
- Massachusetts Bay Colony and, 978
- Cottrol, Robert, 721
- Coughlin, Charles, 69
- Council for Secular Humanism, The, 1438
- Council of Regensburg
- military chaplains and, 268
- Counsel. See also Right to counsel
- ineffective assistance of, 810–811
- Counseling, abortion and, 951
- Counselman v. Hitchcock*, 370, 1453, 1454
- grand juries and, 668
 - Warren Court and, 1758
- Counter Intelligence Program (COINTELPRO), 1518
- Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA), 1520
- Counts v. Cedarville School District*, 164
- County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union*, 41–43, 90
- ADL and, 69
 - Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette* and, 246–247
 - Chanukah and, 42, 1313
 - Christmas and, 42, 1313
 - civil religion and, 297
 - coercion and, 1102
 - coercion test and, 540
 - endorsement test and, 536, 538–539
 - “In God We Trust” and, 1067
 - Kennedy, A., and, 42, 529, 885–886, 1313
 - Lemon* test and, 529, 534, 538–539, 918, 1313
 - no endorsement test and, 1103
 - non-coercion standard and, 768
- County of Riverside v. McLaughlin*, 1361–1362
- County seals, 370–372
- Court injunctions, statutes v., 13
- Court martials, 1007
- Court of Appeals
- Supreme Court and, 868
- Court of Appeals, First Circuit
- Lee v. Weisman* and, 911
- Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit
- Rice v. Paladin* and, 1331–1332
 - Wiccan prayer and, 915
- Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit
- Child Pornography Prevention Act and, 83
 - in City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., 1318
 - Kennedy, A., and, 884
 - on religion, 1262
- Court of Appeals, Second Circuit
- Kaufman and, 883
 - Marshall, T., and, 972
- Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, 943
- Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, 1044
- Court of Appeals, Tenth Circuit
- City of Littleton v. Z.J. Gifts D4, LLC* and, 926
 - Snyder v. Murray City Corp.* and, 915
- Court of Common Pleas, 1748
- Court of High Commission, 1452
- Court of Justice, 865
- Court of Star Chamber, 1452
- Poulterer's Case* and, 350
- Court orders
- compliance with, 469
 - electronic surveillance and, 487
 - with notice, 487
 - penalties and, 469
- Court Reform and Criminal Procedures Act of 1970, 98
- Court rooms, journalists in, 662
- Court-packing plan
- Roosevelt, F., and, 864–865, 1269, 1372, 1390
- Courtrooms
- cameras in, 218
 - religious garb in, 1306
- Courts
- open, 1625–1626
 - U.S. Constitution and, 1635
- Courts, Gus, 548
- Courts of appeal, jurisdiction of, 868
- Courts of Indian Offenses, 51
- Covenants
- racially restrictive, 368–369, 1324–1325
- Covert Action Bulletin Board*
- Intelligence Identities Protection Act and, 817
- Coverture, 963
- Covington, Hayden, 372, 849
- Cox, Archibald, 165
- Cox, Elton, 373
- Cox v. Louisiana*, 15, 372–373
- entrapment by estoppel and, 510
 - picketing and, 1168

INDEX

- Cox v. New Hampshire*, 373–374
- Coy v. Iowa*, 374
 - Roman law and, 128
- CPB. See Corporation for Public Broadcasting
- CPPA. See Child Pornography Prevention Act
- CPUSA. See Communist Party of the United States
- Crack. See Cocaine
- Craig v. Boren*
 - ERA and, 521
 - gender and, 518
 - Ginsburg and, 687
 - middle scrutiny test and, 612
 - Stevens and, 1558
- Craig v. Missouri*
 - Marshall Court and, 968
- Cramer v. United States*, 1665, 1800
- Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction*, 1361, 1611
- Crampton v. Ohio*, 241
- Crandall, Reuben, 1486
- Crandall v. Nevada*, 801
- Crane Junior College, 693
- Crane v. Johnson*, 374–375
- Crane v. Kentucky*, 375, 1428
- CRAs. See Credit reporting agencies
- Crawford v. United States*, 345–346
- Crawford v. Washington*, 344–345
- Creation science. See Creationism
- Creationism, 3, 375–379, 480–481. See also Intelligent design
 - Biblical, 1616
 - Edwards v. Aguillard* and, 377, 481, 1615
 - Epperson v. Arkansas* and, 1615
 - fundamentalist, 1616
 - generalist, 1616
 - Genesis and, 1615
 - public schools and, 1615–1617
 - secular humanism and, 1438
 - theistic, 1616
 - Young Earth, 1616
- Creationism Act, 1617
- Creativity Movement, 566
- Crèche. See Nativity scenes
- Credit
 - FCRA and, 569–570
 - privacy of, 346
 - scores, 570
- Credit reporting agencies (CRAs)
 - FCRA and, 569–570
- CREEP. See Committee to Re-Elect the President
- Cremation, 93
- Crescent City Slaughter-House Company, 514, 1481
- Crescent Obscured, The* (Allison), 1053
- Crime(s)
 - categories of, 385–386
 - hate speech as, 752
 - Inchoate, 1420
 - jury trial right and, 875–876
 - overseas, 354
 - retribution and, 1328–1329
 - serious, 875–876
 - substantive, 1420
 - while on bail, 98
- Crime Control Act 1968, 1519, 1520
- Crime scenes, 428
- Criminal acts
 - corruption of blood and, 369–370
 - incitement of, 651–655
 - profits for, 1494–1495
- Criminal anarchism, 689
- Criminal Anarchy Act of 1902, 74
- Criminal Anarchy Act of 1912, 176
- Criminal Antitrust Penalty Enhancement and Reform Act, 1472
- Criminal codes, 67–68
- Criminal conduct
 - civil forfeiture and, 295
- Criminal conspiracy. See Conspiracy
- Criminal convictions
 - civil death and, 297
 - collateral consequences and, 325–326
- Criminal defendants. See Defendants
- Criminal intent, police power and, 1185
- Criminal justice
 - Burger and, 204
 - ethnicity and, 1256
 - Native Americans and, 1258
 - police and, 1256
 - race and, 1256–1258
 - sex and, 1463–1465
- Criminal Justice Act of 2003, 440
- Criminal justice agencies, 1258
- Criminal law
 - civil law v., 380–381
 - colonial charters and, 327
 - federalization of, 580–581
- Criminal procedural rights
 - Harlan, II, and, 742–743
- Criminal profiling, 1236–1237
- Criminal rights, 128
- Criminal Sentences: Law without Order* (Frankel), 1458
- Criminal statutes, 907
- Criminal surety laws, 1649
- Criminal Syndicalism Act, 1780
- Criminal syndicalism law, 1510
 - KKK and, 1511
- Criminal trials. See also Trials
 - entrapment defense in, 509–510
 - exclusionary rule and, 554
 - fee system of, 798–799
 - multidefendant, 24–25
 - prosecution of, 786–787
 - right of access to, 1336
- Criminology, 1236
- Crips, 1744
- Crisis, The* (magazine), 1063
- Crito* (Burgh), 1735
- Croly, Herbert, 736
- Cromwell, Oliver, 382
 - English Toleration Act and, 504
 - Lilborne and, 920
 - Maryland Toleration Act and, 976
 - New Model Army and, 507
- Crooker v. California*, 292
- Cross burning, 382–383
 - African Americans and, 382–383, 1271
 - City of Houston v. Hill* and, 588
 - fighting words and, 588
 - hate crime laws and, 749
 - hateful motivation for, 752
 - KKK and, 382–383, 753, 896–897
 - R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul* and, 382–383, 1271

- viewpoint discrimination and, 1716
 - Virginia v. Black* and, 382–383, 1513, 1724–1725, 1769
 - “Cross of Gold” (Bryan), 189
 - Cross-examination
 - compulsory process clause and, 344–345
 - of defendants, 1683
 - face-to-face, 345
 - Lilly v. Virginia* and, 920
 - limits on, 396
 - procedural due process and, 463
 - Sixth Amendment and, 1359–1360
 - Croswell, Harry, 733, 1207
 - Crow, Jim, 302
 - Crozier Theological Seminary, 889
 - Cruel and unusual punishment, 383–387. See also Eighth Amendment
 - 1689 English Bill of Rights and, 1537
 - Coker v. Georgia* and, 323
 - death penalty and, 1545
 - drugs and, 1745
 - electric chair as, 485–486
 - English Bill of Rights and, 503
 - evolving standards of decency and, 1669
 - Fuller Court and, 667
 - generally, 387
 - Harlan, II, and, 742
 - Harmelin v. Michigan* and, 744
 - Herrera v. Collins* and, 762
 - history of, 387–388
 - mandatory minimum sentences and, 954
 - Marshall, T., and, 973
 - McCleskey v. Kemp* and, 985–986
 - penitentiaries and, 1539
 - Powell v. Texas* and, 1193
 - proportional punishment and, 1241
 - Quinlan and, 1254
 - Solem v. Helm* and, 1494
 - South Dakota and, 1494
 - sterilization as, 1479
 - test for, 486
 - Thomas and, 1650
 - three strikes laws and, 1654
 - Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723
 - Weems v. United States* and, 1772
 - Cruel and unusual punishment clause
 - Amnesty International and, 60
 - capital punishment and, 231–232
 - execution and, 243–244
 - Furman v. Georgia* and, 241
 - Gregg v. Georgia* and, 231–232
 - Jurek v. Texas* and, 231–232
 - multiple punishments and, 442
 - Proffitt v. Florida* and, 231–232
 - Roberts v. Louisiana* and, 231–232
 - Woodson v. North Carolina* and, 231–232
 - Cruikshank, William J., 1681
 - Cruz v. Beto*, 291
 - free exercise and, 1214
 - O’Lone v. Estate of Shabazz* and, 1130
 - Cruz v. New York*, 344
 - Cruzan, Nancy, 86, 388–389
 - Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health*, 86, 388–389, 1416, 1533
 - euthanasia and, 547
 - O’Connor and, 1127
 - physician-assisted suicide (PAS) and, 1164
 - Rehnquist and, 1766
 - right to die and, 888
 - substantive due process and, 466
 - CSA. See Controlled Substances Act
 - CSO. See Community Services Organization
 - CSRTs. See Combatant status review tribunals
 - CTEA. See Copyright Term Extension Act of 1998
 - Cuba, interdiction and, 390
 - Cullom–Struble Bill, 72
 - Cultural defense, 390–391
 - Cultural interdiction, 389–390
 - Cummings v. Missouri*
 - Chase Court and, 272
 - Field and, 586
 - test oaths and, 1627–1628
 - Cummings v. Richmond County Board of Ed.*, 1181
 - Cupid’s Yokes* (Heywood), 649
 - Currency
 - Anthony and, 65
 - Hepburn v. Griswold* and, 465
 - “In God We Trust” and, 1066
 - politics and, 1190–1191
 - secularism and, 90
 - silver standard, 189
 - Curtilage, 1430
 - Curtis, Helen, 368
 - Curtis Publishing v. Butts*
 - public figures and, 1242
 - Warren Court and, 1755
 - Cusack, Ruth, 1062
 - Cushing, William
 - Adams, J., and, 644
 - Ellsworth Court and, 491
 - Jay Court and, 843
 - Cushing-Adams letters, 644
 - Custody. See Child custody
 - Customs offenses, 295
 - Customs Service, 415
 - Cutter v. Wilkinson*
 - ADL and, 70
 - O’Lone v. Estate of Shabazz* and, 1131
 - RLUIPA and, 160, 560, 1215, 1308
 - Cuyler v. Sullivan*, 810
 - Cyber Promotions v. America Online*, 45
 - Cybersquatting, 824
 - Czech Republic, 1668
- ## D
- Daddy’s Roommate* (Willhoite), 164
 - DADT. See Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell
 - Dainese v. Hale*, 342
 - Dalai Lama, 1035
 - Dale, James, 170
 - Daley, Richard
 - Chicago Seven and, 278
 - political patronage and, 1189
 - Dallek, Robert, 856
 - Damages, for defamation, 404
 - Dambrot v. Central Michigan University*, 1188–1189
 - Danbury Baptist Association, 766
 - Jefferson and, 847
 - Dandridge v. Williams*, 393
 - rational purpose test and, 610

INDEX

- Daniel v. Cantrell*, 1713
Daniels v. Quinn, 1615
Darrow, Clarence, 393–395
 Bryan and, 189
 peremptory challenges and, 873
 Scopes trial and, 1425
Darrow, Paul Edward, 395
Dartmouth College Case
 contract clause and, 477
 freedom of association and, 634
Dartmouth College v. Woodward
 Marshall Court and, 968
 Marshall, J., and, 969
Darwin, Charles, 376, 1505, 1617
 heredity and, 545
Darwinism, 376–377
Data mining, 1519
 privacy of, 1222–1223
Daugherty, Harry M., 1564
 Hoover and, 774
Daughters of Bilitis, 676, 1566
Daughters of Temperance, 64
Davey, Joshua, 929
David v. Beason, 586
Davidian Seventh Day Adventist, 1461–1462
Davidson, Jo, 904
Davis, Angela, 306
Davis, David, 271–272, 551–552
Davis, John W., 517
Davis, Rennie
 Chicago Seven and, 278
Davis, Samuel, 396
Davis v. Alaska, 396
Davis v. Bandemer, 1277
Davis v. Beason, 343, 396–397, 1476
 Fuller Court and, 668
Davis v. United States, 1457
Dawkins, Richard, 1618
Dawson, Joseph Martin, 397
Dawson v. State, 486
Day They Came to Arrest the Book, The (Hentoff), 760
Day, William R.
 Buchanan v. Warley and, 192
 Burdeau v. McDowell and, 195
 Mann Act and, 955
 White Court and, 1777
Daycare, 1421
De facto segregation, 1441, 1443
De jure segregation, 1441
De Libellis Famosis, 506, 1440 de Lubac, Henri, 254 de Medici, Cosimo, 1051
De minimis doctrine sampling and, 764
 in seizures, 1446
De Paul University, 276
de Tocqueville, Alexis, 375
 jury trials and, 875
 Mill and, 1010
DEA. See Drug Enforcement Agency
Dead Man Walking: An Eyewitness Account of the Death Penalty in the United States (Prejean), 1200
Deadly force. See Use of force
Dean and Gill v. District of Columbia, 1401
The Dearborn Independent, 69
DeArment v. Harvey, 571 Death
 autopsies and, 93
 civil, 297, 369
 Declaration of Death Act of New Jersey and, 561
 qualification, 191
Death, Doctor. See Kevorkian, Jack
Death penalty
 abolishment of, 233–234
 African Americans and, 1257–1258
 aggravating factors and, 227
 Amnesty International and, 59–60
 appeals, 684, 762
 Ashcroft and, 85
 Blackmun on, 1394
 Boykin v. Alabama and, 172
 Buchanan v. Kentucky and, 191
 California and, 1545, 1546
 California v. Ramos and, 216
 Caucasians and, 1258 challenges, 233–234, 240–242 commuted, 237
 competency to stand trial and, 692 constitutionality of, 60, 669 crimes for, 385–386
 cruel and unusual punishment and, 1545
 false confessions and, 573–574
 for felony murder accomplices, 236
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 989–990
 future dangerousness and, 110
 Godinez v. Moran and, 692
 Goldberg on, 696–697 guided discretion statutes and, 717
 Herrera v. Collins and, 762
 Hughes Court and, 782–783
 Illinois, 1393
 legislation, 385
 Lockhart v. McCree and, 932
 mandatory, 952–953
 McCleskey v. Kemp and, 985–986
 mitigating factors and, 932
 modern, 224
 NAACP v., 1257
 prohibitions on, 236
 proportionality and, 231
 racial discrimination and, 1257–1258
 rape and, 232, 245, 385–386, 1329
 retribution and, 1329 reversals, 242
 statutes, 227, 228
 Stevens and, 1558
 Stewart, P., and, 1560
 unconstitutionality of, 245
Death with Dignity Act, 1135–1137 Debate
 free and fair, 656
 freedom to, 262
Debs, Eugene, 399–400, 1282
 Darrow and, 394
 Debs v. United States and, 401
 Espionage Act of 1917 and, 652
 La Follette and, 903
 Debs v. United States, 401
 Abrams v. United States and, 13

- bad tendency test and, 97
- clear and present danger test and, 1795–1796
- Holmes and, 771
- incitement of criminal activity and, 652
- Debt
 - collection, 401
 - imprisonment for, 1541
 - peonage, 1649, 1777
 - servitude, 126
- Debtor's prisons, 401
- Deceit, 320
- Decency clause, 700–701
- Decent Interval* (Snepp), 1491, 1492
- Deception, 1016
- “Declaration and Resolves, The,” 54
- Declaration of Death Act of New Jersey, 561
- Declaration of Independence, 401–402, 1275, 1638
 - AASS and, 46
 - Bible and, 127
 - creation of, 54
 - displays of, 1621
 - Enlightenment and, 1026
 - equal protection and, 514
 - Franklin and, 621
 - free speech law and, 815
 - freedom of religion and, 847
 - Jefferson and, 845, 1338
 - Magna Carta and, 949
 - Mason and, 978
 - natural law and, 1080
 - quartering of troops and, 1252
 - Sherman and, 1472
 - slavery and, 451
 - state constitutions and, 1537
 - unalienable rights in, 135
 - Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723–1724
- Declaration of Indulgence, 1667
- Declaration of Principles of 1915* (AAUP), 1505
- Declaration of Principles on Freedom of Expression, 640
- Declaration of Rights, 691
- Declaration of Rights* (Mason), 1203
- Declaration of Sentiments*, 1522
- Declaration of Sentiments of 1848, 539
- Declaration on Religious Freedom, 254
- Declaratory Act, 977
- Deductive reasoning, 913
- Dees, Morris Seligman, Jr., 1500, 1502–1503
- Dees, William, 1414
- Defamation, 1699
 - actual malice standard and, 27
 - anonymity and, 62
 - common law and, 335–336
 - damages for, 404
 - false light invasion of privacy and, 574
 - First Amendment and, 1271
 - free speech and, 402–405, 815
 - Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc.* and, 680
 - group libel and, 715
 - Hustler Magazine v. Falwell* and, 787
 - Milkovich v. Lorain Journal* and, 1009
 - Near v. Minnesota* and, 1081, 1694–1695
 - negligence and, 403
 - neutral reportage doctrine and, 1082
 - New York Times Co. v. Sullivan* and, 330, 680
 - Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps* and, 1158
 - principles of, 402
 - public figures and, 1242
 - public officials and, 1245
 - SLAPP and, 1480
 - truth and, 404
- Defendant damage, 1711
- Defendants
 - categories of, 386
 - entrapment of, 509–510
 - false statements and, 1683
 - humanizing, 870
 - North Carolina v. Alford* and, 1111
 - public trials and, 1247
 - rights of, 1416
 - Scalia and, 1416
 - Souter and, 1497
 - United States v. Agurs* and, 1678–1679
 - Washington v. Texas* and, 1767
- Defending Pornography: Free Speech, Sex, and the Fight for Women's Rights* (Strossen), 1573
- Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA), 405–406, 677, 1399, 1401, 1403
 - debate about, 1406
- Defense, right to present, 406–408
- Definition-by-analogy test, 1215
- DeFunis v. Odegaard*, 447
- Degan, William, 1385
- Deity. See God
- DeJonge, Dirk, 411
- DeJonge v. Oregon*, 74, 411–412
 - Hughes and, 784
 - incitement of criminal activity and, 654
 - substantive due process and, 466
- DeLancey, James, 1814
 - Zenger and, 734
- Delano grape strike, 275
- Delaware
 - Declaration of Rights, 136
 - jury trials and, 137–138
 - Petition Campaign and, 1155
 - religion and, 1309
 - slavery and, 1647
- Delaware Charter of 1701, 327
- Delaware v. Prouse*, 412
 - checkpoints and, 276
- Delima v. Bidwell*, 740
- Delinquency, 1549–1550
 - proceedings, 813
- Delli Paoli v. United States*, 25
- Dellinger, David
 - Chicago Seven and, 278
 - Kunstler and, 898
- DeLong, James, 381
- Delta Force, 1732
- DeMille, Cecil B., 1620
- Democracy
 - Brandeis on, 175
 - civil liberties and, 1028
 - free speech and, 655–656, 1451
 - liberty v., 151
 - in modern period, 655–657
 - pluralism of, 1274
 - promoting, 44
 - religion and, 1274
 - theory, 655–657
 - wisdom and, 1451

INDEX

- Democratic National Committee, 1280
 - Red Lion Broadcasting v. FCC* and, 185
- Democratic Party
 - Hague and, 729
 - McReynolds and, 992
 - Operation Rescue and, 1134
 - Palmer and, 1280–1281
- Democratic Societies, 95
- Demonstrations. See Protests
- Denationalization, 413, 562. See also Expatriation
 - involuntary, 563
 - Trop v. Dulles* and, 385
- Denaturalization, 413
- Dennis, Eugene, 654
 - CPUSA and, 338
- Dennis v. United States*, 14–15, 68, 414–415, 737, 1511
 - categorical approach and, 252
 - Clark, T., and, 309
 - clear and present danger test and, 690
 - CPUSA and, 338, 339
 - Douglas and, 446
 - Frankfurter and, 618, 1641
 - freedom of association and, 635
 - HUAC and, 780
 - incitement of criminal activity and, 654–655
 - national security and, 1073
 - Smith Act and, 1488
 - Vinson and, 1722
 - Vinson Court and, 1719
 - Yates v. United States* and, 1807
- Denver Area Educational Telecommunications Consortium, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission*, 99, 252, 1689
 - Breyer and, 183
- Denver Principles*, 25–26
- Deoxyribonucleic acid. See DNA
- Department of Agriculture
 - Estes and, 545
 - Hiss and, 765
- Department of Defense
 - Abu Ghraib and, 15
 - Flynt and, 599
 - homosexuals and, 435
 - military chaplains and, 268
 - military tribunals and, 1008
 - recognized religions and, 268
 - on religion in military, 1303–1304
 - security clearance and, 1270
- Department of Education, 285
- Department of Health and Human Services (HHS)
 - Bowen v. American Hospital Association*, 166
 - Griffin v. Wisconsin* and, 712
 - Rust v. Sullivan* and, 672–674, 1387
- Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW)
 - Beal v. Doe* and, 115
 - Brown v. Board of Education* and, 186
- Department of Homeland Security (DHS), 415–416, 1259
 - airport searches and, 33–34
 - IMFA and, 795
- Department of Justice (DOJ)
 - Alien Registration Act and, 134
 - AP/LS and, 925
 - Ashcroft and, 84
 - Bork and, 165
 - Chemerinsky and, 276
 - drugs and, 1743
 - hate crimes statistics and, 751
 - Hiss and, 765
 - Hoover and, 774
 - Jackson, R. and, 833–834
 - King and, 890
 - Murphy and, 1047
 - ODWDA and, 1137
 - Radical Division of, 774
 - Reno and, 1317
- Department of Labor
 - Goldberg and, 695–696
 - Rauh and, 1269
- Department of the Navy v. Egan*, 311
 - national security and, 1071
- DePaul University, 693
- Deportation
 - Alien Acts and, 37–38
 - of Arabs, 1625
 - of Bridges, 1566
 - Detroit Free Press v. Ashcroft*, 1626
 - Fong Yue Ting v. United States* and, 600, 1530
 - Geary Act and, 260
 - Harisiades v. Shaughnessy* and, 737
 - history of, 790–791
 - ideological and security-based, 789–792
 - Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha* and, 797
 - of legal residents, 1530
 - Marcello v. Bonds* and, 800
 - of noncitizens, 40, 1105–1106
 - North Jersey Media Group v. Ashcroft* and, 496
 - Palmer and, 1144
 - plenary power doctrine and, 893
 - Quakers and, 1251
 - Wilson, W., and, 1785
 - World War II and, 1800
- Depression
 - AFPS and, 103
 - Communist Party and, 339
 - CPUSA and, 337
 - economic rights and, 479
 - freedom of contract and, 637
 - Hoover and, 775
 - Hughes Court and, 782
 - marriage and, 964–965
 - movies and, 755
 - Murphy and, 1047
 - Prohibition and, 1239
 - substantive due process and, 466
- Deprivation, as coercion, 1455
- Der Deutscher Rechts-Schutz Verein, 912
- Derivative use immunity, 1454
- Dershowitz, Alan, 306, 416–417
- DeSalvo, Albert, 240
- Desegregation. See also Segregation
 - Marshall, T., and, 972–973
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1193
- Deseret, 1039
- DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services*, 282
- Design for Diversity, 220
- Designated public forums, 417, 1245, 1699
 - National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley* and, 1065
 - universities as, 1699
- DeSilver, Albert, 1798
- Desparecidos, 792
- Detached Memoranda* (Madison), 1109

- Detectaphone, 1429
 Detentions. See also Preventive detention
 Breyer and, 183
 extremist groups and, 567
 Guantanamo Bay and, 715–716
 habeas corpus and, 727
 Hamdi v. Rumsfeld and, 731, 1347
 illegal, 665–666
 indefinite, 804–805
 interrogations and, 316
 of material witnesses, 804–805, 981
 Michigan v. Summers and, 1006
 of noncitizens, 1105–1106 pretrial, 804–805, 1419
 probable cause and, 1234
 tribal, 809
 unlawful, 800, 991
 under USA PATRIOT Act, 791–792
Detroit Free Press v. Ashcroft, 1626
 Deukmejian, George, 275
 Dewey, Thomas E., 1762
 DeWitt, John, 417–418
 Japanese internment and, 839 misconduct of, 841–842
 suspect categories and, 518
 Dexter Avenue Church, 889
 DH. See Dignitatis Humanae
 DHS. See Department of Homeland Security
 DI. See Directorate of Intelligence
 Diagnostic and Statistical Manual (DSM), 1405
 Dial-a-porn services, 418
 obscenity and, 1124
 Dialectic materialism, 1639
 Diallo, Amadou, 154
 Dianetics, 286
Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health (Hubbard), 286
 Dickens, Charles, 150, 307
 Dickerson, James, 1020
Dickerson v. United States, 419, 1287, 1457
 Harris v. New York and, 747
 Miranda v. Arizona and, 1017
 Miranda warnings and, 1020
 Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 and, 992, 1132
 Souter and, 1497
 Dickinson College, 1387
 Dies Committee, 780, 1800
 New Deal and, 1083
 Dies, Martin, Jr., 419–420
 HUAC and, 780
 New Deal and, 1084
 Diet, free exercise in, 1215
 DiGerlando, Benedict, 524
Digest of Justinian, 439
 Digital communication. See Electronic communication
 Digital divide, 821–822
 Digital Millennium Copyright Act (DMCA), 817, 822–823
 Digital rights management (DRM), 816–817
 Digital video recorders (DVRs), 1002
Dignitatis Humanae (DH), 254–255, 1049
 Dillinger, John, 774
 Direct advocacy test, 653–654
 Brandenburg v. Ohio and, 655
 Director of National Intelligence (DNI), 257
 Directorate of Intelligence (DI), 257–258
 Directorate of Operations (DO), 257
 Directorate of Science and Technology, 258
 Directorate of Support (DS), 258
Dirkes v. Borough of Runnemede, 1713
 Dirksen, Everett, 356
 Disabled persons
 ADA and, 71
 voting rights for, 1355–1356
 Discipline
 for lawyers, 420 protected speech and, 420–421
 for public employees, 420
Discourses Concerning Government (Sidney), 847
 Discovery Institute, 378
 Discovery Network, Inc., 292–293
 Discovery process in court proceedings, 421
 deadlines, 80
 Discrimination. See also Racial discrimination; Sexual discrimination ABA on, 228
 assisted suicide and, 87
 based on poverty, 711
 Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 170, 1363, 1381
 Civil Rights Act of 1964, 300–301
 de jure, 30
 definition, 70
 EAA and, 512
 economic, 951
 Eisenstadt v. Baird and, 484
 employment, 303, 777–779
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 1468
 in housing, 1649 with Indians, 1412
 interstate commerce and, 826
 invidious, 830, 936
 Jews and, 851
 Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District and, 906
 mandatory death sentences and, 953
 NOW and, 1068
 peremptory challenges and, 873–874
 Plyler v. Doe and, 1182
 political affiliation and, 1417
 pornography and, 1121
 private, 605
 private discriminatory association and, 1226
 privileges and immunities and, 1231 prosecution, 423–424 proving, 422–423
 public forums and, 1230
 purposeful, 114
 by religious entities receiving government funds, 422–423
 religious speech and, 1230 restaurants and, 1443 reverse, 1282–1283
 sexual orientation and, 1409
 Southern Poverty Law Center and, 1500
 Supreme Court on, 1278
 Title III and, 1659
 Title VII and, 1659
 U.S. Constitution and, 352
 in venire, 872 viewpoint, 700–701 voter, 746

INDEX

- Discrimination (cont.)
by voucher-funded schools, 1424
Warren and, 1763
- Discriminatory effect, 424
- Discriminatory purpose, 424
- Disestablishment movement, 425–426
- Disloyalty, dissent v., 39
- Disney. See Walt Disney Company
- Disproportionate test, 236, 384–385
- Dissent
Bache and, 96
in colonial America, 622
commercial speech and, 330
disloyalty v., 39
English Toleration Act and, 504
free speech and, 14
freedom of press and, 658
general warrants and, 678
national security and, 36, 658 public safety and, 1011
religious freedom and, 136
- District of Columbia, as “state,” 1391–1392
- Diversity, 30–31
Grutter v. Bollinger and, 612
Madison and, 944–945
- Diversity Immigrant Visa Program (DV lottery program), 426–427, 1259 goals of, 427
- Divine Right school, 931
- Divorce. See also Child custody emerging laws, 964
Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 1576 increase in, 965
Naim v. Naim and, 1059
no-fault, 1523
reform, 966 same-sex adoption and, 1399 self, 963
Stanton and, 1522–1523
states and, 1540
- Dixon, Thomas, 896
- DMCA. See Digital Millennium Copyright Act
- DNA, 430
cloning and, 313
data privacy and, 1222
dragnets, 430–431
innocence and, 432
photofits, 432
- DNA databases
cross-jurisdictional issues for, 432 problems with, 431–432
- DNA evidence, 428
capital punishment and, 224
collecting, 430, 431 contaminated, 429
destruction of, 429, 431
Herrera v. Collins and, 237
- DNA testing, 430–432
Arizona v. Youngblood and, 79
in courtrooms, 430
exemplars and, 558
fingerprints v., 431 flawed, 429
history of, 430
implications of, 432
information derived from, 432
innocence and, 428–429
mistakes, 429
post-conviction evidence and, 762 post-conviction statutes and, 428
uniformity of, 432
- DNI. See Director of National Intelligence
- Do not e-mail registry, 820
- Do not resuscitate order, 547
- DO. See Directorate of Operations
- Doctor-patient relationship, 1411
- Doctors. See Physicians
- Documenting Courage*, 1461
- Documents production of, 171
protection for, 730
sealed, 1428–1429
- Doe v. Bolton*, 432–433
Burger Court and, 198
Colautti v. Franklin and, 324
Douglas and, 445–446
privileges and immunities and, 1231
Roe v. Wade and, 433, 1320, 1367
- Doe v. University of Michigan*, 221
- Doggett v. United States*, 1517
- Dogs, sniffing, 486–489
reasonable expectation of privacy and, 882
- Doherty, Henry L., 195
- DOJ. See Department of Justice
- Dolan v. City of Tigart*, 1605
- Dole, Bob, 933
- Dole v. Shenandoah Baptist Church*, 571
- Dollar diplomacy, 1601
- DOMA. See Defense of Marriage Act
- Domain names, 824
- Domestic partnerships, 1409
benefits, 1401
registration for, 1409
- Domestic violence, 433–435, 1465 activism against, 434–435
history of, 434–435
limitations on, 1540
- Dominican Republic, 1585
- Dominicans, religious incorporation of, 291
- Donahoe, Bridget, 1294
- Donahoe v. Richards*, 1294
- Donahue, Phil, 72
- Donald, Beulah Mae, 1501, 1503
- Donald, Michael, 1501
- Don’t ask, don’t tell (DADT), 435–436, 1460
gay and lesbian rights and, 677
Log Cabin Republicans, 933
- Doremus v. Board of Education*, 1609–1610
- Dorr v. United States*, 740
- Doty, Madeline, 103
- Double jeopardy, 122, 437–439
appeals and, 230
application of, 440–441
Ashe v. Swenson and, 441
Benton v. Maryland and, 440
in Bible, 439
Blockburger v. United States and, 441
Brown v. Ohio and, 441
Bullington v. Missouri and, 195
Burks v. United States and, 207–208, 1655

- creation of, 438–439
- Criminal Justice Act of 2003 and, 440
- in England, 440
- Fifth Amendment and, 1504
- grand juries and, 708
- guarantee against, 438–439
- guilty pleas and, 719
- Hetenyi v. Wilkins* and, 972
- history of, 437–438, 439–440
- Hudson v. Louisiana* and, 781
- incorporation doctrine and, 803
- international application of, 440
- jury nullification and, 869
- language of, 439
- Menna v. New York* and, 1000
- modern history of, 439–442
- Native Americans and, 441
- Palko v. Connecticut* and, 463
- resentencing and, 226
- Ricketts v. Adamson* and, 1334
- rights of accused and, 1360–1361
- Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania* and, 226–227
- Simpson and, 441
- Tibbs v. Florida* and, 1655
- United States v. Tateo* and, 1694
- DoubleClick, Inc., 821
- Douglas, Helen Gahagan, 1098
- Douglas, Stephen A., 922–923
- Douglas v. California*, 60–61, 442–443, 1345, 1350
 - suspect categories and, 518
- Douglas, William O., 443–447, 1560, 1585
 - Adler v. Board of Education* and, 17
 - Beauharnais v. Illinois* and, 116–117
 - Belle Terre v. Boraas* and, 120
 - Boykin v. Alabama* and, 172
 - Burger Court and, 198
 - on death penalty, 245
 - Dennis v. United States* and, 14–15, 415
 - Emerson and, 497
 - Endo v. United States* and, 840
 - Engel v. Vitale* and, 502
 - Follett v. Town of McCormick* and, 599
 - Fortas and, 603
 - Furman v. Georgia* and, 232
 - Gideon v. Wainwright* and, 682
 - Girouard v. United States* and, 1142
 - Gray v. Sanders* and, 1275
 - Griffin v. California* and, 710
 - Griswold v. Connecticut* and, 444, 499, 713, 1337
 - Harisiades v. Shaughnessy* and, 792
 - Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections* and, 746
 - on Hughes, 782
 - Hughes Court and, 782
 - judicial philosophy of, 445
 - Keyishian v. Board of Regents* and, 18
 - Korematsu v. United States* and, 445, 1373
 - legal realism and, 913
 - Meiklejohn and, 999
 - New York Times v. United States* and, 14–15, 1089
 - obscenity and, 1118
 - Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville* and, 1144
 - penumbras and, 1153, 1154
 - Poe v. Ullman* and, 1183
 - privacy and, 1219
 - quartering of troops and, 1253
 - Rabe v. Washington* and, 1255
 - right to privacy and, 802
 - on right to travel, 1354
 - Roosevelt, F., and, 1373, 1374
 - Rosenbergs and, 1378
 - Ross v. Moffitt* and, 1380
 - Roth v. United States* and, 447, 1382
 - Rowan v. United States Post Office Department* and, 1384
 - Sherbert v. Verner* and, 349
 - Skinner v. Oklahoma* and, 518
 - sodomy and, 1405
 - Stevens and, 1555
 - Terminiello v. Chicago* and, 654
 - United States v. O'Brien* and, 450
 - United States v. Seeger* and, 1693
 - Vinson Court and, 1721
 - Walz v. Tax Commission* and, 1738–1739
 - Warren Court and, 1753
 - Whitehill v. Elkins* and, 18
 - Zorach v. Clauson* and, 343, 1719–1720, 1822
 - Douglass, Frederick, 7, 448, 1486, 1585
 - Anthony and, 65
 - Wells and, 1774
 - Douglass, Margaret, 1485
 - Dover School Board, 378
 - Dower, 1523
 - Down Beat*, 760
 - Downes v. Bidwell*, 740
 - Dr. Bonham's Case*, 863
 - Dr. Seuss, 1414
 - Dr. Seuss v. Penguin Books*, 1414
 - Draft, 1447. See also Conscientious objection; Selective Service Act of 1917
 - Baldwin and, 102
 - Bond and, 161
 - Debs and, 400
 - Murphy and, 1048
 - statutory religion-based exemptions and, 559–560
 - Vietnam War and, 449–450
 - Watts v. United States* and, 1769
 - World War I and, 1792–1793
 - Draft card burning, 363, 449–450, 1007, 1162, 1516
 - First Amendment and, 1688
 - United States v. O'Brien* and, 1113–1114, 1688
 - Vietnam War and, 1688
 - Dreadlocks, 1262–1263
 - Dred Scott v. Sandford*, 293, 451–452, 1484, 1487
 - Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
 - due process and, 457, 1581
 - Emancipation Proclamation and, 493–494
 - exclusion and, 790–791
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803
 - judicial review and, 864
 - Lincoln and, 923
 - Plessy v. Ferguson* and, 1181
 - privileges and immunities clause and, 606–607
 - Second Amendment and, 721–722
 - substantive due process and, 464–465
 - Taney Court and, 1607, 1635
 - Thirteenth Amendment and, 1648
 - Dress codes
 - free exercise and, 1215
 - Goldman v. Weinberger* and, 698–699
 - in public schools, 1578–1579
 - Driver's license information, 662

INDEX

- Drivers Privacy Protection Act of 1994, 346, 662
Driving under the influence. See DUI Driving while black (DWB), 1446
 racial profiling and, 1237
Driving while intoxicated. See DWI
DRM. See Digital rights management
Drug(s), 1684. See also Controlled Substances Act; War on Drugs; specific drugs
 abuse of, 452–453
 advertising and, 114
 African Americans and, 1745
 AIDS, 26
 airport searches and, 33
 bail and, 1745
 Bolshevik Revolution and, 1742
 Bruce and, 188–189
 Bush, G.H.W., and, 1744
 Bush, G.W., and, 1744
 checkpoints and, 276, 806
 China and, 1740
 civil forfeiture and, 295
 Civil War and, 1740
 collateral consequences and, 326
 Colombia and, 1744
 cruel and unusual punishment and, 744, 1745 dogs and, 1569
 DWI and, 469
 Eighth Amendment and, 1745
 Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon
 v. Smith and, 454, 1263
 FBN and, 64
 Federal Railway Administration and, 452
 Federal Sentencing Guidelines on, 1257
 Florida v. Jimeno and, 597
 Florida v. White and, 598 forfeiture and, 1745
 Fourth Amendment and, 1745
 free exercise clause and, 454–455
 gangs and, 1744
 Harrison Act and, 1741
 Helms Amendment and, 759
 Illinois v. Wardlow and, 1569
 incarceration and, 1463
 informants and, 793
 intoxication defense and, 814 intravenous, 759
 IRS and, 1741
 Kyllo v. United States and, 899–900
 Lynum v. Illinois and, 940
 Michigan v. Summers and, 1006
 Native Americans and, 1078
 Nixon, R. and, 1743
 Ohio v. Robinette and, 1128
 paraphernalia, 1804
 Philippines and, 1741 prison population and, 1213–1214
 probable cause and, 1235
 Progressive Era and, 1740
 proportional punishment and, 1241
 proportionality review and, 1242
 punishment and, 1743
 Quinlan and, 1254
 racism and, 424
 Rawlings v. Kentucky and, 1271–1392
 Reagan and, 1743–1744
 reasonable suspicion and, 1445
 religion and, 453–455
 religious ceremonies and, 24
 Robinson v. California and, 1366
 Roviaro v. United States and, 1384
 search and seizure and, 1745
 statutory religion-based exemptions and, 559–560 treatment for, 1743
 United States v. 92 Buena Vista Avenue and, 1678
 United States v. Robinson and, 1691–1692
 United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez and, 1696
 as victimless crime, 1709
 Vietnam War and, 1743
 Virginia Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens' Consumer Council and, 331–332
 World War II and, 1742
 Wyoming v. Houghton and, 1804
Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) of Detroit, 1237
 ODWDA and, 1137
 Oregon Death with Dignity Act and, 87
 profiling and, 1446
Drug testing, 452–453, 1434, 1534, 1746
 bail and, 98–99
 Board of Education v. Earls and, 266
 Chandler v. Miller and, 266, 1746
 DWI and, 470
 extracurricular activities and, 1746
 Ferguson v. Charleston and, 1746
 Kamisar and, 881
 mandatory, 266
 National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab and, 1076–1077
 pregnancy and, 28
 privacy and, 156, 1746
 probable cause and, 156
 in public schools, 155–156
 random, 453
 search warrants and, 156
 Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association and, 1479–1480
 suspicionless, 452–453
 Veronia School District v. Acton and, 1707, 1746
Drunk driving
 Berkemer v. McCarty, 123–124
 California v. Trombetta and, 217
 checkpoints and, 276
 City of Indianapolis v. Edmond and, 806
 Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz and, 1004
Dry Creek Lodge v. Arapahoe and Shoshone Tribes
 tribal courts and, 808–809
DS. See Directorate of Support
DSM See Diagnostic and Statistical Manual
Dual criminality, 563
Dual sovereignty, 113
DuBois, W.E.B., 1063
Duckworth v. Eagan, 1457
Due process, 456–460, 462–467. See also Fourteenth Amendment;
 Substantive due process
 abortion rights and, 714
 Adair v. United States and, 465
 Adkins v. Children's Hospital and, 465 administrative, 692–693
 Alcorta v. Texas and, 35
 Algeyer v. Louisiana and, 1580
 aliens and, 798
 Allen v. Illinois and, 43

- Apprendi v. New Jersey*, 76
Arizona v. Youngblood and, 79
 bail and, 97
Blackledge v. Perry and, 149
BMW v. Gore and, 1583
Bowers v. Hardwick and, 169
Boykin v. Alabama and, 172
 Brandeis and, 176
Breithaupt v. Abram and, 181
Brown v. Mississippi and, 188
Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co. and, 213
California v. Trombetta and, 217
Cantwell v. Connecticut and, 849
 capital punishment and, 234–235, 236
Chambers v. Mississippi and, 264
 coerced confessions and, 315, 317
 under colonial charter, 326–327
Colorado v. Connelly and, 328–329 without compensation, 1033 competency to stand trial and, 831
Coppage v. Kansas and, 465
 definition of, 456
DeJonge v. Oregon and, 411 discriminatory prosecution and, 423
 dispositive, 457
Doe v. Bolton and, 433
 Douglas and, 444, 446
Douglas v. California and, 443, 1345, 1350
Dred Scot v. Sandford and, 1581
 economic regulation and, 473
 economic rights and, 478
Estelle v. Williams and, 544
 euthanasia and, 547
Everson v. Board of Education and, 549 evidentiary errors and, 709
 exemplars and, 559
 Field and, 586
 Fifth Amendment and, 1240, 1580
 forced confessions and, 263–264
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 1544, 1582, 1726
 Fourth Amendment and, 1757
Francis v. Franklin and, 615
 Frankfurter and, 617–618
 free exercise clause and, 160
 Fuller Court and, 667
 gang ordinances and, 675
Gardner v. Florida and, 675
 GBMI and, 718
Giglio v. United States and, 683
Goldberg v. Kelly and, 692
Griffin v. Illinois and, 710–711
 Guantanamo Bay and, 355
 habeas corpus and, 726
Hamdi v. Rumsfeld and, 731, 800, 1347
 Harlan, I. and, 738–739
 Harlan, II. and, 742, 743–744
Herrera v. Collins and, 762
 Holmes and, 772
 ICRA and, 807
 immigration and, 40, 460–461
 incorporation doctrine and, 607–608, 1232
 inquisitorial, 457
 jailhouse informants and, 838
 Johnson, L., on, 855
 jurisdiction and, 460
 jury selection and, 872 jury unanimity and, 743
 juveniles and, 990
Kent v. Dulles and, 886–887
 Ker-Frisbie rule and, 666
Kyles v. Whitley and, 899
Landon v. Plasencia and, 461
Lawrence v. Texas and, 436, 909 laws and, 464
 legal realism and, 913
Leland v. Oregon and, 917
 limitations, 317
Lochner v. New York and, 465, 1580
 Magna Carta and, 456, 462, 631, 1352, 1580, 1633
 mandatory death sentences and, 952
Manson v. Braithwaite and, 1697
 material witnesses and, 981
McKeiver v. Pennsylvania and, 990
 McReynolds and, 993
 minorities and, 1256
 Missouri Compromise and, 464–465 mistaken eyewitness identification and, 956
Mooney v. Holohan and, 1033
Moore v. East Cleveland and, 1033
Morehead v. Tipaldo and, 465
Mullaney v. Wilbur and, 1046
NAACP v. Alabama and, 801–802
Naim v. Naim and, 1059
Napue v. Illinois and, 1061
 as negative right, 1638
 noncitizens and, 380, 460, 1105
 notices and, 458
 orthodox rule and, 831
Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville and, 1145
Patterson v. New York and, 1150
 photographic identification and, 1679
Planned Parenthood of S.E. Pa. v. Casey and, 1583 political appointees and, 799 presumption and, 458
 pretrial detentions and, 1419
 preventative detention and, 1208
 privacy and, 1219, 1225, 1582
 privileges and immunities and, 1232 procedural, 457, 462–463, 609, 952, 1580
 public schools and, 1002–1003
In re Oliver and, 407
In re Winship and, 813
 reasonable doubt and, 1240 right to appeal and, 711
 right to counsel and, 125
Roe v. Wade and, 1583
Slaughterhouse Cases and, 273
 slavery and, 1483, 1484
 sodomy and, 1405
 state bills of rights and, 137–138
 states and, 459–460
 Stevens and, 1558
 substantive due process and, 608–609
Truax v. Corrigan and, 465
Turner v. Murray and, 235
Twining v. New Jersey and, 1018
 types of, 457
 unalienable rights and, 457–458
United States v. Lovasco and, 1686 vagueness and, 1703–1705, 1705

INDEX

- Due process (cont.)
 - Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723
 - void-for-vagueness doctrine and, 1611–1612
 - Waite Court and, 1733
 - Warren Court and, 1757
 - Webb v. Texas* and, 1769
 - Wolf Packing Co. v. Court of Industrial Relations* and, 465
 - Wynehamer v. People* and, 1580
- DUI (driving under the influence), 469
 - blood samples and, 1421–1422
 - checkpoints and, 1446
 - search of, 1433
- Duke, David, 1064
- Dulles, John Foster, 1669
- Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc.*, 404–405
 - Burger Court and, 201–202
 - public concern standard and, 982
- Dunaway v. New York*, 1006
- Duncan v. Kahanamoku*, 1801
 - emergencies and, 494
 - habeas corpus and, 1590
 - Murphy and, 1048
- Duncan v. Louisiana*, 105, 468
 - due process incorporation and, 608
 - Harlan, II, and, 743
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803
 - jury trials and, 875, 990
 - Sixth Amendment, 871
 - Stewart, P., and, 1559
- Dunklin, Daniel, 1037
- Dunn v. Blumstein*, 973
- Dunne, Gerald T., 1712
- Dunster, Henry, 107
- Duplex Printing Press Company v. Deering*, 1595
- Duren v. Missouri*
 - Ginsburg and, 687
 - jury selection and, 872
- Dusky v. United States*, 468
 - Godinez v. Moran* and, 692
- Dutch Anabaptist Menno Simons, 1735
- Dutch Reformed, 291
- Dutton v. Evans*, 25
 - compulsory process clause and, 344
- DV lottery program. See Diversity Immigrant Visa Program
- DVDs
 - NC-17 rating and, 1043
 - VPPA and, 1713
- DVRs. See Digital video recorders
- DWB. See Driving while black
- DWI (driving while intoxicated), 469–470
- Dworkin, Andrea, 46, 470–471, 1573
 - free speech theory and, 816
 - MacKinnon and, 941–942
 - on obscenity, 660
 - pornography and, 1120–1121
- E
 - “E pluribus unum,” 1067
 - EAA. See Equal Access Act
 - Eagle Eyes, 1520
 - Eagle Forum, 1421
 - National Right to Life Committee and, 1134
 - Eakin v. Raub*, 864
 - Earls, Lindsay, 156
 - East Side White Pride, 1502
 - Easterbrook, Frank H., 47
 - American Booksellers Association, Inc., et al v. William Hudnut II*, 1642
 - Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel*, 213
 - takings clause and, 1605
 - Thomas and, 1650
 - Eastern Orthodox Church, 93
 - Eastman, Crystal, 47, 102
 - Eastman, Max, 979
 - Eavesdropping. See Wiretapping
 - Ebenezer Baptist Church, 889
 - Eberhart, John Lee, 897
 - Echols Scholars Program, 998
 - ECHR. See European Court of Human Rights
 - Eclatarian faith, 290
 - Economic Espionage Act, 824
 - Economic Justice for All* (John Paul II), 1101
 - Economic League, 150
 - Economic regulation, 251, 473–475
 - Economic rights
 - political freedom and, 477
 - Roosevelt, F., and, 479, 1372
 - substantive due process and, 928
 - in U.S. Constitution, 475–480
 - ECPA. See Electronic Communications Privacy Act
 - Eddie Eagle Gun Safety Program, 1070
 - Edenfield v. Fane*, 331
 - Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co.*, 115
 - peremptory challenges in, 878
 - Edmunds Act of 1882, 72
 - unlawful cohabitation and, 1039
 - Edmunds-Tucker Act of 1887, 72
 - Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. United States* and, 908
 - Mormons and, 1039
 - Education
 - advancement of religion and, 1022–1025
 - Amish and, 628, 1541
 - Burger Court and, 199–200
 - as constitutional right, 1443, 1535
 - equal protection and, 516
 - establishment clause and, 1024
 - of foreign languages, 1002–1003
 - hate speech codes and, 220–221
 - implied rights and, 801
 - Jefferson and, 845
 - languages and, 801
 - middle scrutiny test and, 613
 - Mormons and, 1036
 - NAACP and, 971
 - Plyler v. Doe* and, 613
 - policies in, 157, 1505–1506
 - racial discrimination in, 971
 - records, 346
 - religion and, 1291–1292, 1306–1307, 1505
 - religious, 929–930
 - San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez* and, 612
 - segregation and, 855, 1442
 - separate but equal and, 1541
 - state constitutions and, 1536
 - substantive due process and, 466
 - undocumented migrants and, 41
 - Education Amendments of 1972, 71
 - ERA and, 521

- Education Between Two Worlds* (Meiklejohn), 999
- Education Facilities Authority Act, 785
- Edward I, king of England, 350
- conspiracy and, 350
 - Magna Carta and, 950
- Edward III, king of England, 1665
- Edwards, Fred, 492
- Edwards v. Aguillard*, 3, 90, 411, 480–481, 1438, 1616–1617
- creationism/creation science and, 377, 481, 1615
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
- Edwards v. Arizona*, 482, 1457
- Butler v. McKellar* and, 209
- Edwards v. California*, 482, 1354, 1466
- privileges and immunities and, 1232
- Edwards v. National Audubon Society*, 1082
- Edwards v. South Carolina*, 483
- Cox v. Louisiana* and, 373
 - picketing and, 1167
 - public forum doctrines and, 1243
- Edwards v. State*, 319
- EED. See Extreme emotional disturbance
- EEOC. See Equal Employment Opportunity Commission
- Effect test, 1423
- EGALE Canada Inc. v. Canada*, 1403
- Eighteenth Amendment
- federalization of criminal law and, 581
 - Olmstead v. United States* and, 1130
 - Prohibition and, 1238–1239
 - taxes and, 1684
- Eighth Amendment, 97, 387–388. See also Cruel and unusual punishment
- Amnesty International and, 60
 - arbitrariness and, 234–235
 - Barclay v. Florida* and, 109
 - Bowers v. Hardwick* and, 169
 - Bray v. Ylst* and, 277
 - Breyer and, 183
 - capital punishment and, 223, 234–235, 1545
 - chain gangs and, 263
 - Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act of 2000 and, 213
 - Coker v. Georgia* and, 323
 - cruel and unusual punishment and, 383–384
 - disproportionality principle and, 236
 - drugs and, 1745
 - electric chair and, 485–486
 - English Bill of Rights and, 503
 - Enmund v. Florida* and, 231
 - evolving standards of decency and, 1669
 - excessive fines and, 1447
 - execution methods and, 236
 - Furman v. Georgia* and, 232, 235, 241, 669
 - Gilmore and, 684
 - Gregg v. Georgia* and, 230, 710
 - Herrera v. Collins* and, 762
 - immigration and, 1530
 - incorporation doctrine and, 804
 - limitations under, 232
 - limits, 235
 - mandatory death sentences and, 953
 - mandatory minimum sentences and, 953
 - Marshall, T., and, 973
 - McCleskey v. Kemp* and, 985–986
 - McGautha v. California* and, 990
 - multiple punishments and, 442
 - negative rights and, 144
 - preventative detention and, 1207
 - Proffitt v. Florida* and, 1238
 - proportional punishment and, 1241
 - proportionality in, 744
 - proportionality review and, 1242
 - Pulley v. Harris* and, 1249
 - sentencing and, 227
 - Solem v. Helm* and, 1494
 - Stevens and, 1558
 - three strikes laws and, 1653–1654
 - victims' rights and, 1711
 - Weems v. United States* and, 1772
 - White, B., and, 1779
- Einhorn, David, 1485
- Einhorn, Ira, 563
- Eisenhower, Dwight D.
- Brown v. Board of Education* and, 186
 - Burger and, 204
 - JBS and, 854
 - Johnson, L., and, 855
 - McCarthy and, 984
 - Nixon, R. and, 1098
 - NRA and, 1070
 - Warren and, 317, 517, 1762
- Eisenmann, Charles, 1032
- Eisenstadt v. Baird*, 9, 169, 250, 483–484, 1493
- birth control and, 148
 - Burger Court and, 198
 - contraceptive access and, 714
 - Griswold v. Connecticut* and, 713, 1320
 - Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton* and, 1148
 - privacy and, 1219
 - substantive due process and, 1582
- El Salvador, 1692
- Elderly, voting rights for, 1355–1356
- Eldred v. Ashcroft*, 484–485, 1414
- free speech clause and, 764
- Election(s). See also Campaign financing
- financing of, 194
 - judicial bias and, 860
 - PACs and, 588
 - press and, 1539
 - spending limits, 219
- Election Act Amendment of 1974, 1273
- Election, general, of 2000. See also Bush v. Gore
- Christian Coalition and, 285
 - felon disenfranchisement and, 583
 - Kennedy, A., and, 885
- Electoral College, 832
- Electric chair, 244
- as cruel and unusual punishment, 485–486
 - Eight Amendment and, 485
 - Glass v. Louisiana* and, 384
 - Louisiana ex. rel. Francis v. Resweber* and, 236
- Electronic communication, 816–817
- Bartnicki v. Vopper* and, 113
 - DHS and, 416
- Electronic Communications Privacy Act (ECPA), 346, 487–488, 821
- USA PATRIOT Act and, 1149
 - wiretapping and, 1785
- Electronic Freedom of Information Act, 662
- Electronic media, 663
- Electronic screening, 33–34

INDEX

- Electronic surveillance, 486–489, 1519. See also Wiretapping domestic, 1695
Fourth Amendment and, 1519
Katz v. United States and, 1430
On Lee v. United States and, 1132
Nixon, R. and, 1099
NSA and, 1520
Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act, 1435
Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 and, 1132
President and, 1695–1996
privacy and, 1220
terrorism and, 1624
United States v. United States District Court and, 1695–1996
USA PATRIOT Act and, 1149
warrantless, 1696
Warren Court and, 1758
- Electronic surveillance. See Wiretapping
- Electropsychometer, 286
- Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA), 31, 1527, 1528
Aguilar v. Felton and, 31
- Eleventh Amendment
Chisolm v. Georgia and, 844
enforcement power and, 613
federal court jurisdiction and, 868
Fuller Court and, 668
judicial review and, 865
Elfbrandt v. Russell
freedom of association and, 635–636
loyalty oaths and, 1612
- Elizabeth I, queen of England
Mary Queen of Scots and, 621
- Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow*, 259, 490–491, 533
coercion test and, 540
Pledge of Allegiance and, 1177
- Elkins, Stanley, 643
Elkins v. United States, 1598
- Ellington, Yank, 315
- Ellis Island, 461
- Ellsberg, Daniel, 1075
New York Times v. United States and, 1089
Nixon, R. and, 1099
- Ellsworth Court, 491–492
- Ellsworth, Oliver, 140–141, 491–492, 1314
Bill of Rights and, 144
ex post facto laws and, 359
- El-Rahman, Omar Abd, 306
- Elrod, Richard, 492–493
political patronage and, 1189
Elrod v. Burns, 178, 492–493, 1388
political patronage and, 1189
- Ely, John, 30
natural law and, 1080
on substantive due process, 608–609
- E-mail. See also Online communication; Spam
advertising, 820
CIPA and, 825
mass, 45
USA PATRIOT Act and, 1149
wiretapping and, 1785
- Emancipation Proclamation, 6, 139, 228, 493–494, 1585, 1647
Dred Scott v. Sandford and, 452
Lincoln and, 924
Simpson and, 146
- Embryos
stem cell research and, 1552
- Emergencies
civil liberties in, 494–496
- Emergency Court of Appeals, 1801
- Emergency powers
habeas corpus and, 923
- Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, 1801
- Emerson, John, 451
- Emerson, Ralph Waldo
Garrison and, 676
- Emerson, Thomas Irwin, 497–499
- Eminem, 765
- Eminent domain
takings clause and, 1603–1604
- Emotional distress
Falwell and, 1414
First Amendment and, 811
Hustler Magazine v. Falwell and, 787
infliction of, 787
public figures and, 575, 599
- Employees freedom of religion of, 543 government, 1513–1515
harassment and, 303–304, 777–779
NLRB and, 1066
Perry v. Sindermann and, 1260 political activity and, 1515
Rankin v. McPherson on, 420–421, 1260
religion and, 1299–1303 speech and, 982
whistleblowers and, 1776
wiretapping and, 1786
Zurcher v. Stanford Daily and, 1823
- Employers
NLRB and, 1066
NLRB v. Catholic Bishops of Chicago and, 1100–1101
O'Connor v. Ortega and, 1128 religious exemptions and, 1659–1660 technology monitoring and, 488–489
whistleblowers and, 1776
- Employers' Liability Law
White Court and, 1777
- Employment
collateral consequences and, 325
in criminal justice agencies, 1258 EEOC on, 1300
police, 1258
Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 24, 52, 73, 159, 289, 500–501, 1263, 1303, 1304–1305, 1416, 1469, 1470–1471, 1478, 1548, 1732, 1818
Bowen v. Roy and, 159
copyright law and, 366
Corporation of Presiding Bishop v. Amos and, 367
equal protection clause and, 513
free exercise and, 1246, 1686
free exercise clause and, 119–120, 365, 454, 625–626, 630, 768, 1263
Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization and, 854
Native Americans and, 1078
neutrality in, 561
peyote and, 454, 1263, 1305
religion clauses and, 542
religious conduct and, 939
Scalia and, 1732–1733
statutory religion-based exemptions and, 560
strict scrutiny test and, 626
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 1788

- Employment Non-Discrimination Act (ENDA)
 gay and lesbian rights and, 677
 Log Cabin Republicans and, 933
- Employment Security Commission, 628
- Encryption
 anonymity and, 63
 copyright infringement and, 823
- ENDA. See Employment Non-Discrimination Act
- Endo, Mitsuye, 840
- Endorsement test, 536
 application of, 539–540
County of Allegheny v. ACLU and, 42–43
 establishment clause and, 530
Lemon test v., 918
 O'Connor and, 1127
 religious symbols and, 938
- Enemy Alien Bureau, 774
- Enemy Aliens* (Cole), 495
- Enemy combatants, 715–716
 Ashcroft and, 84
 Bush, G.H.W., and, 495
 coercive confessions and, 320–321
 detention of, 800
Ex parte Milligan and, 552
Hamdi v. Rumsfeld and, 731
 indefinite detention and, 805
 Japanese internment and, 842
 military law and, 1007
 military tribunals and, 1008
 Miranda warnings and, 1020
 War on Terror and, 1094
- Enforcement Act of 1870
 Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
 Cruikshank and, 1681
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 1681 lynchings and, 1681
- Enforcement power, 613
- Enfranchisement, 65
- Engel v. Vitale*, 2, 90, 408, 502–503
 ADL and, 69
 coercion and, 1101
 establishment clause and, 529
Lee v. Weisman and, 911
Lemon test and, 533
 National Council of Churches and, 1757
 non-preferentialism standard and, 1109
 prayer and, 117
 school prayer and, 502–503, 852, 1196, 1298
 separationism and, 767
Stone v. Graham and, 1563–1564
 wall of separation and, 1736
Wallace v. Jaffree and, 1736
 Warren Court and, 1756, 1760
- England
 Criminal Justice Act of 2003 of, 440
 double jeopardy in, 440
 freedom of press and, 1201
 obscenity and, 1122
 Petition of Right and, 1157
 polygamy in, 1330
 prior restraints and, 1209
 public trials and, 1247
 punishment and, 1329
Regina v. Hicklin, L.R. and, 1284–1285
Reid v. Covert and, 1291
 religious freedom in, 136
 right to bear arms and, 503, 508, 1338
 right to counsel and, 1348
 seditious libel and, 1439–1440
 Society for the Suppression of Vice in, 1285
 stem cell research and, 1554
 in Stuart period, 1439–1440 tradition in, 505
 in Tudor period, 1439–1440
 vagrancy laws and, 1703
 Virginia Charter of 1606 and, 1722–1723
 War on Drugs and, 1740
- English Bill of Rights, 66, 143, 357, 503–504, 505
 English liberties and, 507–508
 right to bear arms and, 503, 508, 1338
- English Bill of Rights of 1689, 1537
 guns and, 721
- English Constitution, 462
- English Declaration of Rights of 1688, 387
- English Justices of the Peace Act, 1218
- English law, 128. See also Common law
 capital punishment and, 238
 general warrants and, 678
 insanity defense and, 814
 jury trials and, 875
 libel and, 643
 litigation under, 798
 marriage and, 963
 peremptory challenges under, 874
- English liberties, 506–507
- English Revolution, 505–506
- English Statute of Labourers of 1349, 1467
- English Toleration Act, 504–505
- Enhanced Computer Assisted Passenger Prescreening System, 34
- Enlightenment
 capital punishment and, 238
 civil liberties and, 1026–1027
 corruption of blood and, 369
 natural law and, 1079
 Penn and, 1152
 proportional punishment and, 1240
- Enmund v. Florida*, 191, 386
 Eighth Amendment and, 231, 232
 proportionality and, 245
- Ennis, Edward, 842
- E.N.O. v. L.M.M.*, 1408
- Enquiry into the Doctrine Lately Propagated Concerning Libels, Warrants, and Seizures of Paper, An*, 1749
- Entertainment Network, Inc. v. Lappin*, 22
- Entick v. Carrington*, 1218
- Entitlement, 609
- Entrapment, 509–510
 by estoppel, 510, 1260
Jacobson v. United States and, 837
Sorrells v. U.S. and, 1495
 theories of, 509
- Entrenchment, of government, 1644
- Enumerated rights, 1154
- Environment, 1480
- Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), 381
- EPA. See Environmental Protection Agency
- Epperson, Susan, 376
- Epperson v. Arkansas*, 366–377, 511, 1616 books and, 163 creation science and, 1615

INDEX

- Epperson v. Arkansas* (cont.) evolution and, 1003, 1612, 1619 extant case law and, 1612
 free exercise and, 1246
Lemon test and, 534
Meyer v. Nebraska and, 1003
 public schools and, 1246 religious neutrality and, 538
 secular purpose and, 1438
 Warren Court and, 1757
- Equal Access Act (EAA), 3, 133, 356–357, 408–409, 512–513, 1298
Board of Education of the Westside Community Schools v. Mergens and, 154
 establishment clause and, 535–537
 public forums and, 1229
 religious speech and, 1229
- Equal access principle, 535
- Equal Employment Opportunity Commission
 Title VII and, 1659
- Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), 1300
- “Equal Justice in the Gatehouses and Mansions of American Criminal Procedure” (Kamisar), 881
- Equal Justice Initiative, 1499
- Equal Opportunity rules, 579–580
- Equal Pay Act, 686
- Equal protection, 513–518, 609–610
 Baldus Study and, 229
Batson v. Kentucky and, 114
 capital punishment and, 228–229
 clergy in public office and, 921
 compelling purpose test and, 610–611 compelling state interest and, 340
 corporate speech and, 650
Crane v. Johnson and, 374–375
Dandridge v. Williams and, 393
 discriminatory prosecution and, 423
 Don’t ask, don’t tell and, 1460
Douglas v. California and, 442, 1345, 1350
Eisenstadt v. Baird and, 483–484
 euthanasia and, 547
 FCC and, 579–580
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 609–610, 1524, 1547, 1562, 1590, 1726
 gender and, 518
 Ginsburg and, 687, 688
Griffin v. Illinois and, 710–711
 Harlan, II, and, 743
Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections and, 746
 history of, 514–515
 ICRA and, 807
 invidious discrimination and, 830
 Japanese internment and, 841
 juries and, 769
 jury selection and, 871, 872
 limitations, 610
Loving v. Virginia and, 936
 Marshall, T., and, 973
McCleskey v. Kemp and, 985–986
 mental defects and, 192–193
 noncitizens and, 1105
 O’Connor and, 1127
 Orthodox Jews and, 851–852
 peremptory challenges and, 877–878
Plessy v. Ferguson and, 225
 race-based classifications and, 611–612
 religion and, 1309–1310
 religious discrimination and, 422
 religious freedom and, 513 right v. privilege under, 1358
Romer v. Evans and, 678, 909, 1371
 Rutledge, W., and, 1391
 same-sex marriage and, 1400
Shelley v. Kraemer and, 1468 sliding scale theory of, 973
 state constitutions and, 1536
 substantive due process and, 466–467
Swain v. Alabama and, 1590
United States v. Virginia (VMI) and, 687
Vacco v. Quill and, 547 voucher-funded schools and, 1424
 women and, 520
- Equal rights
 state constitutions and, 1546
 women’s movement and, 1400
- Equal Rights Amendment (ERA), 499, 519–522
 Falwell and, 575
 in Hawaii, 1401
 impact of, 521
Lawrence v. Texas and, 908–909
 NOW and, 1068
 Schlafly and, 1421
 states and, 521–522
 “Equal Rights Amendment, The: A Constitutional Basis for the Equal Rights for Women” (Emerson), 499
- Equal time rules, 1052
- Equal treatment, of religious groups, 1425
- Equality, 609–610
- Equifax, 569
- ERA. See Equal Rights Amendment
- Erie Railroad v. Tompkins*, 1572
- ERISA, 1408
- Ernst, Morris
 Baldwin and, 103
 Emerson and, 498
- Error
 Mill and, 1011
 writs of, 777
- Erwin, Sam, 695
- Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville*, 523–524, 1318–1319
- Escobedo, Danny, 524, 1758
- Escobedo v. Illinois*, 524, 1021
 Goldberg and, 696
 informing of rights and, 1019
Kirby v. Illinois and, 892
Miranda v. Arizona and, 1016
 procedural due process and, 952
 right to counsel and, 318, 524, 1344
 Stewart, P., and, 1559
 Warren Court and, 1758
- ESEA. See Elementary and Secondary Education Act
- Espionage
 Cohn and, 322
 Hiss and, 765
 Hoover and, 775
 Intelligence Identities Protection Act and, 817
 Japanese internment and, 841–842
 proportionality review and, 1242
Rosenberg v. United States and, 1721
- Espionage Act of 1917, 1280, 1377, 1419–1420

- Abrams v. United States* and, 13
 Brandeis and, 174
 Chafee and, 261
 clear and present danger test and, 311, 1795
Debs v. United States and, 401
 free speech and, 1794
 freedom of association and, 635
 freedom of press and, 658
 Hand and, 736
 Holmes and, 770–771
 incitement of criminal activity and, 651–652
 La Follette and, 903
Masses Publishing Company v. Patten and, 979–980
 national security and, 1072
 New Deal and, 1084
 Palmer and, 1144
 passage of, 642
Pierce v. United States and, 1797
 prior restraints and, 1075
 repeal of, 658
 Vinson and, 1722
 Wilson, W., and, 1784
 Espionage Act of 1918, 652
 Espionage and Sedition Acts, 1636
 Esprit de corps, 1007
Essay on Human Understanding, An (Locke), 931
 Establishment clause, 2, 524–530, 1802
Abington Township School District v. Schempp and, 1757
 abortion and, 11–12
 AFLA and, 29
Aguilar v. Felton and, 32
 Alabama and, 1737
 Americans United and, 56
 application of, 528–530
 Bible reading and, 132
 bifurcated definition of religion and, 410–411
 Black, H., and, 550–551
Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet
 and, 157
Board of Education of the Westside Community Schools v. Mergens and, 154
Board of Education v. Allen and, 1527
Bradfield v. Roberts and, 172
 Breyer and, 183
Brown v. Woodland Joint Unified School District and, 163
 Burger Court and, 199–200
Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette and, 246–247
 ceremonial deism and, 258–259
 Charitable Choice and, 270
 Church of Scientology and, 366–367
Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States and, 288
Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah and, 289–290
 civil religion and, 297
 coercion and, 1101
 coercion test and, 540
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist
 and, 333–334
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Regan
 and, 334–335
Corporation of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos and, 368
County of Allegheny v. ACLU and, 42 in court and city seals, 370–371
 creationism and, 1616
 days of religious observance and, 398–399
 defiance of bans on school prayer and, 408–409 defining religion and, 409–411
 doctrine, 531
 drafting of, 526–528
 EAA and, 535–537
 education and, 1024
 endorsement test and, 539–540
Engel v. Vitale and, 502–503
Epperson v. Arkansas and, 511
Estate of Thornton v. Caldor and, 543
Everson v. Board of Education and, 132, 549, 1527
 federalism and, 532–533
Flast v. Cohen and, 596, 1609 free exercise clause v., 531, 540–542
 Fuller Court and, 668
Harris v. McRae and, 746
Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue and, 761
 history of, 524–526, 531–532
Hunt v. McNair and, 785
 “In God We Trust” and, 1067
 incorporation and, 532–533
 interpretation of, 528–530, 538–540, 541
 Jefferson and, 847
Jones v. Wolf and, 856–857
 jurisprudence, 766–768
 Kennedy, A., on, 885–886
Lamb’s Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District
 and, 907
Lee v. Weisman and, 911
 legislative chaplains and, 267
Lemon test and, 538–539, 918, 1548
Lemon v. Kurtzman and, 1563
 in Locke v. Davey, 929
 Madison and, 946
Marsh v. Chambers and, 966
McDaniel v. Paty and, 989
McLean v. Ark. Board of Education and, 1620
 “Memorial and Remonstrance” and, 550
 modern definitions of religion and, 411
 moments of silence statutes and, 1028–1029
Mueller v. Allen and, 1045
 neutrality in, 270
 no-coercion test and, 534–535
 non-funding provisions and, 153
 non-preferentialism standard and, 1108
 O’Connor and, 1126
 Orthodox Jews and, 851–852
Peloza v. Capistrano United School District and, 1619
Peyote Way Church of God, Inc. v. Thornburgh and, 454
 Pledge of Allegiance and, 490–491, 1177
 prayer and, 1412
 protections of, 143
 public forums and, 1229 purpose of, 527–528
 regulation and, 537
 religion and, 1423, 1437, 1548
 religious discrimination and, 422 religious institutional autonomy and, 537
 religious speech and, 1229
 religious symbols and, 937–938
 Scalia and, 1416
School District of the City of Grand Rapids v. Ball and, 1423
 school prayer and, 356, 1196, 1197 schools and, 1548

INDEX

- Establishment clause (cont.)
 Smith v. Bd. of Sch. Commissioners of Mobile County and, 1619
 states and, 425, 491, 532–533
 statutory religion-based exemptions and, 559
 substantive due process and, 466
 Sunday closing laws and, 1586
 tax exemption and, 1607
 taxes and, 947–948
 taxpayers and, 1608–1610
 Ten Commandments and, 1622
 Texas Monthly v. Bullock and, 1628–1629
 trademarks and, 1662–1664
 United States v. Seeger and, 349–350
 “Virginia Statute of Religious Liberty” and, 550
 Wallace v. Jaffree and, 1736
 Walz v. Tax Commission and, 1738–1739
 Warren Court and, 1756
 Welsh v. United States and, 350, 1693
 Widmar v. Vincent and, 700
 Wisconsin v. Yoder, 1788
 Witters v. Department of Services and, 1789
 Wolman v. Walter and, 1790
 Zelman v. Simmons-Harris and, 1812
 Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District and, 1816
 zoning and, 1817
Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, 542
 Sunday closing laws and, 1586
Estelle v. Smith, 543–544
Estelle v. Williams, 544
Estes, Billie Sol, 218, 544–545
Estes v. Texas, 218, 265, 545
Estoppel, entrapment by, 510, 1260
Estrada, Juana, 274
Ethical Culture, 1619
Ethics
 cloning, 314
 DNA databases and, 432
Ethiopia, 1262
Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church, 455
Ethnic intimidation laws, 750
Ethnicity
 criminal justice and, 1256
 hate crimes and, 303
 hate speech and, 752–755
Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 120
 Taft Court and, 1596
Eugenic sterilization, 545–546
 Buck v. Bell and, 192, 1320
Eugenics, 545, 1426, 1600
 Buck v. Bell and, 192, 1320
 Holmes and, 772
 Nazis and, 546
Europe
 eugenic sterilization and, 546
 immigration and, 1259
 same-sex unions in, 1404
European Convention
 hearsay evidence and, 758
European Convention for the Production of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms
 data privacy and, 1223
 freedom of expression and, 637
European Convention on Human Rights
 European Court of Human Rights and, 638
European Convention on Nationality of 1997, 456
European Court of Human Rights (ECHR), 1223
 freedom of expression and, 637–640
 hearsay evidence and, 758
 Sunday Times v. United Kingdom and, 639
European Union Constitution
 double jeopardy and, 440
 judicial review and, 865
Euthanasia, 546–548. See also Assisted suicide active v. passive, 547–548
 Kamisar and, 881
 PAS and, 1164
 voluntary v. involuntary, 546–547
Evacuation Day, 785–786
Evanescence objection, 1433
 secular purpose and, 1439
Evangelism, of Salvation Army, 1397
Eve, George, 141
Evergreen State College, 998
Evers, Medgar Wiley, 548–549
Evers v. State, 548–549
Everson v. Board of Education, 56, 75, 131–132, 549–551, 1292, 1527
 Black, H., and, 199, 550–551
 Board of Education v. Allen and, 155
 Burger Court and, 199
 equal protection clause and, 513
 establishment clause and, 528
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 533
 Frankfurter and, 618
 incorporation doctrine and, 803
 jurisprudence and, 766
 Lemon test and, 918
 Mueller v. Allen and, 1045
 no endorsement test and, 1103
 non-preferentialism standard and, 1108
 religion and, 131–132, 1294, 1423
 Rutledge, W., in, 550, 1390
 separationism and, 533, 987, 1295, 1390
 substantive due process and, 466
 Torcaso v. Watkins and, 1662
 Vinson Court and, 1719
 wall of separation and, 1736
 Warren Court and, 1755
 Zorach v. Clauson and, 1822
Evidence. See also Exculpatory evidence blood samples as, 1421–1422
 Burks v. United States and, 1655 defense, 1005 destroyed, 79 disclosure, 35
 in discovery process, 421
 DNA, 428–429
 evanescent, 1433
 exclusionary rule and, 554–558, 957
 exculpatory DNA, 429
 exemplars and, 558
 fruit of the poisonous tree and, 666–667
 good faith exception and, 556
 grand jury indictments and, 707
 hearsay as, 709
 Hudson v. Louisiana and, 781 illegal search and seizure and, 557 inadmissible, 1772
 of innocence, 237
 inventory of, 1435
 jailhouse informants and, 838

- On Lee v. United States* and, 1132
- material witnesses and, 981
- Nardone v. United States* and, 1061
- New York v. Belton* and, 1091
- New York v. Quarles* and, 1093
- Nix v. Williams* and, 1097
- polygraph, 407
- post-conviction, 762
- PPA and, 1223
- Rawlings v. Kentucky* and, 1271–1392
- search and seizure and, 1542
- seizure of, 80
- stolen, 195
- testimonial, 558
- treason and, 1665
- United States v. Robinson* and, 1691–1692
- Washington v. Texas* and, 1767
- Weeks v. United States* and, 1772
- Evidentiary errors, 709
- Evidentiary hearings
 - AEDAP and, 233–234
- Evidentiary insufficiency
 - Burks v. United States* and, 207–208
- Evidentiary rules
 - exculpatory evidence and, 264
- Evolution, 1505. See also Creationism
 - ACLU and, 48
 - Arkansas and, 1438
 - bans on, 511
 - creationism and, 375–379
 - Darrow and, 395
 - Edwards v. Aguillard* and, 3, 480–481
 - Epperson v. Arkansas* and, 480–481, 511, 1003, 1612, 1619, 1757
 - Lemon* test and, 534
 - public schools and, 1617–1620
 - religion and, 1438
 - secular humanism and, 1438
 - teaching, 376, 480–481
 - theory of, 1425
 - Torcaso v. Watkins* and, 1619
 - Warren Court and, 1756–1758, 1757
- Evolving standards of decency doctrine
 - Coker v. Georgia* and, 385, 388
 - Palmer v. Clarke* and, 486
 - Trop v. Dulles* and, 385, 1668–1669
- Ewing v. California*, 1494
 - mandatory minimum sentences and, 954
 - proportional punishment and, 1241
- Ex ante, 1434
- Ex officio, 1452–1453
 - Lilborne and, 919
- Ex parte Bollman*, 1665
- Ex parte Endo*, 1565
 - Douglas and, 445
 - emergency powers and, 496
 - Japanese internment and, 839–840
- Ex parte Garland*, 272
 - corruption of blood and, 369
 - Field and, 586
 - pardons and commutations and, 1145
 - test oaths and, 1627–1628
- Ex parte Lange*, 1111
- Ex parte McCordle*, 552
 - appellate jurisdiction and, 867
 - Chase Court and, 272
 - national security and, 1072
- Ex parte McDermott*, 68
- Ex parte Merryman*
 - emergency powers and, 495
 - habeas corpus and, 1590
 - Taney and, 923
 - Taney Court and, 1607
- Ex parte Milligan*, 271–272, 551–552, 1803
 - emergency powers and, 495
 - Field and, 586
 - Habeas Corpus Act of 1863, 1008–1009
 - habeas corpus and, 1590
 - military tribunals and, 496, 1008–1009
 - Taney Court and, 1607
- Ex parte Quirin*, 1562, 1566, 1801
 - military law and, 1007
 - military tribunals and, 496, 1008
- Ex parte Vallandigham*, 552–553, 646
 - habeas corpus petition and, 553
 - Taney Court and, 1607
- Ex parte Virginia*, 1525
- Ex parte Yerger*, 272
- Ex parte Young*
 - Eleventh Amendment and, 668
 - prospective relief and, 868
 - Santa Clara Pueblo v. Martinez* and, 808
- Ex post facto clause, 553–554
 - Calder v. Bull* and, 212
 - collateral consequences and, 325–326
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 359
 - Field and, 586
 - interpreting, 213
 - Mason and, 360
 - Megan’s Law and, 997
 - search warrants and, 1434
 - U.S. Constitution and, 140, 352
- Excessive entanglement, 1738–1739
- Excessive fines, 1447
- Exchequer rule, 745
- Exclusion
 - Chinese Exclusion Act and, 259–260, 1259
 - history of, 790–791
 - ideological and security-based, 789–792
 - noncitizens and, 40
 - plenary power doctrine and, 893
- Exclusionary rule, 554–558, 1772. See also Fifth Amendment
 - confessions and, 991
 - criticism of, 555
 - Fifth Amendment and, 557–558, 1454
 - Frankfurter and, 618
 - fruit of the poisonous tree and, 666
 - good faith exception of, 555–556
 - habeas corpus and, 556
 - Harris v. New York* and, 747–748
 - Holmes and, 772
 - illegal search and seizure and, 557
 - Illinois v. Krull* and, 793–794
 - Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Lopez-Mendoza* and, 798
 - impeachment exception of, 556
 - Kamisar and, 881
 - Kennedy, A., and, 884
 - Mapp v. Ohio* and, 957
 - McNabb v. United States* and, 991–992
 - Michigan v. DeFillipo* and, 1004

INDEX

- Exclusionary rule (cont.)
 - In re Griffiths* and, 812
 - Nix v. Williams* and, 1097
 - Pennsylvania v. Scott* and, 1152–1153
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1195
 - Silverthorne Lumber Company v. United States* and, 772
 - United States v. Calandra* and, 1680–1681
 - United States v. Leon* and, 1685–1686
 - Wolf v. Colorado* and, 1790
 - Exculpatory evidence
 - California v. Trombetta* and, 217
 - Chambers v. Mississippi* and, 264
 - Giglio v. United States*, 683
 - Kyles v. Whitley* and, 899
 - withholding of, 899
 - Execution(s). See also Death penalty; Electric chair; Firing squad
 - Amnesty International and, 59
 - of Chessman, 278
 - description of, 485
 - by electrocution, 244
 - by firing squad, 244
 - by gas chamber, 244
 - by hanging, 243–244
 - humane, 242
 - of innocents, 237–238
 - by lethal injection, 244
 - methods, 236, 240, 243–244
 - Muslim extremists and, 566
 - public, 239
 - risks, 223
 - stay of, 1550–1551
 - in Texas, 242
 - types of, 384–385
 - Executive Order 9066, 418, 1766
 - emergency powers and, 496
 - Japanese internment and, 839
 - Murphy and, 1048
 - termination of, 841
 - Executive Order 9335, 308
 - Executive Order 9835, 635
 - Executive Order 10925, 30
 - Executive Order 12324, 390
 - Executive Order 12807, 390
 - Executive Order 13007, 52
 - Executive powers
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 360
 - enemy combatants and, 800
 - Hamdi v. Rumsfeld* and, 842
 - Jackson, A. and, 831–832
 - Jackson, R. and, 835
 - Madison and, 946
 - military tribunals and, 1008
 - selective service and, 1448
 - during wartime, 731, 1765
 - Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer* and, 835
 - Executive privilege, 310
 - Exemplars, 558–559
 - Exigencies, 1747
 - Exon, James, 336
 - Expatriation, 562–563. See also Denationalization
 - Trop v. Dulles* and, 1669
 - Expatriation Act of 1907, 562
 - Experian, 569
 - Experience and logic test, 1428
 - Experimental College, 998
 - Experimental College, The* (Meiklejohn), 998
 - Expert witnesses, 421
 - Express limitations, 1690–1691
 - Expression. See also Freedom of expression
 - forms of, 262
 - marketplace of ideas approach to, 961–962
 - media liability and, 996
 - regulation of, 656–657
 - Expressive conduct, 111
 - draft card burning and, 449–450
 - flag burning and, 1516
 - freedom of expression and, 1162–1163
 - nude dancing and, 1688
 - O'Brien* test and, 450
 - picketing and, 1166
 - of public employees, 420–421
 - Schenck v. United States* and, 652
 - symbolic speech v., 589–590
 - Extant case law, 1612
 - Extracurricular activities
 - Board of Regents v. Southworth* and, 1699
 - drug testing and, 156, 1746
 - Extradition, 563–564
 - political offense exception and, 563
 - Extreme emotional disturbance (EED), 1150
 - Extremism, 566
 - Extremist groups, 564–567
 - suicide and, 566
 - Eye for an eye, 1645
 - proportional punishment and, 1240
 - Eyewitness Evidence: A Guide for Law Enforcement*, 925
 - Eyewitness identification, 567–568
 - Kirby v. Illinois* and, 892
 - lineups, 925
 - Manson v. Brathwaite* and, 955–956
 - mistaken, 955–956
 - reliability of, 925
 - right to counsel and, 892
 - United States v. Wade* and, 892, 1679, 1697
 - wrongful convictions and, 925
 - “Eyewitness Identification Procedures,” 925
- ## F
- Fabela, Helen, 274
 - FACE Act. See Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act
 - Facial features identification, 1222
 - Facial preference test, 761
 - FACTA. See Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act
 - Faction, 36–37
 - Factionalism, 1296–1297
 - Factual context, 762
 - Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act (FACTA), 570
 - Fair Credit Report Act (FCRA), 346, 569–570
 - Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA), 1269
 - ministerial exemptions for, 571–572
 - National League of Cities v. Usery* and, 1289
 - religion and, 570–572
 - Stone and, 1565
 - Tony and Susan Alamo Foundation v. Secretary of Labor* and, 1660–1661
 - Fair use doctrine, 572
 - copyright and, 1414
 - free exercise clause and, 365–366
 - of intellectual property, 822–823

- metatags and, 823
- sampling and, 764
- FAIR v. Rumsfeld*, 1461
- Fairfax Covenant Church v. Fairfax County School Board*, 513
- Fairfax Resolves, 977
- Fairfax's Divisee v. Hunter's Lessee*, 969
- Fairman, Charles
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 514
- Fairness doctrine, 184, 573
 - FCC v. League of Women Voters* and, 578
 - forced speech and, 601
 - overturning of, 579
- Faith, 1437
- Faith-based organizations (FBOs)
 - Charitable Choice and, 270–271
 - government funding of, 172–173
- Falbo v. United States*
 - Murphy and, 1048
- Fallon, Richard, 1139
- False Claims Act of 1863, 1776
- False light, 828
- False light invasion of privacy, 574–575
- Falsehoods, 36
- Falwell, Jerry, 575–576, 1413
 - emotional distress and, 811
 - Flynt and, 599
 - Hustler Magazine v. Falwell* and, 787–788
 - Islam and, 1053
 - Moral Majority and, 4
 - school prayer amendment and, 356
- Family
 - fundamental rights and, 608–609
 - law, 129–130
 - Prince v. Massachusetts* and, 1283
 - privacy and, 608–609, 1337
 - Rawls on, 1272
- Family Education Rights and Privacy Act, 346
- Family Research Council, 577
- Family unity for noncitizens, 576
- Family values movement, 577–578
 - Christian Coalition and, 285
- Fanaticism. See Extremist groups
- Faneuil Hall, 1158
- Fanny Hill*, 1118. See also Book Named “John Cleland’s Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure” v. Massachusetts
- Farber, Daniel, 646
 - freedom of speech and, 651
- Fahrenheit 451* (Bradbury), 162
- Faretta v. California*, 1457–1458
- Farmer, Millard, 1200
- Farrakhan, Louis, 70
- Farrand, Max, 864
- Fascism, 253
- Father of Candor, 1749, 1750
- Fathers, adoption and, 279–280
- Faubus, Orval, 187
- Favorite Recipes of Home Economics Teachers* (Dees and Fuller), 1503
- Fay v. Noia*, 325
 - habeas corpus and, 727–728
 - overruling of, 728
- FBI HRT. See Federal Bureau of Investigation Hostage Rescue Team
- FBI. See Federal Bureau of Investigations
- FBI Story, The*, 775
- FBI, The*, 775
- FBN. See Federal Bureau of Narcotics
- FBOs. See Faith-based organizations
- FCC. See Federal Communications Commission
- FCC v. American Mini Theatres*, 1714
- FCC v. League of Women Voters of California*, 578
 - radio spectrum and, 663
- FCC v. National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting*, 1670
- FCC v. Pacifica Foundation*, 579, 1316
 - Burger Court and, 201
 - captive audiences and, 247
 - FCC and, 579, 1316
 - FCC v. League of Women Voters* and, 578
 - freedom of press and, 663
 - Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson* and, 858
 - obscenity and, 1124
 - sexually explicit materials and, 1120
 - Stevens and, 1556
 - viewpoint discrimination and, 1714
 - vulgar speech and, 1248
- FCRA. See Fair Credit Report Act
- FDA. See Food and Drug Administration
- Fear of Freedom, The* (Biddle), 134
- FEC. See Federal Election Commission
- FECA. See Federal Election and Campaign Act
- Federal Advisory Committee Act
 - freedom of press and, 661–662
- Federal Aviation Administration, 1623
- Federal Bail Reform Act of 1984, 1207–1208
- Federal Baseball Club of Baltimore, Inc. v. National League Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson* and, 858
- Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI)
 - Arab Americans and, 50
 - background checks by, 1146
 - Baldwin and, 104
 - Bureau of Investigation and, 774
 - CIA and, 258
 - Clark, T., and, 308–309
 - Communist Party and, 339, 1269, 1270
 - CPUSA and, 338
 - criminal profiling and, 1236
 - extremist groups and, 567
 - General Intelligence Division leading to, 1280
 - Gold and, 1377
 - handgun background check and, 721
 - homosexuality and, 1317
 - Hoover and, 774–777, 1281, 1318
 - Japanese internment and, 841–842
 - Johnson, L., and, 856
 - Katz v. United States* and, 882
 - King and, 776
 - movies and, 774–775
 - Murphy and, 1047
 - National DNA Index System, 431
 - New Deal and, 1084
 - NWA and, 764
 - Reno and, 1317
 - Rosenbergs and, 1377
 - Ruby Ridge and, 1384, 1385
 - spying and, 1518
 - television and, 774–775
 - Waco standoff and, 1317
- Federal Bureau of Investigation Hostage Rescue Team (FBI HRT), 1731
- Federal Bureau of Narcotics (FBN), 64, 1742

INDEX

- Federal Communications Act, 1132
- Federal Communications Commission (FCC), 184–185, 579–580
 - alcohol advertising and, 1708
 - antismoking commercials and, 1708
 - cable television regulation and, 211–212
 - censorship and, 185
 - equal time rules and, 1052
 - establishment of, 663
 - fairness doctrine and, 573, 1669
 - FCC v. League of Women Voters* and, 578
 - FCC v. Pacifica Foundation* and, 579, 1316
 - forced speech and, 601
 - Japanese internment and, 841–842
 - licensing, 663
 - Nixon, R. and, 1099
 - obscenity and, 1124
 - Red Lion Broadcasting Co., Inc. v. FCC* and, 185, 579, 663, 1279–1280, 1354
 - Reno v. ACLU* and, 663, 1316
 - sexually explicit materials and, 1120
 - in Turner Broadcasting System, Inc. v. FCC, 100, 450, 601, 663, 1279–1280
 - wiretapping and, 1269
- Federal Corrupt Practices Act of 1925, 218
- Federal courts. See also Lower federal courts
 - jurisdiction of, 866–868
 - removal to, 1315
- Federal Crimes Act of 1790, 1349
- Federal Criminal Code: Past and Present* (Gainer), 381
- Federal Death Penalty Act, 230
- Federal district courts
 - jurisdiction of, 867–868
- Federal Election and Campaign Act (FECA), 193–194, 219, 1650
 - PACs and, 588
- Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974, 219
- Federal Election Commission (FEC), 193
 - installation of, 219
- Federal Election Commission v. Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee*, 1650
- Federal Election Commission v. National Conservative Action Committee*, 588
- Federal Emergency Management Administration (FEMA), 415
- Federal Fair Housing Act, 71
- Federal Farmer's essays, 1267
- Federal Firearms Act of 1938, 720
- Federal Interpleader Act of 1936, 261
- Federal Kidnapping Act, 665
- Federal Loan Agency, 1718
- Federal Loyalty Program
 - ACLU and, 49
 - CPUSA and, 338
- Federal Loyalty Review Board, 308
- Federal Marriage Amendment, 1402, 1403
 - Log Cabin Republicans and, 933
- Federal Maternity Act of 1921, 1609
- Federal Public Records Law. See Freedom of Information Act
- Federal Radio Commission, 663
- Federal Railway Administration, 452
- Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 1481
- Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, 79
 - grand jury indictments and, 705
 - guilty pleas, 718
 - Mallory v. United States* and, 952
- Federal Rules of Evidence
 - confrontation clause and, 344
 - grand jury indictments and, 707
- Federal Sentencing Guidelines, 1460
 - on drugs, 1257
- Federal territories, 1484
- Federal Theater Project, 780
- Federal Torts Claim Act (FTCA), 149
 - federal court jurisdiction and, 868
- Federal Trade Commission (FTC)
 - do not e-mail registry and, 820
 - FCRA and, 570
 - hip-hop music censorship and, 764–765
- Federalism. See also Anti-Federalists
 - Bache and, 95
 - Bill of Rights and, 140, 1325, 1326, 1339–1340
 - Chae Chan Ping v. United States* and, 40
 - Chase and, 274
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1264, 1267, 1268, 1314, 1326
 - defeat of, 38
 - Ellsworth and, 491
 - establishment clause and, 532–533
 - freedom of press and, 1205
 - Harlan, II, and, 742
 - history of, 36
 - Jay and, 843
 - Kentucky and Virginia Resolves and, 887–888
 - Madison and, 944–945
 - Marbury v. Madison* and, 864
 - Marshall Court and, 968
 - Marshall, J., and, 970
 - privileges and immunities and, 1230
 - Rehnquist Court and, 1287–1289
 - Republicans v., 36
 - right to bear arms and, 1339–1340
 - Rush and, 1387
 - Sedition Act and, 38–39, 492, 643
- Federalist 10*, 1296
 - establishment and, 947
 - Madison and, 944–945
 - political parties and, 643
- Federalist 48*, 1636
- Federalist 51*
 - civil liberties and, 1028
 - Madison and, 945
- Federalist 54*, 476
- Federalist 74*, 1145
- Federalist 78*, 289, 1635
 - Hamilton in, 732
 - judicial review and, 864, 958
- Federalist 80*
 - privileges and immunities and, 1231
- Federalist 84*, 553, 1268, 1632
 - free speech laws and, 815
 - Hamilton in, 732
 - natural law and, 1080
 - Ninth Amendment and, 1096
- Federalist 85*, 732
- Federalist Papers*, 62, 943, 1268, 1544
 - economic rights and, 476
 - freedom of press and, 1205
 - Hamilton and, 732, 1268, 1340
 - impartiality and, 798–799

- judicial review and, 864
- Madison and, 1268, 1340
- Fee, John G., 1486
- Feinberg, Joel, 1709
- Feiner, Irving, 582–583
- Feiner v. New York*, 582–583
 - free speech and, 1512
 - heckler's veto and, 758
 - incitement of criminal activity and, 654
 - Vinson and, 1722
 - Vinson Court and, 1719
- Feist Publications, Inc. v. Rural Telephone Service Co., Inc.*, 484–485
- Feldman, Noah, 528
- Fellow-servant rule, 586
- Fellowship on Reconciliation (FOR), 959
- Fell's Point Riot, 274
- Felonies
 - arrest warrants and, 81
 - murder, 230–231
 - proportionality review and, 1242
 - strict liability and, 1573
- Felons
 - disenfranchisement of, 583–584
 - DNA samples and, 428
 - juries and, 872
 - Lambert v. California* and, 905
 - privacy rights of, 712
 - registration of, 997–998
 - voting and, 1257
- FEMA. See Federal Emergency Management Administration
- Female offenders, 1463–1464
- Feminine Mystique, The* (Friedan), 1068
- Feminism
 - abortion and, 8
 - Dworkin and, 470–471, 942
 - first wave of, 8
 - MacKinnon and, 942
 - marital rape and, 961
 - NOW and, 1068–1069
 - pornography and, 304, 1120
 - Stanton and, 1522–1523
 - victims' rights and, 1710
- Feminist Majority Foundation
 - ERA and, 522
 - FACE Act and, 634
- Ferejohn, John, 494–495
- Ferguson, Adam, 847
- Ferguson v. Charleston*, 28, 1480
 - drug testing and, 1746
- Ferguson v. Georgia*, 407
- Ferguson v. Skrupa*, 1582
- Fetal remains, 35
- Fetal tissue research. See Stem cell research
- Fetus, life and, 1553
- Feudal system, 949–950
- Fiallo v. Bell*, 585, 1530
- Field, David Dudley, 585
 - proportional punishment and, 1241
 - United States v. Cruikshank* and, 1681
- Field, Stephen J., 585–586
 - Cummings v. Missouri* and, 1627
 - Ex parte Garland* and, 1627
 - O'Neil v. Vermont* and, 739
 - Wynehamer v. People* and, 1580
- Field v. Clark*, 1448
- draft and, 1793
- Fielden, Samuel, 649
- Fifteenth Amendment, 1522, 1726
 - Anthony and, 65
 - coerced confessions and, 315
 - in Colgrove v. Green, 619
 - Douglass and, 448
 - extremist groups and, 564
 - federalization of criminal law and, 581
 - grandfather clause and, 1571
 - KKK and, 896
 - noncitizens and, 1105–1106
 - private housing and, 1442–1443
 - privileges and immunities and, 1231
 - segregation and, 1442
 - voting rights and, 1358, 1726
- Fifth Amendment, Self-incrimination. See also Double jeopardy; Takings clause
 - adoption of, 438–439
 - Allen v. Illinois* and, 43, 544
 - Aptheker v. Secretary of State* and, 78
 - Arizona v. Fulminante* and, 78
 - bail and, 97
 - Baltimore City Department of Social Services v. Bouknicht* and, 106
 - Barron v. Baltimore* and, 73, 112
 - Bellis v. United States* and, 121
 - Benton v. Maryland* and, 440
 - blood samples and, 1422
 - Boyd v. United States* and, 171
 - Braswell v. United States* and, 180
 - Brooks v. Tennessee* and, 185
 - Burdeau v. McDowell* and, 195
 - capital punishment and, 234–235
 - CDA and, 337, 1316
 - Chambers v. Florida* and, 263
 - coerced confessions and, 315
 - coercion and, 831
 - communists and, 1758
 - corporations and, 706, 730
 - Corrigan v. Buckley* and, 368–369
 - Counselman v. Hitchcock* and, 370
 - Crandall v. Nevada* and, 801
 - discriminatory prosecution and, 423
 - double jeopardy and, 122, 437–439, 439, 1000, 1505
 - due process and, 456–457, 462–467, 1240, 1558, 1580
 - economic regulation and, 473
 - economic rights and, 476
 - Emancipation Proclamation and, 493
 - Estelle v. Smith* and, 543
 - exclusionary rule and, 554, 557–558, 1454
 - exemplars and, 558
 - eyewitness identification and, 568
 - Federal Bail Reform Act of 1984 and, 1207
 - Fisher v. United States* and, 180, 589
 - Frank and, 616
 - Fulminate v. Arizona* and, 320
 - gambling and, 1684
 - grand jury indictments and, 705
 - Griffin v. California* and, 710
 - Hester v. United States* and, 763
 - HUAC and, 780, 1270
 - ICRA and, 807
 - illegal search and seizure and, 557
 - interrogations and, 992

INDEX

- Fifth Amendment, Self-incrimination (cont.)
jailhouse informants and, 838
jury trial right and, 877
Kamisar and, 881
Kirby v. Illinois and, 892
Lilly v. Virginia and, 920
Mapp v. Ohio and, 957
Marchetti v. United States and, 1684
mass communications and, 580
McNabb v. United States and, 991–992
Menna v. New York and, 1000
Michigan v. Mosley and, 1005–1006
Miranda v. Arizona and, 318, 1016, 1331, 1345, 1351
Miranda warning and, 1017, 1020
Moran v. Burbine and, 1033–1034
negative rights and, 144
New York v. Quarles and, 1093
noncitizens and, 380, 1105–1106
occupational tax stamps and, 960
Ohio v. Robinette and, 1128
Olmstead v. United States and, 1129
penumbras and, 1153
Powers v. United States and, 1018 preventative detention and, 1207
privacy and, 1219
private police and, 1227
private property for public use and, 474 probable cause hearings and, 79–80 reasonable doubt and, 1240
Reid v. Covert and, 1291
right to remain silent and, 710
Rust v. Sullivan and, 1668
self-incrimination and, 1453
silence and, 710
slavery and, 1487
Smith v. United States and, 1415
Spano v. New York and, 1504
states and, 618, 772
takings clause and, 1484, 1582, 1603
test oaths and, 1627
in twentieth century, 1017–1018
United States v. Dionisio and, 1682
United States v. Lara and, 441
United States v. Washington and, 1697–1698
use/derivative use immunity and, 668
vagueness and, 1703–1705, 1705
Vinson Court and, 1720
Warren Court and, 1757–1758
White, B., and, 1779
Zenger and, 1815
- Fifty Most Influential Women in American Law, The* (Berry), 1771
- Fighting words doctrine, 587–588, 1271, 1511–1512, 1699
categorical speech and, 1671
Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire and, 849, 1800
hate speech and, 754
hate speech codes and, 221
Hess v. Indiana and, 763
hostile environment harassment and, 778
obscenity and, 1117
political correctness and, 1188–1189
Texas v. Johnson and, 590
viewpoint discrimination and, 1716
vulgar speech and, 1248
Warren Court and, 1754
- File sharing, 817
- Metro-Goldwyn Mayer Studios v. Grokster* and, 1001–1002
P2P, 823
- Filipinos, restrictive covenants and, 1324
- Filled milk, 1564
- Filmer, Robert, 505
- Films. See Movies
- Financial records, 1687–1688
- Finger v. State*, 814
- Fingerprinting
DNA testing v., 431
exemplars and, 558
probable cause and, 1445
- Firearms. See Guns
- Firing squad, 244
Wilkinson v. Utah and, 384
- First Amendment. See also Establishment Clause; Free exercise; Free speech; Religion clauses
abolitionism and, 4–5
Abood v. Detroit Board of Education and, 7
abortion and, 11–12
abortion protests and, 12–13, 948–949
abridged speech and, 1052
absolutism and, 14–15, 100
absolutist interpretation of, 361–362 academic freedom and, 17–18, 1506 access to civil proceedings and, 1336
ACLU and, 286
ACLU and, 47, 48, 1573
Amalgamated Food Employees Union Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza and, 44, 926
American Booksellers Association, Inc., et al v. William Hudnut II
and, 470
Americans United and, 56
anonymity and, 63
anti-abolitionist gag rules and, 66
antipornography ordinances and, 943
Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 and, 1623 appropriation of name or likeness and, 77
atheism and, 89–90
balancing and, 99
Baldwin and, 103
Barenblatt v. United States and, 110
Beauharnais v. Illinois and, 116
Bishop's Case and, 1667
Blaine amendment and, 151–152
Board of Education v. Pico and, 156
Bond v. Floyd and, 162
Boos v. Barry and, 1436
Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 170, 1363, 1381
Branti v. Finkel and, 178
Breard v. Alexandria and, 329 broadcast regulation and, 184
Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Virginia ex. rel. Virginia State Bar and, 186
Bruce and, 188
Buckley v. Valeo and, 194
Burger and, 206, 1299–1300
campaign financing and, 219
Cantwell v. Connecticut and, 222
categorical approaches and, 252, 1671
CDA and, 1316
Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York and, 257
Chafee and, 261–262
child pornography and, 282–283

- children and, 284
- Christian right and, 1296–1297
- Church of Scientology and, 286–287
- Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah* and, 289–290
- CIPA and, 825–826
- City of Boerne, Texas v. Flores* and, 159
- City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc.* and, 1316, 1317–1318
- Clark, T., and, 309
- clear and present danger test, 312
- clergy in public office and, 989
- CNS and, 290
- Code of 1930 and, 756
- coercion and, 1101–1103
- Cohen v. California* and, 321
- Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission* and, 328
- commercial speech and, 329
- confidentiality and, 322
- conscientious objection and, 349, 409–410
- content-based regulation of speech and, 361–362
- content-neutral regulation and, 363–364
- copyrights and, 365–366, 485
- corporate speech and, 650
- corporations and, 632
- Cox v. Louisiana* and, 372–373
- CPUSA and, 338
- cross burning and, 382–383
- damages and, 404
- Davis v. Beason* and, 396–397
- days of religious observance and, 398–399
- defamation and, 402, 1009, 1271
- DeJonge v. Oregon* and, 411
- designated public forums and, 417
- dial-a-porn services and, 418
- Don't ask, don't tell and, 1460–1461
- Douglas and, 445
- draft card burning and, 449, 1688
- drugs and, 454
- Edwards v. South Carolina* and, 483
- Eldred v. Ashcroft* and, 484–485
- Emerson and, 499
- emotional distress and, 811
- employment discrimination, 777
- Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith* and, 454, 1263
- Epperson v. Arkansas* and, 376–377, 511
- equality and, 610
- Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville* and, 523–524
- Espionage Act and, 1420
- establishment clause and, 524–530
- Everson v. Board of Education* and, 132
- evolution and, 377
- ex post facto laws and, 554
- extremist groups and, 565
- fair use doctrine and, 572
- Falwell and, 575
- family values movement and, 577
- FCC and, 579
- FCC v. League of Women Voters* and, 578
- FCC v. Pacifica Foundation* and, 579, 1316
- FECA and, 193
- fighting words doctrine and, 587, 754, 1271
- film ratings and, 1042–1043
- first principles, 656–657
- FLSA and, 570
- Flynt and, 599
- forced speech and, 600–602
- 44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island* and, 614
- Frankfurter and, 617, 618
- free exercise clause and, 22, 621, 1214, 1246, 1548, 1685
- free speech and, 1417, 1449, 1450, 1641–1644
- free speech theory and, 816
- freedom of expression and, 637
- freedom of press and, 1201, 1205
- gag rules and, 671–672, 673–674
- Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada* and, 679
- Girouard v. United States* and, 1142
- Good News Club v. Milford Central School* and, 699–700
- government funding of speech and, 700–701
- government speech and, 701–702
- Grosjean v. American Press Co.* and, 714–715
- group libel and, 715
- H. Rap Brown law, 353
- hate crimes and, 751–752
- hate speech codes and, 220–221
- Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier* and, 756
- heckling and, 758
- Hentoff and, 1651
- Herbert v. Lando* and, 761
- Hess v. Indiana* and, 762–763
- Holmes, Oliver Wendell, on, 1280
- hostile environment harassment and, 778–779
- Houchins v. KQED, Inc.* and, 779
- HUAC and, 780
- Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston* and, 786, 1363
- Hustler Magazine v. Falwell* and, 787
- implied rights and, 801
- incorporation doctrine and, 803
- intellectual property and, 816–817
- intelligent design and, 378–379
- Internet and, 660, 819, 1315, 1316
- Internet filtering and, 825
- invasion of privacy and, 828–829
- Jamison v. Texas* and, 838
- Jehovah's Witnesses and, 848–850, 1542
- Jews and, 851–853
- Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson* and, 858
- journalistic sources and, 859
- judicial bias and, 860
- jurisprudence, 252
- juveniles and, 604
- Kentucky and Virginia Resolves and, 887
- Keyishian v. Board of Regents*, 1514
- Kingsley International Pictures Corporation v. Regents of the University of New York* and, 892
- KKK and, 753–754
- Kleindienst v. Mandel* and, 893
- Kois v. Wisconsin* and, 894
- lawyers and, 420
- lawyers speaking about pending cases and, 420
- Lee v. Weisman* and, 911–912
- legislative prayer and, 915
- lewd speech and, 124
- libraries and, 164
- limitations, 599, 645–646, 862
- Locke v. Davey* and, 929–930
- low value speech and, 937
- LSC and, 1324
- Marshall, T., and, 973

INDEX

First Amendment (cont.)

- mass communications and, 580
- Masses Publishing Company v. Patten* and, 980
- McCullum v. Board of Education* and, 987
- media access and, 21
- media access to military operations and, 995–996
- Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo* and, 1003
- Miller v. California*, 1012
- military chaplains and, 268–269
- military operations and, 995
- Milkovich v. Lorain Journal* and, 1009
- Miller test and, 1012–1013
- Mills v. Alabama* and, 1014
- Minersville School District v. Gobotis* and, 592, 1364
- minorities and, 1574
- Mitchell and, 1026
- moments of silence statutes and, 1028–1029
- Morrill Act of 1862 and, 1330
- movies and, 858
- Murphy and, 1048
- Murray and, 1049–1050
- Muslims and, 1053
- NAACP v. Alabama* and, 1057–1058
- NAACP v. Button* and, 1058
- National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley* and, 1065
- national security and, 1071, 1072, 1073
- Native Americans and, 1077
- Natural Born Killers* and, 210
- naturalization and, 294
- Near v. Minnesota* and, 1081
- negative rights and, 143
- negligence and, 403
- neutral reportage doctrine and, 1082
- New York Times Co. v. Sullivan* and, 330
- New York Times v. United States* and, 1089
- New York v. Ferber* and, 1092
- news-gathering privilege and, 708
- newsroom searches and, 1093
- Nike v. Kasky* and, 332
- NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago* and, 1100
- no endorsement test and, 1103
- noncitizens and, 1105–1106
- nudity and, 111
- Nuremberg Files and, 1172
- obscenity and, 1115–1116, 1117, 1118, 1123, 1125, 1228, 1271, 1382
- obstacles, 657
- O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz* and, 1130
- Omosogbon v. Wells* and, 1700
- Operation Rescue and, 1134
- Osborne v. Ohio* and, 1138
- overbreadth and, 1704
- PACs and, 588
- Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton* and, 1147
- parody and, 575
- patronage and, 492
- Patterson v. Colorado* and, 1795
- Pell v. Procunier* and, 1151
- penalty enhancement and, 750
- Perry v. Sindermann* and, 1260
- Petition Campaign and, 1155
- Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps* and, 1158
- Pickering v. Board of Education* and, 1699
- picketing and, 1166, 1169
- Pledge of Allegiance and, 1178–1179
- political correctness and, 1188–1189
- political patronage and, 1189–1190
- Political speech and, 1650
- polygamy and, 1038
- Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
- PPA and, 1223, 1224
- preferred freedoms of, 216
- press and, 1353–1354
- prior restraints and, 1075, 1209
- prison interviews and, 1415
- prisoners and, 1216
- privacy and, 1219, 1225
- private discriminatory association and, 1226
- professional advertising and, 1235
- prohibition on prior restraints and, 151
- public concern standard and, 982
- public employees and, 420–421
- public forum doctrines and, 1243
- public forums and, 1229, 1663, 1698–1700
- public officials and, 1245
- public schools and, 163, 1508, 1576, 1614
- public trials and, 1247
- Quick Bear v. Leupp* and, 1253–1254
- Rankin v. McPherson* and, 1260
- rape and, 1261–1262
- Rastafarians and, 1262, 1263
- ratification of, 532
- Rawls on, 1272–1273
- red scare and, 1280–1282
- Redrup v. New York* and, 1282
- Rehnquist and, 1289, 1299–1300
- religion and, 766–768, 1262, 1263, 1291, 1294–1295, 1296–1298, 1299, 1302, 1303–1304, 1308, 1315, 1437, 1693, 1755–1756
- religion clauses of, 527
- religious neutrality and, 768
- religious speech and, 1229
- religious symbols and, 1312
- religious tests and, 1661
- reporter's privilege and, 663–664, 1319
- Rice v. Paladin* and, 1331–1332
- right to know and, 1351–1352
- right to petition and, 1352–1353
- right to reply and, 1353–1354
- RLUIPA and, 1308, 1548
- Roberts, O., and, 1363, 1364
- Roth* test and, 835–836
- Roth v. United States* and, 1382
- Rust v. Sullivan* and, 1668
- Rutledge, W., and, 766, 1389–1390
- Salvation Army and, 1397
- satire and parody and, 1413–1414
- School District of the City of Grand Rapids v. Ball* and, 1423
- school prayer and, 1196, 1496
- school vouchers and, 1424, 1528
- sealed documents and, 1428–1429
- secondary effects doctrine and, 1436
- Sedition Act and, 38
- seditious libel and, 1440
- selective service and, 1448
- sex and, 1820–1821
- sexual conduct and, 1676
- sexual orientation and, 786
- Sherbert v. Verner* and, 349–350
- shield laws and, 1473
- shopping centers and, 1474

- SLAPP and, 1480
Snepp v. United States and, 1491
 Son of Sam laws and, 1494–1495
Southeastern Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad and, 1499 speech vs. conduct and, 1515–1516
Stanley v. Georgia and, 1521
 state action doctrine and, 927
 state constitutions and, 1538–1539
 states and, 73–75
 Stevens and, 1556
Stone v. Graham and, 1563
 student speech and, 1575
 substantive due process and, 466
 symbolic speech and, 1593
 Taft Court and, 1597
 taxes and, 715
 teacher speech and, 1614
 teachers and, 1613
 Ten Commandments and, 1563
Texas v. Johnson and, 590
 threats and, 1652–1653
 time, place, and manner test and, 818, 1657
Tinker v. Des Moines School District and, 1658–1659
Tony and Susan Alamo Foundation v. Secretary of Labor
 and, 1660
United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group and,
 1689–1690
United States v. Reidel and, 1690–1691
United States v. Seeger and, 1693–1694
United States v. The Progressive, Inc. and, 1694 universities and, 1698–1700
University of Wisconsin v. Southworth and, 1700
Urofsky v. Gillmore and, 1700–1701
 USA PATRIOT Act and, 1623
Valentine v. Chrestensen and, 1706
Vance v. Universal Amusement Co., Inc. and, 1707
 verbal communication and, 1437
 viewpoint discrimination and, 1714
 Vinson and, 1722
Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc. and, 1724
Virginia v. Black and, 1724–1725
 void-for-vagueness and, 1705
 vulgar speech and, 1248
 Waite Court and, 1732–1733
 wall of separation and, 1735
Wallace v. Jaffree and, 1736
Walz v. Tax Commission and, 1738–1739
 war and, 646–647, 946
 Warren Court and, 1560, 1753
Watson v. Jones and, 1768
Watts v. United States and, 1769
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette
 and, 1775
 Wilson, W., and, 1784
Wisconsin v. Mitchell and, 1787
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 1788
Witters v. Department of Services and, 1789
Wolman v. Walter and, 1790
 women's rights and, 1574
Yates v. United States and, 1807
Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co. and, 1812
Zelman v. Simmons-Harris and, 1812
 zoning and, 1121, 1821
Zorach v. Clauson and, 1822
Zurcher v. Stanford Daily and, 1823
 First Continental Congress, 54
First Flag Salute Case, 782
First Frame of Government (Penn), 1152
 First freedom. See Establishment clause
First Freedom, The: The Tumultuous History of Free Speech in America (Hentoff), 760
 First Law. See Stare decisis
First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti
 corporate speech and, 650
 lobbying and, 632
First Restatement of Torts
 intrusion and, 828
 First sale doctrine, 823
 FISA. See Foreign Intelligence and Surveillance Act
 Fish Committee, 780
 Fisher, Fred, 985
Fisher v. Hurst, 1391
Fisher v. United States, 589, 1432, 1454, 1455
 Fifth Amendment and, 180
Fiske v. Kansas, 68, 74
 incorporation doctrine and, 804
 Fiss, Owen, 1451
 Flag burning, 589–591, 1162
 Congress and, 590
 content-neutral regulation and, 363–364 expressive speech and, 1516
 fighting words and, 587
 Flag Protection Act of 1989 and, 590
 Kamisar and, 881
 Kennedy, A., and, 885
O'Brien test and, 450
 Scalia and, 1417
Street v. New York and, 587
Stromberg v. California and, 782
 symbolic speech and, 1593
Texas v. Johnson and, 361, 590, 1516
United States v. Eichman and, 1516
United States v. O'Brien and, 1114
 Flag Protection Act of 1989, 590
 content-neutral regulation and, 363–364
 Flag saluting, 591–596, 1802
 civil liberties and, 1630
 Frankfurter and, 619
 government speech and, 702
 Jehovah's Witnesses and, 848
Minersville School District v. Gobitis and, 1565
 religious freedom and, 1028
 Stone and, 1565
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette and, 593–596, 1775
Flagg Brothers v. Brooks, 606
 Flags desecration laws, 657
 Hughes and, 784
 red, 48
 saluting, 445
Stromberg v. California and, 782
 Flanagan, Edward, 1402
 Flanders, Ralph, 985
Flast v. Cohen, 56, 596
 establishment clause and, 1609
 federal court jurisdiction and, 867
Fleischfresser v. Dirs. of Sch. Dist. 200, 1247
 Fletcher, Andrew, 847

INDEX

- Fletcher v. Peck*, 112
economic rights and, 477
Marshall Court and, 968
Marshall, J., and, 969
- Flexner, Bernard, 102
- FLIR. See Forward-looking infrared camera
- Floating bubble, 1211
- Flores, P.F., 159
- Florida
abortion and, 1533
busing and, 1546
capital punishment in, 1238
civil liberties and, 1545
DWB and, 1237
Joseph v. State in, 1306
NAACP and, 1064
privacy and, 1531
same-sex adoption and, 1398, 1407–1408
search and seizure in, 1532–1533
- Florida Bar v. Went For It, Inc.*, 1236
lawyer advertising and, 910
- Florida Citrus Commission, 190
- Florida Star v. B.J.F.*, 596, 1261
- Florida v. Bostick*, 1444
Marshall, T., and, 973
- Florida v. Jimeno*, 597
- Florida v. Riley*, 597, 1745
- Florida v. Rodriguez*, 1444
- Florida v. Royer*, 598, 1444, 1445
- Florida v. White*, 598
- Flour scandal, 274
- Flower v. United States*, 1007
- Floyd, Charles, 774
- FLSA. See Fair Labor Standards Act
- Flynn, Elizabeth Gurley, 49 removal of, 104
- Flynt Distributing Company, 575
- Flynt, Larry, 598–599
emotional distress and, 811
Falwell and, 575
Hustler Magazine v. Falwell and, 787–788
- Flynt v. Rumsfeld*, 996
- FOE. See Fraternal Order of the Eagles
- FOIA. See Freedom of Information Act of 1966
- Foley v. Connelie*, 41, 44
- Follett, Lester, 599
- Follett v. Town of McCormick*, 599–600
Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization of California
and, 853
- Folsom v. Marsh*, 1414
- Fong Yue Ting v. United States*, 260, 600, 1530
Alien Registration Act of 1940 and, 792
Chae Chan Ping v. United States and, 600, 1259
- Food and Drug Administration (FDA)
ACT UP and, 26
Church of Scientology and, 287
contraception and, 1323
drugs and, 1743
- Food Lion, Inc., 661
- Food Lion, Inc. v. Capital Cities/ABC, Inc.*
news-gathering torts and, 661
- Footnote Four, 175
Frankfurter and, 617
- FOR. See Fellowship on Reconciliation
- Force Act of 1870, 1341
- Force Bill, 214
- Force of law, 1422
- Force. See Use of force
- Forced speech, 600–602
- Ford, Gerald
Church Committee and, 1519
Kennedy, A., and, 884
pardons and commutations and, 1145–1146
Stevens and, 1556
Tokyo Rose and, 1666
- Ford, Henry, 69
- Ford, Leland, 1085
- Ford v. Wainwright*, 386
competency to stand trial and, 468
- Fordham University
Kaufman and, 883
Mitchell and, 1025
- Foreign Agents Registration Act, 1084
- Foreign Intelligence and Surveillance Act (FISA), 346, 1519, 1520
electronic surveillance and, 487–488
national security and, 1071
terrorism and, 1624
United States v. United States District Court and, 1696
USA PATRIOT Act and, 1149
wiretapping and, 1786
- Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court of Review, 1520, 1624
- Foremaster v. City of St. George*, 371
- Forensics, 1236
- Forest Reserve Act of 1891, 1683
- Forfeiture
Bible and, 130
civil, 442
civil asset, 295–296
in drug cases, 1745
innocent owner and, 213
as punishment, 442
rewards, 296
United States v. 92 Buena Vista Avenue and, 1678
- Forgotten Features of the Founding* (Hutson), 127
- Formalism, 913
- Forman v. United States*, 858
- Forsyth County v. The Nationalist Movement*, 758
- Fortas, Abe, 603–604
Burger Court and, 198
Epperson v. Arkansas and, 376–377
Gideon and, 603, 683, 1350
Kent v. United States and, 812
Mishkin v. New York and, 685
nomination of, 697
Redrup v. New York and, 1282
resignation of, 604
Warren Court and, 1754
- Fortas, Rachel, 603
- Fortas, Woolfe, 603
- 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island*, 216, 614
alcohol advertising and, 1708
Central Hudson test and, 332
low value speech and, 937
Posadas de Puerto Rico v. Tourism Company and, 1192
Thomas and, 1650
Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc. and, 1724
- Forum doctrine cases, 838
- Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights v. Rumsfeld*, 1363
- Forward-looking infrared (FLIR) camera, 1732

- Foster, Abby, 65
- Foster care
- child custody and, 280–282
 - Smith v. Organization of Foster Families* and, 1489–1490
- Foster, Stephen, 65
- Foster v. Illinois*, 1390–1391
- Foucault, Michel, 1240–1241
- Foundation for Women's Resources, 1771
- Four Horsemen, 1564
- Four-strikes statute, 1494
- Fourteenth Amendment, 73–74, 605–613, 1396. See also
- Citizenship clause; Due process; Equal protection;
 - Incorporation doctrine
- absolutism and, 14
 - academic freedom and, 1506
 - accommodation and, 22
 - Alcorta v. Texas* and, 35
 - Allen v. Illinois* and, 43
 - Amalgamated Food Employees Union Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza* and, 44
 - Ambach v. Norwick* and, 44–45
 - antidiscrimination laws and, 71
 - Arizona v. Youngblood* and, 79
 - assisted suicide and, 86–87
 - Benton v. Maryland* and, 122
 - Bingham and, 145–146k
 - Blackledge v. Perry* and, 149
 - Blaine amendment and, 152
 - blood samples and, 1422
 - Brady v. Maryland* and, 173
 - Brandeis and, 176
 - Brewer v. Williams* and, 182
 - Buchanan v. Warley* and, 191
 - California v. Trombetta* and, 217
 - Cantwell v. Connecticut* and, 627, 849
 - capital punishment and, 223, 228, 234–235
 - Chambers v. Florida* and, 263
 - Chase Court and, 272–273
 - children born out of wedlock and, 792
 - City of Boerne, Texas v. Flores* and, 160, 560
 - City of Erie v. Pap's A.M.* and, 523
 - Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
 - Civil Rights Act of 1875 and, 300
 - civil rights and, 1542
 - Civil Rights Cases* and, 301
 - coerced confessions and, 315, 1455
 - coercion and, 831
 - Cohen v. California* and, 321
 - compulsory process clause and, 345
 - compulsory vaccination and, 341, 836
 - Connally v. Georgia* and, 348
 - consent and, 1422
 - Cooley and, 478
 - corporate speech and, 650
 - Corrigan v. Buckley* and, 369
 - Cox v. New Hampshire* and, 373
 - Crane v. Johnson* and, 374–375
 - Crane v. Kentucky* and, 375
 - cross burning and, 382–383
 - death penalty and, 989–990
 - death-qualified juries and, 932
 - discrimination and, 1468
 - discriminatory prosecution and, 423
 - Doe v. Bolton* and, 433
 - Douglas and, 444, 446
 - Douglas v. California* and, 442, 1350
 - due process and, 456–457, 462–467, 607–608, 1544, 1558, 1582
 - Duncan v. Louisiana* and, 468
 - economic regulation and, 473
 - Edwards v. South Carolina* and, 483
 - Eisenstadt v. Baird* and, 483
 - Enforcement Act and, 1681
 - enforcement power and, 613
 - Epperson v. Arkansas*, 376
 - equal protection and, 513–518, 1524, 1547, 1562, 1590
 - establishment clause and, 532–533
 - Estelle v. Williams* and, 544
 - euthanasia and, 547
 - expatriation and, 562
 - extremist groups and, 564
 - federalization of criminal law and, 581
 - felon disenfranchisement and, 583
 - Field and, 585
 - free exercise and, 625, 1215
 - free speech and, 804
 - freedom of contract and, 637
 - Frisbie v. Collins* and, 665
 - Fulminate v. Arizona* and, 320
 - fundamental rights and, 612, 1329
 - Furman v. Georgia* and, 232, 669
 - gay and lesbian rights and, 885
 - gender-motivated violence and, 435
 - Gideon v. Wainwright* and, 318, 682
 - Gitlow v. New York* and, 690, 1003
 - grand juries and, 704
 - Griffin v. California* and, 710
 - Griffin v. Illinois* and, 710–711
 - Harlan, I, and, 738, 740, 742
 - Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections* and, 745–746
 - Herrera v. Collins* and, 762
 - history of, 514–515
 - Holmes on, 770
 - Hughes and, 784
 - Hughes Court and, 781–782
 - implications of, 647
 - implied rights and, 801
 - incorporation doctrine and, 802–804
 - interpretation of, 147
 - interracial marriage and, 936
 - interstate commerce and, 826
 - jurisdiction and, 459
 - jury trials and, 73
 - juveniles and, 604
 - KKK and, 896
 - Klopper v. North Carolina* and, 893
 - Konigsberg v. State Bar of California* and, 895
 - Lawrence v. Texas* and, 436, 908, 1371
 - Lee v. Weisman* and, 911
 - Leland v. Oregon* and, 917
 - liberty and, 74, 1328
 - limitations of, 739
 - Lochner v. New York* and, 928
 - Loving v. Virginia* and, 936
 - Mapp v. Ohio* and, 957
 - Marshall, T., and, 973–974
 - McCleskey v. Kemp* and, 985–986
 - McCollum v. Board of Education*, 987
 - McCreary Count, Kentucky v. American Civil Liberties Union of Kentucky* and, 146–147
 - McDaniel v. Paty* and, 989

INDEX

- Fourteenth Amendment (cont.)
middle scrutiny test and, 612–613
miscegenation laws and, 1022–1023
Monroe v. Pape and, 1030
Mooney v. Holohan and, 1032–1033 multiple trials and, 112–113
Murdock v. Pennsylvania and, 549
Napue v. Illinois and, 1061
national security and, 1073
natural rights and, 1080
Nebbia v. New York and, 1081
Ninth Amendment and, 1097
noncitizens and, 1105–1106
North Carolina v. Pearce and, 1112
obscenity and, 1117
Palko v. Connecticut and, 1632
Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville and, 1145
PAS and, 1164
Paul v. Davis and, 1150
Pell v. Procunier and, 1151
physician-assisted suicide and, 888
Pickering v. Board of Education and, 1166
Pierce v. Society of Sisters and, 1170
Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft and, 1173
Planned Parenthood v. Casey and, 1175
plenary power doctrine and, 1180
Plessy v. Ferguson and, 1181
Plyler v. Doe and, 1182
Poe v. Ullman and, 1183
police power and, 1185
Powell v. Alabama and, 1192
preferred position rule and, 1199
Prince v. Massachusetts and, 1208
privacy and, 1219
private police and, 1227
private schools and, 1548
on privilege, 1357
privileges and immunities and, 606–607, 1230, 1231–1232
public trials and, 1247
race-based classifications and, 611–612 racial classifications and, 30
rational basis test, 251
rational purpose test and, 610
reapportionment and, 1275
Rehnquist on, 1290
RFRA and, 160
right to counsel and, 125, 1344, 1349–1350
RLUIPA and, 1308
Roe v. Wade and, 9, 1320, 1367, 1368, 1372–1374
San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez, 1194
Schneekloth v. Bustamonte, 1422
Section 1, 605
Section 5, 24, 605
segregation and, 1442 self-representation and, 1457
separationism and, 767–768
Sherbert v. Verner and, 628
Slaughterhouse Cases and, 786, 1354, 1355, 1482
Smith v. Organization of Foster Families and, 1489
Smith v. YMCA and, 1501
sodomy and, 1400
Spano v. New York and, 1504 state action limitation of, 605–606
states rights and, 112
sterilization and, 1479
Sunday closing laws and, 1586
Taft Court and, 1597
Tileston v. Ullman and, 1655
Torcaso v. Watkins and, 1661
Troxel v. Granville and, 1003
in twentieth century, 1018
vagueness and, 1703–1705, 1705
Waite Court and, 1733
Washington v. Glucksberg and, 1766
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 1775
Wilson v. United States and, 1017
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 1788
Wolf v. Colorado, 1790
- Fourth Amendment, 486, 1417. See also Search and seizure administrative search and seizures and, 27–29
airport searches and, 33
Arizona v. Hicks and, 78
arrest and, 80
arrest warrants and, 81
automobile searches and, 91
bank deposits and, 1430
Bivens v. Six Unknown Names Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics and, 148–149
blood samples and, 1422
Board of Education v. Earls and, 155–156
Boyd v. United States and, 171
Brown v. Mississippi and, 187–188
Burdeau v. McDowell and, 195
California v. Acevedo and, 214–215
California v. Greenwood and, 215
Camara v. Municipal Court of the City and County of San Francisco and, 217
Carroll Doctrine and, 251
checkpoints and, 275–276
Chimel v. California and, 284–285
City of Indianapolis v. Edmond and, 806
Clark, T., and, 309
Connally v. Georgia and, 348
consent and, 1422
Coolidge v. New Hampshire and, 365
CPUSA and, 339
deportation and, 798
DNA dragnets and, 430
dog sniffs and, 489
drug testing and, 266, 1479–1480
drugs and, 1745
due process and, 1757
DWI and, 469–470
electronic surveillance and, 487, 1519
exclusionary rule and, 554, 793, 1680–1681
exemplars and, 558–559
eyewitness identification and, 567–568
Florida v. Jimeno and, 597
Florida v. Riley and, 597
Florida v. Royer and, 598
Frisbie v. Collins and, 665 garbage and, 1430
Gerstein v. Pugh and, 679
good faith exception and, 556
Griffin v. Wisconsin and, 452, 712
habeas corpus and, 556
Hester v. United States and, 763 incorporation of, 618
ISPs and, 416
jailhouse informants and, 838

- journalistic sources and, 859
- Katz v. United States* and, 881–882, 1430
- Kennedy, A., and, 884
- Kyllo v. United States* and, 900
- On Lee v. United States* and, 1132
- Mapp v. Ohio* and, 555, 956
- Marshall, T., and, 973
- McNabb v. United States* and, 991–992
- Michigan v. DeFillipo* and, 1004
- Michigan v. Summers* and, 1006
- Mincey v. Arizona* and, 1014
- Minnesota v. Olson* and, 1015
- national security and, 1071
- National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab* and, 1076–1077
- need vs. intrusion test and, 1752
- negative rights and, 144
- New Jersey v. T.L.O.* and, 1086
- newsroom searches and, 1093
- noncitizens and, 380
- obscenity and, 933
- O'Connor v. Ortega* and, 1128
- Ohio v. Robinette* and, 1128
- Olmstead v. United States* and, 1129
- open fields and, 1133
- Payton v. New York* and, 82, 1151
- penumbras and, 1153
- phone numbers and, 1430
- plain view and, 1171
- plenary power doctrine and, 1180
- police and, 1332–1333
- PPA and, 1224
- pre-indictment and, 79
- in prison, 781
- privacy and, 1218, 1219, 1220, 1225, 1429, 1532
- private police and, 1227
- probable cause and, 1234
- property and, 1429
- property law and, 1430
- property seizures and, 1447
- proportionality approach to, 1431
- reasonable suspicion and, 794–795
- reasonableness and, 1433
- Richards v. Wisconsin* and, 1332–1333
- Schneckloth v. Bustamonte* and, 1422
- search and seizure and, 1429, 1539, 1567
- search warrants and, 1433
- seizures and, 1444, 1567
- South Dakota v. Opperman* and, 1498
- standing doctrine and, 1432
- states and, 772
- technology monitoring and, 488–489
- Terry v. Ohio* and, 1627
- thermal imaging and, 1430
- United States v. Brignoni-Ponce* and, 1680
- United States v. Calandra* and, 1680–1681
- United States v. Dionisio* and, 1682
- United States v. Havens* and, 1683
- United States v. Leon* and, 1685–1686
- United States v. Miller* (1976) and, 1687–1688
- United States v. Robinson* and, 1691–1692
- United States v. United States District Court* and, 1696
- United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez* and, 380–381, 1696
- United States v. Watson* and, 1698
- USA PATRIOT Act and, 1149
- use of force and, 1622
- Veronia School District v. Acton* and, 1707
- Vinson Court and, 1757
- War on Terror and, 1095
- Warden v. Hayden* and, 1747
- warrant clause IV and, 1748
- warrantless arrests and, 82
- warrants and, 1751
- Warren Court and, 1757
- Weeks v. United States* and, 1772
- Wilson v. Arkansas* and, 1332–1333
- Wilson v. Layne* and, 1783
- wiretapping and, 123, 177, 1786
- Wolf v. Colorado* and, 1757, 1790
- Writs of Assistance Act and, 1803
- Wyman v. James* and, 1804
- Wyoming v. Houghton* and, 1804
- Zurcher v. Stanford Daily* and, 1823
- Fowler v. Rhode Island*, 289
- Fox, Leon, 316
- Fox's Libel Act, 1440
- Frame of Government, 508
- Framers, 357
 - economic regulation and, 473
 - economic rights and, 476
 - enforcement power and, 613
 - English Bill of Rights and, 503
 - Franklin and, 621
 - free exercise clause and, 623–625
 - habeas corpus, 924
 - judicial review and, 864
 - legislative prayer and, 915
 - Meese and, 997
 - Montesquieu and, 1031–1032
- France
 - Adams, J., and, 37
 - Jefferson in, 845–846
 - judicial review and, 865
 - quasiwar with, 945
 - Quasi-War with, 887
 - XYZ Affair and, 37
- France, Anatole, 307
- France v. United States*, 615
- Franchise, noncitizens and, 1107
- Francis v. Franklin*, 615
- Francis v. Henderson*, 325
- Frank, Jerome
 - Fortas and, 603
 - legal realism and, 913
- Frank, John P., 615–616
 - Emerson and, 498
- Frank, Leo, 69, 772
 - lynching of, 897
- Frank v. Mangum*, 772
- Frankel, Marvin, 1458
- Frankfurter, Felix, 616–620, 1560
 - Baker v. Carr* and, 1275
 - Baldwin and, 103
 - Beauharnais v. Illinois* and, 116
 - Brandeis and, 174
 - Butler v. Michigan* and, 1382
 - Chafee and, 261
 - clear and present danger test and, 312
 - Colegrove v. Green* and, 1275
 - Dennis v. United States* and, 1641
 - Douglas and, 445

INDEX

- Frankfurter, Felix (cont.)
Griffin v. Illinois and, 711
 on Hand, 735–736
 Harlan, II, and, 741
Hirabayashi v. United States and, 839
 Hughes Court and, 782
 incorporation doctrine and, 803–804
 on Japanese internment, 840
 legal realism and, 913
Mallory v. United States and, 952
Minersville School District v. Gobitis and, 592, 848, 1364, 1775
Monroe v. Pape and, 1031
 Murphy and, 1048
Naim v. Naim and, 1060
 New Deal and, 1083
 obscenity and, 1117, 1123
 on Palmer raids, 1281
Poe v. Ullman and, 1183
 Rauh and, 1269
 resignation of, 696
 Roberts, O., and, 1364–1365
 Rutledge, W., and, 1389
 selective incorporation and, 618
 on separationism, 987
 Supreme Court appointment of, 50
Sweezy v. New Hampshire and, 17–18
 Vinson Court and, 1718
 warrant clause IV and, 1747
 Warren Court and, 1753
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette and, 595
Wieman v. Updegraff and, 17
Wolf v. Colorado and, 1790
Zorach v. Clauson and, 1822
- Franklin, Benjamin, 620–621
 atheism and, 90
 Bache and, 95
 Chase and, 273
 education and, 1525
 on extremism, 566
 freedom of press and, 1202
 Jefferson and, 845
 Paine and, 1143
 PAS and, 6
- Franklin College, 145–146
 Franklin, James, 621, 1202
Franks v. City of Niles, 399
 Fraser, Matthew N., 124
 Fraternal Order of the Eagles (FOE), 1620
 Fraternity of the Goat, 291 Fraud
 religion and, 1476 spam and, 820
 whistleblowers and, 1776
Frauds Exposed (Comstock), 341
Frazee v. Illinois Department of Income Security, 1477
 free exercise clause and, 629
Frazier v. Cupp, 320
 Free conscience, 1537, 1539
 Aristotle and, 1638
 religion and, 1538
 Free exercise, 92–93, 621–626, 1416, 1469, 1802
 application of, 625–626
 Bowen v. Roy and, 168
 Cantwell v. Connecticut and, 222
 Charles II and, 622
 Church of Scientology and, 366–367
 Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States and, 288
 Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah and, 289–290
 City of Boerne, Texas v. Flores and, 159, 768
 clergy in public office and, 921, 989
 CNS and, 291
 coercion and, 1101
 in colonial America, 622–623
 conscientious objection and, 349–350
 copyright law and, 365–367
 Davis v. Beason and, 396
 defining religion and, 410
 Diversity Immigrant Visa Program and, 427
 doctrine, 626–631
 drafting of, 527, 623–625
 drugs and, 454–455
 due process and, 160
 Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith and, 454, 500, 1263, 1686
 Epperson v. Arkansas and, 511 esprit de corps and, 1007 establishment clause v., 531, 540–542
 Everson v. Board of Education and, 550
 First Amendment and, 1548, 1685
 FLSA and, 570–572
 framers and, 623–625
 Frankfurter and, 618–619
 Fuller Court and, 668
 God and, 860
 Graham v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue and, 703
 history of, 118–120, 621–623
 Hughes Court and, 782
 interpretation of, 625–626
 interpreting, 541
 Jones v. Wolf and, 856–857
 Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. United States and, 908
 limitations of, 513, 768
 Locke v. Davey and, 929
 LSD and, 455
 Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association and, 624, 939
 Madison and, 944
 military and, 698, 699
 modern definitions of religion and, 411
 Mozert v. Hawkins County Board of Education and, 163, 1044 neutral laws and, 500
 non-funding provisions and, 153
 O’Lone v. Estate of Shabazz and, 1130
 Orthodox Jews and, 851–852
 polygamy and, 1038
 prisoners and, 1214–1216
 public lands, 939
 public schools and, 1246–1247
 Quinlan and, 1254
 religion and, 1475–1476
 religious ceremonies and, 454
 religious discrimination and, 422
 religious organizations and, 571
 Reynolds v. United States and, 454, 1330
 RFRA and, 630
 rights of conscience v., 624–625
 school prayer and, 1196
 school vouchers and, 1425
 sex education and, 1246

- Shelley v. Kraemer* and, 1470
- state bills of rights and, 136
- state college scholarships and, 536
- statutory religion-based exemptions and, 559
- Stone Court and, 1562
- substantive due process and, 466
- Sunday closing laws and, 1587
- Supreme Court and, 1587
- Waite Court and, 1732–1733
- Welsh v. United States* and, 350, 1693
- West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette* and, 656
- Free expression
 - bad tendency test and, 96
 - common law and, 336
 - Universal Declaration of Human Rights and, 1676
- Free love, 649
 - marriage and, 964
- Free needles programs, 759
- Free School Society, 1526
- Free Soilers, 1584
- Free speech, 1417. See also First Amendment; Protected speech;
 - Public forums; Speech regulations; Symbolic speech
 - abortion protests and, 12–13
 - absolutism and, 14–15
 - in academia, 1505
 - academic freedom and, 18
 - ACLU and, 47–48
 - Adler v. Board of Education* and, 1361
 - advocacy and, 1415
 - anonymity and, 62–63
 - anti-abortion protest and, 66–67
 - Aristotle and, 1638
 - arts and, 1451
 - autonomy and, 1643
 - balancing approach to, 99–100
 - belief and, 1415
 - Bible and, 129
 - Brandeis and, 174, 1598
 - Brandenburg* incitement test and, 178
 - buffer zone and, 67
 - Burger Court and, 200–202
 - Cantwell v. Connecticut* and, 222
 - captive audiences and, 247
 - Cardozo and, 249
 - cases, ripeness in, 1361
 - categorical approach to, 99, 252
 - Chafee and, 261
 - Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, Inc.* and, 292–293
 - civil rights laws and, 301–304
 - Cohen v. California* and, 321
 - commercial v. noncommercial, 160–161
 - company towns and, 340
 - content neutrality and, 948
 - content-based regulation and, 361–362
 - copyright law and, 764
 - corporations and, 650
 - Cox v. Louisiana* and, 372–373
 - defamation and, 402–405
 - Dennis v. United States* and, 414
 - dissent and, 14
 - distrust of government and, 1643–1644
 - Douglas and, 447
 - draft card burning and, 449
 - early history of, 642–647
 - employment discrimination issues and, 777–779
 - English Bill of Rights and, 507
 - English liberties and, 506
 - fair use doctrine and, 572
 - FCC and, 579
 - FCC v. League of Women Voters* and, 578
 - Feiner v. New York* and, 582, 1512
 - fighting words and, 587–588
 - flag burning and, 589–591
 - Fortas and, 604
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 647
 - free conduct v., 1515–1516
 - free love and, 649
 - freedom of expression and, 1159
 - Fuller Court and, 668
 - Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada* and, 679
 - Gibson v. Florida Legislative Committee* and, 681
 - Gilbert v. Minnesota* and, 1797
 - GLIB and, 786
 - God and, 860
 - government and, 655–656
 - government employees and, 1513–1515
 - gun ownership and, 720
 - harassment and, 303–304
 - hate crimes and, 749–750, 751–752
 - hate speech ordinances, 750
 - Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier* and, 757
 - heckling and, 758
 - Herndon v. Lowry* and, 784
 - Holmes and, 175, 770, 771
 - implied rights and, 801
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803, 804
 - infliction of emotional distress and, 811
 - intellectual influences on, 815–816
 - intellectual property and, 816
 - intelligent design and, 377
 - intermediate scrutiny test and, 818
 - Internet and, 819
 - Internet filtering and, 824–826
 - invasion of privacy and, 828–829
 - Jackson, R. and, 834–835
 - Kendall and, 884
 - KKK and, 897
 - Konigsberg v. State Bar of California* and, 895
 - La Follette and, 903
 - Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District* and, 906
 - legislators', 916–917
 - in limited public forums, 922
 - limits of, 771
 - literature and, 1451
 - Lovejoy and, 935
 - Madison and, 945–946
 - marketplace of ideas theory and, 962, 1449
 - Marshall, T., and, 972
 - Meiklejohn and, 999
 - Milkovich v. Lorain Journal* and, 1009
 - Mill and, 1010
 - Miller* test and, 1012–1013
 - in modern period, 651–657, 655–656
 - MPAA and, 1043
 - national security and, 1072–1074
 - during nineteenth century, 647–650
 - NLRB and, 1066
 - O'Brien* test and, 1113–1114
 - obscenity and, 1115, 1539

INDEX

- Free speech (cont.)
 overbreadth doctrine and, 1139
 Pickering v. Board of Education and, 1166
 picketing and, 1166
 political correctness and, 1188–1189
 pornography and, 47, 304, 943
 prisoners and, 1216–1217
 in private corporations, 632–633 private property and, 926–927
 profanity and, 1506
 professional advertising and, 1235 protected, 1556
 protection of, 1641–1644
 public concern standard and, 982
 Rawls on, 1272–1274
 religion and, 1505
 reputation and, 680
 Salvation Army and, 1396
 Schenck v. United States and, 47, 1281, 1282
 school vouchers and, 1425
 self-fulfillment and, 1449
 self-governance and, 994, 1449, 1642
 shopping centers and, 1474, 1536, 1544
 slavery and, 1483, 1484, 1485 standing in, 1520–1521
 state constitutions and, 1536
 Stevens and, 1556
 student activity fees and, 1574–1575
 for students, 1506–1507
 substantive due process and, 466
 teachers and, 18–19
 Terminiello v. Chicago and, 1512
 theory, 648–650, 816
 threats and, 1652–1653
 Tony and Susan Alamo Foundation v. Secretary of Labor
 and, 1660
 two-tiered theory of, 1671
 United Public Workers v. Mitchell and, 1361
 United States v. Thirty-Seven Photographs and, 1678
 universities and, 1698 unprotected, 1556
 U.S. Constitution and, 353
 viewpoint discrimination and, 1714–1717
 Vinson Court and, 1719
 violence and, 1509–1513
 vulgar speech and, 1248–1249
 during war, 262
 Warren Court and, 1753
 Watts v. United States and, 1769
 Whitney v. California and, 1779–1780
 in workplace, 1507–1508
 World War I and, 1794
 zoning and, 1821
Free Speech and Its Relation to Self-Government (Meiklejohn), 999, 1451
Free Speech Coalition, 83
Free Speech for Me and Not for Thee: How the American Left and Right Relentlessly Censor Each Other (Hentoff), 760
Free Speech in the United States (Chafee), 261, 498
“Free Speech in Wartime” (La Follette), 903
Free Speech League, 1795
Free Thinkers Society, 1292
Freedman v. Maryland, 1042, 1499 movie censorship and, 669
 prior restraints and, 1210
 prompt judicial review and, 926
 Vance v. Universal Amusement Co., Inc. and, 1707
Freedman’s Savings and Trust Company, 448 Freedom
 absolute, 262
 American Republic and, 126–127
 preferred, 216
Freedom and the College (Meiklejohn), 998
Freedom from Religion Foundation v. Thompson, 398 Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances (FACE) Act, 181, 633–634, 1172
 Internet and, 819–820
Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act (FACE Act), 66–67
Freedom of assembly, 634
 Aristotle and, 1638
 Cox v. Louisiana and, 372–373
 Cox v. New Hampshire and, 373
 Harlan, I, and, 740
 KKK and, 753–754
 North Carolina Constitution of 1776, 1111
 picketing and, 1166
 slavery and, 1484
 for students, 1506–1507
 substantive due process and, 466
Freedom of association, 75, 304, 634–636, 636, 1363
 Bell Terre v. Boraas and, 120
 Bible and, 129
 civil rights laws and, 304
 Douglas and, 446
 gang ordinances and, 675
 Gibson v. Florida Legislative Committee and, 681
 Harlan, II, and, 742
 implied rights and, 801
 NAACP v. Alabama and, 1057
 New York ex rel. Bryant v. Zimmerman and, 1087
 right to travel and, 886–887
 terrorism and, 1624
Freedom of conscience
 Rawls on, 1272–1273
 West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette and, 782
Freedom of contract, 636–637
 Lochner v. New York and, 781–782
Freedom of expression, 1159–1164, 1507, 1630 under colonial charter, 326–327
 communism and, 1051
 Douglas and, 446
 Emerson and, 498–499
 Freedman v. Maryland, 1042
 Harlan, II, and, 742
 in international context, 637–640
 in modern period, 655–657
 museums and, 1051–1052
 noncitizens and, 1105
 nude dancing and, 523
 privacy and, 1220
 Wisconsin v. Mitchell and, 1787
Freedom of Information Act of 1966 (FOIA), 310, 641
 ASNE and, 661–662
 DHS and, 415–416
 government operations information and, 20
 journalistic sources and, 859
 national security and, 1071
 sunshine laws and, 641–642
Freedom of Information Committee, 661

Freedom of press, 353, 1201–1207, 1353–1354. See also

Broadcasters
abolitionism and, 648
access and, 661–662
Bill of Rights and, 139
Blackstone on, 151
Burger Court and, 201–202
Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 358, 1263, 1264, 1265
corporate speech and, 650
early history of, 642–647
electronic media and, 663
FCC v. League of Women Voters and, 578
Florida Star v. B.J.F. and, 596, 1261
Fortas and, 604
Fourteenth Amendment and, 647
Franklin and, 620–621
freedom of expression and, 1163
gag orders and, 631–632
Hamilton and, 733
Harlan, I., and, 739–740
Houchins v. KQED, Inc. and, 779
Hughes and, 784
incorporation doctrine and, 804
Jamison v. Texas and, 838
journalistic sources and, 859
libel and, 660–661
Lilborne and, 920
Long and, 934
Lovejoy and, 935
Madison and, 946
media access and, 994
media access to judicial proceedings and, 995 media access to military operations and, 995–996
media liability and, 996
Meiklejohn and, 1000
Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo and, 1003
Miller test and, 1012–1013
Mills v. Alabama and, 1014
Mitchell and, 1026
in modern period, 658–664
Near v. Minnesota and, 1081
Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart and, 1082
during nineteenth century, 647–650
no prior restraint and, 647
North Carolina Constitution of 1776, 1111
palladium of liberty and, 137
Pittsburgh Press v. Human Relations Commission and, 330
prior restraints and, 659, 1209–1213 privacy v., 661
rape victims and, 596
reporter's privilege and, 663–664 right to fair trial and, 631–632, 662
Sedition Act and, 38
sexual expression and, 659–660
Sherman and, 360
slavery and, 1484
state bills of rights and, 137
Stewart, P., and, 1560–1561
Sunday Times v. United Kingdom, 639
taxes and, 715
U.S. Constitution and, 353–354
Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723
voire dire and, 632
Warren Court and, 1754
Zenger and, 1814–1816

Freedom of religion. See also Religious liberty

Anne Hutchinson trial and, 61–62
belief-action and, 119
Bible and, 129
Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet and, 158–159
Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah and, 368
in colonial America, 508
under colonial charter, 326–327
colonial charters and, 327–328
copyright law and, 365–367
Declaration of Independence and, 847
dissent and, 136
in England, 136
equal protection clause and, 513
Follett v. Town of McCormick and, 599–600
Jamison v. Texas and, 838
Jefferson and, 845, 847
Jehovah's Witnesses and, 848–850
Judaism and, 851–853
Madison and, 624, 944
Maryland Toleration Act and, 975–976
McDaniel v. Paty and, 989
in military, 1303–1304
Minersville School District v. Gobitis and, 592
Murray and, 1049–1050
Muslims and, 1051–1052
New Hampshire Constitution of 1784 and, 1085
O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz and, 1130
religion clauses and, 542
RLUIPA and, 160, 1307–1308
separationism v., 542
Souter and, 1496
states and, 1548–1549
West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette and, 802, 1364
“Freedom of Speech” (Cato), 994
Freedom of Speech (Chafee), 261
Freedom of Speech in the United States (Zechariah), 642 sedition and, 644
Freedom of speech. See Free speech
“Freedom of the Press under the Burger Court”
(Emerson), 499
Freedom Riders, 348
Freedom rides, 959
Freedom's Fetters (Smith), 642
Freeman v. Hewitt, 1391
Free-market principles, individual privacy v., 346
Freer, Samuel, 733
Freiler v. Tangipahoa, 377
Fremont, John C., 146
Mormons and, 1038
slavery and, 1647
French Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen, 846, 1204, 1638–1639
freedom of expression and, 637
French Parliament, 865
French Revolution
civil rights and, 1638–1639
Jefferson and, 846
Republicans and, 36
French Terror, 1051
Freud, Sigmund, 1035
Freund, Ernst, 1795, 1796
clear and present danger test and, 658
Holmes and, 771

INDEX

- Freund, Ernst (cont.)
 New Deal and, 1083
 police power and, 1187
Freund, Paul A., 664–665
Frick v. Webb, 1108
Fried, Charles, 1630
Friedan, Betty, 1062
 NOW and, 1068
Friedman, Milton, 1528
Friedman v. Board of County Commissioners, 371
Fries, John, 274
Frisbie v. Collins, 665–666
Frisby v. Schultz, 666
 picketing and, 1167
Frisking, 794–795, 1431, 1569–1570. See also Stop and frisk doctrine seizure and, 1444
 Terry v. Ohio and, 1627
Frivolous issues, 61
Frohwerk v. United States, 97
 Abrams v. United States and, 13
 clear and present danger test and, 1795
 freedom of press and, 658
 Holmes and, 771
 incitement of criminal activity and, 652
“From Establishment to Freedom of Public Religion” (Witte), 528
Frontiero v. Richardson, 1501
 ERA and, 521
 gender and, 518
 Ginsburg and, 687
 Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
Frost, Robert, 998
Frothingham v. Mellon, 596 generalized grievance and, 1609
Fruit of the poisonous tree
 exclusionary rule and, 557, 666–667
 eyewitness identification and, 567–568
 Nix v. Williams and, 1097
FTC. See Federal Trade Commission
FTC v. Cement Institute, 799
FTCA. See Federal Torts Claim Act
Fuchs, Klaus, 1377
Fuck, 321
“Fuck the Police” (NWA), 764
Fuentes v. Shevin, 463
Fugitive Slave Act, 7, 353, 1484, 1585
 Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 358–359
 personal liberty laws and, 1154
 repeal of, 452
 Sumner and, 1584
 Taney and, 1589
 Taney Court and, 1607
Fujii v. California, 1108
Fulgham v. State, 434
Full faith and credit clause, 406
 same-sex marriage and, 1401
Fuller Court, 667–668
Fuller, Melville, 667–668, 1017
 Quick Bear v. Leupp and, 1253
Fuller, Millard, 1503
Fullilove v. Klutznick, 205
Fulminate, Oreste, 320
Fulminate v. Arizona, 320
Fundamental Constitutions of Carolina, 438
Fundamental fairness, 608
Fundamental rights
 compelling state interest and, 340
 education and, 612
 explicit, 612
 family and, 608–609
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 612, 1328
 Fuller Court on, 668
 Goldberg and, 697
 selective incorporation of, 608
 substantive due process and, 464
 suspect categories and, 517–518
Fundamental creationism, 1616
Fundamentalists, 1425
Fundraising, NRA and, 1070
Funeral leave, ERISA and, 1408
Furman v. Georgia, 223, 225, 231, 385, 669, 684
 Amsterdam and, 60
 arbitrariness and, 236
 death penalty statutes after, 228
 Eighth Amendment and, 232, 234–235
 English Bill of Rights and, 503
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 232
 Gardner v. Florida and, 675
 Gregg v. Georgia and, 710
 guided discretion statutes and, 717
 mandatory death sentences and, 953
 McGautha v. California and, 990
 Powell, Lewis, and, 1195
 proportionality and, 245
 sentencing in, 227
 Stewart, P., and, 1560
 White, B., and, 1779
Future dangerousness, 109–110
 Estelle v. Smith and, 543
FW/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dallas, 669–670 prompt judicial review and, 926
- ## G
- Gaffney, Edward, 128
Gag orders
 Burger Court and, 202 conditions for, 632
 freedom of press and, 662
 injunctions and, 1213
 in judicial proceedings, 671–672
 Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart and, 631–632 participant, 671
 Rust v. Sullivan and, 914
Gag rules, 672–674
 AASS and, 46
 on abolitionists, 648 anti-abolitionist, 66 anti-slavery, 302
 Giddings and, 681
Gage, Matilda Joslyn, 65
Gainer, Ronald L., 381
Gallagher v. Crown Kosher Super Market of Massachusetts, 1587
 Frankfurter and, 619
 Orthodox Jews and, 851–852
Gallatin, Albert, 37
Gallup Poll, death penalty and, 240
Galton, Francis, 545
Gambino v. United States, 1598
Gambling

- Fifth Amendment and, 1684
- IRS and, 960
- Katz v. United States* and, 882
- Marchetti v. United States* and, 1684
- Posadas de Puerto Rico v. Tourism Company* and, 1191–1192, 1708
- Revenue Act of 1951 and, 1684
- United States v. Kahriger* and, 1684
- as victimless crime, 1709
- Gandhi, Mahatma
 - Chavez and, 274
 - Garrison and, 676
 - King and, 889
 - nonviolence and, 412
- Gang ordinances, 674–675
- Gangs
 - Chicago v. Morales* and, 278–279
 - drugs and, 1744
 - incarceration and, 1463
 - Lanzetta v. New Jersey* and, 907
 - prison, 1257
- Gannett Co. v. DePasquale*, 1195
- Ganulin v. United States*, 399
- Garbage, 1430
 - California v. Greenwood* and, 215
 - reasonable expectation of privacy and, 882
- Garcetti v. Ceballos*, 421
 - public concern standard and, 982
- Gardner, George K., 592
- Gardner, James A., 1545
- Gardner v. Florida*, 235, 675–676
- Gardner v. Village of Newburgh*
 - economic rights and, 477
 - takings clause and, 1603
- Garland, Charles, 103
- Garland, Judy, 1567
- Garland v. Torre*, 663–664
- Garner, John Nance, 419
- Garner, Tyron, 908
- Garrett v. Estelle*, 21–22
- Garrison v. Louisiana*, 1754
- Garrison, William Lloyd, 5, 7, 676, 1485, 1486
 - AASS and, 45
 - Douglass and, 448
 - Petition Campaign and, 1155
 - Phillips and, 1158
- Garvey, Marcus, 1262
- Gas chamber, 240, 244
 - Gomez v. United States* and, 384
- Gates, Henry Louis, 754
- Gates, Lance, 793
- Gates, Sue, 793
- Gaudium et spes*, 254
- Gault, Gerald, 812
- Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders (GLAD), 1401, 1402
 - Lamda and, 905
- Gay and lesbian rights, 676–678
 - ACT UP and, 26
 - Bryant and, 190
 - forced speech and, 601
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 885
 - Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston* and, 170, 785–786, 1363–1364
 - immigration and, 773
 - Kunstler and, 899
 - Lambda and, 904
 - Lawrence v. Texas* and, 908–909, 1328–1329, 1338, 1369, 1371–1372
 - Log Cabin Republicans and, 932–933
 - movement for, 1400
 - Rawls on, 1272–1274
 - same-sex marriage and, 966
 - sodomy and, 885
- Gay Liberation Front, 1567
- Gay Men's Health Crisis, 25
- Gay Pride Parades, 1405
- Gay Teachers Association v. Board of Education*, 1409
- Gayanashgowa, 53
- Gaylor v. United States*, 1067
- Gays. See Homosexuals
- GBMI. See Guilty but mentally ill
- Geary Act, 260
- Gender
 - Anne Hutchinson trial and, 61–62
 - employment discrimination and, 777–779
 - equal protection and, 518
 - ERA and, 519–522
 - hate crimes and, 303, 748–751, 751–752
 - hate speech and, 752–755
 - jury selection and, 871
 - middle scrutiny test and, 612–613
 - private discriminatory association and, 1226
 - rape and, 1262
- General Accounting Office, 435–436
- General Advertiser*, 95
- General deterrence, 1645
- General Intelligence Division, 1280
- General Managers Association (GMA), 1472
- General Order No. 38, 552
- General Staff College, 418
- General Union for the Promotion of the Christian Sabbath (GUPCS), 1588
- General warrants, 1433, 1435, 1751
 - Otis and, 1138
 - probable cause and, 1234
 - Tudors and, 1748
 - Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723
- General Writ, 1589
- Generalist creationism, 1616
- Generality, vagueness doctrine and, 1705
- Generalized grievance, 1609
- Generic terms, in trademarks, 1662–1663
- Genesis*, 1329
 - belief in, 376
- Genetic disorders, 431
- Geneva Conventions of 1949, 1346
 - Abu Ghraib and, 16
 - Guantanamo Bay and, 60, 716
 - Hamdan v. Rumsfeld* and, 355
 - War on Terror and, 1094
- Genital mutilation, 1465
 - social groups and, 89
- Gentile Christianity, 1035
- Gentile, Dominic, 679
- Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada*, 420, 679
 - gag orders and, 671
 - injunctions and, 1213
- George Foxx Digg'd Out of His Burrovvves* (Williams), 1782
- George Washington University National Law Center, 878

INDEX

- Georgia
 - aggravating factors and, 232
 - Doe v. Bolton* and, 433
 - general warrants and, 1751
 - “In God We Trust” and, 1067
 - literacy tests and, 1729
 - primary election votes in, 1275
 - Reid v. Georgia* and, 1291–1292
 - self-incrimination and, 1453
 - undocumented migrants and, 1675
 - voting in, 1729–1730
- Georgia Act, 396
- Georgia Controlled Substances Act, 347
- Georgia House of Representatives
 - Bond and, 161–162
- Georgia v. McCollum*, 115
 - peremptory challenges in, 878
- Georgia v. Stanton*, 272
- Gerber, Henry, 1566
- German measles, 8
- German-American Bund, 69
- Germaneness analysis, 1674
- Gerry, Elbridge, 139–140, 1263, 1277
 - Bill of Rights and, 815
 - civil trials and, 359–360
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 359, 1263
 - judicial review and, 864
 - Ninth Amendment and, 1096
- Gerrymandering, 1277
- Gerstein v. Pugh*, 82, 679–680, 1362
 - Ker-Frisbie rule and, 666
 - probable cause and, 1234
- Gertz, Elmer, 403
- Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc.*, 39, 403, 680
 - Burger Court and, 201–202
 - Emerson and, 499
 - false light invasion of privacy and, 574
 - Milkovich v. Lorain Journal* and, 1009
 - public figures and, 1243
- Gesell, Gerhard, 1075
 - New York Times v. United States* and, 1089
- Getty Images News Services v. Department of Defense*, 996
- Gettysburg Address, 922, 1275
 - civil religion and, 298
 - equal protection and, 514
- Giard College, 1712
- Gibbons v. Ogden*, 1589
 - Marshall, J., and, 970
 - plenary power doctrine and, 1179
- Gibson, John Bannister, 864
- Gibson v. Berryhill*, 800
- Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee*, 681
- Giddings, Joshua, 681
- Gideon, Clarence, 682–683, 1764
 - Fortas and, 603
 - Miranda v., 1021
- Gideon v. Wainwright*, 682, 1021, 1544
 - Betts v. Brady* and, 618, 1350
 - Black, H., in, 318, 682, 1373
 - Boykin v. Alabama* and, 172
 - Douglas v. California* and, 442, 1350
 - Fortas and, 603, 683, 1350
 - Harlan, I, and, 740–741
 - Harlan, II, and, 741, 742
- incorporation doctrine and, 803
- Powell v. Alabama* and, 1192
- procedural due process and, 463, 1358
- right to counsel and, 318, 682, 683, 1346–1347
- Warren and, 317–318, 1562, 1764
- Warren Court and, 1759, 1760
- Giglio v. United States*, 683
- Gilbert, Humphrey, 1722–1723
- Gilbert v. California*
 - Kirby v. Illinois* and, 892
 - Stewart, P., and, 1559
 - United States v. Wade* and, 1697
- Gilbert v. Minnesota*, 1597
 - Brandeis and, 174–175, 176
 - free speech and, 1797
- Gilded Age
 - freedom of association and, 634–635
 - Salvation Army and, 1396, 1397
- Gillette v. United States*, 1143, 1304, 1305, 1474
 - conscientious objection and, 349–350
- Gilmore, Gary, 684
- Gilmore v. Taylor*, 407
- Gilmore v. Utah*, 230
- Ginsberg v. New York*, 684–685, 1316–1317
 - free speech and, 284
 - Miller test and, 1012
 - MPAA and, 1043
 - obscenity and, 1042, 1119
- Ginsburg, Douglas
 - Kennedy, A., and, 885
 - Stenberg v. Carhart* and, 1322–1324
- Ginsburg, James Steven, 686
- Ginsburg, Jane Carol, 686
- Ginsburg, Martin, 686
- Ginsburg, Ruth Bader, 685–688
 - ACLU and, 50
 - on equal protection clause, 688
 - on fair use doctrine, 572
 - Miller v. Johnson* and, 1278
 - National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley* and, 1065
 - Supreme Court appointment of, 50
 - United States v. Virginia* and, 518
 - Virginia v. Black* and, 1724–1725
 - White, B., and, 1779
- Ginzburg, Ralph, 1118
- Ginzburg v. United States*, 688–689, 1118, 1282
 - A Book Named “John Cleland’s Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure” v. Massachusetts* and, 1–2
 - FW/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dallas* and, 670
 - Mishkin v. New York* and, 1023
- Girard, Stephen, 1712
- Girard Will* case, 634
- Girouard v. United States*, 1462
 - naturalization and, 1142
 - United States v. Schwimmer* and, 1692–1693
- Gitlow, Benjamin, 176, 653, 689–690, 1186
 - incorporation doctrine and, 804
- Gitlow v. New York*, 68, 74, 142, 689–690, 1281, 1282, 1510, 1797
 - Bill of Rights and, 1632
 - Brandeis and, 176
 - due process incorporation and, 607
 - Emerson and, 498
 - film licensing and, 1041
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 1003
 - freedom of association and, 635

- freedom of press and, 658
- Harlan, I, and, 740
- incitement of criminal activity and, 653–654
- incorporation doctrine and, 803, 804
- McReynolds and, 993
- national security and, 1073
- police power and, 1186
- substantive due process and, 466
- Vinson and, 414
- Givhan v. Western Line Consolidated School District*, 982
- GLAD. See Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders
- Glass v. Louisiana*, 485
- Glasser, Ira, 1334
- Glen Theatre, 111
- GLIB. See Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston
- Glickman v. Wileman Bros. & Elliot*, 1650
- Global positioning system (GPS), 488
- Global War on Terror (GWOT), 16, 67
 - Amnesty International and, 60
 - Ashcroft and, 84
- Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court*, 1336, 1337
- Glorious Revolution, 357, 506, 690–691, 1348
 - English Bill of Rights and, 503
 - English Toleration Act and, 504
 - Magna Carta and, 951
 - Maryland Toleration Act and, 976
- Glynn, Martin, 248
- G.M. Leasing v. United States*
 - Florida v. White* and, 598
- GMA. See General Managers Association
- G-Men, The*, 775
- Go Directly to Jail: The Criminalization of Almost Everything* (DeLong), 381
- Go-Bart Importing v. United States*, 209
- Gobitis, Lillian, 591
- God. See also Supreme being
 - belief in, office holding and, 1314–1315
 - judicial proceedings and, 860–861
- God and Man in Washington* (Blanshard), 56
- Godfrey v. Georgia*, 223, 241, 386, 691–692
- Godinez v. Moran*, 692
 - competency to stand trial and, 468
- Goesaert v. Cleary*, 1391
- Gold, Harold, 1281, 1377–1378
- Gold rush, 259
- Goldberg, Arthur J., 693–698
 - ambassadorship of, 697
 - Amsterdam and, 60
 - appointment of, 695–696
 - Bill of Rights and, 1633
 - Breyer and, 182
 - Burger Court and, 198
 - on death penalty, 240
 - Dershowitz and, 416
 - Griswold v. Connecticut* and, 713, 1225–1226
 - nomination of, 696
 - privacy and, 1226
 - resignation of, 696
 - Roth v. United States* and, 2
 - Warren Court and, 1760
 - Zenger and, 1816
- Goldberg v. Kelly*, 692–693
 - procedural due process and, 609
- Wyman v. James* and, 1804
- Golden Fleece of the Month Award, 788
- Goldman, Emma, 1795
 - Baldwin and, 102
 - Palmer and, 1144
- Goldman, Simcha, 698
- Goldman v. United States*, 1429
 - Olmstead v. United States* and, 1130
- Goldman v. Weinberger*, 23, 350, 698–699, 1303, 1470
 - free exercise clause and, 629
 - military law and, 1007
 - yarmulkes and, 852
- Goldsboro Christian Schools, Inc. v. United States*, 158–159
- Goldwater, Barry, 1287–1288, 1421
 - JBS and, 854
- Gomez v. United States*, 384
- Gomillion v. Lightfoot*, 1277
 - Frankfurter and, 619
- Gong Lum v. Rice*, 1442
 - Plessy v. Ferguson* and, 1181
- Gonzales, Alberto
 - Ashcroft and, 85
 - torture and, 16
- Gonzales v. Centro Espirita Beneficiente Uniao do Vegetal*, 455
- Gonzales v. Oregon*, 88
- Gonzales v. Raich*, 1557
- Good faith exception, 555–556
 - Illinois v. Krull* and, 793
 - Michigan v. DeFillipo* and, 1004–1005
 - United States v. Leon* and, 1685–1686
 - Younger v. Harris* and, 868
- Good Friday, 398–399
- Good News Club v. Milford Central School*, 417, 699–700, 1230, 1496
 - Breyer and, 183
 - EAA and, 133
 - equal access and, 535
 - Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District* and, 907
 - viewpoint discrimination and, 1715
- “Good Times” (Chic), 764
- Gooding v. Wilson*, 587
- Goodridge v. Department of Public Health*, 1402, 1583
 - gay and lesbian rights and, 678
 - GLAD and, 905
- Google, 823
- Goold, Thomas, 107–108
- Gore, Al, Jr.
 - gun control and, 719–720
 - O'Connor and, 1127
- Gorham, Nathaniel, 359
- Goss v. Lopez*, 282
- Gotti, John, 1335
- Gouled v. United States*, 1747
- Government
 - arbitrary, 138
 - Calder v. Bull* and, 212
 - Chafee on, 262
 - collateral consequences and, 325
 - constitutional amendments and, 142
 - distrust of, 1643–1644
 - entrapment by estoppel and, 510, 1260
 - entrenchment of, 1644
 - FBOs and, 270
 - incompetence of, 1644
 - intolerance of, 1644

INDEX

Government (cont.)

- labor unions and, 928
 - liberty and, 833
 - limitations, 145, 1580–1584
 - litigation against, 596
 - misbehavior, 145
 - Mormons and, 1036–1040
 - neutrality, 655–657
 - operations information, 20–21
 - Pickering v. Board of Education* and, 702, 1260
 - powers of, 38–39
 - public communications campaigns and, 701–702
 - regulation, 782
 - restrictions on, 112
 - secrets, 1212
 - seditious libel and, 1439
 - during war, 552
 - wrongdoing, 415
- Government funding
- abortion and, 672–674, 746–747, 951
 - equal access and, 535
 - Golden Fleece of the Month Award and, 788
 - for HIV/AIDS programs, 759
 - of legislative chaplains, 966–967
 - for parochial schools, 151–152, 549
 - parochial schools and, 542
 - of private organizations, 927
 - of religious organizations, 918, 929–930, 1045–1046
 - of religious schools, 785, 1024–1025, 1525–1529
 - of speech, 700–701
- Government Operations Committee, 322–323
- Government Printing Office, 984
- Government speech, 701–703
- employees and, 982
- GPS. See Global positioning system
- Gradual Abolition Act, 53
- Graduation
- prayers at, 1416
 - school prayer and, 1198
- Graham, Billy, 1757
- Becker Amendment and, 118
- Graham, Franklin, 1053
- Graham, Katherine, 703
- Graham v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue*, 703
- Graham v. Richardson*, 41, 294
- Graham-Levin-Kyl amendment, 1095
- Gramm-Leach-Bliley, 347
- Grammy Awards, 765
- Grand juries, 703–704
- Clarendon and, 705
 - in colonial America, 704–705, 740
 - Counselman v. Hitchcock* and, 668
 - exclusionary rule and, 1680–1681
 - Hale v. Henkel* and, 730
 - Hurtado v. California* and, 787
 - implied rights and, 801
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803
 - indictments, 705–708
 - investigations, 707–708
 - Menna v. New York* and, 1000
 - private lawyers and, 704
 - procedural due process and, 462–463
 - scope of, 707
 - secrecy of, 708
 - subpoenas and, 707–708
 - targets of, 706
 - transactional immunity and, 706
 - United States v. Calandra* and, 1680–1681
 - United States v. Washington* and, 1697–1698
 - veil of secrecy and, 706
 - venire and, 871
- Grand Rapids School District v. Ball*, 1527
- Americans United and, 56–57
 - establishment clause and, 700
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
- Grandfather clause, 1571
- White Court and, 1777
- Granger, Gideon, 1587
- Grant, Jedediah, 1040
- Grant, Ulysses S.
- Bingham and, 147
 - Dominican Republic and, 1585
 - Douglass and, 448
 - education and, 1526
 - Morrison and, 1732
 - Order No. 11 and, 709
 - School Question and, 152
 - Simpson and, 146
- Grants, 1065
- Granzeier v. Middleton*, 398
- Grateful Dead, The, 185
- Gratz v. Bollinger*, 30–31, 1285, 1443
- Ginsburg and, 688
 - Kennedy, A., and, 886
 - O'Connor and, 1127
- Grau v. United States*, 1364, 1366
- Gravel v. United States*
- legislative free speech and, 916
- Gray, Fred D., 1501
- Gray, Horace, 1591
- Gray v. Maryland*, 344
- Gray v. Sanders*, 1275, 1279
- Grayned v. City of Rockford*
- overbreadth doctrine and, 1139
 - picketing and, 1167
 - vagueness and, 1705
- Grayson, Cary, 1785
- Great Awakening, 108
- Great Binding Law, 53
- Great Depression. See Depression
- Great Disappointment, 1461
- Great Dissenter. See Harlan, John Marshall, I
- Great Petition Campaign. See Petition Campaign
- Great Sedition Trail, 1488
- Great Society
- Fortas and, 604
 - Marshall, T., and, 973
- Great Writ. See Habeas corpus
- Greater New Orleans Broadcasting Association v. United States*, 1650
- Greater-includes-the-lesser argument, 1708
- Greely, Horace, 1585
- Green, Bob, 190
- Green v. Georgia*, 235, 709
- Greenawalt, Kent, 1309
- hate speech and, 754
- Greenberg, Clement, 1051
- Greene v. McElroy*, 1270
- Greenglass, David, 1377–1378
- Greenmoss Builders, 405

- Greenspun, H.M., 306
- Greer v. Spock*
- military law and, 1007
 - public forum doctrines and, 1244
- Gregg v. Georgia*, 223, 225–226, 241, 385, 710
- Amsterdam and, 60
 - arbitrariness and, 236
 - cruel and unusual punishment and, 231–232, 384
 - Eighth Amendment and, 24s
 - English Bill of Rights and, 503
 - Furman v. Georgia* and, 669
 - Godfrey v. Georgia* and, 691
 - guided discretion statutes and, 717
 - Jurek v. Texas* and, 866
 - Marshall, T., and, 973
 - McGautha v. California* and, 990
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1195
 - proportionality and, 245
 - Stevens and, 1558
 - White, B., and, 1779
- Gregory, Thomas, 1518
- Gregory XVI, Pope, 253
- Grenada invasion
- Flynt and, 599
 - media access and, 995
- Griffin, Robert, 695
- Griffin v. Breckenridge*
- Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic* and, 180
- Griffin v. California*, 710
- Griffin v. Illinois*, 710–711, 1381, 1544
- Griffin v. Wisconsin*, 452, 712
- Griffith, D.W., 896
- Griffiths, Fre Le Poole, 812
- Griggs v. Duke Power Co.*, 301
- Grimké, Angelina, 302
- free speech and, 648–649
- Grimke, Frederick, 1207
- Grimké, Sarah, 302
- free speech and, 648–649
- Griswold, Erwin, 498
- Griswold, Estelle, 499
- Griswold Inn v. State*, 399
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 9, 87, 250, 712–714, 1411, 1479, 1493, 1521, 1531, 1582
- birth control and, 147–148, 1320
 - Bork and, 165
 - Brandeis and, 177
 - Burger Court and, 198
 - common law and, 335–336
 - Douglas and, 444, 499, 713, 1337
 - Eisenstadt v. Baird* and, 484, 1324, 1368–1369
 - Emerson and, 499
 - euthanasia and, 547
 - Goldberg and, 697, 1225–1226
 - Harlan, II, and, 742–743
 - implied rights and, 802, 1320
 - incorporation doctrine and, 742
 - NARAL and, 1062
 - Ninth Amendment and, 1097
 - Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton* and, 1148
 - penumbras and, 1153
 - Poe v. Ullman* and, 1183
 - precedent of, 714, 1320
 - privacy and, 1219–1220, 1225–1226, 1590
 - privileges and immunities and, 1232
 - quartering of troops and, 1253
 - right of privacy and, 336, 1337
 - Roe v. Wade* and, 1220, 1368, 1760
 - sex and, 1219–1220
 - Skinner v. Oklahoma* and, 713, 1320
 - Souter and, 1497
 - substantive due process and, 466, 608, 1634
 - Taft Court and, 1598
 - Tileston v. Ullman* and, 1656
 - Warren and, 1765
 - Warren Court and, 1759
 - White, B., and, 1779
 - zone of privacy and, 1003
- Grokster, 823, 1002
- Grosjean v. American Press Co.*, 714–715
- corporate speech and, 650
- Gideon v. Wainwright* and, 682
- Long and, 934
 - self-government and, 994
- Gross, Oren, 495
- Grove v. Mead Dist. No. 354*, 1246
- Gruber, Jacob, 1485
- Grutter v. Bollinger*, 19, 30–31, 1285
- ADL and, 70
 - Breyer and, 184
 - equal protection and, 517
 - Kennedy, A., and, 886
 - O'Connor and, 1127
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
 - race-based classifications and, 612
 - Stevens and, 1558
- Guantanamo Bay, 715–716, 1636
- emergency powers and, 495–496
 - enemy combatants and, 1347
 - Hamdi v. Rumsfeld* and, 731, 842
 - indefinite detention and, 805
 - media access and, 996
 - national security and, 1071
 - torture in, 60
 - U.S. Constitution and, 355
 - War on Terror and, 1095
- Guernica* (Picasso), 1162
- Guest v. Leis*, 1224
- Guided discretion statutes, 717
- Guilt. See also Reasonable doubt
- adjudicating, 164
 - admission of, 164–165
 - beyond reasonable doubt, 831
- Guilty but mentally ill (GBMI), 717–718
- insanity defense and, 814
- Guilty pleas, 718–719
- Mabry v. Johnson* and, 941
 - North Carolina v. Alford* and, 1111
 - Santobello v. New York* and, 1413
 - United States v. Tateo* and, 1694
 - withdrawn, 719, 941
- Guinn and Beal v. United States*, 1571
- White Court and, 1777
- Gun Control Act of 1968, 720
- NRA and, 1070
- Gun-Free School Zones Act, 1589
- Gunn, Paul, 633
- Gunnerud v. State*, 1534
- Guns, 1684. See also Assault rifles
- Branch Davidian Church, 1731

INDEX

Guns (cont.)

- concealed, 1070
- control of, 719–723
- execution by, 244
- manufacturers of, 722–723
- McReynolds and, 993
- NRA and, 1070–1071
- Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 and, 1132
- Operation Rescue and, 1134
- Orozco v. Texas* and, 1137
- ownership, 720
- pardons and commutations and, 1146
- Pennsylvania v. Scott* and, 1152
- protective pat-down searches, 794–795
- public policy and, 720–721
- Second Amendment and, 721–722
- stop and frisk and, 1567–1570
- United States v. Lovasco* and, 1686
- United States v. Miller* (1939) and, 1687
- United States v. Ramirez* and, 1690
- waiting period, 721

Gunther, Gerald, 736

GUPCS. See General Union for the Promotion of the Christian Sabbath

Gurfein, Murray, 1075

- New York Times v. United States* and, 1089

Gusfield, Joseph, 1740

Guterman, Leslie, 911

Gutmacher, Alan, 1062

GWOT. See Global War on Terror

H

H. Rap Brown law, 353

Habeas corpus

- AEDPA and, 233–234
- Butler v. McKellar* and, 208–209
- during Civil War, 272
- common law and, 458
- Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 358, 1263, 1265, 1266–1267
- Eisenstadt v. Baird* and, 483
- Emancipation Proclamation and, 493
- Endo v. United States* and, 840
- exclusionary rule and, 556
- expansion of, 727–728
- federal court jurisdiction and, 867
- German saboteurs and, 1562
- Hamdi v. Rumsfeld* and, 842, 1346
- Herrera v. Collins* and, 762
- indefinite detention and, 805
- indigents and, 886
- ineffective assistance of counsel and, 810
- Jackson v. Virginia* and, 832
- Kennedy, A., and, 886
- KKK and, 896
- lawsuits, 727
- Lilborne and, 920
- Lincoln and, 1374
- Lincoln's suspension of, 923–924
- Lockhart v. McCree* and, 932
- Mabry v. Johnson* and, 941
- Magna Carta and, 726
- martial law and, 552
- McCleskey v. Kemp* and, 985–986

- modern history of, 727–728
- Mooney v. Holohan* and, 1032–1033
- Penn and, 1781
- Powell, Lewis, and, 1195
- relief, 727
- restrictions under AEDPA, 728
- Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei* and, 1467
- suspension of, 352, 1589–1590
- terrorism and, 552
- tribal detention and, 809
- Ulster County Court v. Allen* and, 1672
- undocumented migrants and, 1675
- U.S. Constitution and, 352
- World War II and, 1801

Habeas Corpus Act of 1679, 726

Habeas Corpus Act of 1863, 1008

- Ex parte Milligan* and, 552

Habeas Corpus: Modern History, 867

Habeas corpus petitions

- appeals and, 230
- Betts v. Brady* and, 125
- Coleman v. Thompson* and, 325
- Counselman v. Hitchcock* and, 370
- Ex parte Milligan* and, 552
- Ex parte Vallandigham* and, 553
- Francis v. Franklin* and, 615
- Guantanamo Bay and, 716
- Rasul v. Bush* and, 35

Habitat for Humanity, 1503

Habitual Criminal Sterilization Act, 447

Habitual criminals. See also Recidivism

- sterilization of, 447, 1478–1479

Hacking, 825

Hague, Frank, 729–730

Hague v. Committee of Industrial Organizations, 729, 1800

- Butler and, 209
- Hague and, 729
- privileges and immunities and, 1232
- public forum doctrines and, 1243
- Roberts, O., and, 1364

Haig v. Agee, 311, 730

Haines v. Kerner, 202

Hair, 1498–1499

- public forum doctrines and, 1243

Hair, as dreadlocks, 1262–1263

Haiti, 389–390

Haldene Club, 110

Hale, Matthew, 961

Hale, Robert, 913

Hale v. Henkel, 121, 730

- Braswell v. United States* and, 180
- corporate self-incrimination and, 668

Hall, John, 273

Halleck, Henry, 709

Halpern v. Canada, 1403

Ham v. South Carolina, 873

Hamburger, Philip, 1309

Hamdan, Ahmed, 355

Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 355

- emergency powers, 496
- Guantanamo Bay and, 716
- military tribunals and, 1009
- War on Terror and, 1095

Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 731, 1347, 1348, 1520

- Bush G.W., and, 495–496

- emergency powers and, 495
- habeas corpus and, 842, 1347
- Korematsu v. United States* and, 842–843
- military law and, 1007
- right to counsel and, 731, 1347
- unlawful detentions and, 800, 1347
- War on Terror and, 1094
- Hamdi, Yaser Esam, 495, 731, 842, 1347, 1348
 - military law and, 1007
 - Miranda warnings and, 1020
- Hamerstrom, Ruby, 395
- Hamilton, Alexander, 732–734, 1264, 1632, 1635
 - Bill of Rights and, 140, 144, 732, 1326
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 732, 1263, 1268
 - corruption of blood and, 369
 - death of, 733–734
 - Federalist Papers* and, 732, 1268, 1339
 - Federalist*, The and, 944
 - Federalists and, 36
 - freedom of press and, 1206, 1207
 - Ginsburg and, 687
 - impartiality and, 798–799
 - on independent judiciary, 289
 - judicial review and, 864
 - McCulloch v. Maryland* and, 988
 - pardons and commutations and, 1145–1146
 - privileges and immunities and, 1231
 - Zenger and, 644
- Hamilton, Andrew, 734–735, 1815
 - free speech law and, 815
 - freedom of press and, 1202
- Hamilton, James, 734
- Hamilton, Margaret, 341
- Hamilton v. Regents of the University of Southern California*, 74–75
 - Hughes and, 784
- Hammer v. Dagenhart*, 1777
- Hammett, Dashiell, 323
- Hammond, James Henry, 6
- Hammond, John, 273
- Hammond, Matthias, 273
- Hamurabi, 1492
- Hand, Augustus
 - obscenity and, 1116
 - United States v. Bennett* and, 1689
 - United States v. One Book Entitled “Ulysses”* and, 1688–1689
- Hand, Learned, 735–737, 1281–1282
 - clear and present danger test and, 311–312, 414, 980
 - conspiracy and, 351
 - Dennis v. United States* and, 414, 655
 - direct advocacy test and, 653–654
 - on entrapment, 509
 - Harrison v. United States* and, 380
 - Masses Publishing Company v. Patten* and, 653, 979–980, 1642, 1796
 - national security and, 1073
 - obscenity and, 1116
 - on privacy, 1337
 - United States v. One Book Entitled “Ulysses”* and, 1688–1689
 - Vinson and, 1722
 - Warren Court and, 1753
- Hand, W. Brevard, 1737
- Handcuffs, 1445
- Handgun Control, Inc. (HCI), 721
- Handguns. See Guns
- Hands off doctrine, 1216
- Handyside v. United Kingdom*, 638
- Hanging, 243–244
 - Campbell v. Wood* and, 384
- Hanks, Nancy, 922
- Hannaball v. Spalding*, 438
- Hannegan v. Esquire, Inc.*, 700
- Hansen, Ole, 1798
- Happiness
 - free speech and, 1450
 - privileges and immunities and, 1231
- Harassment, 303–304. See also Sexual harassment
 - effect of, 778
 - hate speech codes and, 221
 - hostile environment, 777–779
 - quid pro quo, 778
 - telephone, 778
 - workplace, 303–304
- Hard labor, 384
- Hard Times* (Dickens), 150, 307
- Harden v. State*, 1490
- Harding, Warren G., 1372
 - Debs and, 400
 - Hays and, 755
 - Hoover and, 774
 - La Follette and, 903–904
- Hardison, Larry, 1300–1301
- Hardwick, Michael, 168–169
- Hardwick v. Bowers*, 855
- Hardy v. United States*, 1017–1018
- Harisiades v. Shaughnessy*, 737–738
 - Alien Registration Act of 1940 and, 792
- Harlan, James, 738
- Harlan, John Marshall, I, 738–741, 741–744
 - on Bakeshop Act, 928
 - Civil Rights Act of 1875 and, 1232
 - Civil Rights Cases* and, 301, 606
 - Cohen v. California* and, 1248
 - Fuller Court and, 667
 - Holmes and, 770
 - Hopt v. Utah Territory* and, 777
 - Jacobson v. Massachusetts* and, 341
 - on jury size, 743
 - Katz v. United States* and, 882
 - liberty and, 74
 - Marchetti v. United States* and, 960
 - Monroe v. Pape* and, 1031
 - obscenity and, 1116, 1117, 1121
 - penumbras and, 1153
 - Plessy v. Ferguson* and, 1181
 - privileges and immunities and, 1232
 - reasonable expectation of privacy and, 882
 - Roth v. United States* and, 2, 1382, 1383
 - Scales v. United States* and, 1415
 - on substantive due process, 466
 - vulgar speech and, 1248
 - White Court and, 1777
- Harlan, John Marshall, II, 1287
 - appointment of, 309
 - Baker v. Carr* and, 1275
 - Barenblatt v. United States* and, 110
 - Cain v. Kentucky* and, 212
 - Cohen v. California* and, 321
 - on compulsory vaccination, 836
 - defining religion and, 410
 - Douglas v. California* and, 443

INDEX

- Harlan, John Marshall, II (cont.)
 Gideon v. Wainwright and, 682
 Griffin v. Illinois, 711
 Hamilton v. Regents of the University of Southern California
 and, 75
 Konigsberg v. State Bar of California and, 895
 NAACP v. Alabama and, 635, 1057
 NAACP v. Button and, 1058
 New York Times v. United States and, 1090
 Poe v. Ullman and, 714, 1183
 Powell, Lewis, and, 1193
 reasonable doubt and, 1240
 Redrup v. New York and, 1282
 Sherbert v. Verner and, 628
 United States v. O'Brien and, 450
 Walz v. Tax Commission and, 1738–1739
 Warren Court and, 1753, 1760
 Welsh v. United States and, 350
Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 868
Harm principle, 1420
 Feinberg and, 1709
 Mill and, 1027–1028, 1709
 obscenity and, 1119
 police power and, 1185
 proportionality and, 245
Harmelin v. Michigan, 384, 744, 1494, 1745
 English Bill of Rights and, 503
 proportional punishment and, 1241
 three strikes laws and, 1654
Harmless error, 320, 745
 Arizona v. Fulminante and, 78
 Estelle v. Williams and, 544
Harmon Publishing, 292
Harmon v. Thornburgh, 452–453
Harper & Row Publishers v. Nation, 1414
Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections, 745–746
 Douglas and, 447
 Harlan, II, and, 742
 Stewart, P., and, 1559
 suspect categories and, 518
Harriman, Averill, 697
Harris, Crampton, 1718
Harris, John, Jr., 1809
Harris, Kevin, 1385
Harris, Robert Alton, 1551
Harris v. City of Zion, 371
Harris v. Harris, 1491
Harris v. McRae, 9–10, 746–747
 abortion and, 673, 1320–1324, 1373
 Beal v. Doe and, 116
 Burger Court and, 198
 Hyde amendment in, 12
 Lemon test and, 534
 Maher v. Roe and, 951
 Roe v. Wade and, 1221
 Webster v. Reproductive Health Services and, 1770
Harris v. New York, 747–748, 1457
Harrisburg Six, 306
Harrison Act of 1914, 1741
Harrison, Benjamin, 1601
Harrison, Francis Burton, 1741
Harrison v. United States and, 380
Harry Potter (Rowling), 164
Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act, 1472
Hartzel v. United States, 1800
 New Deal and, 1084
Harvard Law Review
 Brandeis and, 176
 burden of proof and, 196
 Chafee and, 261
 Hand and, 735
 Holmes and, 658
 Scalia and, 1416
Harvard Law School
 Breyer and, 182
 Chafee and, 261
 Chemerinsky and, 276
 Dershowitz and, 416
 Frankfurter and, 616–617, 782
 Freund and, 664
 Ginsburg and, 686
 Hand and, 735
 Hiss and, 765
 Holmes and, 769–770
 Kennedy, A., and, 884
 Story and, 968
Harvard University, 1269, 1288
 Baldwin and, 102
 Baptists and, 107
 Biddle and, 133
 Chafee and, 658
 Dershowitz and, 416
 Hand and, 735
 Holmes and, 769
 Lasky and, 658
 Rawls and, 1272
Harvesting, of stem cells, 1552–1553
Hatch Act of 1939, 193, 748, 1515
 New Deal and, 1084
Hatch, Orrin, 1137
Hate crimes, 303, 751–752 constitutionality and, 749–750
 hate speech v., 752
 homosexuality and, 1469
 laws, 748–751
 lynching and, 243
 on Middle Easterners, 789–790 penalty enhancement and, 749–750
 politics and, 752
 statistics, 751
 Wisconsin v. Mitchell and, 1787
Hate Crimes Statistics Act of 1990, 751
Hate groups, 564
Hate speech, 303, 752–755 codes, 220–221 in colleges, 1579
 definition of, 752
 effect of, 754–755
 freedom of expression and, 1163
 group libel and, 752
 hate crimes and, 751, 752
 history of, 752–753
 injunctions and, 1211–1212
 Internet and, 819–820
 in modern times, 753–754
 ordinances, 657, 750
 political correctness and, 1188–1189
 R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul and, 362
 secondary effects doctrine and, 1436–1437
 Void-for-vagueness doctrine and, 1725

- Hateful motivation, 752
- Hatfield, Mark, 356
- Haudenosaunee, 53
- Haupt v. United States*, 1665, 1800
- Hauptmann, Bruno, 662
- HAVA. See Help America Vote Act
- Haverford College, 60
- Hawaii
 - AIRFA and, 51
 - busing and, 1546
 - civil liberties and, 1545, 1546
 - Constitution, 405
 - ERA in, 1401
 - Good Friday and, 398–399
 - martial law in, 1048
 - privacy and, 1531
 - same-sex marriage in, 405, 1401
 - search and seizure in, 1532
 - voting in, 1729–1730
- Hawaii Housing Authority v. Midkiff*, 1604
- Hawaii v. Mankichi*, 740
- Hawkins, Alfred E., 1427
- Hayburn's Case*, 844
- Hayden, Tom, 278
- Hayes, Paul Lewis, 165
- Hayes, Rutherford B., 738
- Haymarket rally, 649
- Haynsworth, Clement, 616
- Hays, Arthur Garfield, 103, 1426
- Hays, Bennie Jack, 1501
- Hays, Henry, 1501
- Hays Office, 755–756
- Hays Production Code of 1930, 755–756
 - LOD and, 914
- Hays, Will, 755–756
- Haywood, William, 394, 979
- Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier*, 19, 163, 756–757, 1576, 1613, 1699
 - First Amendment and, 284
 - prior restraint and, 659
 - Tinker v. Des Moines School District* and, 1658
 - viewpoint discrimination and, 1715–1716
- H-bomb, 1694
- “H-Bomb Secret How We Got It, Why We’re Telling It, The” (Morland), 1694
 - injunctions and, 1212
- HCI. See Handgun Control, Inc.
- Heads of the Proposals Offered by the Army*, 456
- Health insurance
 - ERISA and, 1408
 - same-sex adoption and, 1398
 - same-sex marriage and, 1404
 - same-sex partners and, 1407
- Health of the mother, 1554
- Hearings, reasonable promptness and, 1018
- Hearsay, 757–758
 - exclusions, 758
 - Green v. Georgia* and, 709
- Hearsay exception
 - co-conspirator, 351
 - confrontation clause and, 345–346
- Hearsay Rule, 344
- Hearst Newspapers, 694
- Hearst, William Randolph, 64
- Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States*
 - Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, 300
 - racial discrimination and, 827
- Heath v. Alabama*, 440–441
- Heather Has Two Mommies* (Newman and Souza), 164
- Hebert, Claude, 1046
- Heckler’s veto, 758
 - Edwards v. South Carolina* and, 483
- Heckling, 758
- Heightened review, 612–613
- Helfeld, David, 498
- Helicopter surveillance
 - Florida v. Riley* and, 597
 - privacy and, 1220
- Hellman, Lillian, 1270
- Helms Amendment, 759
- Helms, Jesse, 759
- Helmsley, Leona, 306
- Help America Vote Act (HAVA), 1356
- Helper, Hinton, 759–760, 1485
- Hemlock Society, 1164
- Henderson, Russell, 1469
- Henderson v. Morgan*, 718
- Henderson v. United States*, 1443
 - Burton and, 208
- Henery v. City of St. Charles*, 757
- Henry, Aaron, 548
- Henry I, king of England, 437
 - Magna Carta and, 950
- Henry II, king of England, 437
- Henry III, king of England, 950
- Henry, Patrick
 - Baptists and, 108
 - Bill of Rights and, 140, 142, 1341
 - Christianity and, 526
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1266–1267
 - free exercise clause and, 623
 - Madison and, 944
 - Mason and, 978
 - “Memorial and Remonstrance” and, 947
 - Ninth Amendment and, 1096
- Henry VIII, king of England, 1492
 - Church of England and, 621
 - freedom of press and, 1201
 - obscenity and, 1122
- Hentoff, Nat, 760, 1651
 - obscenity and, 1119
- Hepburn v. Griswold*, 465
- Hepps, Maurice, 1157
- Herbert, Anthony, 760–761
- Herbert v. Lando*, 760–761
 - Burger Court and, 202
 - journalistic sources and, 859
- Herdon v. Lowry*, 654
- Heresy
 - Anne Hutchinson trial and, 61
 - Catholic Church and, 1452
- Hernandez, Aileen, 1068
- Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue*, 761–762
 - Church of Scientology and, 287
 - Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization of California* and, 853
- Hernandez v. New York*, 873–874
- Herndon v. Lowry*
 - Butler and, 209
 - Hughes and, 784

INDEX

- Herndon v. Lowry* (cont.)
 incitement of criminal activity and, 654
 Roberts, O., and, 1364–1365
- Herndon v. State of Georgia*
 Cardozo and, 249
- Heroin, 1743
Michigan v. Summers and, 1006
Wong Sun v. United States and, 1792
- Herrera v. Collins*, 224, 237, 762
- Hersh, Seymour, 1519
- Herzig-Yoshinaga, Aiko, 841
- Hess v. Indiana*, 762–763, 1511
- Hester v. United States*, 763, 1430
 open fields and, 1133
- Heston, Charlton, 1621
- Hetenyi v. Wilkins*, 972
- HEW. See Department of Health, Education, and Welfare
- Heywood, Ezra, 649
- HHS. See Department of Health and Human Services
- Hicklin, Benjamin, 1285–1286, 1386–1387
- Hicklin Rule, 1592
United States v. Bennett and, 1689
United States v. One Book Entitled “Ulysses” and, 1688–1689
- Hicklin trial, 659
- Higginbotham, Leon, 616
- Higher Education Facilities Act, 1528–1529
- Hijackers, 33
 criminal profiling and, 1237
- Hill, Anita, 616
- Hill v. Berkman*, 129
- Hill v. Colorado*, 13, 67
 abortion and, 1168
 content-based regulation and, 361
 content-neutral regulation and, 363
 picketing and, 1168
- Hill v. National Collegiate Athletic Association*, 1534
- Hill v. State*, 1490
- Hillard v. State*, 319
- Hinckley, John, Jr., 721
 insanity defense and, 814
- Hindrance clause. See Civil Rights Act of 1871
- Hindus, 1330
 marijuana and, 455
- Hines v. Davidowitz*, 1530
 national security and, 1071
 New Deal and, 1083
- HIPAA*, 347
- Hip-hop music, 763–765
 censorship and, 764–765
- Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States*
 White Court and, 1777
- Hippies, 1743
- Hippocratic oath, 547
- Hirabayashi, Gordon, 839
 litigation of, 841–842
- Hirabayashi v. United States*, 49
 Baldwin and, 104
 Douglas and, 445
 Japanese internment and, 839–840
 Stone and, 1565
 Stone Court and, 1562
- Hirico v. Slovakia*, 640
- Hispanics. See also Mexicans
 bail and, 1257
 in congress, 1277–1278
- Hernandez v. New York* and, 874
- Internet access of, 821
- juvenile, 1258
- Kunstler and, 899
- limited data on, 1256
- parole and, 1257
- police and, 1258
- political patronage and, 1190
- as prisoners, 1463
- racial discrimination and, 1256, 1257
- racial profiling and, 675
- San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez*, 1194
- as victims, 1464
- Hiss, Alger, 765
 Chambers and, 265
 Communist Party and, 265, 1377–1378
 HUAC and, 765, 780, 1377
- Historic preservation, 159
- History, as precedent, 967
- History of the United States* (Bancroft), 54
- “History of U.S. Decision-Making Process on Vietnam Policy, 1945–1967,” 1075
- History of Woman Suffrage* (Anthony, Stanton and Gage), 65
- Hit Man: A Technical Manual for Independent Contractors* (Feral), 211, 996
- “Hit Man” case. See Rice v. Paladin Enterprises, Inc.
- Hit slips, 615
- Hitler, Adolf
 ADL and, 69
 eugenic sterilization and, 546
- HIV/AIDS. See also AIDS
 ADA and, 71
 birth control and, 148
 Helms Amendment and, 759
 intravenous drugs and, 759
 Lamda and, 904
 Log Cabin Republicans and, 933
 transmission of, 759
- Hixson, Richard F., 1115
- H.L. v. Matheson*, 725–726
- Hmong
 autopsies and, 93
 cultural defense and, 391
- Hoasca, 455
- Hobbie, Paula, 1462
- Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Commission*, 1462, 1470
 free exercise clause and, 629
 unemployment benefits and, 629
- Hobbs Act, 1335
- Hodgson v. Minnesota*
 parental notification of abortion and, 725, 1368–1369
- Hoffa, Jimmy, 769
- Hoffa v. United States*, 769
- Hoffman, Abbie
 Chicago Seven and, 278
 Kunstler and, 898
- Hoke v. United States*
 Mann Act and, 955
 White Court and, 1777
- Hold rule, 1551
- Holidays. See also Religious holidays
 civil religion and, 297
 Jews and, 852
 King and, 890–891
Lynch v. Donnelly and, 937–938

- religious observance and, 398–399
- states, 398–399
- Thanksgiving, 399
- Holland, PAS and, 1165
- Holland v. Illinois*, 115, 769
 - challenges for cause in, 873
- Hollow Hope, The* (Rosenberg), 1635
- Hollywood 10
 - blacklist and, 150
 - HUAC and, 780
- Holmes Lectures, 736
- Holmes, Obadiah, 107
- Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr., 769–772, 1280–1282, 1358, 1510, 1556
 - Abrams v. United States* and, 14, 644, 652–653, 658, 787, 1281, 1282, 1795–1796
 - Biddle and, 133
 - Brandeis and, 174
 - Buck v. Bell* and, 192–193, 1320, 1324
 - Cardozo and, 249
 - clear and present danger test and, 311–312, 980
 - criticism of, 658, 771
 - Debs v. United States* and, 401, 652
 - dissent and, 658
 - on equal protection, 513–514
 - on eugenic sterilization, 545
 - on First Amendment, 1281
 - Frankfurter and, 617
 - on free speech limitations, 689
 - free speech theory and, 816
 - freedom of expression and, 1160, 1163
 - freedom of press and, 739–740
 - freedom of speech and, 175
 - Frohwerk v. United States* and, 658
 - Fuller Court and, 667
 - Gitlow v. New York* and, 690, 1281–1282
 - Hamilton and, 733
 - Hand and, 736
 - hate speech and, 752, 754
 - Hughes Court and, 782
 - legal realism and, 913
 - Lochner v. New York* and, 928, 1633
 - marketplace of ideas theory and, 962
 - Meiklejohn and, 999
 - Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon* and, 479
 - penumbras and, 1153
 - preferred position rule and, 1199
 - on protests in public places, 729
 - Schenck v. United States* and, 96–97, 652, 1281–1282, 1636
 - Schwimmer v. United States* and, 1141
 - Stone and, 1564
 - takings clause and, 1605
 - on truth, 994
 - United States v. Abrams* and, 312
 - Vinson and, 414, 1722
 - White Court and, 1777
 - Whitney v. California* and, 1780
- Holmes, Sherlock, 1236
- Holocaust, 1639
 - equal protection and, 516
 - West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette* and, 595
- Holt, Joseph, 146, 1440
- Holy Piby, The* (Rogers, A.), 1262
- Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell*, 474
- Homefront Confidential: How the War on Terrorism Affects Access to Information and the Public's Right to Know*, 662
- Homeland Security Act
 - common law and, 336
 - DHS and, 415
 - FOIA and, 415–416
 - surveillance and, 1519
- Homma v. Patterson*, 1801
- Homosexuality. See also Don't Ask, Don't Tell; Gay and lesbian rights; Same-sex partners; Sodomy; Stonewall riot
 - American Psychological Association and, 1405
 - American Bar Association (ABA) and, 1405
 - APA and, 1405
 - Assyrians and, 1492
 - Bible and, 1492
 - Boy Scouts and, 1497
 - Boy Scouts of America v. Dale* and, 170, 304, 636, 1363, 1382
 - Bryant and, 190
 - Burger Court and, 199
 - Cohn and, 323
 - discrimination and, 1405
 - Falwell and, 575
 - family values movement and, 577
 - FBI and, 1317–1318
 - Garland, J. and, 1567
 - hate crimes and, 1469
 - as learned behavior, 1408
 - as mental illness, 1405
 - in military, 1405
 - NOW and, 1068
 - obscenity and, 1116
 - O'Connor and, 1126
 - opponents to, 1398
 - Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton* and, 1148
 - pedophilia and, 1398
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
 - private discriminatory association and, 1226
 - Rastafarians and, 1262
 - rational purpose test and, 610
 - religious conservatives and, 1406
 - Romer v. Evans* and, 610, 1371
 - sexual orientation and, 1222
 - sexually explicit materials and, 1120
 - Shepard and, 1469
 - SLDN and, 436
 - sodomy and, 1222
 - sodomy laws and, 169, 1398
 - state constitutions and, 1536
 - "The Perfect Moment" and, 1065
 - as victimless crime, 1709
 - White, B., and, 1779
- Homosexuals. See also Sexual orientation
 - adoption by, 678
 - Department of Defense and, 435
 - freedom of association and, 304
 - hate crime laws and, 748–751
 - immigration and, 773
 - Lawrence v. Texas* and, 908–909, 1328, 1329, 1338, 1369, 1371–1372
 - Log Cabin Republicans and, 932–933
 - marriage and, 936, 1023
 - in military, 435–436, 885
 - military discharges and, 436
 - Mullaney v. Wilbur* and, 1046
 - obscenity and, 956

INDEX

- Homosexuals (cont.)
 - privacy rights and, 714
 - same-sex marriage and, 773, 966
 - social groups and, 89
 - student groups, 512–513
- Honest ballot association, 1066
- Hooker, Evelyn, 1405
- Hooker, Richard, 1735
- Hoopa Valley Reservation, 52
 - Moore v. Nelson* and, 809
- Hoover, Herbert
 - Biddle and, 133
 - Brandeis and, 174
 - Cardozo and, 248
 - Hughes and, 784
 - Prohibition and, 1239
 - Roberts, O., and, 1363
- Hoover, J. Edgar, 774–777, 1500, 1799
 - Baldwin and, 104
 - Clark, R., and, 305–306, 306
 - Clark, T., and, 308–309
 - Communist Party and, 339, 775, 1269
 - CPUSA and, 338
 - extremist groups and, 567
 - FBI and, 774–777, 1269–1270, 1317–1318
 - King and, 306
 - Kunstler and, 898
 - Murphy and, 1047
 - New Deal and, 1084
 - Nixon, R. and, 1099
 - Palmer and, 774, 1144, 1280–1281
 - red scare and, 774, 1281
 - spying and, 1518
 - Wilson, W., and, 1785
- Hoover, John, 1483
- Hope House, 1201
- Hopkinson, Francis, 846
- Hopt v. Utah Territory*, 777, 1453
 - torture and, 1017
- Horiuchi, Lon, 1385–1386
- Horn, Lawrence, 1332
- Horn, Mildred, 1332
- Horton, James Edward, 1427
- Horton v. California*, 1171
- Horwitz, Morton, 697
- Hospitalization, involuntary, 1001
- Hospitals
 - abortion and, 1183
 - Bradfield v. Roberts* and, 172–173
 - Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft* and, 1174
 - religious, 668
- Hostetler, John, 1788
- Hostile audiences, 1511–1512
- Hostile environment, 777–779
- Hosty v. Carter*, 1699
- Hot pursuit, 1433
 - arrest and, 1445
- Houchins v. KQED, Inc.*, 21, 779
 - Burger Court and, 202
- House Internal Security Committee, 780. See also House Un-American Activities Committee
- House Judiciary Committee, 780
- House of Commons, 150
- House of Lords Appellate Committee, 639
- House, Paul, 238
- House Select Committee to Investigate Tax-Exempt Foundations, 635
- House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC), 780, 1454, 1636, 1800
 - ACLU and, 49
 - Baldwin and, 104
 - Barenblatt v. United States* and, 49
 - Biddle and, 134
 - Chafee and, 261
 - Chambers and, 265, 780, 1377
 - Clark, T., and, 308
 - CPUSA and, 337–338
 - Dies and, 419
 - Fifth Amendment and, 1270
 - Gitlow and, 690
 - hearsay evidence and, 757
 - Hiss and, 765, 780, 1377–1378
 - Nixon, R. and, 1098
 - Rauh and, 1270
 - Rosenberg and, 780, 1377–1378
 - United States v. Lovett* and, 1686–1687
 - Vinson Court and, 1718
 - Warren and, 1764
 - Warren court on, 1270
- Housing
 - ordinances, 1033
 - racially restrictive covenants and, 368–369, 1325
- Houston, Charles Hamilton, 1442
 - Marshall, T., and, 971
- Houston Police Department Crime Lab, 429
- Houteff, Victor, 1461
- “How Long?...Not Long?” (King), 890
- Howard University
 - affirmative action and, 30
 - Marshall, T., and, 971
- Howell, Leonard, 1262
- Howell’s state trials, 1667
- Hoyle, Fred, 1618
- Hoyt v. Florida*, 1610
- Hoyt v. Minnesota*, 212
- HUAC. See House Un-American Activities Committee
- Hubbard, L. Ron, 286
- Huckle v. Money*, 1749
- Huckleberry Finn* (Twain), 221
- Hudgens v. NLRB*, 44
 - intermediate scrutiny test and, 818
 - Lloyd Corporation v. Tanner* and, 927
 - Marshall, T., and, 972
- Hudson, Tracy Lee, 781
- Hudson v. Louisiana*, 781
- Hudson v. McMillan*, 1650
- Hudson v. Palmer*, 781
- Hue and cry, 1433
- Huger, Alfred, 883
- Hughes, Charles Evans, 783–784, 1364–1565
 - civil liberties and, 1028
 - coerced confessions and, 74
 - court of, 781–783
 - Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada* and, 515
 - Near v. Minnesota* and, 784, 1364, 1366
 - prior restraint and, 659, 1075
 - Roberts, O., and, 1363, 1364
 - Stromberg v. California* and, 74, 1364, 1366
 - United States v. Macintosh* and, 349, 1142

United States v. McIntosh and, 409
 White Court and, 1777
 Hughes Court, 781–783
 judicial review and, 864–865
 Hughes, Howard, 306
 Hughes, John, 1526
 Hughes, Langston, 323
 Hughes, Mike, 150
 Human Intelligence (HUMINT), 257
 Human Life International, 1134
 Human rights
 international, 637–640
 “natural rights” as, 1325–1328
 Rawls on, 1274
 Human Rights Campaign, 1461
 Lawrence v. Texas and, 909
 Human sacrifice, 396–397
 Human trafficking, 1465–1466
 Humane Slaughter Act, 561
Humani Generis, 376
 Humanism, 395
 Hume, David, 377
 Jefferson and, 847
 HUMINT. See Human Intelligence
 Humphrey, Hubert H., 1098
 Johnson, L., and, 856
 Hungary, same-sex marriage and, 1403
Hunt v. Cromartie, 1278, 1279
Hunt v. McNair, 785, 1529
 Tilton v. Richardson and, 1657
 Hunt, Ward, 65
Hunter v. Underwood
 felon disenfranchisement and, 583
 Hurley, John J., 786
Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston, 170, 785–786, 1363, 1364
 private discriminatory association and, 1226
Hurtado v. California, 786–787
 Bill of Rights and, 1632
 grand juries and, 704
 grand jury indictments and, 708
 Harlan, I, and, 739
 incorporation doctrine and, 803
 penumbras and, 1153
 procedural due process and, 462–463, 1358, 1368
 substantive due process and, 464
 Hussein, Saddam
 Abu Ghraib and, 15
 Clark, T., and, 307
Hustler Magazine, 1413–1414
 Falwell and, 575
 Flynt and, 599
 Rehnquist on, 1288–1291
Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 599, 787–788, 1414 emotional distress and, 811
 vulgar speech and, 1248
 Hustler Publishing Company, 599
 Huston Plan, 1099
 Huston, Thomas Charles, 1099
 Hutchins, Robert Maynard, 497
 Hutchinson, Anne
 Puritans and, 1250
 trial of, 61–62
 Hutchinson, Ronald, 788
 Hutchinson, Thomas, 1139

Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 788, 1243
 Hutson, James, 127
Hutto v. Finney, 202
 Hybrid rights cases, 1478
 Hyde Amendment, 9, 1134
 Harris v. McRae and, 12, 746–747
 NARAL and, 1062
 Hyde, Anne, 690
 Hyde, Henry
 CDA and, 336
 ODWDA and, 1137
 school prayer amendment and, 357
Hylton v. United States, 274
 Ellsworth Court and, 492
 Hypnosis, confessions and, 919

I

I, A Woman, 212
 I Am movement, 1476
 “I Have a Dream” (King), 890
 nonviolent protest and, 959
 “I Need a Haircut” (Markie), 764
 ICCPR. See International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights
 Ice-T, 764
 ICMCA. See Illinois Citizens for the Medical Control of Abortion
 ICRA. See Indian Civil Rights Act Idaho
 Alien Land Law in, 1107
 voting in, 1729–1730
Idaho v. Wright, 344
 IDC. See Intelligent Design Creationism
 IDEA. See Individuals with Disabilities Education Act
 Identity registration, 1222
 Identity theft, 1222
 Ideology, exclusion and, 789–792
 IFIDA. See International Film Importers & Distributors of America Ignorance, 510
 coerced confessions and, 940
 “Ignorance of the law,” 1260
 ILD. See Industrial Labor Defense
 Illegitimacy, immigration and, 792–793
 Illinois
 death row, 1393–1394
 Good Friday and, 398–399
 privacy and, 1531
 religious education in, 1292
 Sparks-El v. Finley in, 1307
 undocumented migrants and, 1675
 Illinois Bar Association, 694
 Illinois Citizens for the Medical Control of Abortion (ICMCA), 1061
Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education, 618
Illinois Law Review, 693
 Illinois National Guard
 Presser v. Illinois and, 722, 1342, 1344
 Illinois Sexually Dangerous Persons Act, 43
Illinois v. Allen, 777
Illinois v. Caballes, 882
Illinois v. Gates, 793, 1435
 probable cause and, 1235
Illinois v. Krull, 793–794, 1686
Illinois v. Perkins, 794

INDEX

- Illinois v. Wardlow*, 1445
 stops and, 1569
 Illuminati, 854
 IMFA. See Immigration and Marriage Fraud Amendments
 Immediatism, 4
 Immigrants. See also Alien(s); Noncitizens; Undocumented migrants categories, 427, 796
 diversity, 427
 illegal, 1433
 from Italy, 1395
 lynching and, 243
 Nineteenth Amendment and, 1727
 quotas for, 1069–1070
 Storey and, 1570
 Immigration. See also Deportation
 African Americans and, 1259
 after 9/11, 789, 1259
 Aliens Acts and, 37–38
 Asians and, 1259
 checkpoints and, 806, 1446
 Chinese Exclusion Act and, 259–260, 1259
 Communism and, 1377
 Congress and, 1259
 Diversity Immigrant Visa Program and, 426–427, 1259
 due process and, 40, 460–461
 eugenic sterilization and, 546
 Europeans and, 1259
 family unity for noncitizens and, 576
 Fiallo v. Bell and, 585
 homosexuality and, 773
 illegitimacy and, 792–793
 IMFA and, 795
 Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha
 and, 797
 INA and, 983
 Kentucky Resolves and, 887–888
 from Latin America, 1259
 marriage and, 964–965
 Mexicans and, 1259
 NAACP and, 1259
 plenary power doctrine and, 893
 Plyler v. Doe and, 1182
 Quota and National Origin Act of 1921 on, 426
 Quota and National Origin Act of 1924 on, 426, 1259
 quotas, 796
 racial discrimination and, 1258–1260
 In re Griffiths and, 812
 regulation of, 1529–1531
 sex and, 1465–1466
 United States v. Balsys and, 1680
 U.S. Constitution and, 353
 USA PATRIOT Act and, 789–790
 Virginia Resolves and, 887–888
 Visa Waiver Program on, 1259
 World War II and, 1800
 Immigration Act of 1875, 1258–1259
 Immigration Act of 1917, 1280, 1282
 Immigration Act of 1918
 Palmer and, 1144
 Immigration Act of 1924, 1069
 eugenic sterilization and, 546
 Immigration Act of 1990, 426
 impact of, 427
 Immigration and Marriage Fraud Amendments
 (IMFA), 795
 Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965 (INA), 426, 983 Amendments of 1965, 795–797
 citizenship and, 1669
 denaturalization and, 413
 Diversity Immigrant Visa Program and, 426 exclusion provision of, 893
 family unity for noncitizens and, 576
 Kleindienst v. Mandel and, 893
 racial profiling and, 791
 Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS), 415
Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Cardoza-Fonseca, 88
Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha, 797
Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Elias-Zacharias, 89
Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Lopez-Mendoza, 798
 Immigration law
 Congress and, 40–41
 Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 (IRCA), 427
 Imminent danger, 782
 Imminent harm, 1510, 1511
 Imminent threat doctrine, 1051
 Immortal Seven, 690
 Immunity. See also Official immunity doctrine; Privileges and immunities of Congress, 916 derivative use, 1454
 due process and, 459–460
 federal sovereign, 868 under FTCA, 868
 from punishment, 1694
 transactional, 668, 706, 1453, 1454
 United States v. Tateo and, 1694
 use/derivative use, 668
 Impartial decisionmaker, 798–800
 Impartiality, 798–800, 860. See also Judicial bias challenges for cause and, 873
 voire dire and, 873
 Impeachment of Clinton, B., 1288
 of defendants, 1683
 exception, 556
 Nixon, R. and, 1099–1100
Impending Crisis of the South, The: How to Meet It (Helper), 759, 1485
 Imperialism
 American, 1571
 Bryan and, 189
 Implied consent theory
 DWI and, 470
 marital rape and, 960–961
 Implied rights, 801–802
 Implied trust doctrine, 862
 Watson v. Jones and, 1768
 Impoundment, 1447
 Improved Intelligence, 1149
 In favorem vitae, 234
 “In God We Trust,” 1066–1068
 coercion and, 1101
 no endorsement test and, 1104
In Harm’s Way (Dworkin & MacKinnon), 941
In re Adoption of A.W., J.W., and M.R. Minors, 1408
In re Baby Boy C., 280
In re Bate and O’Steen, 114
In re C.B.
 jury trials and, 990

- In re Debs*, 400
- In re DoubleClick, Inc. Privacy Litigation*, 801
- In re F.B.*, 1086
- In re Gault*, 282, 812, 1351
 - Fortas and, 604
 - In re Winship* and, 813
- In re Grand Jury Proceedings*, 707
- In re Griffiths*, 812
- In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases*, 1095
- In re Guardianship of Sharon Kowalski*, 1407
- In re Isserman*, 414
- In re Kemmler*, 223, 485
 - execution methods and, 236
 - Fuller Court and, 667
- In re May 1991 Will County Grand Jury Subpoena*, 1532
- In re Oliver*, 407
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803
- In re Quinlan*, 888
- In re Ross*, 342
- In re State of Alabama ex rel. James v. ACLU of Alabama*, 343
- In re Toboso-Alfonso*, 773
- In re Turner*, 272
- In re Washington Post Co.*, 1428
- In re Winship*, 282, 813, 1240, 1410
 - burden of proof and, 196
 - Jackson v. Virginia* and, 832
 - Leland v. Oregon* and, 917
 - Mullaney v. Wilbur* and, 1046
- In re Yamashita*, 1562, 1801
 - military tribunals and, 1008
- In seriatim opinions
 - Ellsworth Court and, 492
- In The Matter of Karen Quinlan*, 1254
- In vitro fertilization (IVF), 313
 - stem cell research and, 1552
- INA. See Immigration and Nationality Act
- “Inaugural Address at St. Andrews” (Mill), 1011
- Incarceration
 - arrest and, 80
 - civil death and, 297
 - debt collection and, 401
 - GBMI and, 717
 - of Miranda, 1021
 - Orozco v. Texas* and, 1138
 - reasonable promptness and, 1018
- Incest
 - abortion and, 951
 - Bible and, 130
 - Doe v. Bolton* and, 1320, 1324
 - Hamurabi and, 1492
 - sexual orientation and, 1223
 - as victimless crime, 1709
- Inchoate crimes, 1420
- Incitement of criminal activity, 651–655
 - Brandenburg* test and, 659
- Incitement test, 401
 - group libel and, 715
 - Hand and, 653, 737
 - national security and, 1071
- Incompetence, of government, 1644
- Incompetence to stand trial
 - capital punishment and, 237
- Incorporation doctrine, 73–74, 802–804, 1535, 1536. See also
 - Fourteenth Amendment
 - Douglas and, 444
 - due process and, 1232
 - Frankfurter and, 620
 - free speech and, 804
 - Harlan, I, and, 739
 - Harlan, II, and, 742
 - Hughes and, 784
 - Marshall, T., and, 973–974
 - McReynolds and, 993
 - Meese and, 997
 - privileges and immunities and, 1232
 - Rabe v. Washington* and, 803
 - selective, 618
 - selective incorporation and, 1153
 - selective v. total, 176
 - Sunday closing laws and, 1586
- Increased Information Sharing for Critical Infrastructure Protection, 1149
- Indecency
 - broadcasters and, 651
 - CDA and, 336–337
 - FCC v. Pacifica Foundation* and, 579
 - NEA and, 700–701
 - public, 111
- Independent contractors, 1515
- Independent counsel, 1417
- India, colonial, 1330
- Indian Affairs Committee, 901
- Indian Appropriation Act, 1253
- Indian Bill of Rights, 806–809
- Indian Civil Rights Act (ICRA), 806–809, 1258, 1411
- Indian Removal, 833
- Indian Rights Association, 1253
- Indiana
 - Davis v. Bandemer* in, 1277, 1278
 - Good Friday and, 398–399
- Indiana Law Journal*, 258
- Indiana University, 615
- Indians. See Native Americans
- Indictments
 - in colonial America, 705
 - function of, 708
 - grand jury, 703, 705–708
 - Hurtado v. California* and, 787
- Indifferentism, 1049
- Indigenous population. See Native Americans
- Indigents. See also Vagrancy
 - abortion and, 115, 951
 - appeals costs and, 710–711
 - Edwards v. California* and, 482
 - Gideon v. Wainwright* and, 682–683
 - habeas corpus and, 886
 - ineffective assistance of counsel and, 811
 - mental illness and, 1001
 - Powell v. Alabama* and, 1192
 - right to counsel of, 125
 - transport of, 482
- Indirect deductions, 900
- Individual freedom. See Personal freedom
- Individual rights
 - cocentric circles of, 446
 - Douglas and, 446
 - negligence standard and, 403
 - Supreme Court and, 1535–1536

INDEX

- Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA), 1527
 - Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District* and, 1816
- Industrial Labor Defense (ILD), 1427
- Industrial revolution, 1639
- Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), 68, 175
 - destruction of, 566
- Industrialization, 964–965
- Inevitable discovery, 1097
- Informants
 - coercion and, 794
 - hearsay evidence and, 757
 - Hoffa v. United States* and, 769
 - Illinois v. Gates* and, 793
 - jailhouse, 838
 - probable cause and, 793
- Information
 - freedom of expression and, 1159
 - media access to, 993–994
 - privacy and, 1225
- Informed consent, 389
- Infrared monitoring, 488
- Infringement
 - contributory, 823
 - copyright, 822, 1001
 - encryption and, 823
 - vicarious, 823
- Ingraham v. Wright*, 1195
- Inhabitants of Wilbraham v. Hampden County Commissioners*, 799
- Inherit the Wind* (film), 395
- Inherit the Wind* (play), 1426
- Inheritance
 - matrilineal, 963
 - same-sex adoption and, 1398
 - same-sex marriage and, 1401
- Initiatives, 1540
- Injunctions
 - City of Los Angeles v. Lyons* and, 935
 - Near v. Minnesota* and, 1081
 - prior restraints and, 1210–1213
 - privacy and, 1218
- Injunctions to Ensure Fair Trials, Protect Functioning of Governmental Offices, & Guard Privacy* (Snepp), 1212
- Innocence
 - capital punishment and, 237–238
 - conviction and, 1679
 - DNA and, 432
 - DNA testing and, 428–429
 - plea bargaining and, 719
- Innocence Project, 237, 428
- Innocence Protection Act, 428
- Innocent owner, 213
 - United States v. 92 Buena Vista Avenue* and, 1678
- Inouye, Daniel, 501
- INS. See Immigration and Naturalization Service
- INS v. Cardoza-Fonseca*, 88
- INS v. Delgado*, 1444
- INS v. Elias-Zacharias*, 89
- INS v. Lopez-Mendoza*, 1696
- Insanity
 - capital punishment and, 386
 - Colorado v. Connelly* and, 328–329
- Insanity defense, 813–815
 - Burks v. United States* and, 207–208
 - capital punishment and, 386
 - Colorado v. Connelly* and, 328–329
 - GBMI and, 717–718
 - irresistible impulse test and, 814
 - Leland v. Oregon* and, 917
 - mental illness and, 1000–1001
 - M’Naghten test and, 814
- Insiders, JBS and, 854
- Inspections, without search warrants, 217
- Instant messaging, 825
- Institute for Legislative Affairs, 1070
- Institutes* (Coke), 437
- Institutional identity, 121
- Insufficiency claims, 831
- Insular Cases*, 1607
 - Fuller Court and, 668
 - Harlan, I. and, 740
- Insults, 303
- Insurance. See also Health insurance
 - PAS and, 1165
- Intellectual individualism, 601
- Intellectual property
 - anonymity and, 62
 - backup copies of, 822
 - Church of Scientology and, 366–367
 - fair use of, 822
 - First Amendment and, 816–817
 - Internet and, 822–824
 - trademarks and, 823–824
 - Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co.* and, 1812
- Intelligence, 257–258
- Intelligence Community of the United States, 257
- Intelligence Identities Protection Act, 817
- Intelligence Project of Southern Poverty Law Center, 1500
- Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004, 1053
 - USA PATRIOT Act and, 1149
- Intelligent design, 377–379, 1617. See also Creationism
 - secular humanism and, 1438
- Intelligent Design Creationism (IDC), 377–379
- Interaction of Biblical Religion and American Constitutional Law, The* (Gaffney), 128
- Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, 640
- Inter-American Court of Human Rights
 - freedom of expression and, 638
 - Rodríguez and, 640
- Interception orders, 1786
- Intercourse* (Dworkin), 470–471
- Intercredal cooperation, 1049
- Interdiction
 - Cuban, 390
 - slavery and, 390
- Intermediate scrutiny test, 449
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 612–613
 - free speech and, 818
- Internal Revenue Code, 761
- Internal Revenue Service (IRS). See also Tax(es)
 - Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet* and, 158
 - Christian Coalition and, 285–286
 - Church of Scientology and, 287, 761–762
 - drugs and, 1741
 - Fisher v. United States* and, 589
 - gambling and, 960
 - gay marriages and, 1401
 - Jackson, R. and, 833
 - Mathis v. United States* and, 981–982

- Narcotics Division of, 1742
- Nixon, R. and, 1099
- International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, 1300
- International Committee of the Red Cross. See Red Cross
- International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, 522
- International Council of Christian Churches, 118
- International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), 1639
 - chain gangs and, 263
 - data privacy and, 1223
 - double jeopardy and, 440
 - freedom of expression and, 637–638
 - Universal Declaration of Human Rights and, 637–638
- International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 1639
- International Criminal Court, 59
- International Film Importers & Distributors of America (IFIDA), 1042
- International Information Agency, 984
- International League for the Rights of Man, 105
- International Order of B'nai B'rith. See B'nai B'rith
- International Planned Parenthood Federation, 1411
- International Society of Krishna Consciousness, Inc. v. Lee*, 417
 - public forum doctrines and, 1243
- International Woman Suffrage Alliance (IWSA), 256
- International Workers of the World (IWW)
 - free speech and, 1794–1795
 - Masses Publishing Company v. Patten* and, 979
- Internet
 - access, 821–822, 825
 - advertising and, 819–820
 - anonymity and, 62
 - balancing and, 99
 - CDA and, 336–337, 819, 1316–1318
 - Christian Coalition and, 285
 - civil liberties and, 818–822
 - cookies, 821
 - COPA and, 819, 1318
 - copyrights and, 211–212
 - data privacy and, 1222
 - DHS and, 416
 - fair use doctrine and, 572
 - filtering, 824–826
 - First Amendment and, 660, 819, 1315, 1316
 - freedom of press and, 662
 - government funding of speech and, 701
 - hate speech and, 819–820
 - indecentcy on, 1557
 - intellectual property and, 822–824
 - National Cable & Telecommunications Association v. Brand X Internet* and, 580
 - obscenity and, 1120
 - pornography, 304, 819, 1701
 - PPA and, 1224
 - pranks, 45
 - privacy and, 820–821
 - Red Lion Broadcasting Co., Inc. v. FCC* and, 1279
 - Reno v. ACLU* and, 663, 1316–1317
 - sexual expression and, 660
 - tracing, 63
 - Urofsky v. Gillmore* and, 1700–1701
 - wiretapping and, 1785
- Internet service providers (ISPs)
 - DHS and, 416
 - DMCA and, 822
 - Internet tracing and, 63
 - safe harbors, 823
- Internment, 496. See also Japanese internment
- Interposition doctrine, 946
- Interpretation cessant in claris, 1618
- Interracial couples. See also Miscegenation laws
 - Bob Jones University and, 159
 - cohabitation and, 991
- Interrogations
 - coerced confessions and, 1455
 - coercion and, 1005–1006
 - deceit and, 320
 - detentions and, 316
 - Dickerson v. United States* and, 419
 - exclusionary rule and, 557–558
 - false confessions and, 574
 - Fifth Amendment and, 992
 - history of, 1017
 - length of, 319
 - Michigan v. Mosley* and, 1005–1006
 - Miranda rights and, 318
 - Miranda v. Arizona* and, 747–748, 1016, 1331, 1332, 1345, 1348, 1351
 - Monroe v. Pape* and, 1030
 - permissible coercion and, 318–319
 - police, 314–321
 - of prisoners, 981–982
 - probable cause and, 952
 - promises and, 319
 - Spano v. New York* and, 1504
 - undercover police and, 747–748
 - wiretapping and, 980–981
- Interrogators
 - deceit and, 320
 - number of, 319
- Interstate commerce, 826–827. See also Commerce
 - federalization of criminal law and, 581
 - La Follette and, 902
 - NLRB and, 1066
 - Taft Court and, 1595
 - white slavery and, 955
- Interstate Commerce Act
 - Henderson v. United States* and, 208
 - segregation and, 1443
- Interstate Commerce Commission
 - Baltimore & Ohio Railroad v. United States* and, 604
 - economic regulation and, 473
 - Mitchell v. United States* and, 782
 - White Court and, 1777
- Intimidation
 - coerced confessions and, 1455
 - cross burning and, 383
 - hate speech and, 754–755
 - jury, 772
 - statutes, 750
- Intolerable Acts
 - Chase and, 273
 - Franklin and, 621
 - Mason and, 977
- Intolerance, of government, 1644
- Intoxication defense, 814
- Intrusion, 827–828
 - abortion and, 836
 - Minnesota v. Olson* and, 1015

INDEX

- Intrusion (cont.)
 - sodomy and, 836
 - thermal imaging and, 900
- Invalid Pensioners Act, 844
- Inventory search, 1431
- Investigative stops. See Stops
- Invidious prejudice, 830
 - in jury selection, 873
- Inviolate personality, 1590
- Invisible Empire. See Ku Klux Klan
- Involuntary commitment, 43
- Involuntary servitude, 1649
- Inward looking, 1225
- Iowa State Agricultural College, 256
- Iowa Woman Suffrage Association, 256
- Iraq invasion of 2003
 - Abu Ghraib and, 15
 - Ashcroft and, 85
 - U.S. Constitution and, 355
- Iraqi insurgency, 16
- IRCA. See Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986
- Iredell, James, 141, 1315
 - Bill of Rights and, 1325
 - in Calder v. Bull, 212–213
 - Ellsworth Court and, 491
 - Jay Court and, 843
- Ireland, 36
- Irish Republican Army (IRA)
 - extradition and, 563
- Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston (GLIB), 786
- Irish-Protestant riots, 1286
- Irons, Peter, 839
 - DeWitt and, 841
- Irresistible impulse test, 814
- IRS. See Internal Revenue Service
- Islam, 1053
 - Department of Defense and, 268
 - Kunstler and, 899
 - Nation of, 70
 - Title VII and, 1660
- Islamic Jihad, 1625
- ISPs. See Internet service providers
- Israel
 - ADL and, 70
 - same-sex unions in, 1404
- Istook, Ernest, 357
- Iva Ikuko Toguri D'Aquino v. United States*
 - treason and, 1666
- "I've Been to the Mountaintop" (King), 890
- Ives, Irving, 695
- Ives v. South Buffalo Railway Co.*, 1581
- IVF. See In vitro fertilization
- IWSA. See International Woman Suffrage Alliance
- IWW. See Industrial Workers of the World
- Marshall, J., and, 970
- Mormons and, 1037
- Jackson, Howell E., 992
- Jackson, Robert H., 833–835, 1286, 1287, 1565, 1800
 - appointment of, 134
 - Dennis v. United States* and, 415
 - Everson v. Board of Education* and, 550
 - executive power and, 835
 - free speech and, 834–835
 - Harisiades v. Shaughnessy* and, 737–738
 - Harlan, II, and, 741
 - Korematsu v. United States* and, 839
 - Minersville School District v. Gobitis* and, 594
 - Murphy and, 1047–1048
 - New Deal and, 1083, 1085
 - Nuremburg War Tribunal and, 1718
 - religious freedom and, 1028
 - Stein v. State* and, 317
 - Vinson Court and, 1718
 - West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette* and, 222, 594–595, 656, 782, 849, 1630, 1775
 - Youngston Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer* and, 495
 - Zorach v. Clauson* and, 1822
- Jackson v. Denno*, 831
 - Crane v. Kentucky* and, 375
- Jackson v. Indiana*, 831–832
- Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Company*
 - state action limitation and, 606
- Jackson v. Virginia*, 832
- Jacobellis v. Ohio*, 835–836, 1560
 - A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure"* v. Massachusetts and, 1–2
 - obscenity and, 1118, 1123
 - Pope v. Illinois* and, 1191
 - Stewart, P., and, 1118
- Jacobinism
 - decline of, 39
 - Federalists and, 36
- Jacobs, James, 722
- Jacobson, Henning, 836
- Jacobson v. Massachusetts*, 86, 836–837
 - compulsory vaccination and, 341
 - Holmes and, 772
- Jacobson v. United States*, 837
 - entrapment and, 509
- Jamaica, 1262
- James, Daniel, 156
- James I, king of England, 505, 1648
 - establishment of, 621
 - Puritanism and, 621
 - Virginia Charter of 1606 and, 1722–1723
- James II, king of England, 1667
 - English Bill of Rights and, 503
 - English liberties and, 507
 - Glorious Revolution and, 690
- James v. Illinois*, 556
- James, William, 735
- Jamestown, 238
- Jamison, Ella, 838
- Jamison v. Texas*, 838
- Japan, 1269
- Japanese
 - ACLU and, 49
 - exclusion of, 260
 - land ownership by, 1107

- Vinson Court and, 1720
- Japanese American Citizens League, 840
- Japanese American Evacuation Claims Act, 840–841
- Japanese Americans
 - ACLU and, 49
 - DeWitt and, 418
 - exclusion of, 260
 - internment of, 839, 1636
 - New Deal and, 1085
 - relocation of, 1562–1563
 - restrictive covenants and, 1325
 - Stone and, 1565
 - Stone Court and, 1562
 - Warren and, 1762
 - World War II and, 791, 1800
- Japanese Immigrant Case. See Yamataya v. Fisher*
- Japanese internment, 49, 260, 1636
 - Baldwin and, 104
 - Biddle and, 134
 - cases, 839–843
 - DeWitt and, 417–418
 - Douglas and, 445
 - emergency powers and, 495–496
 - government misconduct in, 841–842
 - habeas corpus suspension and, 352
 - Hoover and, 775
 - impact of, 842–843
 - Jackson, R. on, 835
 - Korematsu v. United States* and, 839–840, 1365, 1366, 1374, 1390
 - Murphy and, 1048
 - racial profiling and, 791
 - reaction to, 840–841
 - Reagan and, 1374
 - reparations for, 841–842
 - Roosevelt, F., and, 418, 839, 1372, 1373–1374
 - suspect categories and, 518
- Javits, Jacob, 306
- Jay Court, 491, 843–844
- Jay, John, 96, 491, 843–844
 - Federalist, The* and, 944
- Jayawickrama, Nihal, 640
- Jaycees
 - Roberts v. United States Jaycees* and, 304, 1363–1364, 1382
 - women and, 304, 1382
- Jay's Treaty, 36, 95–96
 - classified information and, 310
 - Ellsworth Court and, 491
- JB Pictures Inc. v. Department of Defense*, 995–996
- JBS. See John Birch Society
- JCAH. See Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals
- J.E.B. v. Alabama ex. rel. T.B.*, 115
 - middle scrutiny test and, 613
- Jefferson, Mildred, 1134
- Jefferson, Thomas, 844–848, 1441, 1792
 - Alien and Sedition Acts and, 40
 - atheism and, 90
 - Bank of the United States, 732
 - Baptists and, 119
 - belief-action and, 119, 627
 - Biblical law and, 127
 - bill of attainder and, 134–135
 - Bill of Rights and, 1632
 - capital punishment and, 239
 - clergy in public office and, 921
 - Declaration of Independence and, 402, 1339
 - disestablishment movement and, 425
 - Douglas and, 443
 - education and, 1525
 - Enlightenment and, 1026
 - equal protection and, 514
 - establishment clause and, 531
 - Franklin and, 621
 - free speech law and, 815
 - freedom of press and, 1206–1207
 - Hamilton and, 733
 - Judiciary Act of 1801 and, 274
 - Kentucky and Virginia Resolves and, 887
 - Locke and, 930
 - Madison and, 944
 - Marbury v. Madison* and, 958
 - Marshall Court and, 968
 - Mason and, 978
 - McCulloch v. Maryland* and, 988
 - Ninth Amendment and, 1095–1096
 - noncitizens and, 1105–1106
 - People v. Croswell* and, 733
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
 - Republicans and, 36
 - Rush and, 847
 - Sedition Act and, 38, 39–40, 492, 647
 - separationism and, 90, 132, 766, 1309
 - slavery and, 138
 - Thanksgiving and, 532
 - trusts and, 634
 - unalienable rights in, 135
 - Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723–1724
 - Virginia Statute of Religious Freedom and, 526, 550, 623, 1331
 - wall of separation and, 1735
 - Williams, R. and, 1782
 - Zorach v. Clauson* and, 1822
- Jeffreys, Alec, 430
- Jehovah's Witnesses, 119
 - ACLU and, 48
 - attacks on, 593
 - beliefs of, 848
 - Cantwell v. Connecticut* and, 222, 627, 1364
 - children of, 1283
 - Covington and, 372
 - Cox v. New Hampshire* and, 373–374
 - draft and, 1048, 1474, 1802
 - First Amendment and, 1542
 - flag saluting and, 591–596, 1028, 1565, 1630
 - Follett v. Town of McCormick* and, 599–600
 - forced speech and, 600
 - Frankfurter and, 619
 - Jamison v. Texas* and, 838
 - Marsh v. Alabama*, 340
 - Minersville School District v. Gogitis* and, 591–593, 848, 1365, 1366, 1775
 - Nazis and, 591
 - Pledge of Allegiance and, 1177
 - Prince v. Massachusetts* and, 1208
 - religious freedom and, 848–850
 - Stone and, 1566
 - Stone Court and, 1561
 - taxation and, 1388, 1389
 - Thomas v. Review Board* and, 1477
 - Vinson and, 1722
 - Vinson Court and, 1720

INDEX

- Jehovah's Witnesses (cont.)
 West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette and, 593–596, 1775
- Jenkes, Frances, 726
- Jenkins v. Georgia*, 850–851
 Miller test and, 1013
- Jennings, Peter
 on Kunstler, 307
 Prejean and, 1200
- Jersey City, 729
- Jersild v. Denmark*, 640
- Jesuits
 banning of, 126
 religious incorporation of, 291
- Jewish Christians, 1035–1036
- Jewish Holy Scriptures, 132
- Jews. See also Judaism
 City of Shreveport v. Levy and, 1311, 1312
 Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1314
 KKK and, 896, 1420
 Magna Carta and, 950
 Maryland Toleration Act and, 975
 in military, 698, 1007, 1303–1304
 Order No. 11 and, 709
 Orthodox, 851–852, 1304
 as prisoners, 1214
 religious freedom and, 851–853, 1305–1306, 1310
 religious tests for office holding and, 1314
 restrictive covenants and, 1325
 Storey and, 1570
 on Supreme Court, 853
 U.S. Constitution and, 352
- Jim Crow laws, 71, 302, 1442, 1571
 Civil Rights Cases and, 301
 equal protection and, 515
 marches against, 958
 Plessy v. Ferguson and, 1181
 privileges and immunities clause and, 606–607
 race-based classifications and, 611
 United States v. Cruikshank and, 1681–1682
 Voting Rights Act of 1965 and, 1729
- Jimeno, Enio, 597
- Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization of California*, 23, 853–854
- Jobs, drug testing for, 1479–1480
- Johanns v. Livestock Marketing Association*
 forced speech and, 602
- John Birch Society (JBS), 854
 Dies and, 420
- John, Elton, 765
- John I, king of England
 double jeopardy and, 437
 Magna Carta and, 357, 949–950
- John Paul II, Pope, 255, 1101
- John XXIII, Pope
 Murray and, 1050
- Johnson, Andrew
 Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
 Douglass and, 448
 impeachment of, 146
 Mormons and, 1038
 pardons and commutations and, 1145
- Johnson, Frank, 855
 Justice and, 879
- Johnson, Gregory, 590
- Johnson, Hiram W., 1761
- Johnson, Joey, 1516
- Johnson, Lyndon B., 856
 affirmative action and, 30
 campaign financing and, 219
 Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, 300
 Clark, R., and, 305
 Estes and, 544–545
 FOIA and, 641
 Fortas and, 603
 Goldberg and, 693, 696
 INA and, 796
 Justice and, 878
 King and, 890
 Marshall, T., and, 972
 Murray and, 1050
 New York v. Ferber and, 1091
 obscenity and, 1115
 Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 and, 1132
 reapportionment and, 1276–1277
 Voting Rights Act of 1965 and, 959, 1729
- Johnson, Richard M., 1588
- Johnson, Samuel, 138
- Johnson, Sheri Lynn, 128
- Johnson v. Gila River Indian Community*, 809
- Johnson v. Louisiana*, 743
- Johnson v. Robison*, 1304, 1305
- Johnson v. United States*, 679, 1433
- Johnson v. Zerbst*, 1350, 1351
- Johnson, William
 Jefferson and, 848
 in Satterlee v. Matthewson, 213
- Johnson-Reed Act. See Immigration Act of 1924
- Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals (JCAH), 433
- Joint Committee on Social Action, and Conservative Judaism, 852
- Joint participation test, 45
- Joint trials, 351
- Jokes
 hate speech v., 754
 hostile environment harassment and, 778
- Jones, Ashton, 59
- Jones II. See Jones v. Opelika
- Jones, Robert, 1137
- Jones, Russell & Laura, 1271
- Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co.*
 Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299 housing discrimination and, 1649
- Jones v. Georgia*, 872
- Jones v. Hallahan*, 1400
- Jones v. Opelika*, 593, 1390
 civil liberties and, 1634
 Follett v. Town of McCormick and, 599
 Frankfurter and, 619
 preferred position rule and, 1199
 Stone and, 1565
 Stone Court and, 1561
- Jones v. Van Zandt*, 1486–1487
 Taney Court and, 1607
- Jones v. Wolf*, 856–858
 establishment clause and, 537 neutral principles doctrine and, 863
 Watson v. Jones and, 1768
- Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson*, 858, 1042
- Mutual Film Corporation v. Industrial Commission of Ohio*
 and, 1055

- Joseph v. State*, 1307
- Journal of Church and State*, 397
- Journalists. See also Freedom of press; Reporter's privilege
- confidentiality and, 322
 - in court rooms, 662
 - FOIA and, 641
 - freedom of expression and, 640
 - information disclosure and, 1579
 - IRS and, 1099
 - in judicial proceedings, 662
 - libel and, 761
 - military operations and, 995
 - news-gathering torts and, 661
 - Pell v. Procunier* and, 1151
 - PPA and, 1223
 - press access and, 661
 - shield laws and, 1473
 - sources of, 859
 - subpoenas to, 1579
- Joyce, James, 48
- censorship and, 304
 - obscenity and, 659, 1116
 - United States v. One Book Entitled "Ulysses"* and, 1688–1689
- JSSA. See Jury Selection and Service Act
- Judaism. See also Jews
- Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet* and, 157
 - in colonial America, 622
 - Department of Defense and, 268
 - Goldman v. Weinberger* and, 629
 - Humane Slaughter Act and, 561
 - statutory religion-based exemptions and, 561
 - Ten Commandments and, 1622
 - Title VII and, 1660
 - U.S. Constitution and, 352
- Judges
- administrative law, 799
 - duty, 1434
 - impartial, 798–800
 - Model Code of Judicial Conduct and, 859
 - payment of, 798–799
- Judicial activism
- Hand on, 736
 - judicial review and, 865
 - Justice and, 878
 - Miranda warning and, 1017
 - Warren Court and, 1760
- Judicial bias, 859–860
- invidious discrimination and, 830
- Judicial Canon 35, 662
- Judicial Code, 867
- Judicial federalism, 1544–1545
- Judicial legislation, 1634
- Judicial proceedings
- cameras in, 218
 - discovery materials in, 421
 - God in, 860–861
 - journalists in, 662
 - media access to, 995
 - open, 995
- Judicial records, access to, 21
- Judicial restraint
- Frankfurter and, 617, 782
 - Hand and, 736–737
 - judicial review and, 865
 - Kennedy, A., and, 885
 - Nebbia v. New York* and, 1081
- Judicial review, 863–866
- abroad, 865–866
 - access to, 926
 - Calder v. Bull* and, 213
 - Hayburn's Case* and, 844
 - history of, 863–865
 - Kennedy, A., and, 884
 - LSC and, 914
 - Marbury v. Madison* and, 958
 - Marshall Court and, 968
 - Marshall, J., and, 970
- Judicial rights, Bible and, 128
- Judiciary
- encroachment on, 864
 - independent, 289
- Judiciary Act of 1789
- bail and, 97
 - Barron v. Baltimore* and, 112
 - Ellsworth and, 491
 - Marbury v. Madison* and, 958
 - Marshall Court and, 968
 - writ of mandamus and, 864
- Judiciary Act of 1801, 274
- Jurek v. Texas*, 223, 241, 866
- cruel and unusual punishment in, 231–232
- Jurisdiction
- appellate, 866–867
 - concurrent, 1547
 - due process and, 460
 - of federal courts, 866–868
 - general federal question, 867
 - Marshall Court and, 968
 - of state courts, 1547
 - subject matter, 866
 - of Supreme Court, 868
- Jurisprudence
- Christian Nation and, 342–343
 - constitutional, 993
 - establishment clause doctrine and, 531–537
 - Meiklejohn and, 998
- Juries. See also Grand juries
- absolute disparity in, 872
 - Ballew v. Georgia* and, 105
 - bias of, 873
 - in capital cases, 710
 - capital punishment and, 240–241
 - capital sentencing and, 990
 - for civil trials, 359–360, 872
 - death-qualified, 932
 - deliberation of, 875
 - equal protection clause, 225
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 1726
 - gender and, 871
 - grand v. petit, 704, 706
 - hung, 875
 - impartial, 769
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803
 - instructions, 407
 - intimidation of, 772
 - mandatory death sentences and, 952–953
 - Penn and, 1781
 - petit, 703

INDEX

- Juries (cont.)
qualifications for, 872
race and, 114, 871, 877–878 representative, 769
right to, 139, 1417
selection of, 871–874, 876, 1539 sequestered, 632
size of, 743
source lists for, 871–872
Taylor v. Louisiana and, 1610 unanimity of, 73, 743, 875 underrepresentation in, 872
U.S. Constitution and, 352–353
voir dire and, 873 voluntary confessions and, 831
women in, 855
- Jury nullification, 644, 869–871
capital punishment and, 870, 990
jury trial right and, 876–877
mandatory death sentences and, 952
- Jury selection, 871–875
challenges for cause and, 873 composing the venire, 871–873 preemptory challenges for, 873–874
voir dire for, 873
- Jury Selection and Service Act (JSSA), 871
- Jury source lists, 871–872
- Jury trials, 875. See also Civil trials; Joint trials; Judicial proceedings; Trials access to, 20
adjudicating guilt and, 164
African Americans and, 877–878
bifurcated, 227, 231–232
bill of attainder v., 135
burden of proof and, 195–197
clothing and, 544
common law, 739 competency to stand, 831–832
extradition and, 563–564 jury nullification in, 869–871
juveniles and, 990
military, 551–552
multiple, 112–113, 122–123
overseas, 354–355
postponement of, 632
race and, 877–878
right to, 875–877
speedy, 76
state bills of rights and, 137–138
U.S. Constitution and, 352–353
venue of, 632
- Jury wheel, 872
- Just compensation, 1541 eminent domain and, 1604
- Just Say No, 1743
- Justice liberties and, 1272–1273 morality and, 1329
Rawls and, 1272–1273, 1274
- Justice Delayed: The Record of the Japanese American Internment Cases* (Irons, ed.), 839
- Justice Department. See Department of Justice
- Justice, William Wayne, 878–879
- Justice Without Trial* (Skolnick), 1236
- Justiciability, 596
- Juvenile(s). See also Children; Delinquency; Minors adjudications and, 396
African American, 1258
capital punishment and, 224, 885
due process and, 990
First Amendment and, 604
Fortas and, 604
Hispanic, 1258
incarceration
jury trials and, 990
obscenity and, 1119, 1123
O'Connor and, 1127
pretrial detentions of, 1419
proportionality review and, 1242
protection of, 1248
public trials and, 1248
In re Gault and, 812, 1351
In re Winship and, 813
records of, 812 rights for, 604
separation of, 1550
status offenses and, 813, 1549–1550 tried as adults, 990
Warren Court and, 1758
- Juvenile Courts and Probation* (Baldwin and Flexner), 102
- Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974, 1550
- Juvenile Justice Project of Louisiana, 1499
- Juvenile justice system
race and, 1258
In re Gault and, 812, 1350–1351
In re Winship and, 813
- J. W. Hampton, Jr., & Co. v. United States*, 1024

K

- Kaleidoscope*, 894
- Kalven, Harry, Jr.
heckling and, 758
on Stromberg v. California, 784
- Kaminski, John P., 55
- Kamisar, Yale, 881
- Kandyland, 523
- Kanka, Megan, 997
- Kansas, Alien Land Law in, 1107
- Kansas State Board of Education, 378
- Kansas Supreme Court, 58
- Kansas v. Garber*, 58
- Kansas v. Hendricks*
Breyer and, 183
ex post facto laws and, 554
indefinite detention and, 804
mental illness and, 1001
- Kant, Immanuel, 1329, 1645
Meiklejohn and, 999
- Karcher v. Daggett*, 1277, 1279
- Karok Indians, 939
- Kashian v. Harriman*, 1481
- Kaskel, Cesar, 709
- Kassas, Mahmoud, 1143
- Kastigar v. United States*, 1454
use/derivative use immunity and, 668
- Katcoff v. Marsh*, 268–269
- Kate, The*, 342
- Katz, Charles, 882

- Katz v. United States*, 881–882, 1430, 1433, 1519
Florida v. Riley and, 597
Mincey v. Arizona and, 1014
Olmstead v. United States and, 1130, 1602
privacy and, 1220, 1682
United States v. United States District Court
and, 1696
wiretapping and, 1786
- Katzenbach v. McClung*
Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, 300
racial discrimination and, 827
- Katzenbach v. Morgan*, 613
- Kaufman, Irving Robert, 883, 1377, 1378
- KaZaA, 823
- Keating-Own Child Labor Act, 1777
- Kedroff v. St. Nicholas Cathedral*, 862
- Keefe v. Geanakos*, 1613
- Keenan, Nancy, 1062
- Kefauver, Estes, 694–695
- Kelleher v. Minshull*, 1531
- Keller v. State Bar of California*, 1700
- Kelley, Dean, 118
- Kelly, “Machine Gun,” 774
- Kelo v. City of New London*, 1557
- Kelsen, Hans, 865
- Kemp, Edward
Murphy and, 1047, 1048–1049
- Ken, Thomas, 1667
- Kendall, Amos, 6, 883–884, 1485
- Kennard, Clyde, 548–549
- Kennedy, Anthony M., 884–886
appointment of, 10
Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition and, 83–84
Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet
and, 157
Bowers v. Hardwick and, 1222
child pornography and, 660
Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah
and, 289
City of Boerne, Texas v. Flores and, 160
coercion and, 1102
coercion test and, 540
County of Allegheny v. ACLU and, 42, 529, 1313, 1314
Harmelin v. Michigan and, 384
Hill v. Colorado and, 13
Lawrence v. Texas and, 908, 909, 1328
Lee v. Weisman and, 911
Lemon test and, 534
no-coercion test and, 535, 768
nomination of, 884
non-preferentialism standard and, 1110
O’Connor and, 1126
Osborne v. Ohio and, 1138
police power and, 1186
Power v. Ohio and, 878
proportional punishment and, 1241
Romer v. Evans and, 1222
Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia
and, 1379–1380
on same-sex adoption, 678
same-sex marriage and, 1400
sexual orientation and, 1222
sexually explicit materials and, 1120
Solem v. Helm and, 1654
Stenberg v. Carhart and, 1322
- Turner Broadcasting System v. Federal Communications Commission* and, 1669
Virginia v. Black and, 1724–1725
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services and, 1770
- Kennedy, Edward
Breyer and, 183
Dees and, 1503
FACE Act and, 633
- Kennedy, John F.
affirmative action and, 30
assassination of, 720
Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, 300
Clark, R., and, 305
Connor and, 348
Estes and, 545
freedom rides and, 959
Freund and, 664–665
Goldberg and, 693, 695–696
immigration and, 1070
Johnson, L., and, 856
Marshall, T., and, 972
Meiklejohn and, 1000
Murray and, 1050
Nixon, R. and, 1098
NRA and, 1070
reapportionment and, 1276
White, B., and, 1779
- Kennedy, John Stewart, 288
- Kennedy, Randall, 1623
- Kennedy, Robert, 1779
assassination of, 720
Chicago Seven and, 278
Hoover and, 776
- Kennedy School of Government, 182
- Kennedy v. Meacham*, 291
- Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez*, 730
- Kent, James, 769–770, 1572
Gardner v. Village of Newburgh and, 477
People v. Freer and, 733
takings clause and, 1603
- Kent v. Dulles*, 886–887
Haig v. Agee and, 730
right to travel and, 801
- Kent v. United States*, 812
- Kentucky
expulsion of Jews in, 709
Good Friday and, 398–399
pardons and commutations and, 1146
slavery and, 1647
Stone v. Graham and, 1563
- Kentucky and Virginia Resolutions, 38
- Kentucky Habitual Criminal Act, 165
- Kentucky Resolutions, 646, 846, 887–888
federalization of criminal law and, 581
Madison and, 945–946
- Kenya, 972
- Ker v. Illinois*
Frisbie v. Collins and, 665
- Ker-Frisbie rule, 665–666
- Kessler v. Strecker*
Butler and, 209
- Kevorkian, Jack, 547, 888–889, 1165
- Key, Francis Scott, 1486
“In God We Trust” and, 1066
- Key man systems, 872

INDEX

- Keyes v. School District No. 1, Denver*
equal protection and, 517
- Keyhole* (magazine), 1117
- Keyishian v. Board of Regents*, 17–18, 163, 1514, 1613
- Elrod v. Burns* and, 492
- freedom of association and, 635–636
- loyalty oaths and, 1612
- teachers and, 1611
- Keynes, John Maynard, 545–546
- Kidd, Thomas I, 394
- Kidnapping
personal liberty laws and, 1154
- slavery and, 1572
- King Arts Theatre, 1706–1707
- King, Beverly, 1501
- King James Bible, 1621
- King, Martin Luther, Jr., 889–891, 1069, 1443, 1500
- assassination of, 720, 890, 959
- Bible and, 127
- Chavez and, 274
- Chicago Seven and, 278
- civil rights laws and, 302
- COINTELPRO and, 1518
- Connor and, 348
- Garrison and, 676
- Hoover and, 776
- injunctions and, 1210
- Kunstler and, 898
- marches and, 958–959
- New York Times Co. v. Sullivan* and, 330, 403
- nonviolence and, 412
- NRA and, 1070
- RICO and, 1335
- Son of Sam Law and, 361
- wiretapping of, 306, 776
- King, powers of, 126
- King, Rodney, 154, 1184
- race and, 878
- separate prosecutions and, 441
- King, The v. Perkins*, 438
- King, The v. Read*, 437
- King v. Smith*, 692
- King's Bench, 1748
- Kingsley Books v. Brown*, 1211
- Kingsley International Pictures Corporation v. Regents of the University of New York*, 891–892, 1042
- Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson* and, 858
- “Kinsey Reports,” 1405
- Kirby v. Illinois*, 892, 1679
- right to counsel and, 1697
- Kirk v. Commonwealth*, 1491
- Kirkland v. Northside Independent School District*, 1613
- Kirtland Safety Society
Mormons and, 1036
- Kiryas Joel, 157–158
- Kissinger, Henry
New York Times v. United States and, 1089
- Nixon, R. and, 1098
- Kitchen Cabinet, 883
- Kitty Kat Lounge, 111
- Kitzmiller v. Dover Area School District*, 378–379
- KKK. See Ku Klux Klan
- Klanwatch, 1500
- Klein v. Commonwealth, State Employee's Retirement System*, 130
- Kleindienst v. Mandel*, 893, 1530
- due process and, 460
- INA and, 983
- Klopper v. North Carolina*, 893
- incorporation doctrine and, 803
- procedural due process and, 463
- Knauer v. United States*, 1801
- Knauff, Ellen, 461
- Knauff v. Shaughnessy*, 1467
- Knight, Goodwin
Chessman and, 278
- Warren and, 1762
- Knights of Labor, 400
- Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. See Ku Klux Klan
- Knoedler's Gallery, 342
- Knowles, James, 1501
- Know-Nothing Party, 1294
- Knox, Thomas, 1525
- Koenick v. Felton*, 398
- Kohane, Meir, 898
- Kohl v. United States*, 1603
- Kois v. Wisconsin*, 894
- Kolender v. Lawson*, 894
- Chicago v. Morales* and, 278–279
- Konigsberg v. State Bar of California*, 14, 895
- free speech and, 1641
- Warren Court and, 1753
- Kopel, David, 1187
- Korean War
military chaplains and, 268
- Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer* and, 495, 835
- Koreans, exclusion of, 260
- Korematsu, Fred, 496, 839–840
- Hamdi v. Rumsfeld* and, 842
- litigation of, 841–842
- Korematsu v. United States*, 49, 1635, 1766
- Baldwin and, 104
- Black, H., and, 518, 839, 1365, 1373
- Douglas and, 445, 1373
- emergency powers and, 495–496
- habeas corpus and, 1590
- impact of, 842–843
- Jackson, R. and, 835
- Japanese internment and, 839–840, 1365, 1373
- Murphy and, 1048
- profiling and, 1623
- Roberts, O., and, 1364–1365
- Rutledge, W., and, 1390
- Stone and, 1565
- Stone Court and, 1562
- suspect categories and, 518
- Warren on, 936
- Koresh, David, 1317
- Branch Davidian Church, 1731
- Clark, R., and, 306
- Korwar, Arati, 220
- Kotch v. Board of River Port Pilot Commissioners*, 1391
- Kovacs v. Cooper*, 362
- Kowalski, Sharon, 1407
- KQED, Inc., 779
- Kramer, Hilton, 1051
- Kramer, Larry, 25
- Krar, William, 565
- Kreisky, Bruno, 639
- Kreshik v. St. Nicholas Cathedral*, 862

Ku Klux Klan (KKK), 895–898, 1502. See also Cross burning;
 United Klans of America; White supremacists
 ACLU and, 49
 ADL and, 69
Brandenburg v. Ohio and, 178, 1420
Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette and, 246–247, 1314
 Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
 clear and present danger test and, 312
 COINTELPRO and, 1518
 Connor and, 348
 cross burning and, 382–383
 Dawson and, 397
 endorsement test and, 938
 establishment clause and, 529
 extremist groups and, 564
 forced speech and, 601
 freedom of association and, 635
 hate crime laws and, 749
 hate speech and, 753–754
 heckler's veto and, 758
 Hoover and, 774
New York ex rel. Bryant v. Zimmerman and, 1087
Pierce v. Society of Sisters and, 634
 public forums and, 1229
 religious speech and, 1229
 Southern Poverty Law Center and, 1500
United States v. Cruikshank and, 1681–1682
 U.S. Constitution and, 353
 Warren Court and, 1753
 Ku Klux Klan Act. See Civil Rights Act of 1871
Kuhn v. City of Rolling Meadows, 371
 Kunstler, Michael, 898
 Kunstler, William M., 306–307, 898–899
 Chicago Seven and, 278
Kunz v. New York, 1722
 Kutcher, James, 1270
Kyles v. Whitley, 35, 235, 899
 Napue v. Illinois and, 1061
Kyllo v. United States, 899–900, 1430
 plain view and, 1171
 privacy and, 1220
 reasonable expectation of privacy and, 882
 Scalia and, 1417
 Stevens and, 1557

L

La Follette, Robert Marion, 901–904
La Follette's Weekly, 903
 Labor laws anti-child, 474
 Bakeshop Act and, 928
 Goldberg and, 694
 Rauh and, 1269
 Labor organizers, 1395, 1467
 New Deal and, 1083
 permits and, 1562
 Labor practices
 Nike and, 332
 Wal-Mart and, 331
 Labor unions
 Abood v. Detroit Board of Education and, 7
 ACLU and, 48
 Baldwin and, 103

Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Virginia ex. rel. Virginia State Bar and, 186
 campaign financing and, 218
 Chavez and, 274–275
 conspiracy and, 351
 CPUSA and, 337
 Darrow and, 394
 Debs and, 400
 forced speech and, 601–602
 freedom of association and, 634–635
 government and, 928
 hearsay evidence and, 757
 KKK and, 897
 mandatory fees for, 601–602
 National Labor Relations Act and, 51
 picketing and, 1169
 Rauh and, 1269, 1270
 self-incrimination and, 1453
 Taft-Hartley Act and, 1602
Laborem Exercens, On Human Work (John Paul II), 1101
 Labor-Management Relations Act of 1935, 1800
 Lader, Lawrence, 1061–1062, 1062
Ladue v. Gilleo, 363
Lady Chatterley's Lover
 Kingsley International Pictures Corporation v. Regents of the University of New York and, 891–892
 Lafayette, Marquis de, 846
 LaFollette, Robert M., 1083
 McCarthy and, 984
Laird v. Tatum, 445
 Laissez-faire, 1633
 Lake, John, 1667
 Lamar, Joseph R., 1777
 Lambda Legal Defense & Education Fund, 904, 1402
 Lawrence v. Texas and, 908–909
 same-sex marriage and, 1401
Lambert v. California, 905
Lambert v. Wicklund, 905–906
 Lambert, Virginia, 905
Lambeth v. Board of Commissioners, 1067
Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District,
 906–907, 1299
 ACLU and, 286
 Kennedy, A., and, 885–886
 public forums speech and, 1229
 religious organizations and, 699–700
 religious speech and, 1229
 viewpoint discrimination and, 1715
 Land ownership, by noncitizens, 1107–1108
 Land Tax Act of 1694, 691
 Land use variance, 1480
 Landlords, hostile environment harassment and, 778
 Lando, Barry, 760
Landon v. Plasencia, 461
 Landrum, Phillip, 695
 Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959, 1270
 Goldberg and, 695
Langan v. Vincent's Hospital, 1408 Languages
 education and, 801
 hate speech and, 752–755
 jury selection and, 874
 Meyer v. Nebraska and, 1002–1003
Lankford v. Idaho, 235

INDEX

- Lanzetta v. New Jersey*, 907
- LAPD. See Los Angeles Police Department
- Lariat, The*, 397
- Larkin v. Grendel's Den*, 530
- LaRocca v. Lane*, 1307
- LaRocca, Vincent, 1307
- LaRouche, Lyndon, 306
- Larson v. Valente*
 - coercion and, 1102
 - First Amendment and, 289
- Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue* and, 761
- Las Vegas, 306
- Lasky, Harold, 307
 - clear and present danger test and, 658
- Lassiter v. Department of Social Services*, 281
- Lassiter v. Northampton County Board of Elections*, 1559
- "Last Fearsome Taboo, The: Medical Aspects of Planned Death" (Kevorkian), 888
- Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. United States*, 72–73, 342, 397, 908, 1476
 - Fuller Court and, 668
- Latin America
 - immigration from, 1259
 - INA and, 797
- Latinos. See Hispanics
- Lattimore, Owen, 322
 - Fortas and, 603
- Law
 - bible and, 125–130
 - colonial, 126
 - common v. statutory, 335–336
 - constitutional v. biblical, 126
 - English common, 127
 - military, 1006–1007
 - of Moses, 126
- Law & Order*, 305
 - Kunstler and, 307
- Law enforcement, 80–81
 - criminal profiling and, 1236
 - Warren and, 317–318
- Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA), 1132
- Law of the land, 1580
- Law of Torts, The* (Cooley), 1591
- Lawless action, imminent, 762–763
- Lawrence and Garner v. Texas*, 1222
- Lawrence, John Geddes, 908
- Lawrence v. Texas*, 170, 436, 908–909, 1328, 1338, 1399–1400, 1405, 1408, 1416, 1461, 1493, 1533, 1583
 - Bowers v. Hardwick* and, 199
 - Breyer and, 183
 - Eisenstadt v. Baird* and, 484
 - family values movement and, 578
 - gay and lesbian rights and, 678, 1273, 1372
 - intrusion and, 836
 - Kennedy, A., and, 885, 1328
 - Lamda and, 904
 - Miller test and, 1013
 - O'Connor and, 1126
 - Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton* and, 1148
 - police power and, 1186
 - Romer v. Evans* and, 909, 1371
 - Scalia and, 1338, 1583
 - sodomy and, 1521
 - Souter and, 1497
 - Stevens and, 1558
 - substantive due process and, 466
- Laws
 - arbitrary, 464
 - content-based, 252
 - due process and, 464
 - neutral, 500
- Laws and Liberties of Massachusetts*, 55, 126
- Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, Of the* (Hooker, R.), 1735
- Lawson, Edward, 894
- Lawson v. Commonwealth*, 1490
- Lawton v. Steele*, 1185
- Lawyer's Journey: The Morris Dees Story, A* (Dees), 1503
- Lawyers. See Attorneys
- Laxalt, Paul, 306
- Laycock, Douglas
 - establishment clause and, 527
 - Lemon test alternatives and, 534
- Layton, Frank, 1343
- LDF. See Legal Defense Fund
- LEAA. See Law Enforcement Assistance Administration
- League of Decency, 756
- League of Nations, 1640
 - Darrow and, 394
 - La Follette and, 903
- League of Women Voters
 - ERA and, 520
 - FCC v. League of Women Voters* and, 578
- League to Enforce Peace, 1601
- Leahy, Patrick
 - CDA and, 336
 - VPPA and, 1713
- Leary v. United States*, 455
- Least restrictive means test, 972
- Leavitt, Humphrey, 553
- Lee, Edwin, 1685
- Lee, George, 548
- Lee, Richard Henry
 - Bill of Rights and, 140
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1263–1264
- Lee, Robert E., 911
- Lee v. Illinois*, 344
- Lee v. Weisman*, 3, 90, 357, 409, 911–912, 1412
 - coercion and, 1102
 - coercion test and, 540
 - Marsh v. Chambers* and, 915, 967
 - moments of silence statutes and, 1029
 - no-coercion test and, 535
 - Pledge of Allegiance and, 1179
 - religious neutrality and, 768
 - school prayer and, 1198
 - Souter and, 1496
- Lee v. Weisman*, 1416
 - non-preferentialism standard and, 1109
 - Pledge of Allegiance and, 1178
- Lefebvre, George, 151
- Left Wing Manifesto, The* (Gitlow), 653
- Legacy of Suppression* (Levy), 643
- Legal aid organizations, 913–914
- Legal Aid Society of New York, 912
- Legal certainty
 - Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle* and, 1044–1045
- Legal counsel. See also Right to counsel
 - appeals and, 60–61

- Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Virginia ex. rel. Virginia State Bar* and, 186 entitlement to, 60–61
 Legal Defense Fund (LDF), 1442
 death penalty and, 240
 Marshall, T., and, 515
 NAACP and, 971
Witherspoon v. Illinois and, 240
 Legal permanent residents (LPRs)
 family unity for noncitizens and, 576
 Legal realism, 912–913
 Cardozo and, 249
 Douglas and, 443
 Legal services
 advertising and, 114
 LSC and, 1324
 Legal Services Corporation (LSC), 913–914, 1324
 Legal Services Corporation Act, 913
Legal Services Corporation v. Velasquez, 913–914
 government funding of speech and, 701
 government speech and, 702
 viewpoint discrimination and, 1717
 Legion of Decency (LOD), 914
 movies and, 1041
 Legislation
 death penalty, 385
 national security and, 1765
 during wartime, 1765–1766
Lehman v. Shaker Heights, 247
Lehr v. Robertson, 279–280, 281
 Leibowitz, Samuel, 1427
 Leland, John, 108
 free exercise clause and, 623
Leland v. Oregon, 917
 Lemon test, 32, 918 alternatives to, 534–535
 application of, 538–539
Board of Education v. Mergens and, 1298
Bowen v. Kendrick and, 167
 Burger and, 206
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Regan
 and, 335
Corporation of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos and, 367–368, 1302
 creationism and, 379, 1616
 criticism of, 534–535 endorsement test v., 42–43 entanglement prong, 367 equal access v., 535
 establishment clause and, 1548
 establishment of, 528–529
Estate of Thornton v. Caldor and, 543
 Fortas and, 376–377
Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue and, 761
Hunt v. McNair and, 785
Lee v. Weisman and, 911
 legislative chaplains and, 267
 legislative prayer and, 915
Lemon v. Kurtzman and, 533, 538, 1302, 1312, 1313, 1314, 1379
Lynch v. Donnelly and, 200, 528–529, 538–539, 1312–1313
Marsh v. Chambers and, 966
Mueller v. Allen and, 1045
 prongs of, 918
Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of University of Virginia
 and, 1379
 secular purpose prong of, 536
 separationism and, 533–535
Stone v. Graham and, 533, 538, 1314
Wallace v. Jaffree and, 1029
Walz v. Tax Commission and, 1738–1739
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 2, 32, 206, 267, 376–377, 1423, 1527, 1548.
See also Lemon test
 Americans United and, 56
 Burger Court and, 199
 coercion and, 1101
 establishment clause and, 542, 1563
Hunt v. McNair and, 785
Lee v. Weisman and, 911
 Lemon test and, 533, 538, 918, 1303, 1312, 1313
Mueller v. Allen and, 1045
 no endorsement test and, 1103
 non-preferentialism standard and, 1108
 Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
 school prayer and, 1197
 secular purpose and, 1438
Tilton v. Richardson and, 1656
Wallace v. Jaffree and, 1029, 1737
 zoning and, 1817
 Lend Lease Administration, 1269
 Length of delay, 1517
 Leniency, promises and, 319
 Lenin, Vladimir, 339
 Leo XIII, Pope, 1100–1101
 Leopold, Nathan, Jr.
 Darrow and, 395
 Goldberg and, 693
Les Amants (movie), 1560
 Lesbian and Gay Rights Project, 904
 Lesbian Avengers, 26
 Lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) movement, 677.
See also Gay and lesbian rights
 Lesbian rights. See Gay and lesbian rights
 Lesbians. See Homosexuals
 Lesbigo people, 676–677. See also Homosexuals
 L'espirit, 1638–1639
Letany (Bastwick), 919
 Lethal gas. See Gas chamber
 Lethal injection, 236, 242, 244
 “Letter from a Birmingham Jail” (King), 890
 nonviolent protest and, 959
Letter to Providence (Williams, R.), 1782
 Leukemia, stem cells and, 1552
 Leupp, Francis E., 1253
 Levellers, 507
 Levi, Edward, 1519
 Stevens and, 1556
 Levin, Joseph L., Jr., 1500, 1503
Levin v. Yeshiva University, 1409
 Levine, Samuel, 128
 Levison, Stanley, 776
Leviticus 24, 1329
Levitt v. Committee for Public Education, 334–335
Levitt v. PEARL, 1527
 Levy, Irving, 1269
 Levy, Leon, 1440
 Madison and, 643
 on seditious libel, 644
 Levying war, 1665
 Lewd speech, 124
 Lewis, C.S., 128

INDEX

- Lewis, Joseph, 1292
Lewis Publishing Co. v. Morgan, 62
Lewis v. Casey, 202
Lewis v. City of New Orleans, 587–588
Lewis v. Harris, 1402
Lewis v. United States, 1343
 Marchetti v. United States and, 960
Lex talionis, 1645
Leyra, Camilo, 919
Leyra v. Denno, 919
LGBT movement. See Lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender movement
Liability of gun manufacturers, 722–723 media, 996
Libel, 36, 402. See also Seditious libel blasphemy and, 815
 categorical speech and, 1671
 damages for, 404
 defamation and, 815
 in England, 506
 English law and, 643
 Falwell and, 575
 Flynt and, 599
 Frankfurter and, 617
 free speech law and, 815
 freedom of press and, 660–661, 1202
 Garrison and, 676
 grand juries and, 705
 group, 715, 752
 hate speech and, 752–753
 Herbert v. Lando and, 760–761
 history of, 815
 Hustler Magazine v. Falwell and, 787
 journalists and, 761
 jury nullification and, 869 malice and, 761
 Marshall, J., on, 970
 New York Times Co. v. Sullivan and, 39, 302, 1088
 obscenity and, 1117
 pre-Sedition Act of 1798, 733 private torts v., 661
 public figures and, 788
 sedition and, 815
 Warren Court and, 1754
Libel Act of 1692, 506, 646
Liberal Party, of Canada, 1403
Liberalism
 Catholic Church and, 253–254
 Jefferson and, 846
 Rawls and, 1272
Liberation movements, 87
Liberator, The, 5, 7, 448, 1155, 1485
 AASS and, 45–46
 Garrison and, 676
Libertad v. Welch, 181
Libertarian Party, 266
Libertarian privilege, 1638
Liberté, Égalité, Fraternité, 1638
Liberty
 American Revolution and, 135
 arrests and, 80
 Bible and, 127
 Bill of Rights and, 945
 Burke and, 207
 Catholic Church and, 253–255
 colonial, 126
 in Crandall v. Nevada, 801 democracy v., 151
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 74, 1328 fundamental, 138–139, 143
 government and, 833
 Harlan, I. and, 74
 individual, 1026
 Jackson, A. and, 832
 Mill and, 1011
 natural v. civil, 1026
 palladium of, 137
 privileges and immunities and, 1231
 subjects of, 52–54
 substantive due process and, 1582
Liberty Bell, 127
Liberty of contract. See Freedom of contract
Liberty rights, natural rights as, 1326
Liberty Under the Soviets (Baldwin), 103
Liberty University, 575
Libraries
 CIPA and, 825
 computers and, 660
 First Amendment and, 164
 government funding of speech and, 701
 Internet filtering at, 824–826
 as nonpublic forums, 1245
 obscenity and, 1125
 school, 156
Licensing. See also Liquor licensing
 City of Littleton v. Z.J. Gifts D4, LLC and, 926 film, 1041–1042
 Follett v. Town of McCormick and, 599–600
 free speech law and, 815
 gay and lesbian rights and, 677
 Hague v. C.I.O. and, 729
 history of, 815
 medical, 800
 sexually explicit movies and, 669–670
 tax, 1561
Licensing laws
 in England, 1439–1440
 freedom of press and, 1201
 prior restraints and, 1210
 private police and, 1227
Lieberman, Joseph, 764–765
Liebman, James, 1346
Life (magazine), 1657
Life, liberty, and property, 1537–1538
Likeness. See Appropriation of name or likeness Lilborne (Lilburne), John, 128, 919–920
 freedom of press and, 1201
Lilly, Benjamin, 920
Lilly, Mark, 920
Lilly v. Virginia, 920
 compulsory process clause and, 344
Limited public forums. See Designated public forums
Lin, Maya, 1500
Lincoln, Abraham, 922–924, 1487
 assassination of, 146
 civil religion and, 298
 election of, 759
 Emancipation Proclamation and, 6, 452, 493–494, 924
 emergency powers and, 495

- equal protection and, 514
- Ex parte Milligan* and, 271, 551
- Ex parte Vallandigham* and, 552
- Field and, 586
- freedom of speech and, 646–647
- habeas corpus and, 923–924, 1374
- legacy of, 924
- no endorsement test and, 1104–1105
- Order No. 11 and, 709
- pardons and commutations and, 1145
- Phillips, W. and, 1158
- Simpson and, 146
- slavery and, 1647
- Lincoln, Thomas, 922
- Lincoln University, 971
- Lincoln-Douglas debates, 922–923
- Lincoln's Constitution* (Farber), 646
- Linde, Hans A., 1545
- Lindenmuller v. People*, 1311
- Lindh, John Walker
 - Miranda warnings and, 1020
 - terrorism and, 790
- Lindsay, John V., 760
- Lindsay, Vachel, 1145
- Lindsmith, Alfred, 64
- Line of Fire: the Morris Dees Story* (movie), 1503
- Line-Item Veto Act, 1417
- Lineups, 567, 925
 - United States v. Wade* and, 1697
 - Warren Court and, 1759
- Lingens, Peter, 639
- Lingens v. Austria*, 639
- Linmark Associates, Inc. v. Township of Willingboro*, 1821
- Lippmann, Walter, 736
- Liquor licensing
 - establishment clause and, 530
 - nude dancing and, 215–216
- Lisenba v. California*, 316
- Literacy tests
 - segregation and, 1442
 - Voting Rights Act of 1965 and, 1729
- Lithuania, 1679
- Litigation. See also Class action litigation
 - Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Virginia ex. rel. Virginia State Bar* and, 185–186
 - under English law, 798
 - federal, 1030–1031
 - Flast v. Cohen* and, 596
 - Fourth Amendment violations and, 148–149
 - media liability and, 996
 - municipal, 1030–1031
 - NAACP v. Button* and, 1058–1059
- Little, Joan, 1501
- Little Lindbergh Law, 277
- Little Rock School Board, 376
- Living the Bill of Rights: How to Be an Authentic American* (Hentoff), 760
- Livingston, Sigmund, 69
- Llanfear Pattern* (Biddle), 133
- Llewellyn, Karl, 913
- Illinois v. Wardlow*, 794–795
- Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner*, 44, 1544
 - Marshall, T., and, 972
- Lloyd Corporation v. Tanner*, 926–927
- Lloyd, William, 1667
- Loan Association v. Topeka*, 927–928
- Lobbying, 1674
 - Christian Coalition and, 285–286
 - free speech and, 632
 - gun control and, 719–720
 - NARAL and, 1062
 - NRA and, 1070
- Lochner era, 473
- Lochner v. New York*, 465, 928
 - due process and, 1580
 - economic regulation and, 473
 - economic rights and, 479
 - freedom of contract and, 637
 - Fuller Court and, 667
 - Hand on, 735
 - Holmes and, 770, 1633
 - Hughes and, 781–782
 - “laissez-faire” capitalism and, 1337
 - New Right and, 1086
 - preferred position rule and, 1200
 - privileges and immunities and, 1232
 - substantive due process and, 608, 1368, 1633
 - Taft Court and, 1596
 - Waite Court and, 1733
- Locke, John, 930–931, 1580, 1630
 - civil liberties and, 1638
 - double jeopardy and, 438
 - due process and, 462
 - emergencies and, 494
 - English liberties and, 507
 - Franklin and, 620–621
 - free speech law and, 815
 - individual liberty and, 1026
 - influence of, 54
 - Jefferson and, 845, 847
 - Mason and, 978
 - Mill and, 1010
 - natural law and, 1079–1080
 - natural rights and, 1357
 - New Hampshire Constitution of 1784 and, 1085
 - property ownership and, 475
 - religion and, 1309–1310, 1314
 - Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723
- Locke v. Davey*, 929–930, 1528
 - equal access and, 536
 - non-funding provisions and, 153
 - Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia* and, 1379
 - scholarships and, 1425
 - separationism and, 767
 - Witters v. Department of Services* and, 1789
- Lockerty v. Phillips*, 1801
- Lockett, Sandra, 931
- Lockett v. Ohio*, 223, 236, 241, 246, 385, 931–932
 - mitigating factors and, 232
- Lockhart, A.L., 932
- Lockhart v. McCree*, 191, 932
 - challenges for cause in, 873
- Lockwood, Polly, 341
- Lockyer v. Andrade*, 384–385, 1494
 - Chemerinsky and, 277
 - three strikes law and, 6, 1654
- LOD. See Legion of Decency
- Loeb, James, 1269

INDEX

- Loeb, Richard
Darrow and, 395
Goldberg and, 693
Lofton v. Secretary of Department of Children and Family Services, 190 homosexual adoption and, 678
Log Cabin Republicans, 932–933
Logan, James, 734
Logan Valley Mall, 44
Lohman, Ann Trow Lohman, 342
Loitering, 674–675
Loitering statutes, 1706
Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 933
London Company, 1722–1723
London, Ephriam, 188
London School of Economics, 884
Lonergan, Bernard, 254
Loney v. Scurr, 291
Long, Huey Pierce, 934
Long Island Railroad, 102
Long Parliament, 506
Lopez v. United States, 127
Lord's Prayer
Abington Township School District v. Schempp and, 502, 1757
in school, 2–4
school prayer and, 1197
Loretto v. Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp., 1604
Lorillard Tobacco Company v. Reilly, 1650
Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD)
City of Los Angeles v. Lyons and, 935
jury nullification and, 869
Rampart scandal and, 277
Los Angeles Times, bombing of, 394
Lotteries
congressional regulation of, 955 France v. United States and, 615 interstate, 615
United States v. Edge Broadcasting and, 1708
Louima, Abner, 154
Louis XVI, king of France, 1143
Louisiana
Alien Land Law in, 1107
City of Shreveport v. Levy in, 1311
Creationism Act and, 1617
literacy tests and, 1729
Long and, 934
lynchings in, 1774
NAACP and, 1064
Plessy v. Ferguson and, 1181
privacy and, 1531
religion and, 1438
slaughterhouses and, 1481
United States v. Cruikshank and, 1681
voting in, 1729–1730
Louisiana Crisis Assistance Center, 1499
Louisiana ex rel Francis v. Resweber, 236
Louisiana Purchase, 845
Louisiana Railroad Commission, 934
Louisiana State University, 934
Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Mottley, 867
Lovejoy, Elijah, 5, 302, 935, 1486
death of, 648
Phillips and, 1158
Lovell v. Griffin
Cantwell v. Connecticut and, 849
prior restraints and, 1209
Loving, Mildred, 936
Loving, Richard, 936
Loving v. Virginia, 169, 518, 936, 1368, 1399
interracial cohabitation and, 991
Japanese internment and, 841
miscegenation laws and, 1023
Naim v. Naim and, 1059, 1060
Warren and, 1763
Zablocki v. Redhail and, 1811
Low Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments, 1589
Lowell v. City of Griffin, 222
Lower federal courts, 19–20
“Loyalty Among Government Employees” (Emerson & Helfeld), 498
Loyalty and Security Program, 1269
Loyalty oaths, 504–505
Adler v. Board of Education and, 1612
Elfbrandt v. Russell and, 1612
Keyishian v. Board of Regents and, 492, 1612
National Labor Relations Board and, 1719
political patronage and, 1189
Speiser v. Randall and, 1672
teachers and, 1611
vagueness and, 1703–1705
Vinson Court and, 1718
Warren and, 1762
Weiman v. Updegraff and, 1612
Loyalty program, 603
LPRs. See Legal permanent residents
LSC. See Legal Services Corporation
LSD, 1743
free exercise clause and, 455
War on Drugs and, 1739
Lubbock Civil Liberties Union v. Lubbock Independent School District, 512
Lucas, Roy, 1062
Lucas v. Forty-Fourth General Assembly of Colorado, 1276
Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council, 1605
Luciano, Salvatore “Lucky,” 1742
Lugar v. Edmondson, 606
Luggage, searches and, 1752
Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 1520
Scalia and, 1417
Lundy, Benjamin, 1155
Lurton, Horace
McReynolds and, 992–993
White Court and, 1777
Lusk Committee, 1798
Lutherans, 291
Lynch, Charles, 242
Lynch Men, 5
Lynch v. Donnelly, 41–42, 90, 288, 343, 399, 937–938, 1439
Burger Court and, 200
Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette and, 246–247, 1314
ceremonial deism and, 258
Christmas and, 41, 536, 1314
Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow and, 490
endorsement test and, 536, 539
God and, 861
“In God We Trust” and, 1067
Lemon test and, 200, 528–529, 538–539, 918, 1313

- nativity scenes and, 1313
 - no endorsement test and, 1103
 - non-preferentialism standard and, 1109
 - O'Connor and, 1029, 1126, 1313
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
 - Lynching, 240, 242–243, 1442
 - Bell and, 1773–1774
 - of Eberhart, 897
 - Enforcement Act of 1870 and, 1681
 - extremist groups and, 564
 - of Frank, 897
 - Frank v. Mangum* and, 772
 - Jim Crow laws and, 302
 - KKK and, 896–897
 - Lovejoy and, 1486
 - NAACP and, 1063
 - Petition Campaign and, 1157
 - United States v. Cruikshank* and, 1681–1882
 - Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association*, 939, 1470
 - free exercise clause and, 624, 629
 - Native Americans and, 1077
 - Lyng v. Northwest Indian Protective Association*, 52
 - Lynn, Barry, 57
 - Lynnum, Beatrice, 940
 - Lynnum v. Illinois*, 319, 940
 - Lyons, Adolph, 935
 - Lysergic acid diethylamide. See LSD
 - Lysistrata* (Aristophanes), 649
- M
- M Squad*, 1030
 - Mabry, James, 941
 - Mabry v. Johnson*, 941, 1413
 - MacAndrews and Forbes Company, 730
 - MacArthur, General Douglas, 1269
 - MacDonald, R. St. J., 638
 - MacDougall v. Green*, 1392
 - Macintosh, Douglas Clyde, 1142
 - Mackenzie v. Hare*, 562
 - MacKinnon, Catharine A., 46, 941–943, 1573
 - Dworkin and, 470
 - Emerson and, 499
 - obscenity and, 660, 1125
 - pornography and, 1120–1121
 - MacPherson v. Buick Motor Company*, 249
 - MacReynolds, James Clark, 801
 - Mad Bomber, 1236
 - Madden, James Arnold, 73
 - Madden v. Kentucky*, 1232
 - Madison, James, 943–946, 1441, 1544, 1636
 - Alien and Sedition Acts and, 40
 - Anti-Federalists and, 141, 1326
 - atheism and, 90
 - Baptists and, 108
 - Bill of Rights and, 112, 140–142, 438, 945, 1325, 1326–1327, 1340, 1349, 1632, 1635, 1751
 - Cato and, 994
 - civil liberties and, 139, 143, 1028
 - clergy in public office and, 921–922
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 357–358, 1264
 - economic regulation and, 473
 - economic rights and, 476
 - election of, 526
 - establishment clause and, 531–532
 - Federalist 10* and, 643, 1296
 - Federalist Papers* and, 1268, 1340
 - First Amendment and, 766
 - free exercise clause and, 624
 - free speech and, 945–946
 - freedom of press and, 1205, 1206
 - Jefferson and, 845
 - Kentucky and Virginia Resolves and, 887
 - Marbury v. Madison* and, 864, 958
 - Marshall Court and, 968
 - McDaniel v. Paty* and, 989
 - “Memorial and Remonstrance” and, 550, 947–948
 - Ninth Amendment and, 1095–1096, 1325, 1326–1327
 - noncitizens and, 1105–1106
 - non-preferentialism standard and, 1109
 - plenary power doctrine and, 1180
 - on political parties, 643
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
 - presidency of, 946
 - religion and, 541, 624, 1315
 - religious freedom and, 944
 - Republicans and, 36
 - Separate-Baptists, 526
 - Tenth Amendment and, 142, 1328
 - Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723–1724
 - Madison Ring, 902
 - Madsen v. Women's Health Center, Inc.*, 12, 66, 948–949
 - ACLU and, 286
 - injunctions and, 1211
 - Operation Rescue and, 1134
 - picketing and, 1168
 - TPM and, 1664
 - Mafia
 - Cohn and, 323
 - RICO and, 1334–1335
 - Magazines, free, 292
 - Magna Carta, 54, 143, 357, 949–951, 1748, 1750
 - civil liberties and, 1537
 - double jeopardy and, 437
 - due process and, 456, 462, 1352, 1580, 1633
 - English liberties and, 506
 - Griffin v. Illinois* and, 711
 - habeas corpus and, 726
 - jury trials and, 877
 - Lilborne and, 919
 - Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641 and, 978–979
 - Petition of Right and, 1157
 - property ownership and, 475
 - proportional punishment and, 1240
 - revision of, 950
 - takings clause and, 1603
 - Magnetometers, 33
 - Magnuson Act, 260
 - Maher v. Roe*, 951
 - abortion and, 673–674, 725, 1321
 - Burger Court and, 198
 - Harris v. McRae* and, 746
 - Poelker v. Doe* and, 1183
 - Roe v. Wade* and, 1221
 - viewpoint discrimination and, 1717
 - Maheu, Robert, 306
 - Mail
 - ensorship of, 46
 - Jacobson v. United States* and, 837

INDEX

- Mail (cont.)
Kendall and, 883–884
obscenity and, 956–957, 1116, 1410
Olmstead v. United States and, 1129
pornography and, 837
public forum doctrines and, 1244
- Mailer, Norman, 684
- Mailloux v. Kiley*, 1613
- Maine
Prohibition and, 1238
Supreme Judicial Court, 1294
- Maine, Henry, 1039
- Major Threat to Churches: Zoning Law, A*, 1819
- Majority, tyranny of, 1027–1028
- Majority-minority districts, 1277–1278
- Making Sense of Overbreadth* (Fallon), 1139
- Mala prohibita, 1185
- Malbin, Micahel, 527
- Malcolm, Joyce Lee
English Bill of Rights and, 503
on gun ownership, 721
- Malcolm X. See X, Malcolm
- Male captus bene detentus*. See Ker-Frisbie rule
- Malice, 403
defamation and, 680
Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders
and, 405
Hutchinson v. Proxmire and, 788
infliction of emotional distress and, 811
libel and, 761
- Malinski v. New York*, 316–317
- Mallory, Andrew, 952
- Mallory v. United States*, 952
exclusionary rule and, 991
McNabb Rule and, 316
unnecessary delay and, 1018
- Malloy v. Hogan*, 1455
Adamson v. California and, 618
incorporation doctrine and, 803
procedural due process and, 463
self-incrimination and, 991–992
Stewart, P., and, 1559
Twining v. New Jersey and, 740
Warren Court and, 1758
- Malone, Dudley Field, 1426
- Malz, Earl M., 1545
- Man Versus the State, The* (Spencer), 928
- Mandamus, writs of
common law and, 458
Marbury v. Madison and, 864, 958
- Mandatory fees, 601–602
- Mandel, Ernest, 893
- Mandel v. Hodges*, 398
- Mandela, Nelson, 791
- Manhattan Project, 1377
- Mann Act, 954–955
White Court and, 1777
- Mann, Horace, 1584
school prayer and, 356
- Mann, James, 954, 1741
- Mann-Elkins Act, 1601
- Mansfield, Lord, 458
- Mansfieldization, 458
- Manslaughter, 1150
- Manson v. Brathwaite*, 955–956
- due process and, 1697
eyewitness identification and, 568, 925
- Manton, Martin T.
United States v. One Book Entitled “Ulysses” and, 1688–1689
- Manual Enterprises, Inc. v. Day*, 956–957
- Manual of Parliamentary Practice* (Jefferson), 846
- Mapp, Dollree, 957
- Mapp v. Ohio*, 181, 957, 1521, 1544
ACLU and, 49–50
Clark, T., and, 309
exclusionary rule and, 555, 618, 793
fruit of the poisonous tree and, 666
Harlan, II, and, 741
incorporation doctrine and, 803
Meese and, 997
Michigan v. DeFillipo and, 1004
procedural due process and, 463
United States v. Leon and, 1685–1686
Warren Court and, 1757
Wolf v. Colorado, 1790
- Mapplethorpe, Robert, 1065
- Marbury v. Madison*, 958
cruel and unusual punishment and, 383
Ellsworth Court and, 492
federal court jurisdiction and, 866
Hayburn’s Case and, 844
judicial review and, 864, 1608
Marshall Court and, 968
Marshall, J., and, 970
remedies and, 148
Sedition Act of 1798 and, 643
- Marbury, William, 958
judicial review and, 864
- Marcantonio, Vito, 1098
- Marcello v. Bonds*
deportation and, 800
ex post facto laws and, 554
- March on Washington, 959
King and, 890
- Marches, 958–959
- Marchetti, James, 960
- Marchetti v. United States*, 1684
Fifth Amendment and, 1684
- Mardian, Robert, 1089
- Margarine, 1684
- Margin of appreciation, 638–639
- Mariel Boatlift, 390
- Marijuana, 1743, 1745
Alaska and, 1744
Anslinger and, 64, 1742
California v. Acevedo and, 92
Carter and, 1743
Delaware v. Prouse and, 412
drug testing and, 453
Florida v. Riley and, 597
Florida v. Royer and, 598
free exercise clause and, 454
Kyllo v. United States and, 900, 1171 medically prescribed, 1742 plain smell and, 1171
privacy and, 1220
Rastafarians and, 454, 1262, 1263
search and seizure and, 763
Smith test and, 1263
South Dakota v. Opperman and, 1498

- War on Drugs and, 1739
- Marijuana Tax Act, 64, 1742
- Marine Corps, 305
- Maris, Albert B., 592
- Maritain, Jacques, 254
- Marital unities doctrine, 960–961
- Marketplace of ideas theory, 961–963, 1630
 - commercial speech and, 330–331
 - criticism of, 962–963
 - free speech theory and, 816
 - Hamilton and, 733
 - hate speech and, 754
 - Holmes and, 771
 - Hustler Magazine v. Falwell* and, 787
 - Mill and, 1010–1011
 - Whitney v. California* and, 1780
- Markie, Biz, 764
- Markonni, Paul, 1237
- Marley, Bob, 1262
- Marquette University, 983–984
- Marriage. See also Antimiscegenation statutes; Miscegenation laws; Polygamy
 - Bible and, 129
 - Christianity and, 963
 - civil, 678
 - civil unions v., 933
 - cohabitation without, 964
 - common law and, 963, 1403
 - constitutional framework for, 1399–1400
 - domestic violence and, 434–435
 - Dworkin and, 471
 - Edmunds-Tucker Act and, 1039
 - expatriation and, 562
 - Fiallo v. Bell* and, 585
 - history of, 963–966
 - illness and, 1400
 - IMFA and, 795
 - implied rights and, 801, 802
 - informal, 963
 - interracial, 936
 - laws, redefined, 964
 - lex celebrationis*, 406
 - Loving v. Virginia* and, 1763–1764
 - miscegenation laws and, 1022
 - mixed, 1541
 - modern laws, 965–966
 - Naim v. Naim* and, 1059
 - O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz* and, 1130
 - partnership theory of, 1522–1523
 - as patriarchal institution, 1400
 - personal autonomy rights and, 1533
 - prisoners and, 1399, 1670
 - privacy and, 444
 - privileges of, 1399
 - as property, 960
 - rape in, 960–961
 - restrictions on, 1541
 - same-sex, 405–406, 677, 773, 905, 933, 936, 966, 1023, 1399–1410
 - Schlaflly and, 1421
 - serial, 963
 - slavery and, 964
 - sodomy and, 1493
 - spousal murder and, 974–975
 - state laws and, 1399
 - validity of, 795
 - Zablocki v. Redhail* and, 1811
- Marsh v. Alabama*, 44
 - company towns and, 340
 - Stone Court and, 1562
- Marsh v. Chambers*, 267, 966–967
 - Burger Court and, 200
 - legislative chaplains and, 861
 - legislative prayer and, 767, 915
 - Lemon* test and, 534
- Marshall Court, 967–969
 - contract clause and, 477
 - Story and, 1572
 - United States v. Reidel* and, 1690–1691
- Marshall Islands, 1668
- Marshall, John, 492, 968–969
 - Barron v. Mayor and Council of Baltimore* and, 73, 112, 1632
 - Batson v. Kentucky* and, 114–115, 874
 - Belle Terre v. Boraas* and, 120
 - civil liberty and, 1027, 1541
 - contract clause and, 477
 - Fletcher v. Peck* and, 477
 - Frazier v. Cupp* and, 320
 - judicial review and, 864
 - Marbury v. Madison* and, 864, 958
 - Marshall Court and, 967–969
 - McCulloch v. Maryland* and, 988
 - Ninth Amendment and, 1096
 - Olmstead v. United States* and, 1129
 - plenary power doctrine and, 1179
 - Plyler v. Doe* and, 1182
 - Poelker v. Doe* and, 1183
 - police power and, 1186
 - privacy and, 1220
 - Story and, 645, 1572
 - on substantive due process, 466
 - supremacy clause and, 1589
- Marshall, Lawrence, 237
- Marshall Mathers LP, The* (Eminem), 765
- Marshall, Thomas, 968
- Marshall, Thurgood, 970–974, 1442
 - Buckley v. Valeo* and, 194
 - Burger Court and, 198
 - Cable News Network, Inc. v. Noriega* and, 1076
 - Frank and, 616
 - Furman v. Georgia* and, 223, 225, 233
 - Ginsburg and, 687
 - Graham v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue* and, 703
 - ineffective assistance of counsel and, 810–811
 - judicial career of, 972–974
 - Legal Defense Fund and, 515
 - NAACP and, 1063, 1064
 - New York Times v. United States* and, 1090
 - New York v. Belton* and, 1091
 - newsroom searches and, 1093
 - NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago* and, 1100
 - obscenity and, 1123
 - Osborne v. Ohio* and, 1138
 - Perry v. Sindermann* and, 1260
 - Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps* and, 1158
 - Police Department of Chicago v. Mosely* and, 361
 - Regents of the University of California v. Bakke* and, 1284
 - Rhode Island v. Innis* and, 1331
 - Sedma, S.P.R.L. v. Imrex Co., Inc.* and, 1335
 - Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association* and, 1636

INDEX

- Marshall, Thurgood (cont.)
 - Stanley v. Georgia* and, 1521
 - Stewart, P., and, 1560
 - Strickland v. Washington* and, 1346
 - Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Hardison* and, 1300
 - Witters v. Department of Services* and, 1789
 - Wolman v. Walter* and, 1790
- Marshall v. Jerrico*, 296
 - administrative process and, 800
- Marshall, Vivian, 974
- Martial law
 - in Baton Rouge, 934
 - emergencies and, 494
 - Ex parte Milligan* and, 272
 - habeas corpus and, 552
 - in Hawaii, 1048
- Martin, Luther, 988
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1264
- Martin Luther King, Jr. Federal Holiday and Service Act, 891
- Martin v. Hunter's Lessee*, 1572
 - Marshall Court and, 968
 - Marshall, J., and, 969, 970
- Martin v. Ohio*, 974–975
- Martinez, Julia, 808, 1411–1412
- Martinez v. Southern Ute Tribe*, 807
- Marx, Karl, 1639
 - Communist Party and, 339
 - Mormons and, 1035
- Marx, Paul, 1133
- Mary II, Queen, 690–691
- Mary, of Modena, 690
- Mary Queen of Scots, 621
- Maryland
 - Christianity and, 1538
 - constitution, 137, 1309, 1310, 1311
 - DWB and, 1237
 - free exercise clause of, 622
 - general warrants and, 1751
 - Good Friday and, 398–399
 - prior restraints and, 1210
 - slavery and, 1647
- Maryland & Virginia Eldership of the Churches of God v. Church of God at Sharpsburg, Inc.*, 857
- Maryland Charter of 1632, 326
- Maryland Court of Appeals
 - Brady v. Maryland* and, 173
- Maryland Declaration of Rights of 1776, 623
- Maryland Toleration Act, 975–976
- Maryland v. Buie*, 976, 1752
- Maryland v. Craig*, 976–977
 - Coy v. Iowa* and, 374
 - Scalia and, 1417
- Maryland v. Garrison*, 1435
- Mascots, Native Americans as, 1188
- Mason City Republican*, 256
- Mason, George, 977–978, 1340
 - Bill of Rights and, 139–140, 815
 - civil trials and, 360
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 358–360, 1263
 - ex post facto laws, 360
 - freedom of press and, 1203
 - Locke and, 930
 - “Memorial and Remonstrance” and, 947
 - plenary power doctrine and, 1180
 - sumptuary laws and, 358–359, 360
- U.S. Constitution and, 359, 360
- Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723
- Mass communications, 580. See also Broadcasters
- Massachusetts
 - bill of rights, 137
 - busing and, 1546
 - civil liberties and, 1545
 - colonial law and, 126
 - Commonwealth v. Kneeland* in, 1311
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1264, 1265–1266
 - Declaration of Rights, 139
 - free speech and, 1536
 - freedom of press and, 1204
 - gerrymandering in, 1277
 - jury trials and, 138
 - Know-Nothing Party in, 1294
 - open-air assembly and, 1397
 - personal liberty laws and, 1154
 - religion and, 1538
 - same-sex marriage and, 966, 1402, 1403
 - segregation and, 1441
 - slavery and, 139
- Massachusetts Bay Charter, 326
- Massachusetts Bay Colony, 55
 - Hutchinson and, 61–62
 - Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641 and, 978–979
 - obscenity and, 1115–1116
 - Williams and, 107
 - Winthrop and, 298
- Massachusetts Body of Liberties, 508
- Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641, 55, 387, 978–979
 - double jeopardy and, 438, 439–440
- Massachusetts Constitution, 109
- Massachusetts Human Rights Commission, 601
- Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, 1396
- Massachusetts v. Sheppard*
 - Kennedy, A., and, 884
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1195
 - United States v. Leon* and, 1685–1686
- Masses Publishing Company v. Patten*, 979–980
 - clear and present danger test and, 653
 - free speech and, 1642
 - Hand and, 736
 - Hand, L. and, 1796
- Masses, The*, 979
 - Hand and, 736
- Massiah v. United States*, 980–981, 1345
 - Warren Court and, 1758
- Masturbation, 1492–1493
- Mather v. Roe*, 116
- Mathews v. Diaz*, 41
- Mathews v. Eldridge*, 461
 - administrative due process and, 693
 - Hamdi v. Rumsfeld* and, 731
 - procedural due process and, 609
- Mathis v. United States*, 981–982
- MATRIX. See Multi-State Anti-Terrorism Information Exchange
- Mattachine Society, 676–677, 1566
- Mattel v. Walking Mountain Productions*, 1414
- Matter of Acosta*, 89
- Matter of Interpretation: Federal Courts and the Law* (Scalia), 1668
 - English Bill of Rights and, 503
- Matter of Jacob*, 1408
- Matthews, Stanley
 - Hurtado v. California* and, 739

- Yick Wo v. Hopkins* and, 515
Maxwell v. Dow, 739
 Mayson, Frank, 1302
 Mayton, William, 1440
 Mazella, David, 1502
 Mazor, Lester J., 1544
McAuliffe v. Mayor of New Bedford, 1358, 1514
 Holmes and, 770
McCabe v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., 783
 McCain, John
 Log Cabin Republicans and, 933
 War on Terror and, 1095
 McCain-Feingold law, 220. See also Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002
McCann v. Fort Zumwalt School District, 757
 McCardle, William, 272
 national security and, 1072
 McCarran Act of 1950
 CPUSA and, 338
 freedom of association and, 635
 McCarran-Walter Act of 1952. See Immigration and Nationality Act McCarthy era
 Scopes trial and, 1426
 Vinson Court and, 1719
 McCarthy, Eugene
 campaign finance reform and, 219
 McCarthy, Joseph, 983–985, 1773 censure of, 985
 Clark, T., and, 308
 Cohn and, 322–323, 1773
 CPUSA and, 338
 Dies and, 419–420
 drugs and, 1742–1743
 Fortas and, 603
 Frankfurter and, 618
 free speech and, 1451
 Goldberg and, 695
 incitement of criminal activity and, 654–655
 JBS and, 854
 Kunstler and, 898
 Lattimore and, 603
 Middle and, 134
 morphine and, 64
 Shine and, 1773
 speech and debate clause and, 351
 McCarthyism, 983–985, 1454, 1510
 balancing and, 100
 categorical approach and, 252
 conspiracy and, 351
 CPUSA and, 338
 Dies and, 419–420
 freedom of association and, 635
 Harlan, II, and, 741
 incitement of criminal activity and, 654–655
 Kaufman and, 883
 Konigsberg v. State Bar of California and, 895
 Schrecker and, 150
 McClean, Edward, 774
 McClellan, John, 695
McCleskey v. Kemp, 101, 241, 985–986
 Baldus Study and, 225, 229
 race and, 224
 racial bias and, 237, 1258
 McCleskey, Warren, 985
McClesky v. Zant, 886
 McCleskey, Warren, 229
 McCloskey, Robert G., 1634
McCullum v. Board of Education, 356, 987, 1292
 Torcaso v. Watkins and, 1662
 wall of separation and, 1736
 Zorach v. Clauson and, 1822
 McCollum, Vashiti, 987
 McConnell, Michael, 23, 559, 621–625, 1296, 1311, 1312
 McConnell, Mitch, 220
McConnell v. Federal Election Commission, 1190
 Breyer and, 183
 McCain-Feingold law and, 220
 PACs and, 588
 Scalia and, 1417
 McCormack-Dickstein Committee, 1488
 HUAC and, 780
 McCorvey, Norma, 987–988
McCray v. United States, 1684
McCreary County, Kentucky v. American Civil Liberties Union of Kentucky
 ADL and, 69
 civil religion and, 297
 coercion and, 1102
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 146–147
 Lemon test alternatives and, 534
 Lemon test and, 536, 538
 O'Connor and, 1127
 religious neutrality and, 538
 Scalia and, 528
 Stone v. Graham and, 1564
 Ten Commandments and, 1621
McCulloch v. Maryland, 988, 1589
 Marshall Court and, 968
 Marshall, J., and, 970
 Ninth Amendment and, 1096
 Olmstead v. United States and, 1129
McCullom v. Board of Education, 1719–1720
 McDaniel, Paul, 989
McDaniel v. Paty, 989
 clergy in public office and, 921
 McDonald, Gable, 264
 McDougall, Alexander, 1749
 McDowell, J.C., 195
McGautha v. California, 223, 234–235, 241, 989–990
 Furman v. Georgia and, 669
 McGeorge College of the Law, 884
 McGovern, George, 1503
McGowan v. Maryland, 543, 1438–1439
 Sunday closing laws and, 1586
 Warren Court and, 1755
 McGranery, James, 322
 McHenry, James, 359
McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Commission, 62
McKastle v. Wiggins, 1458
McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 990
 In re Gault and, 812
 McKenna, Joseph
 Mutual Film Corporation v. Industrial Commission of Ohio and, 1041, 1055
 Schaeffer v. United States and, 1796
 White Court and, 1777
 McKenna, William, 955
 McKenzie, Ben G., 1426

INDEX

- McKinley, William
 - Bryan and, 189
 - La Follette and, 902
 - national security and, 1073
- McKinney, Aaron, 1469
- McKinney, et al. v. Southern White Knights et al.*, 1502
- McKittrick, Eric, 643
- McLaughlin v. Florida*, 991
 - miscegenation laws and, 1023
- McLaurin v. Oklahoma*
 - equal protection and, 516
 - Plessy v. Ferguson* and, 1181
 - Vinson Court and, 1720
- McLean v. Ark. Board of Education*
 - establishment clause and, 1620
 - evolution and, 1620
- McMurray, Howard, 984
- McMurray, Linda O., 1774
- McNabb v. United States*, 316, 991–992
 - reasonable promptness and, 1018
 - Stone Court and, 1562
- McNabb-Mallory rule, 316
 - unnecessary delay and, 952, 991
- McNamara brothers, 394
- McNamara, Robert, 1088
- McPherson, Ardith, 1260
- McPherson, James, 1158
- McRae, Cora, 746
- McReynolds, James Clark, 992–993, 1597
 - Meyer v. Nebraska* and, 176
 - Pierce v. Society of Sisters* and, 176
 - Stone and, 1564
 - United States v. Miller* and, 1343
 - White Court and, 1777
- McVeigh, Timothy, 565, 1622–1623
 - AEDPA and, 728
 - Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 and, 1052
- Means, Gaston B., 774
- Measure of a Man, The* (King), 890
- Media. See also Press
 - access, 21
 - access to information, 993–994
 - access to military operations, 995–996
 - appropriation of name or likeness and, 77
 - cameras in courtrooms and, 218
 - liability, 996
 - Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart* and, 1082
 - neutral reportage doctrine and, 1082
 - newsroom searches and, 1093–1094
 - obscenity and, 1124
 - prison access and, 21–22
 - rape and, 1261
 - reporter's privilege and, 1319
 - sealed documents and, 1428–1429
 - United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group* and, 1689–1690
 - Wilson v. Layne* and, 1783
 - Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co.* and, 1812
- Media Law Resource Center, 660
- Media Marketing Accountability Act of 2001, 764
- Medicaid
 - abortion and, 9, 12, 115–116, 746–747, 951
 - Beal v. Doe* and, 115–116
 - Harris v. McRae* and, 746, 1373
 - NARAL and, 1062
- Medical counseling
 - abortion and, 673–674, 700
 - right to, 712
- Medical leave, 1408
- Medical treatment
 - abortion and, 433
 - Crane v. Johnson* and, 374–375
 - euthanasia and, 547
 - faith based, 374–375
 - involuntary, 1131
 - pediatric, 29
 - personal autonomy rights and, 1533
 - religion and, 1267, 1268
 - right to refuse, 389, 1267
 - Rush and, 1386–1387
 - withholding of, 86
- Medina, Harold, 414
- Medina, Michael, 127
- Meek v. Pittenger*, 1423, 1527
 - Americans United and, 56
 - Burger Court and, 199
 - Mitchell v. Helms* and, 1024
 - Wolman v. Walter* and, 1791
- Meese, Ed, 1710
 - New York v. Ferber* and, 1092
 - obscenity and, 1115
- Meese, Edwin, 996–997
- Meetings, by Salvation Army, 1397
- Megan's Law, 554, 997–998
- Meigs, Return J., 1587
- Meiji restoration, 147
- Meiklejohn, Alexander, 998–1000, 1451, 1630
 - free speech theory and, 816
 - self-government, 994
- Meiklejohn Lecture, 258
- Melton, Gordon, 1262
- Members of the City Council of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers of Vincent*, 1716
 - overbreadth doctrine and, 1139
 - United States v. O'Brien* and, 1113–1114
- Memoirs* (Warren, E.), 1762
- Memoirs v. Massachusetts. See A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Massachusetts*
- "Memorial and Remonstrance Against Religious Assessments" (Madison), 90, 766, 944, 947–948
 - Black, H., and, 550
 - clergy training and, 536
 - establishment clause and, 550
- Memorial Hospital v. Maricopa County*, 129
- "Memorial Remonstrance" (Madison), 531–532
- Mempa v. Rhay*, 1759
- Memphis Free Speech and Headlight*, 1774
- Mencken, H.L., 1426
 - obscenity and, 1121
- Mendel, Gregor, 376
 - heredity and, 545
- Menna v. New York*, 1000
- Mennonites, 1311
 - religious tests for office holding and, 1315
- Mens rea, 1523–1524
 - murder and, 231
 - police power and, 1185
- Menstruation, 1410
- Mental illness, 1000–1001
 - due process and, 855

- GBMI and, 717–718
- homosexuality as, 773
- insanity defense and, 813–814
- involuntary hospitalization and, 1001
- Riggins v. Nevada* and, 1336
- Robinson v. California* and, 1366
- Rush on, 1387
- Sell v. United States* and, 1336
- sex offenders and, 1001
- Mental retardation
 - Atkins v. Virginia* and, 232
 - capital punishment and, 224, 246, 386, 1669
 - due process and, 855
 - equal protection clause and, 192–193
 - false confessions and, 574
 - forced sterilization and, 772
 - Jackson v. Indiana* and, 831–832
 - O'Connor and, 1127
 - proportionality review and, 1242
- Merchandising, 77
- Mercitron, 1165
- Mercy killing. See Euthanasia
- Meredith, James
 - fighting words and, 587
 - Street v. New York* and, 589–590
- MERRIMAC, 1518–1519
- Merryman, John, 923
- Metatags, 823
- Methamphetamine, 1804
- Methodist Episcopal Church of America, 146
- Methodists, 291
- Metro-Goldwyn Mayer Studios (MGM), 1001
- Metro-Goldwyn Mayer Studios v. Grokster*, 1001–1002
- Metromedia, Inc. v. City of San Diego*, 1821
- Metropolitan Community Church of America, 1401
- Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. v. Ward*, 973
- Metzger, Thomas, 1502
- Metzl v. Leininger*, 398–399
- Mexican War, 922
- Mexicans. See also Hispanics
 - immigration and, 1259
 - restrictive covenants and, 1325
 - Rosales-Lopez v. United States* and, 873, 1376
- Mexico
 - Plyler v. Doe* and, 1182
 - undocumented migrants and, 1675
 - United States v. Brignoni-Ponce* and, 1680
 - United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez* and, 1696
- Meyer v. Nebraska*, 466, 1002–1003, 1582, 1597
- liberty and, 801
- McReynolds and, 176, 993
- penumbras and, 1153
- Pierce v. Society of Sisters* and, 1170
- private schools and, 712
- Mezei, Ignatz, 461
- MGM. See Metro-Goldwyn Mayer Studios
- MI5, 639
- MIA. See Montgomery Improvement Association
- Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo*, 1003, 1279–1280
 - Burger and, 205
 - Burger Court and, 202
 - forced speech and, 601
 - freedom of press and, 663, 1354
 - Mills v. Alabama* and, 1014
 - Turner Broadcasting System v. Federal Communications Commission* and, 1669
- Michael H. v. Gerald D.*, 281
- Michelman, Kate, 1062
- Michigan
 - PAS and, 1165
 - personal liberty laws and, 1154
 - Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz*, 1004
 - checkpoints and, 806
 - Michigan v. Chesternut*, 1444
 - Michigan v. Clifford*, 1433
 - Michigan v. DeFillippo*, 1004–1005
 - Michigan v. Long*
 - DWI and, 469
 - frisks and, 1570
 - Stevens and, 1557
 - Supreme Court jurisdiction and, 868
 - Michigan v. Lucas*, 1005
 - Michigan v. Mosley*, 1005–1006
 - Michigan v. Summers*, 1006
 - Michigan v. Tucker*, 1457
 - Mickens v. Taylor*, 810
- Mickey Mouse Act. See Copyright Term Extension Act of 1998
- Microbiology, 430
- Microsoft, 336
- Middle Ages, 1452
- Middle East, 1295
- MIDI, 764
- Military
 - chaplains, 268–269
 - civil liberties in, 1006–1007
 - Congress and, 354–355
 - conscientious objection and, 349–350
 - discharges, 436
 - discretion, 1007
 - don't ask, don't tell policy of, 435–436
 - free exercise and, 698
 - Goldman v. Weinberger* and, 698, 852
 - homosexuals in, 435–436, 885, 1405
 - Jews in, 1007, 1310, 1311
 - jurisdiction, 271–272
 - law, 1006–1008
 - media access to, 995–996
 - overseas, 353
 - policies, 435–436
 - Reid v. Covert* and, 1291
 - religion and, 1474–1475
 - religious freedom in, 1305
 - uniforms, 698–699
 - United States v. Schwimmer* and, 1692–1693
 - women in, 855
- Military bases
 - as nonpublic forums, 1245
 - as public forums, 1663
- Military Commission Instructions, 1009
- Military commission process, 355, 1347
- Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act of 2000, 355
- Military Readiness Enhancement Act, 1461
- Military tribunals, 496, 1008–1010
 - civilians in, 552–553
 - Guantanamo Bay and, 716
 - history of, 1008
 - indefinite detention and, 805
 - justification of, 1008–1009
 - racial profiling and, 790

INDEX

- Military tribunals (cont.)
 - types of, 1008
- Militia Act of 1903, 1341
- Militias, 1448
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 357–358
 - draft and, 1793
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 1726
 - NRA and, 1071
 - plenary power doctrine and, 1180
 - Presser v. Illinois* and, 722, 1342
 - right to bear arms and, 1342
 - Second Amendment and, 721
 - United States v. Miller* (1939) and, 1687
 - Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723
- Milk Wagon Drivers Union v. Meadowmoor Dairies*, 1800
- Milkovich v. Lorain Journal*, 1009
 - group libel and, 715
- Mill, John Stuart, 1010–1011, 1450, 1630
 - free speech theory and, 816
 - harm principle and, 1027–1028, 1709
 - individual liberty and, 1026
 - marketplace of ideas theory and, 962, 1010–1011
 - Montesquieu and, 1031–1032
 - obscenity and, 1119
 - truth theory and, 1641
 - writings of, 1010
- Miller, Arthur, 1270
- Miller, Henry, 1051
- Miller, Jack, 1343
- Miller, Judith, 1473
- Miller, Karen, 168
- Miller, Marvin, 1012
- Miller, Samuel F., 1482
 - Loan Association v. Topeka* and, 927
 - Slaughterhouse Cases* and, 272–273, 514
- Miller, Seaman, 288
- Miller test, 660, 1012
 - CIPA and, 825
 - obscenity and, 850–851
 - reformulation of, 851
- Miller, Tyisha, 154
- Miller v. California*, 46, 83–84, 1012–1013, 1521, 1676
 - Burger Court and, 201
 - New York v. Ferber* and, 1091, 1092
 - obscenity and, 660, 1118, 1124, 1282, 1316
 - overbreadth doctrine and, 1140
 - Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton* and, 1147, 1148
 - Pope v. Illinois* and, 1191
 - Stewart, P., and, 1560
 - Young v. American Mini Theatres* and, 1808
- Miller v. Commonwealth*, 510
- Miller v. Johnson*, 1278
- Miller v. Standard Nut Margarine Co.*, 209
- Miller v. Texas*, 1342
- Miller v. Johnson*, 1726
- Miller, Wallace, 1787
- Miller, Warren, 1461
- Miller-El v. Cockrell*, 114
- Miller-El v. Dretke*, 874
- Millerites, 1461
- Milligan, Lambdin, 272, 551–552, 1008
- Milliken v. Bradley*
 - Burger and, 205, 206
 - equal protection and, 517
- Mills v. Alabama*, 1014
- Milosevic, Slobodan, 306
- Milton, John, 815, 1450
 - marketplace of ideas theory and, 962
 - truth theory and, 1641
 - Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723
- Mincey v. Arizona*, 1014
- Minersville School District v. Gobitis*, 501, 1802
 - Covington and, 372
 - Douglas and, 445
 - flag saluting and, 591–593, 1630
 - Frankfurter and, 619, 782, 1365
 - Jehovah's Witnesses and, 591–593, 848, 1367
 - overruling of, 834
 - Roberts, O., and, 1364
 - Stone and, 1565, 1630
 - West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette* and, 594, 1775
- Minimum wage, 1269
 - Adkins v. Children's Hospital* and, 465
 - equal protection and, 515
 - FLSA and, 570
 - Morehead v. Tipaldo* and, 465
 - for women, 479
- Minimum Wage Act, 928
- Mini-RFRAs, 1549
- Mink v. Salazar*, 1224
- Minnesota
 - gag law, 1364
 - same-sex partners and, 1407
 - sentencing guidelines and, 1458
 - Supreme Court, 1271, 1284
- Minnesota State Fair, 1664
- Minnesota v. Carter*, 1745
 - Breyer and, 183
 - Minnesota v. Olson* and, 1015
 - reasonable expectation of privacy and, 882
- Minnesota v. Dickerson*, 1015
 - plain view and, 1171
- Minnesota v. Martinson*, 1744
- Minnesota v. Olson*, 1015
- Minnick v. Mississippi*, 482
- Minor, John B., 992
- Minor v. Board of Education*, 356
- Minorities. See also specific minority
 - due process and, 1256
 - equal protection clause and, 513
 - First Amendment and, 1574
 - free speech and, 656
 - Plyler v. Doe* and, 1182
 - political patronage and, 1190
 - status offenses and, 1550
- Minors. See also Children; Juvenile(s)
 - abortion and, 34–35, 121–122, 250, 725, 905–906, 1321–1322, 1368–1369
 - Carey v. Population Services International* and, 249–250
 - child pornography and, 282–283
 - classes of, 122
 - execution of, 386
 - Internet and, 825
 - movies and, 1041–1043
 - obscenity protection for, 418
 - Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth* and, 905
 - pornography and, 684–685
 - privacy and, 250
- Minton, Sherman, 1721

- Miracle, The*, 858, 1042
- Miranda, Ernesto, 318, 1016, 1020–1022, 1456, 1764
 Frank and, 616
 release of, 1022
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 1016–1017, 1331, 1455, 1544
 ACLU and, 49–50
 Adamson v. California and, 618
 aftermath of, 1019–1020
 Berkemer v. McCarty and, 122–123
 Boykin v. Alabama and, 172
 Brown v. Mississippi and, 187
 Edwards v. Arizona and, 482
 Escobedo v. Illinois and, 524, 696
 Estelle v. Smith and, 543
 exclusionary rule and, 557–558
 exemplars and, 558
 facts of, 1019
 Fifth Amendment and, 318, 1331, 1345, 1351
 Frank and, 616
 Harlan, II, and, 741
 Harris v. New York and, 747–748
 Illinois v. Perkins and, 794
 jailhouse informants and, 838
 Kamisar and, 881
 Kirby v. Illinois and, 892
 Malloy v. Hogan and, 991–992
 Marshall, T., and, 971
 Mathis v. United States and, 982
 Meese and, 997
 Michigan v. Mosley and, 1005
 Miranda and, 1020–1021
 Miranda warning and, 1018–1020
 New York v. Quarles and, 1093
 Ohio v. Robinette and, 1128
 Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968
 and, 1132
 opinion of, 1019
 Orozco v. Texas and, 1137
 procedural due process and, 952
 Rhode Island v. Innis and, 1331
 scope of, 747–748
 self-incrimination and, 1456–1457
 Souter and, 1496
 Spano v. New York and, 1504
 Stewart, P., and, 1559
 Warren and, 317, 1763, 1764–1765
 Warren Court and, 1758–1759, 1760
 White, B., and, 1779
- Miranda warnings, 318, 1422, 1445, 1455
 Burger and, 205
 Butler v. McKellar and, 209
 Colorado v. Connelly and, 328
 exclusionary rule and, 557–558
 future of, 1020
 history of, 1017
 Miranda and, 1020–1021
 Miranda v. Arizona and, 1016, 1018–1020
 Moran v. Burbine and, 1033–1034
 Rehnquist and, 1286
 text of, 1016
 traffic stops and, 122–123
- Miriari vos*, 253
- Miscegenation laws, 406, 1022–1023, 1541. See also Antimiscegenation statutes interracial cohabitation laws and, 991
- McLaughlin v. Florida*, 991
- Naim v. Naim* and, 1059
 same-sex marriage and, 1023
- “Miscegenation: The Theory of the Blending of the Races Applied to the American White Man and Negro,” 1022
- Misdemeanors
 arrest warrants and, 81
 vagrancy laws and, 1703
 warrantless arrests and, 82
- Mishkin v. New York*, 1023
- A Book Named “John Cleland’s Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure” v. Massachusetts* and, 2
- Ginzburg v. United States* and, 689
- Miller* test and, 1012
- variable concepts of obscenity in, 685
- Mississippi
 literacy tests and, 1729
 religion and, 1538
 same-sex adoption and, 1398–1399
 voting in, 1729–1730
- Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan*
 middle scrutiny test and, 612
 Powell, Lewis, and, 1195
- Mississippi v. Johnson*, 272
- Missouri
 Mormons in, 1036–1037
 self-governance and, 1540
 slavery and, 1155, 1647
- Missouri Compromise
 Calhoun and, 214
 due process clause and, 464–465
 judicial review and, 864
- Missouri ex rel Gaines v. Canada*, 515, 1442
 Butler and, 210
 Hughes and, 782, 784
 Plessy v. Ferguson and, 1181
- Missouri Pacific Railway Company v. Humes*, 586
- Missouri Pacific Railway Company v. Mackey*, 586
- Missouri v. Seibert*, 1457
- Mistretta v. United States*, 1023–1024
- Mistrials, 893
- Mitchell, John, 1025–1026
- Mitchell, Todd, 1787
- Mitchell v. Helms*, 422, 1024–1025, 1424, 1528
 ADL and, 69
 Americans United and, 57
 Breyer and, 183
 Burger Court and, 199
 Charitable Choice and, 270
 Locke v. Davey, 930
 private choice and, 536
 Souter and, 1496
 Wolman v. Walter and, 1791
- Mitchell v. United States*
 Hughes and, 782
 right to remain silent and, 710
 silence and, 710
- Mitigating factors
 capital punishment and, 246, 990
 ineffective assistance of counsel and, 810–811
 Jurek v. Texas and, 866
 Lockett v. Ohio and, 232, 932
 sentencing and, 227
- Mitochondrial disease, 313
- M.K.B. V. warden*, 1626

INDEX

- M.L.B. v. S.L.J.*, 281
 M'Naghten test, 814
Mob Rule in New Orleans (Wells), 1774
 MOBE. See National Mobilization to End the War in Vietnam
Mobile v. Bolden, 1277
 Model Code of Judicial Conduct, 859
 Model Code of Pre-Arrest Procedure, 1444
 "Model of Christian Charity, A" (Winthrop), 298
 Model Penal Code, 9, 433, 1320
 burden of proof and, 196
 Doe v. Bolton and, 9
 entrapment by estoppel and, 510
 proportional punishment and, 1241
 retribution and, 1329
 sodomy and, 1405
 statutory rape and, 1550
 Model State Emergency Health Powers Act, 837
Moll Flanders (Defoe), 649
 Moments of silence, 3, 409
 Lemon test and, 533
 statutes, 1028–1030
 Wallace v. Jaffree and, 530
 Money laundering, 295
 Money Laundering Abatement and Anti-Terrorist Financing Act of 2001, 1149
Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 788
 Monkey trial. See Scopes Monkey Trial
 Monmouth Oil Company, 904
Monongahela Navigation Company v. United States, 1604 Monopolies
 in baseball, 1555
 New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann and, 479
 protection from, 1541
 Sherman Antitrust Act and, 1471
 Slaughterhouse Cases and, 514
 slaughterhouses and, 1481
 Monroe, James
 Calhoun and, 214
 free exercise clause and, 624
 Monroe, James (II), 1030
 Monroe, Marilyn, 1117
Monroe v. Pape, 1030–1031
Monroe v. Soliz, 990
 Montana
 abortions and, 1533
 Alien Land Law in, 1107
 constitution, 1351
 privacy and, 1531
 search and seizure in, 1532
Montana v. Egelhoff, 407
 insanity defense and, 814
Montana v. Oakland, 1108
Monteiro v. Tempe Union High School District, 163
 Montesquieu, Charles, 1031–1032, 1185
 Jefferson and, 847
 Madison and, 944
 Montgomery Bus Boycott, 889
 Montgomery Improvement Association (MIA)
 King and, 889
 marches and, 958
 Montgomery, Olen, 1427
 Monticello, 845
 Moody, William H., 740
 Mooney, Tom, 1762
Mooney v. Holohan, 1032–1033
 Moore, Alfred, 491
 Moore, Alvin, 1021
 Moore, Carzell, 709
 Moore, Roy, 343
 Moore, Underhill, 913
Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 121, 281, 1033
 substantive due process and, 466, 608
Moore v. Dempsey, 1442
 Holmes and, 772
 procedural due process and, 463
 Taft Court and, 1599
Moore v. Nelson, 809
Moose Lodge no. 107 v. Irvis
 freedom of association and, 636
 state action limitation and, 606
 Mootness, 867
Mora v. McNamara, 1560
 Moral Majority, 4, 1413
 Americans United and, 57
 Falwell and, 575
 family values movement and, 577
 school prayer amendment and, 356
 Moral powers, 1272
 Moral suasion, 5
Morales v. Turman, 878–879
 Morality
 censorship and, 942
 Comstock and, 341–342
 family values movement and, 577
 fighting words and, 587
 hate speech and, 754–755
 Hustler Magazine v. Falwell and, 788
 justice and, 1329
 lynching and, 242
 Society for the Suppression of Vice on, 1285
Morals vs. Art (Comstock), 342
Moran v. Burbine, 1033–1034
 Moravians, 1314, 1315
Morehead v. New York ex. rel. Tipaldo, 465
 Butler and, 209
 Morehouse College, 889
 Morella, Constance, 633
 Morgan, J.P., 1280
 Morgan, Lewis, 733
Morgan v. Virginia, 971
 Morgentaler, Henry, 1134
Morrissey v. Brewer, 800
 Morland, Howard, 1694
 Mormon Battalion, 1038
 Mormons
 accommodation and, 22
 antipolygamy laws and, 72
 belief-action and, 118
 Corporation of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos and, 367–368, 1302
 Davis v. Beason and, 396–397
 Foremaster v. City of St. George and, 371
 free exercise and, 625, 1246
 Fuller Court and, 668
 government and, 1037–1040
 Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. United States and, 908 persecution of, 1035

- police power and, 1185
- polygamy and, 964
- public schools and, 1246
- religious liberty and, 1034–1040
- Reynolds v. United States* and, 627, 1330–1331, 1476
- Title VII and, 1660
- Waite Court and, 1732–1733
- Morphine, 64
- Morrill Act of 1862, 72, 1330
 - polygamy and, 1038–1039
 - Waite Court and, 1732–1733
- Morrill, John, 382
- Morris, Herbert, 1645
- Morris, Lewis, 1814
- Morris, Richard B., 358
- Morrison v. Olson*, 1417
- Morrison v. Sadler*, 1402
- Morrow, Dwight, 998
- Morton, Oliver P., 551
- Mosaic law, 1035
- Moscowitz, Henry, 1063
- Mosely, Earl, 361
- Moses, law of, 126
- Mosk, Stanley, 1545
- Moss, John E., 661
- Most susceptible person standard, 1023
- Motes v. United States*, 1040
- Motes, Walter, 1040
- Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA), 1042–1043
- Motion picture industry
 - LOD and, 914
 - production codes, 1041
 - self-censorship, 1041
- Motorcycle helmets, 1709
- Mott, Lucretia, 519
 - marriage laws and, 964
 - women's suffrage and, 1793
- Mott, Stewart, 1062
- Mottos. See also "In God We Trust"
 - state, 702
- Moulson, Deborah, 64
- Movie Producers Production and Distribution Association (MPPDA), 755–756
- Movies, 858. See also Motion picture industry
 - adult, 201, 364, 669, 1318–1319
 - Carmen Baby* and, 1255
 - censorship of, 669–670, 755–756, 1041–1043, 1054–1055
 - City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc.* and, 201, 364, 669, 1318–1319
 - Class of '74* and, 523
 - Code of 1930 and, 755–756
 - copying, 823
 - copyright infringement and, 1001–1002
 - Depression and, 755
 - fair use of, 823
 - FBI and, 774–775
 - Hays and, 755–756
 - HUAC and, 780
 - I, A Woman* and, 212
 - Kingsley International Pictures Corporation v. Regents of the University of New York* and, 891–892
 - Lady Chatterly's Lover* and, 891
 - minors and, 1041–1043
 - Mutual Film Corporation v. Industrial Commission of Ohio* and, 1054–1055
 - Natural Born Killers* and, 210
 - obscenity and, 850–851
 - ratings of, 1041–1043
 - self-censorship of, 1041–1043
 - sexual activity in, 1041
 - sexually explicit, 669
 - VCRs and, 1001
 - zoning ordinances, 669
- Mozert v. Hawkins County Board of Education*, 1044
 - free exercise and, 1246
 - free exercise clause and, 163
 - public schools and, 1246
- MP3.com, 823
- MPAA. See Motion Picture Association of America
- MPPDA. See Movie Producers Production and Distribution Association
- Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle*, 421, 1044–1045, 1514
 - teacher speech and, 1614
- Mueller v. Allen*, 1045–1046, 1528
 - Burger Court and, 199
 - equal access and, 535
 - establishment clause and, 529
 - Mitchell v. Helms* and, 1024
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
 - Wolman v. Walter* and, 1791
- Mugler v. Kansas*, 465
- Mugwumps, 1570
- Muhammad, 1035
- Muir, Robert, Jr., 1254
- Mulatatoes, 1022
- Mullaney v. Wilbur*, 1046, 1410
 - Leland v. Oregon* and, 917
- Muller v. Oregon*, 1596
 - Brandeis and, 174
 - economic rights and, 479
- Multi-State Anti-Terrorism Information Exchange (MATRIX), 1519, 1520
- Munn v. Illinois*
 - economic rights and, 478
 - Field and, 586
 - Waite Court and, 1733
- Murder
 - accomplices, 236
 - of African Americans, 1681
 - cultural defense and, 391
 - false confessions and, 574
 - felony, 230–231
 - Francis v. Franklin* and, 615
 - Gilmore and, 684
 - guilty pleas, 718
 - Hopt v. Utah Territory* and, 777
 - intraracial, 101
 - mandatory death sentences and, 952–953
 - mens rea and, 231
 - Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart* and, 1082
 - Orozco v. Texas* and, 1137
 - PAS and, 1166
 - Patterson v. New York* and, 1150
 - Proffitt v. Florida* and, 1238
 - Prohibition and, 1239
 - proportional punishment and, 1241
 - punishment and, 1328–1329
 - race and, 225
 - Rice v. Paladin* and, 210, 659, 1332

INDEX

Murder (cont.)

- Ricketts v. Adamson* and, 1334
- right to counsel and, 1344
- self-defense and, 974–975
- slavery and, 1483
- spousal, 974–975
- Murdock v. City of Memphis*, 868
- Murdock v. Pennsylvania*, 1390, 1802
 - Follett v. Town of McCormick* and, 599
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 549
 - Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization of California* and, 853
- Murphy, Frank, 1046–1049, 1633, 1757
 - Hirabayashi v. United States* and, 839
 - Hughes Court and, 782
 - Korematsu v. United States* and, 839, 1048
 - New Deal and, 1083
 - nomination of, v
 - obscenity and, 1116–1117
 - Vinson Court and, 1721
- Murphy v. Ramses*, 397
- Murphy v. Waterfront Commission*, 696
- Murphy, William, 1286
- Murray, Donald, 971
- Murray, John Courtney, 254, 1049–1051
- Murray, Pauli, 1068
- Murray, Robert, 1281
- Murray v. City of Austin*, 371
- Murray v. Curlett*, 117–118
- Murray v. Giarrantano*, 886
- Murray v. United States*, 557
- Murray, William, 847
- Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land and Improvement Company*, 462
 - substantive due process and, 464
- Museum of Modern Art, 1052
- Museums, 1051–1052
- Music. See also Hip-hop music; Reggae music
 - copying, 823
 - fair use doctrine and, 572, 823
 - FCC and, 185
 - lyrics, 764–765
- Musical instrumental digital interface. See MIDI
- Muslims. See also Arab Americans; Arabs; Islam
 - after 9/11, 1259
 - autopsies and, 93
 - extremist groups and, 566
 - freedom of religion and, 1052–1054
 - O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz* and, 1130
 - as prisoners, 1214
 - Sunni, 1306
- Must-carry, 1669
- Muste, A.J., 760
- Mutiny Act, 691
- Mutual Film Corporation v. Industrial Commission of Ohio*, 1041, 1054–1055
 - Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson* and, 858
- Muzzy v. Wilkins*, 425
- Myers, Caroline Rulon “Lonny,” 1062
 - NARAL and, 1061
- Myers v. Loudoun County Public Schools*
 - “In God We Trust” and, 1067
 - Pledge of Allegiance and, 1178
- Myers v. United States*, 1601
- Mystery of the Ages* (Armstrong), 366

N

- NAACP. See National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
- NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, Inc. (LDF), 1063
- NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson*, 62, 1057–1058
 - association and, 75
 - compelling state interest and, 340
 - due process and, 801–802
 - freedom of association and, 635, 743
 - Harlan, II, and, 742
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803
 - invasion of privacy and, 828
 - New York ex rel. Bryant v. Zimmerman* and, 1087
 - penumbras and, 1153
 - privacy and, 1220
 - private discriminatory association and, 1226
- NAACP v. Button*, 1058–1059
 - overbreadth doctrine and, 1139
 - public interest and, 972
- NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware*, 302
 - threats and, 1653
- NAC. See Native American Church
- Nadeau, Cynthia, 1655
- Nader v. General Motors Corp.*, 828
- NAF. See National Abortion Federation
- Naier, Aariah, 307
- Naim, Han, 1059
- Naim, Ruby, 1059
- Naim v. Naim*, 1059–1060
 - miscegenation laws and, 1022
- Naked Lunch* (Burroughs), 1051
- Namba v. McCourt*, 1108
- Name. See Appropriation of name or likeness
- Naming, of rape victims, 1261–1262
- Napster, 823, 1002
- Napue v. Illinois*, 35, 1061
 - Giglio v. United States* and, 683
- NARAL Pro-Choice America, 1062
- NARAL. See National Abortion Rights Action League
- Narcotic Rehabilitation Act of 1966, 1743
- Narcotics Control Act, 1743
- Narcotics. See Drugs
- Nardone v. United States*, 1061
- Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, An American Slave* (Douglass), 7, 448
- Nash, Gary, 54
- Nassier, El Sayyid, 898
- Nathanson, Bernard, 1062
- Nation of Islam, 70
- National Abortion Federation (NAF), 633–634
- National Abortion Federation v. Operation Rescue*
 - hindrance clause and, 181
- National Abortion Rights Action League (NARAL), 1061–1063, 1635
- National Agricultural Workers' Union (NAWU), 274
- National Alliance, 566
- National American Woman Suffrage Amendment (NAWSA), 256
- National Anti-Slavery Standard*, 46
- National Association for Repeal of Abortion Laws, 1061
- National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), 1063–1064, 1442, 1500
 - ACLU and, 49
 - Amsterdam and, 60
 - anonymity and, 62
 - Baldwin and, 103

- Beasley and, 549
- boycott by, 1511
- Brown v. Board of Education* and, 186, 959
- Buchanan v. Warley* and, 191
- death penalty and, 240, 1257
- education and, 971
- equal protection and, 515–517
- Evers and, 548
- Frank and, 616
- Frankfurter and, 617
- freedom of association and, 635
- Gibson v. Florida Legislative Committee* and, 681
- Gilmore and, 684
- Hughes and, 784
- immigration and, 1259
- KKK and, 897
- Legal Defense and Education Fund, 223, 616
- Marshall, T., and, 971
- Murphy and, 1047
- NAACP v. Alabama* and, 1057–1058
- NAACP v. Button* and, 1058
- Parks and, 776
- Plessy v. Ferguson* and, 1181
- Scottsboro trials and, 1427
- Storey and, 1571
- Wells and, 1774
- Wilson, W., and, 1784
- National Association of Evangelicals
 - Becker Amendment and, 118
 - Equal Access Act and, 357
- National Association of Theatre Owners, 1042
- National Broadcasting Co. v. United States*, 1279
 - freedom of press and, 663
- National Cable & Telecommunications Association v. Brand X Internet*
 - FCC and, 580
- National Center for State Courts, 206
- National Citizens for Kennedy Committee, 1779
- National Civil Liberties Bureau (NCLB), 47, 102
 - ACLU and, 1798
- National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement, 1184, 1455
 - Prohibition and, 1239
- National Committee to Stop ERA, 520
 - Schlaflly and, 1421
- National Conference of Christians and Jews, 911
- National Council for Japanese American Redress, 842
- National Council of Churches (NCC)
 - Becker Amendment and, 118
 - Warren Court and, 1757
- National Council on Chuches, 357
- National Defense Act of 1916, 1342
- National Defense Association, 1795
- National Defense Authorization Act of 1994, 435
- National DNA Index System, 431–432
- National Education Association
 - ERA and, 520
 - religious school funding and, 1527
 - Zelman v. Simmons-Harris* and, 1813
- National Electronic Task Force Initiative, 1148
- National Endowment for the Arts (NEA), 1065–1066
 - indecentcy and, 700–701
- National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley*, 1065–1066
 - government funding of speech and, 700–701
 - viewpoint discrimination and, 1716
- National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH), 285
- National Era, The*, 1486
- National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association, Inc. v. Sullivan*, 674
- National Farm Workers Association (NFWA), 274
- National Federation of Business, 520
- National Firearms Act of 1934, 720, 1523
 - McReynolds and, 993
 - United States v. Miller* and, 722, 1343, 1687
- National Firearms Registration and Transfer Record, 1523
- National Gazette, The*
 - Madison and, 945
- National Guard, 1342
- National Industry Recovery Act, 1602
- National Jewish Community Relationship Advisory Council (NJCRAC), 852
- National Labor Relations Act, 1269, 1602
 - Communist Party and, 51
 - Goldberg and, 694
 - NLRB and, 1066
 - NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp.* and, 474
 - picketing and, 1169
- National Labor Relations Board (NLRB), 51, 1066
 - Emerson and, 497
 - equal protection and, 515
 - Goldberg and, 694
 - loyalty oaths and, 1719
 - New Deal and, 1083
 - NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago* and, 1100
- National Lawyers Guild, 1773
 - Emerson and, 497
- National League of Cities v. Usery*, 1289
- National Lesbian and Gay Law Association, 909
- National March on Washington for Lesbian and Gay Rights, 1401
- National Marches for Women's Lives, 1069
- National Mobilization to End the War in Vietnam (MOBE), 898
- National motto. See "In God We Trust"
- National Negro Committee, 1063
- National NOW Conference, 522
- National Organization for Women (NOW), 1068–1069
 - ERA and, 520, 522
 - Operation Rescue and, 1134
 - Scheidler v. NOW* and, 181, 1335
- National origins quota system, 1069–1070
- National Park Service
 - AIRFA and, 51
 - TPM and, 1664
- National Political Congress on Black Women
 - Shakur and, 764
- National Prison Project
 - ACLU and, 50
- National Probation Association, 102
- National Prohibition Act
 - Brandeis and, 176–177
 - Olmstead v. United States* and, 1129
 - Prohibition and, 1239
 - search warrant and, 1364
 - Sorrells v. United States* and, 1495
- National Prohibition Law*, 1602
- National Recovery Administration, 497
- National Recovery Review Board, 395
- National Rifle Association (NRA), 1070–1071
 - Gun Control Act of 1968 and, 720
 - McCain-Feingold law and, 220
 - right to bear arms and, 1342

INDEX

- National Right to Life Committee
 - Eagle Forum and, 1134
 - Operation Rescue and, 1133–1134
- National security, 1071
 - antidiscrimination and, 789–790
 - classified information and, 310–311
 - dissent and, 36, 658
 - exclusion and deportation and, 789–792
 - free speech and, 1072–1074
 - indefinite detention and, 805
 - injunctions and, 1212–1213
 - legislation and, 1765
 - prior restraints and, 1074–1076
 - Schlafly and, 1421
 - United States v. United States District Court* and, 1696
 - West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette* and, 595
 - wiretapping and, 856
- National Security Act of 1947, 257
 - Intelligence Identities Protection Act and, 817
 - USA PATRIOT Act and, 1149
- National Security Agency (NSA), 1520
- National Security Council (NSC)
 - CIA and, 257
 - Meese and, 996–997
- National Security Entry-Exit Registration System (NSEER), 1053
- National Sex Offender Public Registry, 997
- National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab*, 1076–1077, 1480, 1746
 - drug testing and, 452–453
- National Victims' Constitutional Amendment network, 1711
- National War Labor Board, 1601
- National Woman Suffrage Association, 65, 1522
- National Women's Party, 520
- Nationalism
 - Marshall, J., and, 1557
 - Stevens and, 1557
- Nationality Act of 1965, 1070
- Naturalization Act of 1940, 562
- Native American Church (NAC), 24, 92–93, 807, 1818
 - AIRFAA and, 501
 - defining religion and, 410
 - Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith* and, 500–501
 - peyote and, 454, 1263, 1305
- Native American Church v. Navajo Tribal Council*, 807
- Native Americans, 1411–1412
 - AIRFA and, 51
 - American Revolution and, 53
 - Bill of Rights and, 1254, 1258
 - citizenship clause and, 293
 - criminal justice and, 1258
 - cultural defense and, 391
 - double jeopardy and, 441
 - Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith* and, 500–501, 630
 - free exercise and, 119–120, 626
 - Friedman v. Board of County Commissioners* and, 371
 - ICRA and, 806–809
 - Indian Civil Rights Act and, 1258
 - Indian Removal and, 833
 - Jackson, A. and, 832–833
 - La Follette and, 901
 - lynching and, 243
 - Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association* and, 629, 939, 1470
 - Madison and, 946
 - marriage and, 963
 - as mascots, 1188
 - miscegenation laws and, 1022
 - Mormons and, 1036–1037
 - police and, 1258
 - property and, 1538
 - Quick Bear v. Leupp* and, 1253–1254
 - racial discrimination and, 1256
 - religious liberty and, 1077–1079
 - religious practices of, 1470
 - RLUIPA and, 1308
 - Social Security and, 168
 - sovereign immunity of, 1411
 - sovereignty of, 807
 - Storey and, 1570
 - tribal courts of, 808–809
- Nativity scenes, 1439
 - County of Allegheny v. ACLU* and, 42, 1313
 - Lemon* test and, 918
 - Lynch v. Donnelly* and, 937–938, 1312, 1314
- Natural Born Killers*, 210
- Natural Law, 1079–1081, 1535
 - Locke and, 930
 - privacy and, 1225
- Natural rights
 - Declaration of Independence and, 401
 - freedom of contract and, 636–637
 - as human rights, 1325
 - as liberty rights, 1326
 - Locke and, 930–931, 1357
 - natural law and, 1080–1081
- Natural Theology* (Paley), 377
- Naturalization, 293–294
 - Gillette v. United States* and, 1143
 - Girouard v. United States* and, 1142
 - illegal, 413
 - pacifists and, 1141–1143
 - revocation of, 413
 - U.S. Constitution and, 353
- Naturalization Act of 1798, 37
- Naturalization Act of 1906, 1141
- Naturalization Act of 1952, 1141
- Naturalization Law of 1790, 796
- Nature*, 313
- Nature of the Judicial Process, The* (Cardozo), 248
- Nauvoo, 1037–1038
- Nauvoo Expositor*, 1038
- Navajo Nation
 - autopsies and, 93
 - ICRA and, 807
 - tribal courts and, 808
- Navajo Nation v. Crockett*, 808
- Navigation Acts, 1803
- Navy, homosexuals in, 885
- NAWSA. See National American Woman Suffrage Amendment
- NAWU. See National Agricultural Workers' Union
- Nazis. See also Neo-nazis
 - ACLU and, 50
 - Baldwin and, 103
 - book banning and, 162
 - citizenship and, 1390
 - Communist Party and, 339
 - eugenic sterilization and, 546
 - freedom of expression and, 639

- hate crime laws and, 749
- HUAC and, 780
- Jackson, R. and, 738, 834–835
- Jehovah’s Witnesses and, 591
- military law and, 1007
- miscegenation laws and, 1022
- Naier and, 307
- New Deal and, 1084
- United States v. Balsys* and, 1680
- NC–17 rating, 1043
- NCC. See National Council of Churches
- NCLB. See National Civil Liberties Bureau
- NEA. See National Endowment for the Arts
- Neal, John R., 1426
- Near, Jay, 784
- Near v. Minnesota*, 48, 74, 1081
 - Brandeis and, 176
 - Butler and, 209
 - Hughes and, 784, 1364
 - Hughes Court and, 782
 - incorporation doctrine and, 804
 - injunctions and, 1210, 1211
 - New York Times v. United States* and, 1089
 - obscenity and, 1116
 - prior restraint and, 659, 892, 1075, 1210
 - prohibition on prior restraints and, 151
 - United States v. The Progressive, Inc.* and, 1694–1695
 - Vance v. Universal Amusement Co., Inc.* and, 1707
- Nebbia v. New York*, 1081–1082
 - economic regulation and, 474
 - McReynolds and, 993
- Nebraska, 1554
- Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart*, 1082
 - Burger Court and, 202
 - freedom of press and, 631–632
 - gag orders and, 662, 671
 - injunctions and, 1213
- Necessary and proper clause
 - extension of, 581
 - federalization of criminal law and, 580
 - Hamilton and, 732
 - Reid v. Covert* and, 354–355
- Necessity, doctrine of, 923
- Need v. intrusion test, 1752
- Negligence standard
 - defamation and, 403
 - false light invasion of privacy and, 574
 - for private individuals, 403
 - in tort law, 1468
- NEH. See National Endowment for the Humanities
- Neighborhood Children’s Internet Protection Act, 825
- Neil v. Biggers*, 956
- Nemo tenetur, 1453, 1454
- Neo-Nazis
 - extremist groups, 565–566
 - hate speech and, 753
- Netherlands
 - euthanasia and, 547
 - same-sex marriage and, 1403
- Neufeld, Peter, 237
- Neumann, Franz, 1032
- Neutral principles doctrine
 - Jones v. Wolf* and, 863
 - Presbyterian Church v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Memorial Presbyterian Church* and, 862–863
- Neutral reportage doctrine, 1082
- Neutrality, religious, 542, 768, 1662
 - in church property disputes, 862–863
 - Everson v. Board of Education* and, 550
 - Jones v. Wolf* and, 857
 - legislative prayer and, 967
 - religion clauses and, 551
 - statutory religion-based exemptions and, 561
- Neutrality test, 289
- Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs*, 613
- New Deal, 1372
 - Biddle and, 133
 - Butler and, 210
 - civil liberties and, 1082–1085
 - Clark, T., and, 308
 - Darrow and, 395
 - Dies and, 419
 - Douglas and, 443
 - economic regulation and, 474
 - economic rights and, 479
 - Edwards v. California* and, 482
 - equal protection during, 515
 - Fortas and, 603
 - “four horsemen” v., 1373
 - Frankfurter and, 617
 - freedom of association and, 635
 - Hiss and, 765
 - impartiality and, 799
 - Jackson, R. and, 833–834
 - judicial review and, 864–865
 - legal realism and, 913
 - Marshall, T., and, 973
 - Murphy and, 1047
 - Nebbia v. New York* and, 1082
 - Rauh and, 1269
 - Stone and, 1564
- New England, 107
- New England Anti-Slavery Society, 4
 - Garrison and, 676
 - Petition Campaign and, 1155
- New England Courant*, 621
- New England Watch and Ward Society, 342
- New Hampshire, 1266
 - forced speech and, 600
 - “In God We Trust” and, 1067
 - proportional punishment and, 1241
 - right of conscience and, 1538
 - same-sex adoption and, 1407–1408
- New Hampshire Constitution of 1784, 438, 1085–1086
- New Jersey
 - civil liberties and, 1545
 - constitution, 1310
 - DWB and, 1237
 - free speech and, 1536
 - jury trials and, 137
 - Petition Campaign and, 1155
 - Ryslik v. Krass* in, 1307
 - same-sex marriage and, 1404
 - school transportation and, 1548
- New Jersey State Crime Lab, 429
- New Jersey Supreme Court
 - Boy Scouts of America v. Dale* and, 170
 - Committee on Evidence, 25
- New Jersey v. T.L.O.*, 124, 282, 1086
- Veronica School District v. Acton* and, 1707

INDEX

- New Lights, 108
- New Mexico Territory, 1649
- New Model Army, 507
- New Paltz, New York, 1402
- “New Property, The” (Reich), 692
- New Reformation, 107
- New Republic*
 - Chafee in, 311
 - Frankfurter and, 617
 - Hand and, 736
 - Holmes and, 658
- New Right, 1086–1087
- New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann*
 - Brandeis and, 1557
 - economic rights and, 479
- New York
 - “Bible war” in, 1293
 - Comstock law of, 1410
 - Constitution, 1294, 1311
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1263, 1264, 1267–1268
 - education in, 1526
 - foster care in, 1489
 - free conscience and, 1539
 - free textbooks and, 1548
 - general warrants and, 1751
 - LaRocca v. Lane* in, 1307
 - Lindenmuller v. People* in, 1311
 - Petition Campaign and, 1155
 - pretrial detentions and, 1419
 - Public School Society, 1293
 - religious education in, 1292–1293
 - Rockefeller Drug Laws and, 1743
 - same-sex partners and, 1409
 - SLAPP and, 1481
 - Valentine v. Chrestensen* and, 1706
- New York Bar, 248
- New York Board of Regents
 - Abington Township School District v. Schempp* and, 2
 - Miracle, The* and, 858
 - school prayer and, 408
- New York City College, 1378
- New York City Police Department, 154
- New York Civil Liberties Union
 - campaign finance reform and, 219
 - Hentoff and, 760
- New York ex rel Bryant v. Zimmerman*, 1087
- New York Herald Tribune*
 - reporter’s privilege and, 663–664
- New York Journal*, 1267
- New York Law School, 898
- New York Manumission Society, 732
- New York Milk Control Board, 1081
- New York Society for the Suppression of Vice
 - Comstock and, 342
 - obscenity and, 1123
- New York State Catholic Welfare Committee, 1042
- New York State Club Ass’n v. City of New York*, 1226
- New York State Education Department, 891
- New York State Liquor Authority, 123
- New York State Liquor Authority v. Bellanca*, 216
- New York Stock Exchange (NYSE), 26
- New York Supreme Court, 248
- New York Times*
 - Branzburg v. Hayes* and, 179
 - cloning and, 314
 - Mitchell and, 1026
 - shield laws and, 1473
 - TRO to, 1075
- New York Times Co. v. Sullivan*, 27, 184, 1088, 1441
 - actual malice standard and, 403
 - burden of proof and, 197
 - Burger Court and, 201–202
 - commercial speech and, 330
 - common law and, 336
 - defamation and, 402, 680
 - false light invasion of privacy and, 574
 - First Amendment and, 646
 - free speech and, 1642–1643
 - Herbert v. Lando* and, 761
 - libel and, 39, 302, 660
 - Lingens v. Austria* and, 639
 - Meiklejohn and, 999–1000
 - national security and, 1072
 - offensive speech and, 117
 - Pickering v. Board of Education* and, 1166
 - political advertising and, 632
 - public figures and, 1242
 - public officials and, 1245
 - Sedition Act and, 68
 - teacher speech and, 1614
 - Time, Inc. v. Hill* and, 1657
 - Warren Court and, 1753, 1754, 1760
 - Zenger and, 1815–1816
- New York Times Co. v. United States*, 14–15, 1088–1091
 - Burger Court and, 202
 - injunctions and, 1212
 - national security and, 1071
 - Near v. Minnesota* and, 659
 - Pentagon Papers and, 311, 658
 - prior restraints and, 1075
 - Sunday Times v. United Kingdom* and, 638–639
 - Vietnam War and, 1695
- New York Tribune*, 649
- New York v. Belton*, 1091
- New York v. Burger*, 28
- New York v. Ferber*, 83, 1091–1093
 - Burger Court and, 201
 - child pornography and, 284, 660
 - family values movement and, 578
 - First Amendment and, 282
 - obscenity and, 1119, 1124
 - Osborne v. Ohio* and, 1138
 - overbreadth doctrine and, 1140
- New York v. Miln*, 1606
 - police power and, 1184
- New York v. Quarles*, 1093, 1457
- New York v. United States*, 167, 1589
- New York Weekly Journal*, 644
 - Cosby and, 869
 - freedom of press and, 1202
 - national security and, 1072
 - sedition and libel and, 734
 - Zenger and, 1814
- New York World*, 646
- New Yorker, The*, 760
- New Zealand
 - same-sex unions in, 1404
 - women and, 1728
- Newdow v. United States Congress*
 - Pledge of Allegiance and, 1178, 1179

- New-England Courant*, 1202
- Newman, John Henry, 254
- News gathering
- Branzburg v. Hayes*, 994
 - grand juries and, 708
- News media. See also Press
- appropriation of name or likeness and, 77
 - cameras in courtrooms and, 218
- Newsom, Gavin, 1402
- Newspapers. See also Press
- newsroom searches and, 1093–1094
 - student, 1699
- Newsroom searches, 1093–1094
- Newsweek*, 416
- NFWA. See National Farm Workers Association
- Ng Fung Ho v. White*, 177
- NGRI. See Insanity defense
- Nguyen v. INS*, 1530
- Niagara Movement, 1063
- Nichol v. Arin Intermediate Unit 28*, 1307
- Nicholas II, Tsar, 339
- Nichols, Terry, 565, 1622–1623
- separate prosecutions and, 441
- Niebuhr, Reinhold, 298
- Niemotko v. Maryland*
- Vinson and, 1722
 - Vinson Court and, 1720
- Nike, 332
- Nike v. Kasky*, 332
- 9/11, 1519, 1623
- ACLU and, 50
 - airport searches and, 33–34
 - Arab Americans after, 1259
 - Ashcroft and, 84
 - balancing test and, 101
 - CIA and, 258
 - Dershowitz and, 416–417
 - DHS and, 415
 - emergency powers and, 495
 - extremist groups and, 564–567
 - FOIA and, 641
 - government operations information and, 21
 - Guantanamo Bay and, 715–716
 - immigration after, 789, 1259
 - Japanese internment and, 842
 - material witness detention and, 805
 - material witnesses and, 981
 - military law and, 1007
 - Miranda warnings and, 1020
 - Muslim civil rights and, 1052
 - Muslims after, 1259
 - national security after, 789
 - privacy and, 347
 - right to counsel and, 1346–1347
 - War on Terror and, 1094–1095
- Nineteenth Amendment, 1275, 1541, 1727–1728
- Catt and, 256
 - federalization of criminal law and, 581
 - noncitizens and, 1105–1106
 - voting rights and, 1356–1357, 1726
 - women's suffrage and, 520, 1794
- Ninth Amendment, 144, 459, 1095–1097
- Congress and, 1325, 1326, 1327, 1328
 - fundamental rights and, 697
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803, 804
 - Madison and, 1324, 1326–1327
 - natural rights and, 1080
 - plenary power doctrine and, 1180
 - police power and, 1185
 - privacy and, 1219, 1226
 - retained rights, 1325–1328
 - Roe v. Wade* and, 9, 1221
 - substantive due process and, 466–467
 - Warren Court and, 1760
- Nix v. Williams*, 1097–1098
- illegal search and seizure and, 557
- Nixon, Lawrence, 1571
- Nixon, Richard M., 1098–1100
- ACLU and, 50
 - Bork and, 165
 - Burger and, 203–204, 1384
 - campaign financing and, 219
 - CIA and, 258
 - drugs and, 1743
 - Frank and, 616
 - gag rules and, 672
 - HUAC and, 780
 - Johnson, L., and, 856
 - McCarthy and, 985
 - Mitchell and, 1025–1026
 - New York Times v. United States* and, 1089
 - obscenity and, 1115
 - Oval Office tapes and, 311
 - pardons and commutations and, 1145–1146
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1193
 - Rehnquist and, 1286–1287, 1289
 - St. Clair and, 306
 - Stevens and, 1556
 - Time, Inc. v. Hill* and, 1657
 - War on Drugs and, 1739
 - Warren and, 1762
 - wiretapping of, 856
- Nixon v. Condon*, 210
- Nixon v. Herndon*, 1571
- Nixon v. Shrink Missouri Government PAC*, 1650
- Nixon v. Warner Communications, Inc.*, 21
- NJRAC. See National Jewish Community Relationship Advisory Council
- NLRB. See National Labor Relations Board
- NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago*, 1100–1101, 1301–1302
- establishment clause and, 537
- NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co.*, 1653
- NLRB v. Inland Steel Co.*
- Goldberg and, 694
- NLRB v. Jones and Laughlin Steel Corporation*, 1066
- economic regulation and, 474
- No contest plea, 1175
- No Cross, No Crown* (Penn), 1152
- No Electronic Theft Act, 823
- No endorsement test, 1102, 1103–1105
- No Equal Justice* (Cole), 33
- No knock warrants, 1690
- No trespassing signs, 1133
- Noah v. AOL Time Warner, Inc.*, 45
- Nobel Peace Prize
- King and, 890
 - Ryan nominated for, 1393
- No-coercion test, 768. See also Coercion
- Lemon* test alternatives and, 534–535
- Noerr-Pennington* doctrine, 1353

INDEX

- Nollan v. California Coastal Commission*, 1605, 1674
 Nolle prosequi with leave, 893
 Nolo contendere, 1175
 Noncitizens. See also Alien(s); Immigrants civil liberties of, 380–381, 1105–1107 deportation and, 40
 due process for, 460
 exclusion and, 40, 789 family unity for, 576
 Fong Yue Ting v. United States and, 600 franchise and, 1107
 IMFA and, 795
 land ownership and, 1107–1108
 In re Griffiths and, 812
 Non-delegation doctrine, 1024
 Nondisclosure agreements, 659
 Nondiscrimination. See Discrimination
 Non-funding provisions, 152–153
 Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs), 59
 Nonpartisan League, 174
 Non-preferentialism standard, 90, 767, 1108–1110
 Nonpublic forums, 1245
 Nonviolence, 412
 Nonviolent noncooperation, 889
 Noriega, Manuel, 1076
 Norman Conquest, 437
 Norris, Clarence, 1427
Norris v. Alabama, 1428
North Briton, The, 1749
 North Carolina
 Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1326
 general warrants and, 1751
 literacy tests and, 1729
 reapportionment in, 1278
 Ross v. Moffitt and, 1380–1381
 undocumented migrants and, 1675
 voting in, 1729–1730
 North Carolina Constitution of 1776, 1110–1111
North Carolina v. Alford, 1111
 guilty pleas and, 719
North Carolina v. Pearce, 1111–1112
 Blackledge v. Perry and, 149
 North Dakota, 1540
North Jersey Media Group v. Ashcroft deportation and, 496, 1626
North Star, 448
 Northern Ireland, 1295
Northern Pacific Railway v. North Dakota, 1778
Northern Pipeline Construction Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line
 federal court jurisdiction and, 867
 Northern Securities Company, 1472
 Northwest Ordinance of 1787
 equal protection and, 514
 property ownership and, 476
 Northwest Territory, 845
 Northwestern University, 1393
 capital punishment and, 237
 Chemerinsky and, 276
 Goldberg and, 693
 Hentoff and, 760
 Nosair, El Sayyid, 306
 Nostra aetate, 254
 “Notes on England” (Montesquieu), 1032
Notes on Virginia (Jefferson), 846
 Notices, due process and, 458
 Notification procedures, 997
Noto v. United States
 freedom of association and, 635
 Smith Act and, 1488
 Notorious B.I.G., 764
N.O.W. v. Scheidler
 Operation Rescue and, 1135
 NRA. See National Rifle Association
 NSA. See National Security Agency
 NSEER. See National Security Entry-Exit Registration System
 Nude dancing
 City of Erie v. Pap’s A.M. and, 523
 content-neutral regulation and, 364 expressive conduct and, 1688
 freedom of expression and, 523 liquor licensing and, 215–216
 overbreadth doctrine and, 1139
 Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton and, 1148
 Schad v. Mt. Ephraim and, 1418
 secondary effects doctrine and, 1436–1437
 United States v. O’Brien and, 1114
 Young v. American Mini Theatres and, 1808
 Nudity, 111. See also Obscenity
 Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville and, 523–524
 United States v. O’Brien and, 1114
 as victimless crime, 1709
 Nugent, John, 663
 Nullification, 214
 Jefferson and, 846
 Kentucky and Virginia Resolves and, 887
 Nuremberg Files, 819–820, 1172
 Nuremberg Trials, 354, 1718
 Biddle and, 134
 Jackson, R. and, 834
 NWA, 764
 NYSE. See New York Stock Exchange
- ## O
- Oaths. See also Loyalty oaths
 ex officio, 1452–1453
 in judicial proceedings, 861
 Lilborne and, 919
 public office, 425
 Quakers and, 1251
 self-incrimination and, 1452
 Test and Corporation Acts and, 504
 United States v. Schwimmer and, 1692–1693
 U.S. Constitution and, 352
 Objections, timeliness of, 544
 Objective reasonableness, 597
 O’Brien, David Paul, 363, 449, 1688
O’Brien test, 363–364, 449–450, 1113–1114
 Obscene Publications Act, 1286
 Obscenity, 1115–1122, 1699. See also Indecency adversary hearings and, 1435–1436
 advertising and, 1012
 art and, 1051
 Beecher-Tilton Scandal and, 649
 birth control as, 1539
 Board of Education v. Pico and, 156
 A Book Named “John Cleland’s Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure” v. Massachusetts and, 1–2
 Bruce and, 188–189

- Burger Court and, 201
- Cain v. Kentucky* and, 212
- California v. Larue* and, 215–216
- on campuses, 1507
- Carmen Baby* and, 1255
- categorical speech and, 1671
- Comstock Act and, 353, 1054
- Comstock and, 341–342
- congressional regulation of, 955
- definition of, 660
- dial-a-porn services and, 418
- Douglas and, 447
- dress codes and, 1578
- Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville* and, 523
- FCC and, 579
- First Amendment and, 1271, 1382
- Flynt and, 599
- Fourth Amendment and, 933
- free speech and, 815, 1539
- freedom of expression and, 1163–1164
- Ginsberg v. New York* and, 684–685, 1042, 1316
- Hair and, 1499
- Hess v. Indiana* and, 763
- Hicklin* trial and, 659
- in history, 1122–1125
- homosexuals and, 956–957
- hostile environment harassment and, 778
- identifying, 46
- injunctions and, 1211
- Internet and, 819
- Internet filtering and, 824–825
- Jacobellis v. Ohio* and, 835–836
- Jenkins v. Georgia* and, 850–851
- Kingsley International Pictures Corporation v. Regents of the University of New York* and, 892
- Kois v. Wisconsin* and, 894
- in Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 933
- MacKinnon and, 943
- mail and, 956, 1410
- Miller test and, 850–851, 1012–1013
- Miller v. California* and, 660, 1012–1013, 1283, 1317, 1521
- Mishkin v. New York* and, 1023
- One, Inc. v. Olesen* and, 677
- Oregon and, 1539
- Osborne v. Ohio* and, 1138
- Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton* and, 1147, 1283
- Pope v. Illinois* and, 1191
- pornography and, 304, 660
- prior restraints and, 1209
- privacy and, 1220
- private possession of, 1228
- probable cause and, 933
- protection for minors, 418
- public nuisance and, 1706
- Redrup v. New York* and, 1282
- Regina v. Hicklin, L.R.* and, 1285–1286
- Reno v. ACLU* and, 1316
- Rosen v. United States* and, 1286
- Roth v. United States* and, 1382, 1383, 1521
- Smith v. California* and, 1488–1489
- Southeastern Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad* and, 1499
- Stanley v. Georgia* and, 1521, 1677
- states and, 850
- Stewart, P., and, 1560
- strict liability and, 1573
- Swearingen v. United States* and, 1592
- test, 659–660
- 2 Live Crew and, 765
- Ulysses* and, 659
- United States v. Bennett* and, 1286
- United States v. One Book Entitled “Ulysses”* and, 1688–1689
- United States v. Orito* and, 1677
- United States v. Reidel* and, 1690–1691
- United States v. Thirty-Seven Photographs* and, 1676
- Vance v. Universal Amusement Co., Inc.* and, 1706–1707
- variable concepts of, 685
- as victimless crime, 1709
- vulgar speech and, 1248
- Warren and, 1765
- Warren Court and, 1755
- Washington Supreme Court and, 1255
- Observer, The*, 5
 - Amnesty International and, 59
- Obsta principiis, 171
- O’Callahan v. Parker*, 1007
- O’Connor, Sandra Day, 1126–1128, 1127
 - Agostini v. Felton* and, 31, 1527
 - Aguilar v. Felton* and, 33
 - appointment of, 10
 - Apprendi v. New Jersey* and, 76
 - balancing and, 100
 - Board of Education v. Mergens* and, 1298
 - Bowers v. Hardwick* and, 909
 - Burger Court and, 198
 - Cable News Network, Inc. v. Noriega* and, 1076
 - ceremonial deism and, 258–259
 - City of Boerne, Texas v. Flores* and, 768
 - City of Littleton v. Z.J. Gifts D4, LLC* and, 926
 - City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc.* and, 1319
 - City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc.* and, 1318
 - coercion and, 1102
 - Corporation of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos* and, 368, 1302
 - Corporation of Presiding Bishop v. Amos* and, 630
 - Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health* and, 389
 - Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co.* and, 878
 - Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow*, 490, 1177
 - Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith* and, 501
 - endorsement test and, 536, 539
 - Enmund v. Florida* and, 245
 - FW/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dallas* and, 670
 - Grutter v. Bollinger* and, 19, 517
 - Handi v. Rumsfeld* and, 731, 842–843
 - on Harlan, II, 741
 - “In God We Trust” and, 1067
 - Lynch v. Donnelly* and, 41–42, 200, 528–529, 1029, 1312–1314
 - Maher v. Roe* and, 1221
 - Mitchell v. Helms* and, 1025
 - moments of silence statutes and, 1029
 - National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley* and, 701, 1065
 - no endorsement test and, 1103
 - non-preferentialism standard and, 1108
 - ODWDA and, 1137
 - Osborne v. Ohio* and, 1138
 - partial birth abortion and, 1555
 - Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps* and, 1158
 - Pledge of Allegiance and, 1177
 - Plyler v. Doe* and, 1182
 - Pope v. Illinois* and, 1191

INDEX

- O'Connor, Sandra Day (cont.)
 Powell, Lewis, and, 1193, 1195
 proportional punishment and, 1241
R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul and, 1271
 on religious symbols, 938
Reno v. ACLU and, 1316
 resignation of, 10–11, 1322, 1323
Roberts v. United States Jaycees and, 170
Roe v. Wade and, 1221
 same-sex marriage and, 1400
 school prayer and, 1197
Shaw v. Reno and, 1278
Stenberg v. Carhart and, 1287
Texas Monthly v. Bullock and, 1628–1629
Vacco v. Quill and, 87
Virginia v. Black and, 1724–1725
Wallace v. Jaffree and, 1737
 War on Terror and, 1094
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services and, 1770
Zelman v. Simmons-Harris and, 1813
O'Connor v. Donaldson, 1001
O'Connor v. Ortega, 1128
 O'Dell, Jack, 776
 O'Dell, Joseph, 429
 Odors, dog sniffs and, 489
 ODWDA. See Oregon Death with Dignity Act
 O'Dwyer, William, 582
 Offensive speech, 117
Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp. and, 161
Cohen v. California and, 321
 Flynt and, 599
 government speech and, 702
 hostile environment harassment and, 778–779
 infliction of emotional distress and, 811
 Internet and, 819
 Office holding. See also Religious tests for office holding Fourteenth Amendment and, 1726
 multiple, 358
 Office of Economic Stabilization, 497
 Office of Homeland Security, 415
 Office of National Drug Control Policy, 1744
 Office Of Naval Intelligence, 841–842
 Office of Special Investigations, 1680
 Office of Strategic Services (OSS), 257
 Goldberg and, 694
 Office of Telecommunications Policy, 1416
 Office of the Special Rapporteur on Freedom of Expression, 640
 Official immunity doctrine, 868
Ogden v. Saunders, 213
 “Oh, Pretty Woman” (Orbison and Dees), 1414
 fair use doctrine and, 572
O'Hair v. Murray, 1067
O'Hare Truck Services, Inc. v. City of Northlake, 179 political patronage and, 1189
 Scalia and, 1417
 Ohio
 Christianity and, 1538
 Good Friday and, 399
 personal liberty laws and, 1154
 Petition Campaign and, 1155
 Raley v. Ohio and, 510, 1260
 Supreme Court, 1260
 Ohio Court of Appeals, 1009
 Ohio Pilot Scholarship Program, 1812
Ohio v. Roberts
 compulsory process clause and, 344
 confrontation clause and, 345–346
Ohio v. Robinette, 1128–1129
 Ohl, Jessie, 395
Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Association, 1235 lawyer advertising and, 910
 Oklahoma, 1146
 Oklahoma City bombing, 565, 728, 1622–1623
 AEDPA and, 233
 extremist groups and, 565
 United States v. McVeigh and, 1428
 Oklahoma City Police Department Crime Lab, 429
Oklahoma v. Williamson, 343
 Old Lights, 108
 Old Pretender, 690
Olden v. Kentucky, 396
O'Leary v. County of Sacramento, 371
Oliver v. United States, 1532, 1745
 Hester v. United States and, 763
 privacy and, 1220
 Olmstead, Roy, 1129
Olmstead v. United States, 445, 1129–1130, 1429, 1521, 1591
 Brandeis and, 176–177, 1368, 1629
 Butler and, 209
 civil liberties and, 1629
 Holmes and, 772
 implied rights and, 801
 Katz v. United States and, 882
 overruling of, 123
 penumbras and, 1153
 privacy and, 1218
 right to privacy and, 772, 802, 1369
 Taft Court and, 1599, 1601–1602
 Olney, Richard, 1472
O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 1130–1132, 1470, 1650
 free exercise and, 629, 1215
Olsen v. Drug Enforcement Administration, 455
 Olson, Culbert L., 1762
 Olympics, bombing of, 565
 Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, 487, 992, 1132, 1435, 1519
 USA PATRIOT Act and, 1149
 wiretapping and, 1785
 Omnibus Diplomacy Security and Antiterrorism Act of 1986, 1148
Omoegbon v. Wells, 1700
 “On Civil Disobedience” (Thoreau), 847
On Crimes and Punishments (Beccaria), 238–239
On Lee v. United States, 1132–1133, 1429, 1430
 Douglas and, 445
On Liberty (Mill), 1011, 1027, 1450
On Reading the Constitution (Tribe), 1668
On the Subjection of Women (Mill), 1010–1011
 On-demand video, 1714
One, Inc. v. Olesen, 677
 Oneida Indian Nation, 809
 O'Neil, Patrick, 130
O'Neil v. Vermont
 Fuller Court and, 667
 Harlan, I, and, 739
 One-person, one vote, 1276
 Harlan, II, and, 741
 Online communication, 63
Only Words (MacKinnon), 943
 Ontario, Canada, same-sex marriage and, 1403

Open fields doctrine, 1133
 privacy and, 1220
 Open meetings law, 642
 Open-air assembly courts and, 1397
 by Salvation Army, 1397
 Operating while intoxicated. See OWI
 Operation Rescue, 12, 1133–1135
 Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic and, 180–181
 FACE Act and, 633
 Madsen v. Women's Health Center and, 66
 McCorvey and, 988
 NOW and, 1068
 Operation Save America, 1135
Opinion of the Justices
 “In God We Trust” and, 1067
 Opinions, binding v. persuasive, 459
 Opium, 1743
 War on Drugs and, 1740
 Oral intercourse, 1492–1493
 Orange, William of
 English Bill of Rights and, 503
 English liberties and, 507
 Glorious Revolution and, 690–691
 Magna Carta and, 949
 Orbison, Roy, 1414
 fair use doctrine and, 572
 Order No. 11, 709
 Oregon
 Alien Land Law in, 1107
 civil liberties and, 1543, 1545
 Cooper v. Eugene School District in, 1306–1307
 free speech and, 1536
 obscenity and, 1539
 PAS and, 1165–1166
 Pierce v. Society of Sisters and, 1170
 public schools and, 1548
 Oregon Death with Dignity Act (ODWDA), 87, 1135–1137
 Oregon National Guard, 899–900
Oregon v. Hass, 748
Oregon v. Mathiason, 318–319
O'Reilly v. New York Times Co., 1307
Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 1210 Organizations
 Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, 301
 government funding of, 927
 nonprofit, 761 subversive, 681
 Organized crime
 Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 and, 1132
 Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps and, 1158
Origin of the Species by Means of Natural Selection, On the (Darwin), 545, 1617
 Originalism, 1086
Orloff v. Willoughby
 Goldman v. Weinberger and, 699
 military law and, 1006
Orozco v. Texas, 1137–1138
 Ortega, Magno, 1128 Orthodox Jews
 autopsies and, 93
 Braunfeld v. Brown and, 1470, 1756
 Orthodox rule, 831

Osborn, Charles, 1155
Osborne v. Ohio, 283, 284, 1138
 obscenity and, 1119
 overbreadth doctrine and, 1139
 OSS. See Office of Strategic Services
 O'Sullivan, Gilbert, 764
Othello, 402
 Otis, James, 54, 1138–1139, 1750, 1751
 Ottoman Empire, War on Drugs and, 1740
 Outward looking, 1225
 Oval Office tapes, 311
 Overbreadth doctrine, 1139–1140, 1419, 1704. See also Vagueness
 Virginia v. Black and, 1724–1725
 Warren Court and, 1753–1754
 Overreaching, 875
 Overtime pay, 570
 Ovington, Mary White, 1571
 NAACP and, 1063
 Owen, Robert Dale, 649
 OWI (operating while intoxicated), 469
Oyama v. California
 land ownership and, 1107–1108
 Vinson Court and, 1720
 Oyer, 458
Ozawa v. United States
 Brandeis and, 177
 Taft Court and, 1599

P

P2P networks. See Peer-to-peer networks
Pace v. Alabama, 1059
Pacemaker Diagnostic Clinic of America, Inc. V. Instromedix, Inc., 884
Pacific Gas & Electric v. California Energy Resources Conservation & Development Commission
 Tribe and, 1668
 Pacifica Foundation, 579, 1316
 Pacifism
 Bond and, 162
 Catt and, 256
 free speech laws and, 816
 naturalization and, 1141–1143
 Quakers and, 1251
 United States v. Macintosh and, 784
 U.S. Constitution and, 353
 PACs. See Political action committees
 Padilla, Jose, 1020, 1346–1347
Padilla v. Hanft, 1095
 Page Act, 260
 Page Law of 1875, 1465
 Page School of International Relations, 603
 Paine, Thomas, 1143, 1387, 1631
 Bache and, 96 conviction of, 646
 free speech law and, 815
 PAS and, 6
Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 183
 Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), 306
 Palestinian–Israeli conflict, 70
 Paley, William, 377
Palko v. Connecticut, 75, 1391
 Bill of Rights and, 1633
 Brandeis and, 176
 Cardozo and, 249

INDEX

- Palko v. Connecticut* (cont.)
 due process incorporation and, 607–608
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 1632
 Frankfurter and, 617–618
 implied rights and, 801
 incorporation doctrine and, 803
 overturning of, 122
 penumbras and, 1153
 preferred position rule and, 1199
 procedural due process and, 463
- Palmer, A. Mitchell, 1144, 1799
 Democratic Party and, 1281
 Frankfurter and, 617
 Hoover and, 774, 1281
 spying and, 1518
 Wilson, W., and, 1784, 1785
- Palmer Raids, 658, 1395, 1396, 1518
 Chafee and, 261, 1281
 Hoover and, 774, 1281
 red scare and, 1798
 Wilson, W., and, 1785
- Palmer v. Clarke*, 486
- Palmieri, Edmund L., 686
- Palmore v. Sidoti*, 281
- Pamphlets
Abrams v. United States and, 771
Bolger v. Youngs Drugs and, 331 commercial, 838
 Comstock and, 342
 hate speech and, 753
Hill v. Colorado and, 361
Jamison v. Texas and, 838
Lee v. Weisman and, 911
 military law and, 1007
- Pandas and People*, 378
- Pandering
Ginzburg v. United States and, 688–689
Roth test and, 689
- Panel. See Venire
- Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville*, 1144–1145
- Papal Birth Control Commission, 1050
- Pape, Frank, 1030
- Pap's A.M., 523
- Parades
 forced speech and, 601
 gay and lesbian rights and, 785–786
 injunctions and, 1210, 1211–1212
 Neo-Nazis, 1211–1212
 by Salvation Army, 1397
- Paramount-Richards Theatres v. City of Hattiesburg*, 343
- Parchment barriers, 945–946
- Pardons and commutations, 1145–1147
 federal, 1145–1146
 felon disenfranchisement and, 583 former, 437
 history of, 437
 state, 1146
- Parens patriae, 1001, 1283
 preventative detention and, 1208
- Parental consent
Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth
 and, 1173
Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft and, 1174
- Parental Notification of Abortion Act, 906
- Parental rights
 adoption and, 279–280
 custodial liberties, 281
 incarceration and, 1463
Pierce v. Society of Sisters and, 1171
- Parents
 adoptive, 280
 foster, 281
 Protection of Children Against Sexual Exploitation Act of 1977
 and, 283
Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 1013, 1147–1148, 1283
 obscenity and, 1118, 1124
- Parker, John J., 1364
 in Commonwealth v. Blanding, 645
 NAACP and, 1064
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette and, 593
- Parker, John M., 774
- Parker v. Levy*, 699
- Parkinson's disease, 1551
- Parks
 public forum doctrines and, 1243
 as public forums, 1663
- Parks, Rosa, 776, 1064
 King and, 889
- Parochial schools
 establishment clause and, 529
 government funding and, 542, 549
Wolman v. Walter and, 1527
- Parody
 copyright and, 1413
 fair use doctrine and, 572
 Falwell and, 575
 First Amendment and, 1413–1414
 Flynt and, 599
Hustler Magazine v. Falwell and, 787
 v. satire, 1414
 vulgar speech and, 1248
- Parole
 African Americans and, 1257
 Hispanics and, 1257
 race and, 1257
 revocation hearings, 1152
 revocation of, 800
- Parolees, search of, 1433
- Parsons v. State*, 814
- Partial birth abortion, 10
Stenberg v. Carhart and, 1554–1555
- Participation objection, 1439
- Partin, Edward, 769
- PAS. See Physician-assisted suicide
- Pasquino, Pasquale, 494–495
- Passive resistance
Brown v. Board of Education and, 949
 King and, 889
- Passport Bill
Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei and, 1467
- Passports
Haig v. Agee, 730
Kent v. Dulles and, 886–887
- Pataki, George, 189
- Pat-down. See Stop and Frisk
- Pate, Macel, 575
- “Patent for Providence Plantations,” 327
- Patents business methods, 824
 intellectual property rights and, 816, 824

- Metro-Goldwyn Mayer Studios v. Grokster* and, 1001–1002
- Paterson, William
- Ellsworth Court and, 491
 - Jay Court and, 843
- Patient-physician relationship, 673
- Patients' rights, 1254
- Patriarcha* (Filmer), 505
- Patriarchy, 1400
- Patriot Act. See USA PATRIOT Act
- Patriotism, 595
- children and, 592
 - Federalists and, 37
 - flag saluting and, 592
 - Stone on, 593
- Patronage. See Political patronage
- Patterson, Haywood, 1427
- Patterson, John, 959
- Patterson, Thomas, 770, 1795
- national security and, 1073
- Patterson v. Alabama*, 49
- Patterson v. Colorado*, 151, 466, 770, 1795
- Fuller Court and, 668
 - Holmes and, 740, 770
 - Meiklejohn and, 999
- Patterson v. McClean Credit Union*
- Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
- Patterson v. New York*, 1150
- Mullaney v. Wilbur* and, 1046
- Patterson, William, 477
- Paty, Selma Cash, 989
- Paul, Alice
- ERA and, 520
 - women's suffrage and, 1793–1794
- Paul v. Davis*, 1150–1151
- procedural due process and, 609
- Pauline Christianity, 1035
- Payne v. Tennessee*, 385
- victim impact statements and, 1709
 - victims' rights and, 1711
- Payton v. New York*, 81, 1151
- Fourth Amendment and, 82
- PBA. See Public Broadcasting Act of 1967
- Pearl Harbor attack
- DeWitt and, 418
 - emergency powers and, 496
 - Hoover and, 775
 - Japanese internment and, 839
- PEARL. See Public Education and Religious Liberty
- Pearl v. Reagan*, 1527
- Pearson, John J., 145
- Bingham and, 146
- Pearson v. Murray*, 1442
- Pease, Elizabeth, 681
- Peckham, Rufus Wheeler
- Allgeyer v. Louisiana* and, 1633
 - Bradfield v. Roberts* and, 172
 - France v. United States* and, 615
 - Lochner v. New York* and, 928
 - Maxwell v. Dow* and, 739
 - substantive due process and, 1633
- Pecos Independent and Enterprise*, 545
- Pedophilia, 1398
- Peer-to-peer (P2P) networks, 823, 1002
- Pell v. Procunier*, 21, 1151–1152, 1415
- Burger Court and, 202
 - media access and, 995
- Peloza v. Capistrano Unified School District*, 1619
- Peltier, Leonard, 306
- Pen register, 487
- privacy and, 1220
- Penalty enhancement
- for hate crimes, 749–751
 - Wisconsin v. Mitchell* and, 1787
- Pending cases, 420
- Penitentiaries. See also Prisons
- cruel and unusual punishment and, 1539
 - proportional punishment and, 1241
- Penitentiary movement, 239
- Penn Central Transportation v. New York*, 1605
- Penn, William, 327, 1152, 1781
- free exercise and, 623
 - Hamilton and, 734
 - jury nullification and, 869
 - Quakers and, 1251
- Pennkamp v. Florida*, 1800
- Pennsylvania
- Bible and, 126, 1757
 - Bill of Rights and, 1252
 - busing and, 1546
 - constitution of, 1264
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1264–1265, 1326
 - freedom of press and, 1204
 - Nichol v. Arin Intermediate Unit 28* in, 1307
 - Petition Campaign and, 1155
 - religion and, 1538
 - sentencing guidelines and, 1458
 - Sunday mail and, 1587
 - U.S. Constitution and, 1252
 - War on Drugs and, 1740
- Pennsylvania Abolition Society, 6
- Pennsylvania Abortion Control Act, 10
- Planned Parenthood v. Casey* and, 1174
- Pennsylvania Charter of 1701, 327
- Pennsylvania Charter of 1781, 326
- Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon*
- economic regulation and, 474
 - takings clause and, 1605
- Pennsylvania Declaration of Rights, 440
- Quakers and, 1252
- Pennsylvania Railroad, 63
- Pennsylvania State Crime Lab, 429
- Pennsylvania v. Casey*, 1173
- Pennsylvania v. Ritchie*
- Brady v. Maryland* and, 173
 - United States v. Agurs* and, 1679
- Pennsylvania v. Scott*, 1152–1153
- Penry v. Johnson*
- Breyer and, 183
 - Estelle v. Smith* and, 544
- Penry v. Lynaugh*, 386, 1127
- Pentagon
- media access and, 995
 - terrorism and, 1623
- Pentagon Papers, 14–15, 311. See also New York Times Co. v. United States
- injunctions and, 1212
 - Mitchell and, 1026
 - national security and, 1071
 - New York Times Co. v. United States* and, 658, 1088

INDEX

- Pentagon Papers (cont.)
 - Nixon, R. and, 1099
 - White, B., and, 1779
- Penumbras, 1153–1154, 1582
- Peonage Act, 1649
- Peonage laws
 - Bailey v. Alabama*, 770
 - Hughes and, 783d
- People ex rel. Gallo v. Acuna*, 675
- People for the American Way, 285
- People v. Anderson*, 1545
- People v. Ardenarczyk*, 319
- People v. Croswell*, 96
 - freedom of press and, 1207
- People v. Croy*, 391
- People v. Defore*
 - Cardozo and, 249
 - exclusionary rule and, 555
- People v. Disbrow*, 1545
- People v. Flores*, 319
- People v. Flynn*, 128
- People v. Freer*, 733
- People v. Marrero*, 510
- People v. Moua*, 391
- People v. Onofre*, 904
- People v. Simmons*, 128
- People v. Woody*, 1078
 - peyote and, 454
- People's Party, 1472
 - Emerson and, 497
- People's rights, 1640
- Per curiam decisions
 - Kois v. Wisconsin* and, 894
 - New York Times v. United States* and, 1695
 - obscenity and, 1118
 - Poelker v. Doe* and, 1183
 - Stone v. Graham* and, 1563
- Peremptory challenges, 873–874. See also Challenges for cause
 - in Batson v. Kentucky, 877–878
 - Holland v. Illinois* and, 769
 - jury selection and, 825
 - jury trial right and, 876
 - race and, 114, 877–878
 - Sixth Amendment and, 115
 - Swain v. Alabama* and, 225
- Perez v. Brownell*, 562
- Perez v. Lippold*, 1443
- Perez v. Sharp*, 1022
- “Perfect Moment, The” (Mapplethorpe), 1065
- Performers, appropriation of name or likeness and, 77
- Perilous Times* (Stone), 37
- Perjury
 - Dees and, 1501
 - prosecutors and, 35
 - Webb v. Texas* and, 1769
- Permanent residents, 1108
- Permissible purpose, 570
- Permoli v. First Municipality of New Orleans*, 1606
- Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators' Association*, 417
 - limited public forum and, 922
 - public forum doctrines and, 1243
 - viewpoint discrimination and, 1714, 1715, 1716
- Perry, James, 1332
- Perry, Michael, 1296
- Perry, Troy, 1401
- Perry v. Sindermann*, 1260
- Persecution
 - definition of, 88
 - Quakers and, 1251
 - relief from, 89
- Persian Gulf War
 - media access and, 995
 - military chaplains and, 269
- Persian Letters* (Montesquieu), 1032
- Persistent vegetative state, 86
 - Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health* and, 389
- Personal autonomy rights, 1533–1534
- Personal freedom, 97
 - Bill of Rights and, 140
 - societal needs v., 100
 - state bills of rights and, 138–139
- Personal injuries
 - attorneys and, 1236
 - strict liability and, 1572
- Personal Justice Denied, 841
- Personal liberty laws, 1154, 1484
 - police power and, 1184–1185
- Personal recognizance bond, 98–99
- Personal responsibility, 890
- Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act (PRWORA), 1396
 - AFDC and, 693
- Personal security
 - Bible and, 127
 - Watts v. United States* and, 1769
- Personal-attack rule
 - fairness doctrine and, 573
- Persons and Punishment* (Morris, H.), 1645
- Persons living with AIDS (PWAs), 25–26
- Persuasion, 1160
- Pervasively regulated industries, 1432
- Peter, Paul and Mary, 185
- Peters, John, 1270
- Peterson v. Greenville*, 826–827
- Petit juries. See Juries
- Petition(s)
 - abolitionist, 5–6
 - dispositive due process and, 457
 - right to, 458, 1265, 1352–1353
- Petition Campaign, 1154–1157
- Petition of Rights, 54, 505, 1157
 - English liberties and, 506
- Peyote, 24, 159, 1416, 1745
 - ACLU and, 49
 - AIRFA and, 51–52
 - Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith* and, 500–501, 630, 1263
 - free exercise clause and, 119–120, 454, 626, 1263
 - NAC and, 454, 1263, 1305
 - Native Americans and, 1078
- Peyote Way Church of God, Inc. v. Thornburgh*, 454
- Pfeffer, Leo, 1527
- Phagan, Mary, 897
- Philadelphia
 - “Bible war” in, 1294
 - Rush in, 1386, 1387
- Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps*, 404, 1157–1158
 - group libel and, 715
- Philanthropist*, 1486

- freedom of press and, 648
- Philanthropist, The*, 5, 1155
- Philippines
 - Bryan and, 189
 - drugs and, 1741
 - Murphy and, 1047
 - Weems v. United States* and, 1772
 - World War II and, 1269
- Philipse, Frederic, 734
- Phillips, Samuel F., 1681
- Phillips, Wendell, 46, 1158–1159, 1486
- Photographic identification, 1679
- Phyllis Schlafly Report, 1421
- Physician license, suspension of, 1358
- Physician-assisted suicide (PAS), 86–87, 1164–1166, 1583. See also
 - Assisted suicide
 - Kevorkian and, 888–889
 - O'Connor and, 1127
 - ODWDA and, 1135–1137
 - Souter and, 1497
 - Vacco v. Quill* and, 1668, 1767
 - Washington v. Glucksberg* and, 1766
- Physicians
 - abortion and, 324
 - gag rules and, 672–674
 - licensing of, 800
 - ODWDA and, 1136
 - professional advertising by, 1235–1236
- Picasso, Pablo, 1162
- Pickering, Marvin, 1613
- Pickering, Thomas, 39
- Pickering v. Board of Education*, 420, 1166, 1507–1508, 1514
 - academic freedom and, 18
 - First Amendment and, 1699
 - government speech and, 702, 1260
 - political patronage and, 1189
 - public concern standard and, 982
 - teacher speech and, 1613, 1614
- Pickering, Lewis, 1440
- Picketing, 1166–1170. See also Protests
 - captive by, 1167
 - Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire* and, 1562
 - of foreign embassies, 1168
 - Frankfurter and, 618
 - Frisby v. Schultz* and, 666
 - hostile environment harassment and, 778–779
 - intention of, 926–927
 - Marshall, T., and, 973
 - NOW and, 1069
 - overbreadth and, 1704
 - Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley* and, 1663
 - residential, 666
 - Staub v. Baxley*, 1663
 - Stone Court and, 1562
 - targeted, 1167
 - Truax v. Corrigan* and, 465
- Pierce, Glenn, 228
- Pierce v. Society of Sisters*, 1170–1171, 1548, 1581
 - AJC and, 852
 - free exercise and, 1214
 - freedom of association and, 634–635, 801–802
 - McReynolds and, 176, 993, 1597
 - penumbras and, 1153
 - Prince v. Massachusetts* and, 1208
 - privacy and, 1003, 1220
 - private schools and, 712
 - substantive due process and, 466
 - Wisconsin v. Yoder*, 1788
- Pierce v. United States*
 - Brandeis and, 174
 - Espionage Act of 1917 and, 1797
- Pierrepont, Edwards, 1681
- Pinckney, Charles, 139
 - Bill of Rights and, 143, 1326, 1363
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 358, 1263, 1314, 1326
 - freedom of the press and, 360
 - religious tests for office holding and, 312, 359
- Pinckney, Henry L., 66
- Pine Ridge Reservation, 807
- Ping, Chae Chan, 260, 791
- Pinochet, August, 59
- Piracy, airplane, 33
- Pirate v. Dalby*, 129
- “Piss Christ” (Serrano), 1065
- Pitney, Mahon, 1595
 - Pierce v. United States* and, 1797
 - White Court and, 1777
- Pitt, William, 1748
- Pittsburgh Press v. Human Relations Commission*
 - commercial speech and, 330
 - injunctions and, 1211
- Pius IX, Pope, 253
- Plain hearing, 1171
- Plain smell, 1171
- Plain touch, 1171
- Plain view doctrine, 78, 1171–1172
 - in Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 933
- Plaintiffs, private, 404–405
- Plame, Valerie
 - Intelligence Identities Protection Act and, 817
 - reporter’s privilege and, 664
- “Plan B” contraception, 1323
- Planned Parenthood
 - birth control and, 147
 - eugenic sterilization and, 545–546
 - NARAL and, 1062
 - “Nuremberg Files” litigation and, 1172
 - Warren Court and, 1759
- Planned Parenthood Assn. of Kansas City v. Ashcroft*, 1173
- Planned Parenthood Federation of America, 1411
- Planned Parenthood League of Connecticut
 - Griswold v. Connecticut* and, 712, 1320
- Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth*, 9, 35, 250, 1172–1173
 - Bellotti v. Baird* and, 121
 - Lambert v. Wicklund* and, 905
 - Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft* and, 1174
- Planned Parenthood of Kansas City v. Ashcroft*, 198
- Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey*
 - Burger Court and, 198–199
 - due process and, 1583
 - Lawrence v. Texas* and, 909, 1338
 - Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton* and, 1148
- Planned Parenthood v. American Coalition of Life Activists*
 - Internet and, 819–820
 - threats and, 1653
- Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft*, 1173–1174, 1475
- Planned Parenthood v. Casey*, 10, 1174–1175, 1287, 1416, 1533
 - Colautti v. Franklin* and, 324
 - Kennedy, A., and, 885

INDEX

- Planned Parenthood v. Casey* (cont.)
 O'Connor and, 1126
Roe v. Wade and, 885, 1221, 1320, 1322, 1337, 1367–1369
 Souter and, 1497
 substantive due process and, 609
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services and, 1770
- Plato, 1242
 civil liberties and, 1026
- Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc.*, 867
- Playboy*, 1117
- Playboy Enterprises, Inc. v. Welles*, 823
- Plea bargaining, 164–165, 1175–1177
Boykin v. Alabama and, 172
 guilty pleas and, 719
 introduction of, 1539
Mabry v. Johnson and, 941
 racial discrimination in, 1257
Santobello v. New York and, 1413
 sentencing and, 1460
- Pledge of Allegiance, 1177–1179
Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow and, 490–491
 God and, 861
 government speech and, 702
 Jackson, R. and, 834
 no endorsement test and, 1103
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette and, 1775
- Plenary power doctrine, 460, 1179–1181
 Congress and, 792
 immigration and, 797
Kleindienst v. Mandel and, 893
 police power and, 1185
- Plessy v. Ferguson*, 225, 229, 1181–1182, 1441, 1442, 1467
Buchanan v. Warley and, 192
Civil Rights Cases and, 301
 Emerson and, 498
 equal protection clause and, 228
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 515
 Fuller Court and, 667
 Harlan, I. and, 738
 Hughes and, 783
Korematsu v. United States and, 843
Naim v. Naim and, 1060
 overturning of, 741
 race-based classifications and, 611 separate but equal doctrine and, 1017 stare decisis and, 1524
 state action and, 606
 Warren and, 1763
- PLO. See Palestine Liberation Organization
- Plumbers, The, 1090
 Nixon, R. and, 1099
- Pluralism, 23, 944–945
- Plyler v. Doe*, 41, 1182
 middle scrutiny test and, 613
 Powell, Lewis, and, 1195
- POAU. See Protestants and Other Americans United for Separation of Church and State
- Pocock, J.G.A., 55
- Poe v. Ullman*, 1182–1183, 1497, 1656
 Harlan, II, and, 714, 741–743
 privacy and, 1219
 right to medical counseling and, 712
- Poelker v. Doe*, 116, 1183–1184
- Poetry, 894
- Pointer v. Texas*
 compulsory process clause and, 344
 incorporation doctrine and, 803
 procedural due process and, 463
- Poisons, religion and, 1490
- Poland Act of 1874, 72
- Police
 African Americans and, 1256, 1257, 1258
 arrests and, 80–81
 blue wall of silence and, 154
 checkpoints and, 275
 choke holds of, 935 citizen complaints against, 1256
 civil rights and, 1256 civilian review boards and, 305
 corruption, 154
 criminal justice and, 1256 deadly force by, 1256
 DNA samples and, 431
 employment, 1258
 entrapment by, 509
 Fourth Amendment and, 1333
 gangs and, 278–279
 Hispanics and, 1258
 in-home arrests and, 976
 interrogations, 314–321
McAuliffe v. New Bedford and, 770
 McNabb-Mallory Rule and, 316
Miranda v. Arizona and, 1016
 Miranda warnings and, 1019–1020
Moran v. Burbine and, 1033–1034
 Native Americans and, 1258
 Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 and, 1132
 private, 1227–1228
 race and, 1256
 racial profiling by, 1256
Rawlings v. Kentucky and, 1271–1272
 reasonable promptness and, 1018
Rhode Island v. Innis and, 1331
Rizzo v. Goode and, 1362 undercover, 747–748, 794 unwarranted searches and, 956
- Police Department of Chicago v. Mosely*, 361 content-based regulation and, 362
 public forums and, 1663
- Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley*, 973
- Police investigation commissions, 1184
- Police power, 801, 1184–1188
 compulsory vaccination and, 836
 mental illness and, 1000–1001
 prohibition and, 1187
- Polis, 1026
- Political action committees (PACs)
Buckley v. Valeo and, 194
 corporations and, 632
 First Amendment and, 588
 NARAL and, 1062
- Political and Civil Rights in the United States*, 498
- Political animal, 1638
- Political appointees, 799
- Political cartoonists, 1414
- Political contributions, 1190
- Political correctness, 1188–1189
- Political Disquisitions* (Burgh), 847

- Political expression, 1162
- Political freedom, 477
- Political Freedom: The Constitutional Powers of the People* (Meiklejohn), 999, 1630
- Political offense exception, 563
- Political participation, 325
- Political parties
 - Branti v. Finkel* and, 178–179
 - Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission* and, 328
 - Madison and, 643, 945
 - U.S. Constitution and, 36
- Political patronage
 - Elrod v. Burns* and, 492
 - First Amendment and, 1189–1190
- Political prisoners, 59
- Political question doctrine, 868
- Political speech, 642
 - First Amendment and, 1650
 - freedom of expression and, 1162
 - hate speech v., 754
 - World War II and, 1800
- Political theory, 127
- Politics* (Aristotle), 1638
- Politics, hate crimes and, 752
- Polk, Leonidas, 1486
- Polkinghorne, John, 377
- Poll taxes, 1559
 - Voting Rights Act of 1965 and, 1729
- Pollak, Walter, 498
- Pollitt, Dan, 1269
- Pollock v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company*, 586
 - economic rights and, 478–479
- Polygamy, 72–73
 - belief-action and, 118–119
 - Bible and, 129
 - Davis v. Beason* and, 396–397
 - in England, 1330
 - Field and, 586
 - First Amendment and, 1038
 - free exercise clause and, 1038
 - history of, 1034–1036
 - Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. United States* and, 908
 - marriage laws and, 964
 - Morrill Act and, 1038–1039
 - police power and, 1185
 - property rights and, 1039
 - racism and, 1331
 - religious liberty and, 1034
 - Reynolds v. United States* and, 627, 1330–1331
 - Smith and, 1038
 - statutes, 1039
 - statutory religion-based exemptions and, 560
 - U.S. Constitution and, 353
 - as victimless crime, 1709
 - voter registration and, 396–397
 - Waite Court and, 1732
- Polygraph evidence, 407
- Poodry v. Tonawanda Band of Seneca Indians*, 809
- Poor People's March, 1069
- Poore, Barbel, 191
- Pope v. Illinois*, 1191
 - Miller* test and, 1013
 - obscenity and, 1119
- Popular Front, 104
- Popular sovereignty, 1585
- Population control, 1062
- Pornography. See also Child pornography; Movies
 - American Booksellers Association, Inc. et al v. Hudnut* and, 46–47
 - Ashcroft and, 85
 - Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition* and, 83–84
 - banning, 660, 689
 - Burger Court and, 201
 - CDA and, 336
 - censorship of, 941–942, 1574
 - Christian Coalition and, 285
 - content-neutral regulation and, 364
 - defining, 46–47
 - Dworkin and, 470–471, 1120–1121
 - entrapment and, 509
 - Falwell and, 575
 - feminism and, 304, 1120
 - Flynt and, 599
 - free speech and, 304, 1450
 - free speech theory and, 816
 - Ginsberg v. New York* and, 684–685, 1316
 - Ginzburg v. United States* and, 689
 - government funding of speech and, 701
 - hardcore, 1023
 - hostile environment harassment and, 778
 - Internet, 304, 819, 1701
 - Internet filtering and, 825
 - Jacobson v. United States* and, 837
 - low value speech and, 937
 - MacKinnon and, 941–943, 1120–1121
 - mail and, 837
 - Miller* test and, 1012–1013, 1013
 - Mishkin v. New York* and, 1023
 - obscenity and, 660, 1117
 - Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton* and, 1147
 - privacy and, 1220
 - as sexual discrimination, 942
 - Society for the Suppression of Vice on, 1285
 - Stewart, P., and, 1118
 - Strassen and, 1573–1574
 - United States v. One Book Entitled "Ulysses"* and, 1689
 - United States v. Reidel* and, 1690–1691
 - violence and, 942
 - Warren on, 836
 - World War I and, 1117
- Pornography and the Justices* (Hixson), 1115
- Pornography: Men Possessing Women* (Dworkin), 470
- Port Huron Statement, 278
- Porter, Anthony, 237, 1393
- Porter, Paul, 603
- Porterfield v. Webb*, 1108
- Portland, Oregon, same-sex marriage and, 1402
- Portsmouth, Rhode Island, 61
- Posadas de Puerto Rico v. Tourism Company*, 1191–1192, 1708
- Positive law, 1431
- Positive rights, 1639
- Posner, Richard, 842
- Posodas de Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Co. of Puerto Rico*, 331
- Posse Comitatus Act, 1732
- Post, Amy, 65
- Post, Isaac, 65
- Post, Louis F., 1799
- Wilson, W., and, 1785

INDEX

- Post Office Act of 1836
 free speech and, 648
Post office. See U.S. Postal Service
Post, Robert, 1452
Postage stamps, 1067
Postal Act of 1810, 1588
Postconviction statutes, 428
Potter, Royston, 72
Poulos v. New Hampshire, 850
Poulterer's Case, 350
Pound, Dean Roscoe
 Brandeis and, 176
 on Palmer raids, 1281
Poverty
 abortion and, 747 appeals costs and, 711
 digital divide, 821
 discrimination, 711
Powell, Adam Clayton, 1764
Powell, Leroy, 1193
Powell, Lewis F., 1193–1196
 Batson v. Kentucky and, 114
 Beal v. Doe and, 115
 Board of Education v. Pico and, 157
 Branzburg v. Hayes and, 179
 Burger Court and, 198
 City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc. and, 1318
 Coker v. Georgia and, 323, 385
 Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist
 and, 333
 on English Bill of Rights, 503
 Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville and, 523–524
 Fiallo v. Bell and, 585
 Frontiero v. Richardson and, 521
 Hudson v. Louisiana and, 781
 Maher v. Roe and, 951
 McCleskey v. Kemp and, 229, 986
 Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps and, 1158
 Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth
 and, 1173
 Plyler v. Doe and, 1182
 Pope v. Illinois and, 1191
 on proportionality, 245
 Regents of the University of California v. Bakke and, 19, 1284–1285
 retirement of, 165
 school prayer and, 1197
 shield laws and, 1473
 United States v. United States District Court and, 1696
 Windmar v. Vincent and, 1298
 Wolman v. Walter and, 1790
Powell, Ozie, 1427
Powell v. Alabama, 49, 1192–1193, 1427
 Brandeis and, 176
 Butler and, 209
 Cardozo and, 249
 Duncan v. Louisiana and, 468
 Emerson and, 498
 Gideon v. Wainwright and, 682
 Harlan, I. and, 740
 incorporation doctrine and, 803
 ineffective assistance of counsel and, 810
 procedural due process and, 463, 1344, 1349
 right to counsel and, 1018
 Warren Court and, 1759
Powell v. McCormack, 1764
Powell v. Texas, 1193, 1745 Power
 blacklisting and, 150
 unchecked, 320
Powers v. Ohio, 115 race of jury and, 878
Powers v. United States
 Fifth Amendment and, 1018
PPA. See Privacy Protection Act
Pratt, Charles, 1749
 Jefferson and, 847
Prayer. See also School prayer
 Alabama and, 1438
 Becker amendment and, 117
 Church of England and, 1196
 Engel v. Vitale and, 117
 First Amendment and, 532
 legislative, 767, 914–915, 966–967
 legislative chaplains and, 267
 mandatory, 1542
 moments of silence statutes and, 1029–1030
 nondenominational, 967
 public, 1416
 in public schools, 1412–1413
 Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe and, 1412
 Scalia and, 1416
 Souter and, 1496
 Warren Court and, 1756–1758
Precedent. See also Stare decisis
 Douglas and, 443
 history as, 967
Precision of regulation, 1512
Preeson, Ann Brown, 734
Preferred position rule, 100–101, 1199–1200, 1582, 1634 Pregnancy. See also Birth control
 abortion and, 9
 AFLA and, 29
 Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health and, 34–35
 Bowen v. Kendrick and, 167
 drug testing and, 28
 forced sterilization and, 772
 Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier and, 756, 1576
 Roe v. Wade and, 1475
 with same-sex partners, 1407 sex discrimination and, 71 in South Carolina, 1320
 statutory rape and, 1550
 Unborn Victims of Violence Act on, 1322–1323
Pre-indictments, 79
Prejean, Sister Helen, 1200–1201
Prejudice
 gag orders and, 671
 Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada and, 679
 ineffective assistance of counsel and, 810
 invidious discrimination and, 830
 Strickland test and, 811
Prepublication clearance, of confidential information, 1491
Presbyterian Church, 1768
Presbyterian Church v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Memorial Presbyterian Church, 857
 church property disputes and, 862–863
Prescriptive guidelines, for sentencing, 1459
Presentment, 703
President. See also Executive powers

- civil religion and, 297
- as commander-in-chief, 1520
- electronic surveillance and, 1695–1996
- in emergencies, 494–496
- military and, 354
- threats to, 1653
- United States v. United States District Court* and, 1695–1996
- Watts v. United States* and, 1512–1513, 1769
- President's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice, 11184
- President's Commission on Narcotic and Drug Abuse, 1743
- President's Task Force on Victims of Crime, 1710, 1711
- Press. See also Freedom of press; Journalists; Media; News media
 - access to information of, 993–994
 - elections and, 1539
 - First Amendment and, 74, 1353–1354
 - Grosjean v. American Press Co.* and, 714–715
 - Hoover and, 774–775
 - Lovejoy and, 5
 - reporter's privilege and, 1319
 - restraint of, 48
 - Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia* and, 995
 - Sedition Act and, 39
 - sources of, 859
 - Watergate scandal and, 1354
- Press clause. See Freedom of press
- Press Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court*, 1429
- Press Enterprise II, 1428
- Press interviews, in prisons, 1415
- Press releases, 330, 859
- Presser v. Illinois*, 1342
 - gun ownership and, 722
- Preston, Evelyn, 103
- Preston, Thomas, 166
- Presumption, 458
 - burden of proof and, 196
- Presumptive guidelines, for sentencing, 1459
- Pretrial hearings, 79–80
- “Pretty Woman” (Two Live Crew), 1414
- “Prevention of Acts of Violence and Terrorism,” 1625
- Preventive detention, 98, 1207–1208
- Preventive prosecution
 - terrorism and, 1624
- Preventive services, 29
- Price fixing, 730
 - Nebbia v. New York* and, 1081
- Price, Victoria, 1427
- Priests, religious garb of, 1307
- Prigg v. Pennsylvania*, 1484, 1486
 - personal liberty laws and, 1154
 - Story and, 1572
 - Taney Court and, 1607
- Primary penalties, collateral consequences v., 325–326
- Prime Time Live*, 661
- Prince Albert v. Strange*, 1591
 - privacy and, 1218
- Prince v. Massachusetts*, 1208–1209, 1283, 1390
- Princeton Theological Seminary, 935
- Princeton University, 1272
 - DeWitt and, 417
 - Harlan, II, and, 741
 - Madison and, 943
- Pring, George W., 1480
- Printz v. United States*, 167, 1589
- Prior restraint, 1209–1213
 - freedom of press and, 659
 - FW/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dallas* and, 670
 - national security and, 1074–1076
 - Near v. Minnesota* and, 892, 1694–1695
 - no, 647
 - nondisclosure agreements and, 659
 - prohibition on, 151
 - public forum doctrines and, 1243
 - United States v. The Progressive, Inc.* and, 1694
- Prison Justice Ministries' InnerChange Freedom Initiative, 1216
- Prisoners
 - Burger Court and, 202
 - of conscience, 59
 - disenfranchisement of, 583
 - First Amendment and, 1216
 - free exercise and, 1214–1216
 - habeas corpus and, 727
 - hands off doctrine and, 1216
 - interrogation of, 981–982
 - marriage and, 1399
 - Native Americans, 1079
 - O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz* and, 1130
 - political, 59
 - Prejean and, 1200
 - as slaves, 1216
 - Thornburgh v. Abbott* and, 1651
 - Turner v. Safley* and, 1670–1671
- Prisons. See also Debtor's prisons; Incarceration; Penitentiaries
 - access to, 21–22
 - African Americans in, 1257
 - censorship and, 1131
 - chain gangs and, 263
 - CNS and, 290–291
 - conditions, 855
 - constitutional protection in, 291
 - discipline, 800
 - free exercise clause and, 629
 - gangs in, 1257
 - Houchins v. KQED, Inc.* and, 779
 - informants, 794, 838
 - Kunstler and, 898–899
 - as nonpublic forums, 1245
 - O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz* and, 629
 - overpopulation, 953
 - pardons and commutations and, 1146
 - Pell v. Procunier* and, 1151
 - population growth of, 1213–1214
 - press interviews in, 1415
 - race and, 1257
 - rape in, 1120
 - Rastafarians in, 1262
 - reform, 878
 - religion and, 24
 - RLUIPA and, 1308
 - search and seizure in, 781
 - sentencing and, 1459
 - serious crimes and, 876
- Pritchett, C. Herman, 516–517
- Privacy. See also Intrusion
 - abortion and, 1542
 - appropriation of name or likeness and, 77
 - arrest warrants and, 81
 - Bill of Rights and, 1634
 - birth control and, 1542

INDEX

Privacy (cont.)

Brandeis and, 176–177, 1590–1592
Breyer and, 183
California v. Greenwood and, 215
captive audiences and, 247
Chemerinsky and, 277
congressional protection of, 346–347 consumer, 829
contraceptives and, 9
Cooley and, 1591
of data, 1222–1223
decisional, 169, 828
DHS and, 416
DNA testing and, 431
Don't Ask, Don't Tell and, 1460
Douglas and, 446
drug tests and, 156, 1479–1480, 1746
due process and, 1582
electronic surveillance and, 487–488
euthanasia and, 547
extremist groups and, 567
false light invasion of, 574–575
Falwell and, 575
family, 280–281, 608–609 felons and, 712
financial, 346
Florida Star v. B.J.F. and, 596, 1261
Florida v. Riley and, 597
Florida v. White and, 598
Fortas and, 604
freedom of expression and, 1163
freedom of press v., 661
free-market principles v., 346
Griswold v. Connecticut and, 444, 713, 1320, 1521, 1531
Harlan, II, and, 741–742
helicopter surveillance and, 597
homosexuals and, 714
implied rights and, 801, 802
information, 828, 1534
Internet and, 820–821
intrusion and, 827–828
invasion of, 828–829
jailhouse informants and, 838
Johnson, L., and, 856
Katz v. United States and, 882
Kyllo v. United States and, 900
Mapp v. Ohio and, 1521
marital, 444, 742
Megan's Law and, 997
minors and, 250
National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab and, 1076–1077
O'Connor v. Ortega and, 1128
Olmstead v. United States and, 772, 802, 1368
Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton and, 1147
penumbras and, 1153
personal autonomy rights and, 1533–1534
Poe v. Ullman and, 743, 1183
Poelker v. Doe and, 1183 positive law and, 1430
probable cause and, 1234, 1431
probation and, 712
Quinlan and, 1254
reasonable expectation of, 882, 1015, 1220, 1430–1431
residential, 829
residential picketing and, 666

right to, 1003, 1336–1338, 1368 right to be left alone and, 828
Roe v. Wade and, 1336, 1337, 1368, 1475
scope of, 802
searches and, 83, 1429, 1532
seizures and, 598, 1532
sexual activity and, 714
sexual orientation and, 1221–1222
sodomy and, 1542
sodomy laws and, 168–169, 855, 1493
software, 820–821
in state constitutions, 1531
state constitutions and, 1546
states and, 1541
substantive due process and, 608, 928
tax stamps and, 960
technology monitoring and, 488–489, 1430–1431 telephones and, 488
terrorism and, 1624–1625
theories of, 1224–1226
United States v. Thirty-Seven Photographs and, 1677 vehicles and, 1751
Veronica School District v. Acton and, 1707
Warren and, 1590–1592
Warren Court and, 1759–1760
Weems v. United States and, 1772
wiretapping and, 113, 1786
Privacy Act of 1974, 346, 1519
national security and, 1071
sunshine laws and, 641
Privacy Protection Act (PPA), 1223–1224, 1823
journalistic sources and, 859
newsroom searches and, 1093
Privacy protection laws, 569–570
Privacy rights
 Buck v. Bell and, 193
 international, 63
Private bank notes, 1684
Private choice, 1528
equal access and, 535
 Mitchell v. Helms and, 536
 Zelman v. Simmons-Harris and, 1813
Private concerns, 404–405
Private discriminatory association, 1226–1227
Private law, 798–799
 Bible and, 129–130
Private police, 1227–1228
Private property
 Amalgamated Food Employees Union Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza and, 44
 Aristotle and, 1638
 Bible and, 127, 130
 Buchanan v. Warley and, 191–192
 buffer zones and, 67
 company towns and, 340
 free speech and, 926–927
 interracial marriage and, 936
 New Hampshire Constitution of 1784 and, 1085
 protests and, 44
 for public use, 474
Private right
 Salvation Army and, 1397
Private schools, 1424–1425, 1547. See also Religious schools
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 1548
 right to, 712

- Private speech, 1717
- Privacy, 1217–1223
- Privilege
 - Fourteenth Amendment on, 1357
 - v. right distinction, 1356–1358
- Privileges and immunities clause, 606–607, 1396
 - citizenship and, 1230
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 1726
 - Saenz v. Roe* and, 294
 - Slaughterhouse Cases* and, 273, 1354, 1355, 1482
- Privy Council, 108, 1748
- Prize Cases, 1665
- Probable cause, 1234–1235
 - arrest and, 81, 1444–1445, 1698
 - automobile searches and, 92
 - checkpoints and, 275
 - drug testing and, 156
 - exemplars and, 558–559
 - fingerprinting and, 1445
 - Florida v. Jimeno* and, 597
 - Florida v. White* and, 598
 - Gerstein v. Pugh* and, 679
 - hearings, 79–80
 - Illinois v. Gates* and, 793
 - Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Lopez-Mendoza* and, 798
 - informants and, 793
 - interrogations and, 952
 - Kolender v. Lawson* and, 894
 - in Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 933
 - Michigan v. DeFillipo* and, 1004
 - Minnesota v. Dickerson* and, 1015
 - New Jersey v. T.L.O.* and, 1086
 - newsroom searches and, 1093
 - noncitizens and, 380
 - obscenity and, 933
 - Payton v. New York* and, 1151
 - Pennsylvania v. Scott* and, 1152
 - privacy and, 1220, 1431
 - protective sweep and, 976
 - relaxing of, 1627
 - search and seizure and, 78
 - search warrants and, 83, 1433, 1434, 1435
 - search without, 148
 - seizures and, 1444, 1447
 - stop and frisk and, 1568
 - stops and, 1445
 - United States v. Leon* and, 1685–1686
 - United States v. Robinson* and, 1691–1692
 - United States v. Watson* and, 1698
 - Warren Court and, 1757
- Probation
 - privacy and, 712
 - race and, 1257
- Probation officers
 - Pennsylvania v. Scott* and, 1152
 - powers of, 1153
- Procedendo, 458
- Procedural rules, 324–325
- Procreation personal autonomy rights and, 1533
- Procurier v. Martinez*, 1449
 - free speech and, 1217
 - prisoners and, 1217
- Procurement rules, 270–271
- Prodigy, 336
- Production Code Administration, 756
- Production Code of 1930, 755–756, 1041–1042
- Profanity, 1115, 1506
- Professional Women's Clubs, 520
- Proffitt, Charles William, 1238
- Proffitt v. Florida*, 223, 1238
 - capital punishment and, 675
 - cruel and unusual punishment in, 231–232
 - right of appeal and, 230
- Profiling, 1236–1238. See also Racial profiling
 - criminal, 1236–1237
 - racial, 1237–1238
 - seizures and, 1446
 - United States v. Brignoni-Ponce* and, 1680
- Profiteering
 - of Burroughs Wellcome, 26
 - Order No. 11 and, 709
- Progressive Era, 1531
 - Baldwin and, 102
 - drugs and, 1740
 - freedom of association in, 635
 - immigration and, 1069
 - Nineteenth Amendment and, 1727
- Progressive Movement
 - La Follette and, 901
- Progressive movement
 - economic rights and, 479
 - eugenics and, 545
 - Hague and, 729
 - World War I and, 240
- Progressive Party
 - Feiner and, 582
 - La Follette and, 904
 - Younger v. Harris* and, 1808
- Progressive, The*, 1075
- Prohibition, 1238–1239. See also Nineteenth Amendment; Volstead Act
 - Darrow and, 395
 - guns and, 720
 - police power and, 1187
- Pro-Life Action League, 1134
 - FACE Act and, 633
- Pro-Life Action Network
 - Operation Rescue and, 1134
- Pro-life movement, 1421
- Prometheus Radio Project v. FCC*
 - FCC and, 580
- Promiscuity, 1464
- Promise of American Life, The* (Croly), 736
- Promise Scholarship Program, 929
- Promised Key* (Howell), 1262
- Promises, 319
 - confidentiality and, 322
 - promissory estoppel and, 322
- Promissory estoppel, 322
- Proof beyond a reasonable doubt, 1240
- Property
 - joint ownership of, 1541
 - marriage and, 963
 - marriage as, 960
 - miscegenation laws and, 1022
 - Native Americans and, 1538
 - privileges and immunities and, 1231
 - searches and, 1429
 - seizures of, 1447

INDEX

- Property (cont.)
slaves as, 1483, 1538
- Property rights. See also Private property; Public property
abortion protests and, 12
American Revolution and, 475–476
Brandeis and, 174
church disputes over, 861–863 church splitting and, 856–857
civil forfeiture and, 295
civil liberties v., 1028
civil rights and, 478
Fourth Amendment and, 1430
future of, 479
Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association
and, 629
Marshall Court and, 968 of minorities, 1468–1469
polygamy and, 1039
protection of, 475
racism and, 191–192
rational basis test and, 251
religion and, 291–292
segregation and, 1442
surveillance and, 1430
takings clause and, 667–668
U.S. Constitution and, 476–477 of women, 1522
women and, 434
- Proportionality
capital punishment and, 245–246
cruel and unusual punishment clause and, 387
of punishment, 1240–1242
death penalty and, 231
Harmelin v. Michigan and, 744 measuring, 246
moral, 246
- Proportionality reviews, 1242
Pulley v. Harris and, 1249
- Proportionality test alteration of, 744
Fuller Court and, 668
- Proposition 22, 1403
- Prosecution of African Americans, 1257 arrest v., 81
Caucasians and, 1257
discriminatory, 423–424
Napue v. Illinois and, 1061
racial discrimination and, 1256–1257
- Prosecutions, separate, 441
- Prosecutorial discretion, 954
- Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to End the Exploitation of Children Today Act of 2003, 84
- Prosecutors elected, 786–787 perjury and, 35
plea bargains and, 1413
- Proselytization, 1663
Wolman v. Walter and, 1791
- Prospective relief, 868
- Prostitution
AIDS and, 1463
Bible and, 130
immigration and, 1465
Mann Act and, 955
as victimless crime, 1709
- Protected speech
Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition and, 83 classification systems and, 252 factual context and, 762
false light invasion of privacy and, 575
Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle
and, 1044–1045
public employees and, 420
- Protection of Children Against Sexual Exploitation
Act of 1977, 283
- Protection of Lawful Commerce in Arms Act, 722–723
- Protective sweeps, 976
- Protest, David, 1393
- Protest movement
civil rights and, 161–162
surveillance of, 1519
- Protestant Episcopal Church, 108
- Protestantism, 1286, 1293
coercion and, 1102
Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1314
religious liberty and, 1309, 1310
religious tests for office holding and, 1314
Roe v. Wade and, 1367
in South Carolina, 136
state constitutions and, 1538
- Protestants
Bible reading and, 131
English Bill of Rights and, 503
English Toleration Act and, 504
Ten Commandments and, 1622
- Protestants and Other Americans United for Separation of Church and State (POAU), 56
religious school funding and, 1527
- Protests, 412, 958–959. See also Flag burning; Marches; Picketing; Sit-ins
abortion, 12–13 anti-abortion, 66–67, 633–634
Baldwin and, 103
Brown v. Board of Education and, 959
categorical approaches and, 252
Chicago Seven and, 278
civil rights laws and, 302
commercial speech and, 330
Connor and, 348
content-neutral regulation and, 363
Cox v. Louisiana and, 372–373
Edwards v. South Carolina and, 483
FACE Act and, 633–634
fighting words and, 587
First Amendment and, 948–949
Fortas and, 604
free speech theory and, 649
Hill v. Colorado and, 361
Holmes and, 771
illegality of, 1395
injunctions and, 1211
Internet and, 819–820
invasion of privacy and, 829
Jackson, R. and, 834
of King, 889–890
of Long, 934
military law and, 1007
nonviolent, 412, 949

- picketing and, 1166
- Police Department of Chicago v. Mosely* and, 361
- on private property, 926
- private property and, 44
- in public places, 729
- Sacco and Vanzetti and, 1395
- self-incrimination and, 1456
- Texas v. Johnson* and, 361
- Title VII and, 1660
- United States v. O'Brien* and, 1113
- United States v. Schoon* and, 1692
- Vietnam War, 48, 1456
- World War I and, 261, 651–652
- The Protocols of the Elders of Zion*, 69
- Provenzano v. Moore*, 486
- Providence, 382
- Providence Plantations, 525
- Providing for Victims of Terrorism, Public Safety Officers and Their Families, 1149
- Provincial Charter, 979
- Proxmire, William, 788
- Prudential Insurance Co. v. Benjamin*, 1392
- Prudential Insurance Company v. Cheek*, 1596
- Prune Yard Shopping Center v. Robins*, 1544
- Prurient, 1117
- Prurient appeal requirement
 - Mishkin v. New York* and, 1023
- PRWORA. See Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act
- Psychiatrists
 - Ake v. Oklahoma* and, 235
 - Church of Scientology and, 286
 - coerced confessions and, 919
 - criminal profiling and, 1236
 - Rush and, 1386
- Psychological evaluation, 43
- Psychology, Church of Scientology and, 286
- Public Broadcasting Act of 1967 (PBA), 578
- Public buildings, Ten Commandments and, 1620–1622
- Public communications campaigns, 701–702
- Public concern standard, 982
- Public Education and Religious Liberty (PEARL), 1527
- Public Education Department, 50
- Public employees
 - Connick v. Myers* and, 674
 - disciplining, 420–421
 - doctrine, 18–19
 - expressive activity of, 420–421
 - government speech and, 702
 - Hatch Act and, 748
- Public Enemy, 763–764
- Public figures, 1242–1243
 - actual malice standard and, 27, 403
 - emotional distress and, 575, 599
 - invasion of privacy and, 829
 - libel and, 788
 - satire and parody of, 1413
 - vulgar speech and, 1248
- Public forum doctrine, 1657
 - picketing and, 1167
- Public forums. See also Closed forums; Designated public forums; Reserved forums
 - doctrine for, 1243–1244
 - equal access to, 1230
 - Hague v. C.I.O.* and, 729
 - limited, 922
 - religious speech and, 1229
 - traditional, 922, 1663–1664
 - universities and, 1698–1700
- Public function, 44
 - Cyber Promotions v. America Online* and, 45
 - state action and, 606
- Public health
 - civil liberties and, 836
 - Reynolds v. United States* and, 1283
- Public Health Service Act of 1970, 672
 - homosexuality and, 1405
 - Title X and, 674
- Public interest
 - broadcast regulation and, 184
 - NAACP v. Button* and, 972
- Public interest law firms, 1400
- Public interest standard, 579
- Public intoxication
 - Powell v. Texas* and, 1193
 - as victimless crime, 1709
- Public Law 601, 780
- Public nuisance, 674–675
 - obscenity and, 1706
- Public office
 - clergy in, 921–922, 989
 - collateral consequences and, 325
 - criminal prosecutors and, 786–787
 - drug testing and, 453
 - Jews and, 851
 - KKK and, 897
 - oaths for, 425
 - pardons and commutations and, 1146
 - religious tests for, 136, 140, 352, 358, 359, 426, 1044, 1314–1315
- Public officials, 1245–1246
 - criticism of, 96
- Public opinion, 1543
- Public passage, 373
- Public places
 - definition of, 83
 - nudity and, 111
 - protests in, 729
 - warrantless arrests in, 82
- Public policy
 - courts and, 1416, 1417
 - guns and, 720–721
- Public property
 - free exercise clause and, 939
 - religious speech on, 906–907
 - religious symbols on, 937–938, 1312–1314
- Public relations, 330
- Public safety
 - dissent and, 1011
 - emergencies and, 494
 - Harris v. New York* and, 748
- Public School Society, 1526
- Public schools
 - Becker amendment, 117
 - Bible and, 131–133, 1197
 - “Bible wars” in, 1293–1294
 - Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet* and, 157–158
 - censorship in, 756–757

INDEX

Public schools (cont.)

creation science and, 1615–1617
 dress codes in, 1578–1579 drug testing in, 155–156, 453
 EAA and, 512
Edwards v. Aguillard and, 377, 480–481
Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow and, 490–491
 endorsement test and, 938
 evolution and, 376–377, 1617–1620
 First Amendment and, 163, 1508, 1576 foreign languages in, 1002–1003
 free exercise and, 1246–1247
 freedom of association and, 801–802
 gay teachers in, 932
Good News Club v. Milford Central School and, 699–700
 Jehovah's Witnesses and, 848–849
 Jews and, 852
Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District
 and, 906–907
Lee v. Weisman and, 911
 lewd speech in, 124
 libraries in, 156–157
 moments of silence statutes and, 1028–1030
 New York, 1293
 open forums and, 1577–1578
 Oregon and, 1548
Pierce v. Society of Sisters and, 1170
 Pledge of Allegiance and, 1177
 prayer in, 1196–1199 release time from, 1291–1292
 religion and, 560, 1291–1294 religious clubs in, 154
 religious garb in, 1306–1307 religious instruction in, 987
San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez, 1194
 secular humanism and, 1437–1438
 separationism and, 767
 sex education in, 1246
 speech regulations, 417
 statutory religion-based exemptions and, 560 student groups in, 513 student speech in, 1575–1579 teacher speech in, 1611–1615 Ten Commandments in, 90 textbooks and, 155
 undocumented migrants and, 1182
Veronica School District v. Acton and, 1707
Wallace v. Jaffree and, 1736
 “Public square” debate, religion in, 1295–1297
 Public use, takings clause and, 1604
 Public utilities, 1541
Public Utilities Commission v. Pollak
 captive audiences and, 247
 Douglas and, 446
 Public Utilities Holding Company Act, 1269
 Public welfare offenses, 1573
 Pueblo Indians, 1411–1412
 Puerto Rico
 citizenship clause and, 293
 Harlan, I, and, 740
 Posadas de Puerto Rico v. Tourism Company and, 1191–1192, 1708 restrictive covenants and, 1324
 Pulaski, Charles, 986
Pulley v. Harris, 1249

Pullman, George, 400
 Pullman Palace Car Company, 400 strike at, 1472
Pumpelly v. Green Bay Company, 1604
 Punishment. See also Capital punishment; Cruel and unusual punishment bodily correction and, 1202 corporal, 385
 drugs and, 1743
 England and, 1329
 “eye for an eye,” 1328 immunity from, 1694
 multiple, 442
 murder and, 1328–1329
 pardons and commutations and, 1145–1147
 proportional, 1240–1242 of Quakers, 1251
 retribution and, 1328–1330
 of speakers, 1509
 theories of, 1645–1647
 types of, 384–385
 United States v. Lovett and, 1686–1687
 victims' rights and, 1710
 War on Drugs and, 1739
Purcell v. Summers, 1662
 Pure Food and Drug Act, 1740
 White Court and, 1777
 Pure speech, juvenile rights and, 604
 Puritanism, 525, 1249–1250
 establishment of, 621–622
 Hutchinson trial and, 61
 Lilborne and, 919
 Puritans
 Baptists and, 107
 Church of England and, 107
 Maryland Toleration Act and, 975
 Winthrop and, 298
Purkett v. Elem, 114
 Pursuit of happiness, 1450
 Putnam, G.P.
 A Book Named “John Cleland’s Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure” v. Massachusetts and, 1
 PWAs. See Persons living with AIDS
 Pythagoras, 1240, 1242

Q

al Qaeda
 emergency powers and, 496
 Guantanamo Bay and, 715–716
 Miranda warnings and, 1020 network, 1346
 prisoners, 16
 USA PATRIOT Act and, 85
 Quakers
 ACLU and, 103
 capital punishment and, 238–239
 in colonial America, 622
 Penn and, 1152
 Petition Campaign and, 1155
 religious liberty and, 1251–1252
 religious tests for office holding and, 1314, 1315
 statutory religion-based exemptions and, 561, 1310
 U.S. Constitution and, 352
 Williams, R. and, 1782

Quanta cura, 253
Quantum Computer Services, 45
Quartering of troops, 1252–1253
Queer Nation, 26
Question of Choice, A (Weddington), 1771
Questioning. See Interrogations
Qui tam doctrine, 1776
Quick Bear, Reuben, 1253
Quick Bear v. Leupp, 1253–1254
Quill, Timothy, 1165
Quill v. Vacco, 1165
Quilloin v. Walcott, 279, 281
Quinlan, Karen Ann, 86, 1254
Quo warranto, 458
Quota and National Origin Act of 1921, 426
Quota and National Origin Act of 1924, 426, 1259
Quotas
immigration, 796
Jews and, 851
racial, 30–31

R

R. v. Butler, 46
Rabban, David, 1795
Rabe v. Washington, 1255–1256
A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Massachusetts and, 1255
incorporation doctrine and, 803
Roth v. United States and, 1255
Race. See also Ethnicity
Capital punishment and, 224
Chase Court and, 271
citizenship and, 293–294
Civil Rights Act of 1875 and, 300
criminal justice and, 1256–1258
employment discrimination and, 777–779 ethnic intimidation laws and, 750 exclusion by, 791
gerrymandering and, 1277
hate crimes and, 303, 748–751, 751–752
hate speech and, 752–755
Immigration Act of 1875 and, 1258–1259
interracial cohabitation and, 991 invidious discrimination and, 936
juries and, 114, 769
jury nullification and, 869
jury selection and, 871
jury trials and, 877–878
juvenile justice and, 1258
lynching and, 243, 302, 896–897, 1063
McCleskey v. Kemp and, 224
murder and, 225
parole and, 1257
peremptory challenges and, 114, 876
police and, 1256
prisons and, 1257
probation and, 1257
Regents of the University of California v. Bakke and, 611, 1284–1285 research on, 1256
venire and, 877
Race-based classifications, 611–612
Rachel v. Walker, 451

Racial animus, 76
Racial bias
McCleskey v. Kemp and, 236, 1258
Turner v. Murray and, 235
Racial classifications
affirmative action and, 30
Fourteenth Amendment and, 30
Racial discrimination. See also Profiling; Racial profiling
African Americans and, 1256, 1257
Baldwin and, 103
Bob Jones University v. United States and, 629, 636
Burton and, 208
capital punishment and, 225–226, 228–229
chain gangs and, 263
Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, 300–301
civil rights laws and, 303
corrections and, 1257
death penalty and, 1257–1258
in education, 971
Freund and, 665
Hispanics and, 1256, 1257
immigration and, 1258–1260
interstate commerce and, 826–827
Jackson, R. and, 835
Japanese internment and, 841
King and, 889–891
McCleskey v. Kemp and, 985–986
miscegenation laws and, 406
Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada and, 782
Mitchell v. United States and, 782
Moose Lodge no. 107 v. Irvis and, 636
Native Americans and, 1256
Palmore v. Sidoti and, 281 in plea bargaining, 1257
prosecution and, 1256–1257
race-based classifications and, 611–612
sentencing and, 228–229, 1257
traffic stops and, 1256
Vinson Court and, 1718
voting rights and, 959
Racial epithets, 221
Racial profiling, 1237–1238
civilian review boards and, 305
gang ordinances and, 675
INA and, 791
Japanese internment and, 791
of Middle Easterners, 789–790
military tribunals and, 790
Muslims and, 1053–1054
by police, 1256
terrorism and, 791–792, 1623
United States v. Weaver and, 1746
USA PATRIOT Act and, 789
Racism
abolitionists and, 1486
Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet and, 158
Brown v. Board of Education and, 186
Brown v. Mississippi and, 187–188
capital punishment and, 101
Confederate flag and, 1188
Connor and, 348
DeWitt and, 418
DNA dragnets and, 431

INDEX

- Racism (cont.)
drugs and, 424
injunctions and, 1211
lyrics and, 765
Marshall, T., and, 971
McCleskey v. Kemp and, 985–986
Monteiro v. Tempe Union High School District
and, 163
Murphy and, 1048
Naim v. Naim and, 1060
polygamy and, 1330
property rights and, 191–192
restrictive covenants and, 368–369, 1325
segregation and, 1441
- Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), 1334–1335
ACLU and, 1335
FACE Act and, 633
Operation Rescue and, 1134
Scheidler v. NOW and, 181, 1335
- Radical Division, 1144
- Radical Republicans, 146, 1442
- Radin, Max, 1762
- Radio citizen's band, 488
fairness doctrine and, 573
freedom of press and, 663
ham, 488
indecentcy on, 1556–1557
spectrum, 663
- Radio Act of 1927, 663
obscenity and, 1124
- Rahner, Karl, 254
- Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Co.*
federal court jurisdiction and, 868
- Railroads
Mormons and, 1038
Plessy v. Ferguson and, 1181
protection from, 1541
segregation and, 1442
- Rakas v. Illinois*, 83
- Raleigh, Walter, 757
- Raley v. Ohio*, 1260
entrapment by estoppel and, 510, 1260
- Rambler*, 26
- Ramirez, Hernan, 1690
- Rampart scandal, 277
- Ramsay, David, 54
- RAND Corporation, 1088
- Randolph, Edmund, 140, 1266–1267, 1315
Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1266–1267
- Randolph, John, 274
- Rankin v. McPherson*, 420–421, 1260
public concern standard and, 982
- Rankin, Walter, 1260
- Rap music. See Hip-hop music
- Rape, 1464
abortion and, 951
African Americans and, 1257
capital punishment and, 323
cultural defense and, 391
date, 758, 1464
death penalty and, 232, 245, 385–386, 388, 1329
DNA testing and, 430
First Amendment and, 1261–1262
forced sterilization and, 772 gender bias and, 1262
hearsay evidence and, 758
Mallory v. United States and, 952
mandatory death sentences and, 953
marital, 960–961 media and, 1261
Michigan v. Lucas and, 1005
military law and, 1007
New York v. Quarles and, 1093 prior sexual activity and, 1005
in prison, 1120
proportionality review and, 1242
reporting, 1261–1262
Scottsboro trials and, 1427–1428
sexually explicit materials and, 1120
statutory, 1550, 1572–1573
Supreme Court and, 1261, 1320
victims' rights and, 1710
of white women, 1741
- Rape shield statutes, 1464
- Rape victims
freedom of press and, 596
naming of, 1261–1262
- Rape-shield statute, 1005
- “Rapper's Delight” (Sugar Hill Gang), 764
- Rasmussen v. South Florida Blood Services*, 1534
- Rastafarians
First Amendment and, 1262, 1263
marijuana and, 454, 1262, 1263
religion and, 1262–1263
- Rasul v. Bush*, 355, 1391
Guantanamo Bay and, 716
indefinite detention and, 805, 1391
Stevens and, 1558
War on Terror and, 1094
- Ratification debate, 1263–1269
- Rating Appeals Board, 1042–1043
- Rational basis test, 251
gun control and, 722
police power and, 1185
- Rational purpose test, 610
- Rationality test, 216
- Rauh, Joseph L., Jr., 1269–1270
- Raulston, John T., 1426
- Rauschenbusch, Walter, 397
- R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul*, 303, 1271
content-based regulation and, 362
cross burning and, 382–383
fighting words doctrine and, 588, 754
hate speech codes and, 221, 657, 750
political correctness and, 1188–1189
Stevens and, 1556
viewpoint discrimination and, 1714, 1716
Virginia v. Black and, 1724–1725
Wisconsin v. Mitchell and, 1787
- Ravin v. State*, 1533, 1744
- Rawlings v. Kentucky*, 1271–1272
- Rawls, John Bordley, 1272–1274
- Ray, James Earl, 890 assassination by, 959
- Read, Lucy, 64
- Reagan Amendment, 356
- Reagan, Nancy, 1554
- Reagan, Ronald

- abortion and, 10
- assassination attempt on, 1260
- Bork and, 165
- Chavez and, 275
- Civil Liberties Act signed by, 1374
- drugs and, 1743–1744
- ERA and, 520
- Falwell and, 575
- family values movement and, 577
- Frank and, 616
- Hinckley and, 814
- interdiction and, 390
- Japanese internment and, 1374
- Kennedy, A., and, 884
- King and, 890
- Meese and, 996–997
- Moral Majority and, 4
- New Right and, 1086
- New York v. Ferber* and, 1092
- NRA and, 1070
- obscenity and, 1115
- O'Connor and, 1126
- Rehnquist and, 1287–1289
- Roe v. Wade* and, 1321
- Scalia and, 1415, 1416
- school prayer amendment and, 356
- shooting of, 721
- stem cell research and, 1553–1554
- Supreme Court and, 1287
- victims' rights and, 1710
- War on Drugs of, 452
- Webster v. Reproductive Health Services* and, 1770
- Reagan, Ronald, Jr., 1554
- Reapportionment, 1275–1278, 1728
 - 1963/1964 cases, 1275–1276
 - Baker v. Carr* and, 1275–1276
 - controversy, continuing, 1278
 - courts entry into, 1275
 - district boundaries in, 1276–1277
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 1275
 - gerrymandering in, 1277
 - Gray v. Sanders* and, 1275
 - Johnson, L., and, 1276
 - Karcher v. Daggett* and, 1277
 - Kennedy, J., and, 1276
 - Lucas v. Forty-Fourth General Assembly of Colorado* and, 1276
 - majority-minority districts in, 1277–1278
 - Mobile v. Bolden* and, 1277
 - in North Carolina, 1278
 - Reynolds v. Sims* in, 1276
 - in Tennessee, 1275
 - Thornburg v. Gingles* and, 1277
 - Voting Rights Act of 1965 and, 1276
 - Warren and, 1764
 - Warren Court and, 1753
 - Wesberry v. Sanders* and, 1276
- Reasonable doubt
 - burden of proof and, 196
 - Francis v. Franklin* and, 615
 - Jackson v. Virginia* and, 832
 - jury nullification and, 870
 - Leland v. Oregon* and, 917
 - proof beyond, 1240
 - rights of accused and, 1360
 - Sandstrom v. Montana* and, 1410
 - self-defense and, 974–975
 - standards for, 1240
- Reasonable promptness, 1018
- Reasonable suspicion, 1431
 - criminal profiling and, 1236
 - Illinois v. Wardlow* and, 794–795
 - search warrants and, 1434
 - stops and, 1445, 1568
 - in Terry v. Ohio, 794–795
 - United States v. Brignoni-Ponce* and, 1680
 - United States v. Ramirez* and, 1690
- Reasonableness test, 28
 - Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier* and, 757
- Reasonable-person-would-feel-free-to-leave test, 1568
- Reasoned judgment, 1497
- Recidivism, 1646. See also Three strikes law
 - four-strikes statute and, 1494
 - Megan's Law and, 997
- Reckless indifference, 231
- Reconstruction, 1733
 - amendments and, 1542
 - Chase Court and, 272
 - Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
 - Civil Rights Act of 1875 and, 300
 - Civil Rights Cases* and, 301
 - cross burning and, 382–383
 - Dred Scott v. Sandford* and, 452
 - equal protection during, 515
 - Ex parte Milligan* and, 551
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 605
 - hate crime laws and, 749
 - Joint Committee on, 146
 - jury trials in, 877
 - lynching during, 243
 - miscegenation laws and, 1022
 - privileges and immunities and, 1231
 - Republican Party and, 146
 - Sumner and, 1585
- Reconstruction Act, 1072
- Reconstruction Amendments, 1482
- Reconstruction Civil Rights Acts, 70
- Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA), 336
- Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, The* (Farrand), 864
- Red Cross, 15–16
- Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission*, 184–185, 858, 1279–1280, 1354, 1452
 - fairness doctrine and, 573
 - FCC and, 579
 - forced speech and, 601
 - freedom of press, 663
 - Turner Broadcasting System v. Federal Communications Commission* and, 1669
- Red Monday*, 780
- Red Record, A* (Wells), 1774
- Red scare, 1280–1282, 1377, 1798–1799
 - Americanism and, 1280–1281
 - Chambers and, 265
 - Clark, T., and, 308
 - Communist Party and, 339
 - emergency powers and, 496
 - extremism and, 566
 - First Amendment and, 1281
 - Frankfurter and, 617
 - freedom of association and, 635

INDEX

- Red scare (cont.)
 - freedom of press and, 658
 - Hoover and, 774, 1281
 - incitement of criminal activity and, 653–654
 - Meiklejohn and, 999
 - Palmer and, 1144
 - Schenck v. United States* and, 1281, 1282
 - Supreme Court's response to, 1281–1282
 - World War I and, 566, 1279–1282
- Redman, John, 1386
- Redrup v. New York*, 1282–1283
 - Cain v. Kentucky* and, 212
 - obscenity and, 1118
- Reed, John, 150
- Reed, Ralph, 285
- Reed, Stanley
 - Frankfurter and, 618
 - separationism and, 767
 - Vinson Court and, 1721
- Reed v. Reed*
 - ACLU and, 50
 - ERA and, 521
 - gender and, 518
 - Ginsburg and, 687
- Referenda, 1540
- Reflections on the Revolution in France* (Burke), 207
- Reformation
 - Amish and, 57
 - establishment clause and, 525
 - Rawls and, 1273–1274
- Refugee Act of 1980, 88
- Refugees, 88–89
 - Cuban, 390
 - Haitian, 389–390
 - INA and, 796
- Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Washington*, 1608, 1674
- Regents of the University of California v. Bakke*, 19, 1284–1285
 - ADL and, 70
 - affirmative action and, 1284–1285
 - Burger and, 206, 1284
 - equal protection and, 517, 1285
 - Japanese internment and, 841
 - Marshall, T., and, 973
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 19, 1193, 1285
 - race-based classifications and, 611, 1284–1286
- Regents of the University of Michigan v. Ewing*, 19
- Reggae music, 1262
- Regina v. Benjamin Hicklin*, 1285–1286, 1382
 - Miller test and, 1012
 - Mishkin v. New York* and, 1023
 - obscenity and, 1116, 1122
 - Warren Court and, 1755
- Regulated industries, 1432
- “Regulating Racist Speech on Campus” (Strossen), 1574
- Regulation
 - establishment clause and, 537
 - of interstate commerce, 826–827
- Regulation and Its Reform* (Breyer), 183
- Regulatory statutes
 - Breyer and, 183
 - religious exemptions for, 559–561
- Regulatory taking, 474
- Rehabilitation, 1645
 - collateral consequences and, 325
 - prison population and, 1213–1214
- Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 71
 - Bowen v. American Hospital Association*, 166
- Rehnquist Court, 1286–1287
 - Burger Court and, 1287
 - Bush v. Gore* and, 1287
 - civil rights and, 1544
 - Coleman v. Thompson*, 324–325
 - EAA and, 535
 - federalism of, 1289
 - habeas corpus and, 233–234
 - judicial review and, 865
 - Marshall, T., and, 972
 - Plyler v. Doe* and, 1182
 - Roe v. Wade* and, 1635
 - search warrants and, 1434
 - Warren Court and, 1287–1288
- Rehnquist, William, 1288–1291, 1416, 1636
 - All the Laws But One* and, 646–647
 - Ansonia Board of Education v. Philbrook* and, 1301
 - Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition* and, 84
 - on Blaine Amendment, 930
 - Bowen v. Kendrick* and, 167
 - Bowers v. Hardwick* and, 1222
 - Buckley v. Valeo* and, 194
 - California v. Larue* and, 215–216
 - career of, 1287
 - City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc.* and, 1316, 1318–1319
 - on civil liberties, 1289
 - Colorado v. Connelly* and, 329
 - on Constitution, 1288–1290
 - Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health* and, 86, 1766
 - death of, 11, 1287
 - Dickerson v. United States* and, 1287
 - education of, 1287
 - Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow* and, 490, 1177
 - First Amendment and, 1289, 1299–1300
 - Florida v. Jimeno* and, 597
 - on Fourteenth Amendment, 1290
 - on Goldberg, 697
 - habeas corpus and, 727
 - Hustler Magazine v. Falwell* and, 599, 787–788, 1290
 - “In God We Trust” and, 1067
 - on Internet filtering at libraries, 826
 - on Japanese internment, 842
 - Jenkins v. Georgia* and, 850
 - Lemon test alternatives and, 534
 - Locke v. Davey* and, 929
 - Madsen v. Women's Health Center* and, 948–949
 - Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz* and, 1004
 - Miranda warnings and, 1287
 - Mueller v. Allen* and, 1045–1046
 - National League of Cities v. Usery* and, 1288
 - Nixon, R. and, 1287–1288
 - nomination of, 204, 1287, 1290
 - non-preferentialism standard and, 767, 1108–1110
 - Osborne v. Ohio* and, 1138
 - PAS and, 1165
 - Pell v. Procunier* and, 1151
 - Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps* and, 1158
 - Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth* and, 1173
 - Pledge of Allegiance and, 1177
 - Pope v. Illinois* and, 1191
 - Posadas de Puerto Rico v. Tourism Company* and, 1192
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1193

- preventative detention and, 1208
- proportional punishment and, 1241
- Rawlings v. Kentucky* and, 1394
- Reagan and, 1287–1289
- Regents of the University of California v. Bakke* and, 1284
- Reno v. ACLU* and, 1317
- robe worn by, 1287
- Roe v. Wade* and, 10, 1287, 1290, 1322
- Rust v. Sullivan* and, 672, 700, 702, 1388
- Stone v. Graham* and, 1563
- Ten Commandments and, 1621
- United States v. O'Brien* and, 1114
- United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez* and, 1696
- wall of separation and, 1736
- Wallace v. Jaffree* and, 1737
- Washington v. Glucksberg* and, 87, 1766
- Webster v. Reproductive Health Services* and, 1770
- Wolman v. Walter* and, 1790
- Zelman v. Simmons-Harris* and, 1813
- Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District* and, 1816
- Reich, Charles A., 692
- Reich v. Shiloh True Light Church of Christ*
- Reid v. Covert*, 354–355, 1291
- Reid v. Georgia*, 1291, 1445
- racial profiling and, 1237
- Reindeer rule, 42
- Relation back forfeiture doctrine, 1678
- Released time, 1822–1823
- Religion. See also Freedom of religion
 - abortion and, 11–12
 - academic freedom and, 1506
 - accessibility and, 1296
 - accommodation of, 22–24
 - ACLU and, 48–49
 - advancement of, 1024–1025
 - AFLA and, 29
 - Ashcroft and, 85
 - atheism and, 89–90
 - authoritarianism and, 1295–1296
 - autopsies and, 92–93
 - bifurcated definition of, 410–411
 - bills of rights and, 135–136
 - Burger Court and, 199–200
 - capital punishment and, 239–240, 1469–1471
 - Catholic Church and, 253–255
 - Charitable Choice and, 269–271
 - charitable contributions and, 703
 - children and, 1283
 - Christian nation and, 342–343
 - Church of Scientology and, 286–287
 - civil, 3, 297–298
 - claims of, 1437
 - coercion and, 1101–1103
 - in colonial America, 525, 621–622
 - colonial charters and, 326–328
 - conscientious objection and, 349–350, 409–410
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 358, 1263, 1264, 1309
 - Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, on, 1262
 - Cromwell and, 382
 - de Tocqueville and, 375
 - defining, 409–411, 530, 1437
 - Delaware and, 1309
 - democracy and, 1273
 - as divisive, 1296
 - draft and, 1793
 - drugs and, 453–455
 - education and, 1291–1292, 1306–1307
 - employees and, 1299–1303
 - employment discrimination and, 777–779
 - endorsement test and, 42–43, 536
 - equal protection and, 1309–1310
 - establishment clause and, 1416, 1548
 - establishment of, 409, 1262
 - Everson v. Board of Education* and, 131–132, 1294, 1423
 - evolution and, 1438
 - expanded concept of, 1477
 - factionalism and, 1296–1297
 - family values movement and, 577
 - First Amendment and, 74–75, 1262, 1263, 1291, 1294–1295, 1296–1298, 1299, 1302, 1303–1304, 1308, 1315, 1755–1756
 - FLSA and, 570–572
 - fraud and, 1476
 - free conscience and, 1538
 - free exercise and, 3, 1475–1476
 - fundamentalists in, 1425
 - government favoritism and, 1439
 - government funding of, 1423
 - hate crime laws and, 748–751
 - hate speech and, 752–755
 - historical practice and, 259
 - homosexuality and, 1406
 - hostility towards, 535
 - Indian, 51–52
 - Know-Nothing Party and, 1294
 - legislative chaplains and, 267
 - Lemon* test and, 32
 - Locke and, 1309–1310, 1314
 - Madison and, 541, 624, 1315
 - Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641 and, 979
 - medical treatment and, 1283–1284
 - medicine and, 374–375
 - minority sects and, 291
 - Mississippi and, 1538
 - modern definitions of, 411
 - national, 526–527, 767
 - neutrality towards, 23
 - non-preferentialism standard and, 1108
 - North Carolina Constitution of 1776, 1111
 - as not shared, 1295–1296
 - O'Connor and, 1126
 - ODWDA and, 1136
 - official references to, 938
 - pacifists and, 1141
 - Pledge of Allegiance and, 1179
 - poisons and, 1490
 - Prince v. Massachusetts* and, 1208
 - prisons and, 24
 - property rights and, 291–292
 - public school and, 2–4, 1291–1294
 - in “Public square” debate, 1295–1297
 - in public universities, 1297–1299
 - Puritans and, 1249–1250
 - Rastafarians and, 1262–1263
 - Rawls on, 1272–1274
 - Rhode Island and, 1309, 1312–1314
 - school prayer and, 356–357
 - secular humanism and, 1437
 - secular v. religious arguments and, 1295
 - selective service and, 1448
 - separationist jurisprudence and, 33

INDEX

Religion (cont.)

- sincerity and, 1476–1477
- slavery and, 1483
- South Carolina and, 1309–1311, 1314–1315
- state-sponsored, 254
- statutory exemptions for, 559–561
- Supreme Being and, 1693
- Supreme Court and, 766–768
- suspect classes and, 513
- Swaggart Ministries v. California Board of Equalization* and, 1629
- tax exemption and, 1629
- taxes and, 108–109, 766, 1607–1608
- teaching of, 1437
- unemployment benefits and, 629
- United States v. Ballard* and, 1476–1478
- United States v. Bauer* on, 1262
- United States v. Seeger* and, 1693–1694
- U.S. Constitution and, 352, 1330
- Vidal v. Girard's Executor* and, 1712
- violence and, 1295
- war and, 1273
- Warren Court and, 1755–1756
- Watson v. Jones* and, 1768
- in workplace, 1299–1303
- zoning and, 1817–1820
- Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment* (Witte), 527, 625
- Religion clauses, 540–542, 766–768. See also Establishment clause;
Free exercise
 - drafting of, 527
 - Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow* and, 490–491
 - freedom of religion and, 542
 - interpretation of, 541
 - neutrality of, 561
 - neutrality v. separationism, 551
- Religious belief
 - prisoners and, 1214
 - security of, 1475–1478
 - United States v. Seeger* and, 1693–1694
- Religious ceremonies
 - AIRFA and, 51–52
 - Bible reading as, 132
 - Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah* and, 627
 - City of Boerne, Texas v. Flores* and, 159
 - copyright law and, 366–367
 - drugs and, 24
 - Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith* and, 630
 - free exercise clause and, 454
 - in judicial proceedings, 860–861
 - Native Americans and, 939
- Religious conduct
 - Cantwell v. Connecticut* and, 849–850, 1364
 - protection of, 939
 - states and, 849
- Religious content
 - in county and city seals, 370–372
 - County of Allegheny v. ACLU* and, 42, 1313
 - cross burning and, 382–383
- Religious corporations, 291
- Religious exercises, 2–4
- Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), 24, 49, 52, 71, 93, 159, 1305–1306, 1471, 1490–1491, 1549, 1589, 1818
 - Americans United and, 57
 - City of Boerne, Texas v. Flores* and, 501, 1305–1306
 - copyright law and, 366
 - Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith* and, 501, 630
 - free exercise and, 1215
 - Gonzales v. Centro Espirita Beneficiente Uniao do Vegetal* and, 455
 - Native Americans and, 1078
 - O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz* and, 1131
 - overturning of, 630
 - RLUIPA and, 1308
 - statutory religion-based exemptions and, 560
 - strict scrutiny test and, 626
 - striking down of, 160
- Religious garb, 1306–1307
- Religious holidays
 - days of, 398–399
 - displays, 42, 90
 - Lynch v. Donnelly* and, 41
- Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA), 160, 501, 1306, 1308, 1547–1548, 1819
 - Americans United and, 57
 - Clinton, B., and, 1306
 - First Amendment and, 1308
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 1308
 - free exercise and, 630–631, 1215
 - Native Americans and, 1078, 1307, 1308
 - O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz* and, 1131
 - prisons and, 1308
 - RFRA and, 1305–1306, 1308
 - statutory religion-based exemptions and, 560
 - strict scrutiny test and, 626
- Religious liberty
 - Amish and, 57–58
 - Christianity and, 1309, 1310
 - Church of Scientology and, 286–287
 - CNS and, 290–291
 - under eighteenth-century state constitutions, 1309–1312
 - Mormons and, 1034–1040
 - Native Americans and, 1077–1079
 - polygamy and, 1034
 - Protestantism and, 1309, 1310
 - Quakers and, 1251–1252
 - Salvation Army and, 1396–1398
 - snake-handling sects and, 1490–1491
 - Williams and, 1782
 - Wisconsin v. Yoder*, 1788
- Religious Liberty Protection Act (RLPA), 1306, 1308, 1818
- Religious motive test, 481
- Religious neutrality
 - Epperson v. Arkansas* and, 511
 - free exercise and, 1246
 - public schools and, 1246
 - Witters v. Department of Services* and, 1789
- Religious organizations
 - autonomy of, 537
 - church property disputes and, 861–863
 - discrimination by, 422
 - equal protection clause and, 513
 - establishment clause and, 528
 - extremist groups and, 564
 - FLSA and, 570–572
 - Fuller Court and, 668
 - Good News Club v. Milford Central School* and, 699–700
 - government funding of, 918, 929–930, 1045–1046
 - Hays and, 755
 - taxes and, 23, 761–762, 853–854

- Title VII exemptions for, 422, 1299–1303
- Tony and Susan Alamo Foundation v. Secretary of Labor* and, 1660–1661
- Watson v. Jones* and, 1767
- Religious proclamations, 532
- Religious Right
 - Americans United and, 57
 - Ashcroft and, 84
 - school prayer amendment and, 356
- Religious schools
 - equal access and, 535
 - FLSA and, 571
 - free textbooks to, 1526–1527
 - government funding of, 785, 1024–1025, 1525–1529
 - indirect aid to, 1424
 - Locke v. Davey* and, 929
 - Mueller v. Allen* and, 1045–1046
 - School District of the City of Grand Rapids v. Ball* and, 1423
 - school vouchers and, 929, 1424
 - state regulation of, 1547–1548
 - Tilton v. Richardson* and, 1656–1657
 - Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District* and, 1816
 - Zorach v. Clauson* and, 1822
- Religious speech, 90, 258–259
 - endorsement test and, 539
 - hate speech v., 754
 - in judicial proceedings, 861
 - Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District* and, 906–907
 - on public property, 1229–1230
- Religious symbols
 - challenges to, 536–537
 - First Amendment and, 532
 - Lynch v. Donnelly* and, 937–938
 - on public property, 1312–1314
 - Ten Commandments and, 862
- Religious Technology Center v. Lerma*, 824
- Religious tests for office holding, 136, 352, 526, 1315
 - belief in God and, 1315
 - Christianity and, 1314, 1315
 - in Church of England, 1310
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 358, 1314
 - elimination of, 426
 - Pinckney and, 312, 359
 - Test and Corporation Acts and, 504
 - Torcaso v. Watkins* and, 1661–1662
 - U.S. Constitution and, 140, 426, 1314–1315
- Religious tolerance, 1538
 - Madison and, 948
- Religious training, 409–410
- Remedies, state v. federal, 1030–1031
- Remington, William, 1270
- Remmers v. Brewer*, 290
- Removal, to federal courts, 1315–1316
- Removing Obstacles to Investigating Terrorism, 1149
- Reno, Janet, 1317–1318
 - ACLU and, 1316–1317
 - assisted suicide and, 87
 - CDA and, 1317–1318
 - Clinton, B., and, 1317, 1318
 - Department of Justice and, 1317
 - FBI and, 1317
 - ODWDA and, 1137
 - Waco standoff and, 1317
- Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union*, 1279, 1315–1317
 - CDA and, 337, 660, 1315–1317
 - FCC licensing and, 663, 1316
 - Internet and, 819, 1316–1317
 - obscenity and, 1125, 1317
 - O'Connor and, 1319
 - Rehnquist and, 1319
 - sexually explicit materials and, 1120
 - Stevens and, 1316, 1557
- Reno v. Flores*, 282
- Renshaw, Patrick, 1281
- Renteln, Alison Dundes, 455
- Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc.*
 - content-neutral regulation and, 364
 - zoning laws and, 669
- Reparations, for Japanese internment, 841–842
- Report from the Field: The USA PATRIOT Act at Work*, 1625
- Report on the Lawlessness in Law Enforcement*, 261, 1455
- Reporter's Committee for Freedom of the Press, 662
- Reporter's privilege, 1319
 - Branzburg v. Hayes* and, 179, 1319
 - freedom of press and, 663–664
- Reporters. See Journalists
- Reproductive rights. See also Abortion; Contraception
 - contraception and, 1320
 - current law, 1323–1324
 - future directions, 1323–1324
 - key abortion case and, 1320–1323
 - Rawls on, 1273
 - sterilization and, 1320
 - Supreme Court and, 1320
 - Unborn Victims of Violence Act and, 1323
- Reproductive Rights Project, 50
- Republican National Committee, 220
- Republican Party
 - Bingham and, 146
 - Burger and, 204
 - Christian Coalition and, 285–286
 - Colorado, 328
 - congressional powers and, 988
 - ERA and, 520
 - family values movement and, 577
 - Federalists v., 36
 - founding of, 945
 - history of, 36
 - KKK and, 895
 - La Follette and, 902
 - Lincoln and, 923
 - Log Cabin Republicans and, 932–933
 - Madison and, 945
 - Marshall Court and, 968
 - McCarthy and, 984
 - Mitchell and, 1026
 - Reconstruction and, 146
- Republican Party of Minnesota v. White*
 - Breyer and, 183
 - judicial bias and, 860
- Reputation, free speech and, 680
- Rerum Novarum, On the Condition of the Working Class* (Leo XIII), 1100–1101
- Res judicata, 459
- Resentencing, 226–227
- Reserved forums, 1699
- Residency
 - in California, 1396

INDEX

- Residency (cont.)
in Canada, 1403
Fong Yue Ting v. United States and, 600 welfare and, 1396
- RESISTANCE, 1519
Respublica v. Shaffer, 438
Restatement of the Law of Torts, 1218
Restell, Madame. See Lohman, Ann Trow Lohman
Restrictive covenants, 1468
Retail Credit Company, 569
Retribution, 1329–1330
punishment and, 1645
Reuther, Walter, 1269, 1270
Reveille, 934
Revenue Act of 1951, 1684
Revolution, 65, 1522
Revolution of 1688. See Glorious Revolution
Revolutionary Age, The, 689
Revolutionary Convention, 108
Revolutionary War. See American Revolution
Rex v. Hutchinson, 437
Reynolds, Gene, 1187
Reynolds, George, 72, 1038–1039, 1732
belief-action and, 118–119
Reynolds v. Sims
Harlan, II, and, 741, 742
reapportionment and, 1276, 1728
suspect categories and, 518
voting and, 746
Warren Court and, 1760
Reynolds v. United States, 22, 1283, 1305, 1330–1331, 1470, 1476, 1802
belief-action and, 118–119, 1331
Cantwell v. Connecticut and, 222
challenges for cause in, 873
conscientious objection and, 349
Davis v. Beason and, 396–397, 668
free exercise clause and, 454, 625, 627, 1331
Jehovah's Witnesses and, 849
Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. United States and, 908
police power and, 1185
public health and, 1283
religion clauses and, 766, 1305
statutory religion-based exemptions and, 560
Waite Court and, 1732–1733
wall of separation and, 1736
- RFRA. See Religious Freedom Restoration Act
- Rhode Island
religion and, 1306, 1309, 1312
Rogers, W. and, 1781
U.S. Constitution and, 1546
- Rhode Island charter of 1663, 327
free exercise clause of, 622
Rhode Island v. Innis, 1331
- RIAA. See Recording Industry Association of America
- Ribbentrop-Molotov pact, 1488
Rice v. Paladin Enterprises, Inc., 1332
Byers v. Edmondson and, 210
freedom of press and, 659
- Richards, David, 879
Richards v. Wisconsin, 1333, 1435
Stevens and, 1557
United States v. Ramirez and, 1690
- Richardson, Elliot, 165
- Richardson v. Ramirez*
Burger Court and, 202
felon disenfranchisement and, 583
- Richardson, William Merchant, 883
- Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia*, 20, 1333–1334, 1336 judicial records and, 21
media access and, 995
open courts and, 1625
Powell, Lewis, and, 1195
right of access and, 994
Stewart, P., and, 1561
Tribe and, 1668
- Ricketts v. Adamson*, 1334
guilty pleas and, 719, 1334
- RICO. See Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act
- Riddick, Gregory, 1787
- Ride-along policy, 1783
- Ridge, Tom, 415
- Ridgely, Charles, 273
- Riggins v. Nevada*, 1336
- Right of access
Houchins v. KQED, Inc. and, 779
Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia and, 994
- Right of appeal
Boykin v. Alabama and, 172
capital punishment and, 230
Gilmore v. Utah and, 230
Proffitt v. Florida and, 230
- Right of conscience, 1538
- Right of Privacy Act, 856
- Right of the People* (Douglas), 445
- Right to be left alone, 828
- Right to bear arms, 1338–1343. See also Second Amendment colonial experience and, 1339
Constitution and, 1339–1340
English Bill of Rights and, 503, 508, 1338–1339
Federalism and, 1340–1341
individualist view on, 1344
NRA and, 1343
old militia system and, 1342
rulings, 1343
Second Amendment and, 1338, 1343
Supreme Court and, 1342–1343
- Right to counsel, 125, 1343–1351. See also Sixth Amendment
ACLU and, 48
Brewer v. Williams and, 182
Brooks v. Tennessee and, 185 choice/effectiveness of attorneys and, 1345–1346
Cicenia v. Lagay and, 292 congress on, 1346
Douglas v. California and, 442, 1345, 1350 for enemy combatants, 1346–1348
English/American origins, 1348–1349
Escobedo v. Illinois and, 318, 524, 1019, 1345
eyewitness identification and, 568, 1679
Fourteenth Amendment and, 125, 1349–1350
Gideon v. Wainwright and, 318, 682, 683, 1346
grand juries and, 708
Hamdi v. Rumsfeld and, 731, 1347
Harlan, II, and, 742
Illinois v. Perkins and, 794
jailhouse informants and, 838
Kirby v. Illinois and, 892
Marshall, T., and, 973
Massachusetts and, 138

- Miranda v. Arizona* and, 318, 1016, 1331
modern, development of, 1349–1351
Moran v. Burbine and, 1033–1034
murder and, 1344
as negative right, 1638
9/11 and, 1347
novelty of, 144
Powell v. Alabama and, 1018, 1192 post/post-trial proceedings and, 1344–1345
procedural due process and, 463
In re Gault and, 812, 1351
Sixth Amendment and, 1344–1347, 1349–1351
terrorism and, 1625
United States v. Ash and, 1344
United States v. Wade and, 1344, 1697
Warren Court and, 1758
Wong Sun v. United States and, 1792
- Right to die. See also Euthanasia
Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health and, 388–389
Kevorkian and, 888
- Right to fair trial. See also Jury trials
Duncan v. Louisiana and, 468
Ex parte Milligan and, 551
freedom of press and, 631–632, 662
gag orders and, 631–632
for juveniles, 990
lawyers speaking about pending cases and, 420
Massiah v. United States and, 980–981
- Right to Financial Privacy Act, 346
- Right to know, 1351–1352
- Right to petition. See Petition(s)
- “Right to Privacy, The” (Brandeis and Warren), 176, 1218
- “Right to Privacy, The” (Gray), 1591
- Right to remain silent, 710. See also Miranda warnings
Moran v. Burbine and, 1033–1034
United States ex rel. Bilokumsky v. Tod and, 1018
- Right to reply, 1354
Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo and, 1003
- Right to speedy trial, 893
- Right to vote. See Voting rights
- Right to work laws, 635, 1602–1603
- Right v. privilege distinction, 1357–1359, 1673
- Rights. See also Bill of Rights; Implied rights claimed, 1416 conflict between, 1541
declarations of, 135
economic, 1633–1634
enumeration of, 802 essential, 945 fundamental v. nonfundamental, 460 informing of, 1019 negative, 143–144, 1638
noneconomic, 1633–1634
positive vs. negative, 1631 privacy v. associational, 828–829 procedural v. substantive, 460 unalienable, 135
unenumerated, 804
waiving, 172
- Rights of accused. See Accused
- Rights of conscience, 624–625
- Rights of Man, The* (Paine), 646, 1143
free speech law and, 815
- Rights of the British Colonies Asserted and Proved, The* (Otis)
Otis and, 1139
- Rikers Island, 912
- Ring v. Arizona*, 76, 231
Stevens and, 1558
- Ripeness
federal court jurisdiction and, 867
in free speech cases, 1361–1362
- Ritner, Joseph R., 145
- River Bridge Co. v. Warren Bridge Co.*, 1606
- Rivera v. Delaware*, 917
- Riverside v. McLaughlin*, 79, 82
- Rizzo v. Goode*, 1362–1363
- RLPA. See Religious Liberty Protection Act
- RLUIPA. See Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000
- Roadblocks. See Checkpoints
- Roane, Spencer, 847–848
- Roanoke Valley Christian Schools
FLSA and, 571
- Robbery
Prohibition and, 1239
proportionality review and, 1242
- Roberson, Willie, 1427
- Roberts, Benjamin, 1467
- Roberts, John, 11
- Roberts, Owen, 1364–1365
Beets v. Brady, 1364
Black, H., and, 1365
Cantwell v. Connecticut and, 119, 222, 627–628, 782, 849, 1364–1365
civil liberties and, 1364
economic regulation and, 474
First Amendment and, 1364
Frankfurter and, 1364, 1365
Hague v. C.I.O. and, 729, 1243
Hague v. Committee of Industrial Organizations and, 1364
Herndon v. Lowry and, 1364
Hoover, Herbert, and, 1364
Hughes, Charles Evans, and, 1364
Korematsu v. United States and, 1365
Minersville School District v. Gobitis and, 1364
Near v. Minnesota and, 1364
public forum doctrines and, 1243
Stromberg v. California and, 1364
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette and, 1365
- Robert's Rules of Order*, 846
- Roberts, Sarah, 1441, 1467, 1584
- Roberts v. City of Boston*, 1441
Shaw and, 1467
Sumner and, 1584
- Roberts v. Louisiana*, 241
- cruel and unusual punishment in, 231–232
- Roberts v. Russell*
compulsory process clause and, 344
- Roberts v. United States Jaycees*, 170, 1363, 1382
freedom of association and, 304, 636, 1363
private discriminatory association and, 1226
- Robertson, James, 355
- Robertson, Marion G. See Robertson, Pat
- Robertson, Pat
Christian Coalition and, 4, 285
Islam and, 1053
school prayer amendment and, 356
- Robinson, Harriet, 451
- Robinson, James, 1139

INDEX

- Robinson v. California*, 1366, 1745
incorporation doctrine and, 803
Robinson v. City of Edmond, 371
Robinson-Patman Act, 1472
Rochin v. California, 1366–1367, 1582
 Breithaupt v. Abram and, 181
 Frankfurter and, 619
 incorporation doctrine and, 803–804
 Souter and, 1497
Rock v. Arkansas, 1367
Rock, Vickie, 1367
Rockefeller Drug Laws, 953, 1743
Rockefeller, John D., 1280
 Hughes Court and, 782
Rockefeller, Nelson
 Goldberg and, 697
 Kunstler and, 898–899
Rocky Mountain News, 1073
Roderick, Art, 1385
Rodríguez, Velásquez, 640
Roe, Jane, 987
 Weddington and, 1771
Roe No More, 988
Roe v. Wade, 8–11, 87, 193, 1367–1369, 1475
 ACLU and, 49–50
 Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health and, 34
 Beal v. Doe and, 115
 Bellotti v. Baird and, 121
 Blackmun in, 9, 1320–1321, 1368–1369
 Burger Court and, 198, 1369
 Catholic Church and, 1368–1369
 Colautti v. Franklin and, 324
 commercial speech and, 330 conservatism and, 4
 Constitution and, 1321
 Doe v. Bolton and, 433, 1320, 1368
 Douglas and, 445–446
 due process and, 1583
 Eisenstadt v. Baird and, 484
 euthanasia and, 547
 family values movement and, 577
 Fourteenth Amendment and, 9, 1320, 1367–1368, 1371, 1373
 Griswold v. Connecticut and, 499, 713, 1368, 1760
 Harlan, II, and, 743
 Harris v. McRae and, 746
 implied rights and, 802
 intrusion and, 836
 Kennedy, A., and, 1222
 Lambert v. Wicklund and, 905–906
 Lochner v. New York and, 928
 marriage and, 966
 McCorvey and, 987–988
 NARAL and, 1062
 Ninth Amendment and, 1097
 O'Connor and, 1126
 Operation Rescue and, 1133
 Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton and, 1148
 Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth
 and, 1172
 Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft and, 1173
 Planned Parenthood v. Casey and, 885, 1175, 1287, 1337, 1369
 Poelker v. Doe and, 1183
 privacy and, 1003, 1220
 privileges and immunities and, 1231, 1232
 Protestantism and, 1367
 quartering of troops and, 1253
 Reagan and, 1321
 Rehnquist and, 10, 1287, 1290, 1322, 1634, 1635
 right of privacy and, 1336, 1337, 1368
 Souter and, 1496, 1497
 states and, 725, 1320, 1321, 1322
 states' reaction to, 725
 Stenberg v. Carhart and, 1322
 substantive due process and, 466, 608, 1367
 Supreme Court and, 8–11, 1320–1323, 1367–1369
 Thomas and, 1650
 Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists and, 1652 trimester framework of, 1770
 Warren Court and, 1760
 Webster v. Reproductive Health Services and, 1321, 1368, 1770
 White, B., and, 1779
Roemer v. Maryland Board of Public Works, 1370, 1529
 Burger Court and, 200
 Tilton v. Richardson and, 1657
 Wolman v. Walter and, 1791
Rogers, Athlyi, 1262
Rogers v. Bellei, 294
Rogge, John, 582
Rollins v. Proctor & Schwartz, 129
Rome Statute for the International Criminal Court, 638
Romer v. Evans, 1371–1372
 Breyer and, 183
 compelling purpose test and, 610
 equal protection and, 678, 1371
 family values movement and, 577
 homosexuality and, 610, 1371
 Kennedy, A., and, 885, 1222
 Lamda and, 904–905
 Lawrence v. Texas and, 909, 1371
 O'Connor and, 1126
 rational purpose test and, 610
 Scalia in, 1371
Rompilla v. Beard, 810–811
Roosevelt Court, 1564
Roosevelt, Eleanor, 1269, 1371
 Americans United and, 56
 Hoover and, 775
 Minersville School District v. Gobitis and, 782
 NAACP and, 1064
Roosevelt, Franklin D., 1372–1374, 1562, 1800. See also New Deal
 Baldwin and, 104
 Biddle and, 133–134
 Black, H., and, 1373–1374
 civil liberties and, 1372–1374
 Clark, T., and, 308
 Communist Party and, 339
 court-packing plan of, 864–865, 1269, 1373, 1389
 death of, 134
 Douglas and, 443, 1373–1374
 economic regulation and, 474
 economic rights and, 479, 1372
 equal protection and, 515
 Frankfurter and, 616
 Goldberg and, 694
 Hague and, 729
 Hand and, 737
 Hatch Act and, 748
 Hiss and, 765

- Hoover and, 775
- Hughes Court and, 782
- internment and, 496
- Jackson, R. and, 833
- Japanese internment and, 418, 839, 1373–1374
- judicial review and, 864–865
- military tribunals and, 1008
- Murphy and, 1047
- NAACP and, 1064
- New Deal and, 1082–1085, 1564
- powers of, 1801
- Rauh and, 1269
- Roosevelt, T., and, 1372
- Rutledge, W., and, 1389
- Soviet Union and, 150
- spying and, 1518
- Supreme Court and, 1373–1374
- suspect categories and, 518
- Vinson and, 1718
- Wilson, W., and, 134, 1372, 1374
- World War II and, 1372–1373
- Roosevelt, Theodore, 770
 - antitrust and, 1471–1472
 - birth control and, 147
 - on dual citizenship, 456
 - eugenic sterilization and, 545–546
 - Frankfurter and, 617
 - Hand and, 736
 - “In God We Trust” and, 1066–1067
 - La Follette and, 902–903
 - McReynolds and, 992
 - Roosevelt, F., and, 1372
 - Taft and, 1601
- Roper v. Simmons*, 224, 386
 - California v. Ramos* and, 216
 - Cardozo and, 248
 - Kennedy, A., and, 885
 - O'Connor and, 1127
 - proportionality and, 246
 - Stevens and, 1558
- Rorty, Richard, 1374–1375
- Rosales-Lopez v. United States*, 1376
 - voire dire and, 873
- Rose v. Clark*, 1410
- Rose v. Locke*, 1376
- Rosebud Reservation, 1253
- Rosen v. United States*, 1286, 1689
- Rosenberg espionage trial*, 322
 - Frankfurter and, 619
- Rosenberg, Ethel, 322, 1377–1378, 1721
 - Communist Party and, 1377, 1378
 - Douglas, William, and, 1378
 - electric chair and, 485
 - FBI and, 1377
 - HUAC and, 780, 1377
 - Kaufman and, 883, 1377–1378
 - Vinson and, 1722
- Rosenberg, Julius, 322, 1377–1378, 1721
 - Communist Party and, 1377, 1378
 - Douglas, William, and, 1378
 - FBI and, 1377
 - HUAC and, 780, 1377
 - Kaufman and, 883, 1377–1378
 - Vinson and, 1722
- Rosenberg v. Board of Education of the City of New York*, 163
- Rosenberg v. United States*, 1721
- Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia*, 1298, 1379–1380, 1496, 1574
 - balancing and, 100
 - Breyer and, 183
 - Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District* and, 907
 - limited public forum and, 922
 - National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley* and, 1065
 - public forum doctrine and, 1229, 1244
 - religious organizations and, 699, 1379
 - religious speech and, 1229
 - student newspapers and, 1699
 - Thomas and, 1650
 - viewpoint discrimination and, 1715, 1717
- Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc.*, 1243
- Rosie the Riveter, 965
- Ross v. Moffitt*, 1380–1381
- Rossiter, Clinton, 1801
- Rostker v. Goldberg*, 698
- Rostow, Eugene, 258
 - on Japanese internment, 840
- ROTC
 - conscientious objection and, 349
- Roth test
 - A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure"* v. Massachusetts and, 1
 - Ginzburg v. United States* and, 688, 1282
 - Jacobellis v. Ohio* and, 835–836
 - pandering and, 689
- Roth v. United States*, 1382–1383, 1521
 - A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure"* v. Massachusetts and, 1–2
 - Brennan in, 1382–1383
 - Cain v. Kentucky* and, 212
 - Douglas and, 447, 1382
 - First Amendment and, 1382
 - Ginzburg v. United States* and, 688
 - Harlan, I. in, 1382–1383
 - low value speech and, 937
 - Miller test* and, 1012–1013
 - Miller v. California* and, 1012
 - Mishkin v. New York* and, 685, 1023
 - obscenity and, 659–660, 1117, 1123, 1228, 1382–1383
 - Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton* and, 1147, 1148
 - Pope v. Illinois* and, 1191
 - Rabe v. Washington* and, 1255
 - Stewart, P., and, 1560
 - United States v. Reidel* and, 1690–1691
 - Warren Court and, 1755
 - Warren in, 1382–1383
- Rousseau, Jean-Jacques
 - civil religion and, 297
 - civil rights and, 1638–1639
 - Meiklejohn and, 999
- Roviano v. United States*, 1384
- Rowan v. United States Post Office Department*, 1384–1385
 - captive audiences and, 247
 - solicitations and, 829
- Roy, Stephen, 168
- Royce, Josiah, 735
- Royer, Mark, 598
- Rubber stamp objection, 1439
- Rubin, Jerry, 278
- Rubin v. Coors Brewing Co.*, 332

INDEX

Ruby Ridge shootout, 1385–1386
 BATF and, 1385–1386
 extremist groups and, 565, 1385–1386
 FBI and, 1385–1386
Ruckelshaus, William, 165
Rudolph, Eric, 565
Rudolph v. Alabama, 240
 Goldberg and, 697
Ruiz v. Estelle
 Justice and, 878–879
Rule 801. See Hearsay Rule
Rule of law, 1386, 1580
 cultural defense and, 391
Rule of reason, 1777
Rules of Professional Conduct, 1481
Rules, standards v., 100
Rummel v. Estelle, 384
 English Bill of Rights and, 503
 three strikes laws and, 1654
Rumsfeld, Donald, 85–86
Rumsfeld v. Padilla, 1558
Runaway slaves, 1542
 personal liberty laws and, 1154
Running away, 1549
Runyon v. McCrary, 170, 281, 1548
 Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
Rush, Benjamin, 239, 1386–1388
 free exercise and, 1214
 Jefferson and, 847
Russia
 extradition and, 563
 Tribe and, 1668
 War on Drugs and, 1740
Russian Revolution of 1917, 1280
 Communist Party and, 339
Russo, Anthony, 1089
Rust v. Sullivan, 1388
 abortion and, 1674
 gag rules and, 672–674
 government funding of speech and, 700–701
 government speech and, 702, 1388
 Legal Services Corporation v. Velasquez, 914
 Maher v. Roe and, 951
 Tribe and, 1668
 viewpoint discrimination and, 1716
Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 179, 1389, 1515
 Elrod v. Burns and, 493, 1389
 political patronage and, 1189
 Scalia and, 1417
Rutgers University, 686
Rutgers v. Waddington, 732
Rutherford, Samuel, 847
Rutledge, John, 491
Rutledge, Wiley, 1389–1392, 1555, 1556, 1561
 Bill of Rights and, 1633
 Colgrove v. Green and, 619, 1391
 Commerce Clause Decisions and, 1391 creative constitutional jurisprudence and, 1391–1392 criminal cases and, 1390–1391
 equal protection and, 1391
 Everson v. Board of Education and, 550, 1390
 First Amendment and, 766, 1389–1390
 Frankfurter and, 1389
 Korematsu v. United States and, 1390 as legal educator, 1389–1390

 Murphy and, 1048–1049
 Roosevelt, F., and, 1389
 Vinson Court and, 1721
 wartime decisions and, 1390–1391
 World War II and, 1390
Rwandan genocide, 306
Ryan, George, 224, 241, 1393–1394
 capital punishment and, 237, 1394
 pardons and commutations and, 1146
Ryslik v. Krass, 1307

S

Sabbath
 Estate of Thornton v. Caldor and, 543
 Frazee v. Illinois Department of Income Security and, 629
 free exercise clause and, 119
 Jewish, 851–852
 Sherbert v. Verner and, 628, 1044
 Thomas v. Review Board and, 629
 violations, 126
Sable Communications v. FCC, 418
 obscenity and, 1124
Sacco and Vanzetti trial, 1395–1396
 alibis of, 1395–1396
 Baldwin and, 103
 Frankfurter and, 617
Sacco, Nicola, 1395–1396
 Baldwin and, 103
Sacher v. United States, 414
Sacramento v. Lewis, 1497
Sacrilege, 1042
Sadomasochism, obscenity and, 1119
Saenz v. Roe, 294, 1355, 1396
 privileges and immunities and, 1233
Safe harbors, 823
Safe Streets and Crime Control Act
 Johnson, L., and, 856
 Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 and, 1132
Saia v. People of State of New York, 834
Salazar regime, 59
Sale v. Haitian Centers Council, Inc., 390
Salem witch trials, 67
 Puritans and, 1250
Salon, 306
Salt Lake City, 1038
Salvation Army
 in America, 1397
 religious liberty and, 1396–1398
Same-sex marriage, 405–406, 677, 773, 905, 933, 936, 966, 1023, 1404–1410, 1541
 adoption and, 1398
 Goodridge v. Department of Public Health and, 1583 international developments with, 1403–1404 legalization of, 1399–1404 litigation and, 1400–1401
 miscegenation laws and, 1023 societal influence by, 1404 test cases for, 1401–1403
Same-sex partners
 adoption and, 678, 1398–1399
 as element of society, 1405–1406
 family unity for noncitizens and, 576
 hospitals and, 1406
 housing and, 1406

- legal recognition of, 1406–1409
- marriage and, 677
- Sampling, music, 763–764
- San Antonio Bar Association School of Law, 372
- San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez*
 - fundamental rights and, 612
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
 - suspect categories and, 518
- San Francisco, same-sex marriage and, 1402
- Sancroft, William, 1667
- Sandel, Michael, 1028
- Sandford, Eliza, 451
- Sandford, John, 451
- Sandstrom v. Montana*, 1410
 - Francis v. Franklin* and, 615
 - Mullaney v. Wilbur* and, 1046
- Sanford, Edward T., 74, 176
- Sanger, Margaret, 1410–1411, 1795
 - Baldwin and, 102
 - birth control and, 147
 - Comstock Act and, 353
 - eugenic sterilization and, 545–546
- Santa Clara Pueblo v. Martinez*, 1411–1412
 - ICRA and, 808–809
- Santa Clara v. Southern Pacific*, 650
- Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe*, 3, 357, 409, 1412–1413, 1416
 - ACJL and, 286
 - ADL and, 69
 - Breyer and, 183
 - endorsement test and, 539, 938
 - Lee v. Weisman* and, 912
 - Lemon* test and, 538–539
 - school prayer and, 1198
- Santa Fe, New Mexico, same-sex marriage and, 1402
- Santayana, George, 735
- Santeria, 289
- Santobello v. New York*, 1413
- Santosky v. Kramer*, 280, 281
- Sarandon, Susan, 1200
- Sarbanes-Oxley Act
 - commercial speech and, 332
 - whistleblowers and, 1776
- Sarivola, Anthony, 320
- Satire
 - copyright and, 1413
 - First Amendment and, 1413–1414
 - v. parody, 1414
- Satmar Hasidim, 157, 852
- Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania*
 - appeals and, 230
 - resentencing and, 226–227
- Satterlee v. Matthewson*, 213
- Saturday Press*, 784
- Saudi Arabia, extradition and, 563
- Saunders, Janice, 1332
- Savage, David, 908
- Save Our Children, Inc., 190
- Sawyer, Philetus, 901–902
- Saxbe v. Washington Post*, 21, 1415
- Saypol, Irving, 1378
- SCA. See Synagogue Council of America
- Scales v. United States*, 1415
 - freedom of association and, 635
 - Smith Act and, 1488
- Scalia, Antonin, 1415–1418, 1668
 - appointment of, 10, 699
 - Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc.* and, 111
 - Bowers v. Hardwick* and, 909, 1222
 - City of Boerne, Texas v. Flores* and, 1311
 - coercion and, 1102–1103
 - Corporation of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos* and, 367
 - Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health* and, 389
 - Edwards v. Aguillard* and, 481
 - Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow*, 1177
 - Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith* and, 501, 626, 1732–1733
 - establishment clause and, 528
 - on free exercise clause, 768
 - Griffin v. Wisconsin* and, 712
 - Hamdi v. Rumsfeld* and, 731
 - Harmelin v. Michigan* and, 744
 - Hill v. Colorado* and, 13, 361
 - judicial bias and, 860
 - Lawrence v. Texas* and, 1338, 1583
 - Lee v. Weisman* and, 911
 - Lemon* test alternatives and, 534
 - Madsen v. Women's Health Center* and, 949
 - National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley* and, 1065
 - no-coercion test and, 535
 - non-preferentialism standard and, 1110
 - Osborne v. Ohio* and, 1138
 - Pledge of Allegiance and, 1177
 - Pope v. Illinois* and, 1191
 - proportional punishment and, 1241
 - R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul* and, 362, 1271
 - on reasonable expectation of privacy, 882
 - Romer v. Evans* and, 1371
 - Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois* and, 1389
 - same-sex marriage and, 1400
 - on separatism, 767
 - as textualist, 1417
 - Webster v. Reproductive Health Services* and, 1770
- Scandinavia, same-sex marriage and, 1403
- Scarlet letter, 384
- Schacht v. United States*, 364
- Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim*, 111, 1319, 1418–1419, 1820
 - overbreadth doctrine and, 1139
- Schaefer v. United States*, 1796
 - Brandeis and, 174
- Schall v. Martin*, 281, 1419
 - preventative detention and, 1208
- Scheck, Barry, 237
- Scheidler, Joseph, 1134
 - FACE Act and, 633
- Scheidler v. NOW*, 181, 1335
- Schenck, Charles, 651–652, 1419–1420
- Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of Western New York*, 10, 12–13, 67
 - abortion and, 1168
 - buffer zones and, 181
 - Madsen v. Women's Health Center* and, 949
 - picketing and, 1168
- Schenck v. United States*, 1071, 1419–1421
 - Abrams v. United States* and, 13
 - bad tendency test and, 96–97
 - Brandeis and, 174
 - Brandenburg* incitement test and, 178
 - civil liberties and, 1636
 - clear and present danger test and, 311, 980, 1795

INDEX

- Schenck v. United States* (cont.)
Debs v. United States and, 401
 free speech and, 47, 1281, 1794–1795 free speech limitations and, 689
 freedom of expression and, 1163
 freedom of press and, 658
 Hand and, 736
 Holmes and, 770–771, 1280, 1636
 incitement of criminal activity and, 651–652
Masses Publishing Company v. Patten and, 980
 national security and, 1073
Near v. Minnesota and, 1081
 political speech and, 642
 prohibition on prior restraints and, 151
 red scare and, 1280–1282
 Taft Court and, 1597
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette
 and, 1776
 Schiavo, Terri, 86
 Schiffrin, André, 816
 Schiller, Herbert, 650
 Schine, G. David, 984
 Schlafly, Phyllis, 1421
 ERA and, 520
 Schlatt, Frank, 229
 Schlesinger, Arthur, 1269
Schmerber v. California, 181, 1421–1422, 1454, 1455
 DWI and, 470
 exemplars and, 558
 self-incrimination and, 1682
 Schmitt, Carl, 494
Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 78, 1422–1423
Edwards v. Arizona and, 482
 Marshall, T., and, 973
 Schneider, Leonard. See Bruce, Lenny
Schneider v. Irvington, 838
Schneider v. New Jersey, 1364, 1642
Cantwell v. Connecticut and, 849
Schneiderman v. United States, 1566, 1801
 New Deal and, 1084
 Scholarships
 free exercise clause and, 536
Locke v. Davey and, 1425
 School(s). See also Public schools; Universities
 CIPA and, 825
 clubs, 154 compulsory, 58, 628 desegregation, 187
 establishment clause and, 1548 evolution in, 376
 government funding and, 152, 155
 hostile environment harassment and, 778 integrated, 972 juvenile rights in, 604
 lewd speech in, 124
 libraries, 156
Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada and, 782
 non-funding provisions, 152–153 parochial, 31–33, 151–152
 prayer in, 2–4, 1496, 1542
 racial discrimination in, 158–159
 reform, 878
 religious, 31, 333–335
 segregation, 186–187, 281, 878, 1441
 Ten Commandments and, 1563 testing and, 334–335
 U.S. Constitution and, 353
School District of the City of Grand Rapids v. Ball, 31, 1423–1424
Lemon test and, 32
 reversal of, 33
Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District and, 1816
 School of Architecture and Planning, SUNY, 899
 School prayer, 90, 1196–1199
Abington Township School District v. Schempp and, 2–4
 ACLU and, 49
 amendment permitting, 357
Board of Education of Westside Schools v. Mergens and, 1197
 Burger Court and, 200
 coercion and, 1101
 defiance of bans on, 408–409
Engel v. Vitale and, 502–503, 852, 1298
 Falwell and, 575
 Freund and, 665
 Johnson, L., and, 855
Lee v. Weisman and, 540, 911–912, 915
Lemon test and, 533, 538–539, 918
 New York Board of Regents and, 408
 no-coercion test and, 535
 public forums and, 1230
 religious speech and, 1230
Wallace v. Jaffree and, 409, 1736
 White, B., and, 1779
 School Question, 152
 School uniforms, 1578–1579
 School vouchers, 1424–1425, 1525. See also Private choice
 First Amendment and, 1528
 O'Connor and, 1127
 religious schools and, 929, 1424
Zelman v. Simmons-Harris and, 31–32, 167, 334, 1424, 1812
 Schrecker, Ellen, 150
Schriro v. Summerlin, 76
 Schroeder, Theodore, 1795
 Schumer, Charles, 633
 Schwartz, Joseph, 13
 Schwarzenegger, Arnold, 1403
Schweiker v. Chilicky, 149
 Schwimmer, Rosika, 1141
 Scinter, 685, 1488–1489
 Scientific research. See Technology
 Scientology. See Church of Scientology
 SCLC. See Southern Christian Leadership Conference
 Scofield, Edward, 902
 “Scope and Meaning of Police Power, The” (Bufford), 1187
 Scopes, John T., 48, 376, 1425–1427, 1757
 ACLU and, 103
 Bryan and, 189
 Scopes Monkey Trial, 1425–1427
 ACLU and, 48, 103, 376
 Bryan and, 189
 Darrow and, 395
Epperson v. Arkansas and, 511
 Scott Act, 260
 Scott, Coretta, 889
 Scott, Dred, 451–452
Scott v. Illinois, 1349–1350
 Scott, Walter, 383
 Scottsboro Boys, 1427–1428
 Emerson and, 498
Powell v. Alabama and, 1192
 Scottsboro Cases. See Powell v. Alabama

- SDS. See Students for a Democratic Society
- Seale, Bobby
Chicago Seven and, 278
Kunstler and, 898
- Sealed documents, in court proceedings, 1428–1429
- Search and seizure. See also Automobile searches; Forfeiture; Fourth Amendment; Seizures
administrative, 27–29
airports, 33–34
arrest and, 80–81
authority, 81
automobile, 91–92 in Barron v. Mayor of Baltimore, 970
Bible and, 127
at borders, 1752
Boyd v. United States and, 171
California v. Acevedo and, 214–215
California v. Greenwood and, 215
Camara v. Municipal Court of the City and County of San Francisco and, 217
checkpoints and, 275–276, 1004
Chimel v. California and, 284–285 of closed containers, 597 consent to, 1422
Coolidge v. New Hampshire and, 365
definition of, 1429
drug testing and, 266
drugs and, 1745
DWI and, 469–470
electronic surveillance and, 487–488
emergency powers and, 496 evidence and, 1542
exclusionary rule and, 554–555
Florida v. Jimeno and, 597
Florida v. Riley and, 597
Florida v. Royer and, 598
Florida v. White and, 598
Fourth Amendment and, 1539
fruit of the poisonous tree and, 667
Fuller Court and, 668
good faith exception to, 1004–1005
Hester v. United States and, 763
illegal, 557
Illinois v. Krull and, 793–794
Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Lopez-Mendoza
and, 798
inventory, 1431
Kamisar and, 881
Katz v. United States and, 881–882
Kolender v. Lawson and, 894
in Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 933 luggage and, 1752
Mapp v. Ohio and, 956
marijuana and, 763 mass suspicionless, 430
Michigan v. Summers and, 1006
Mincey v. Arizona and, 1014
Minnesota v. Dickerson and, 1015
New Jersey v. T.L.O. and, 1086
New York v. Belton and, 1091
noncitizens and, 380–381
O'Connor v. Ortega and, 1128
Ohio v. Robinette and, 1128
open fields and, 1133
of papers, 1432
of parolees, 1433
pat-frisks and, 1015
Payton v. New York and, 1151 of pervasively regulated industries, 1432
plain view and, 1171
PPA and, 1224
in prison, 781
privacy and, 83, 598, 1430–1431 without probable cause, 148
probable cause and, 78, 1234, 1431 property-based definition of, 1429–1430 protective pat-down, 794–795
protective sweep and, 976
Rawlings v. Kentucky and, 1271 reasonable, 881–882 reasonable grounds for, 712
Reid v. Georgia and, 1291
rules for, 1431–1432
Schneekloth v. Bustamonte and, 1422
Silverthorne Lumber Company v. United States and, 772
state constitutions and, 1536
United States v. Ramirez and, 1690
United States v. Robinson and, 1691–1692 unreasonable, 555, 1751 unwarranted, 251
USA PATRIOT Act and, 1149
Vinson Court and, 1720
Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723
warrant clause IV and, 1747 warrantless, 28, 81, 91–92, 712, 794, 1014, 1417, 1751–1752
warrants and, 1429
Warren Court and, 1757–1758
Weeks v. United States and, 1772
- Search engines, 823
- Search warrants, 83, 1433–1436 administrative searches and, 28 application process for, 1434 automobile searches without, 91–92
California v. Acevedo and, 215
Camara v. Municipal Court of the City and County of San Francisco and, 217
Carroll v. United States and, 251
Chimel v. California and, 284–285
Connally v. Georgia and, 347–348
Coolidge v. New Hampshire and, 365
drug testing and, 156
duplicate original, 1434
electronic surveillance and, 487 elements of, 1434–1435 exceptions for, 1433 for felony drug crimes, 1557
Florida v. White and, 598
good faith exception and, 555–556
habeas corpus and, 556
Hester v. United States and, 763
Illinois v. Gates and, 793 inspections without, 217 insufficiency of, 1435
limits of, 1433
in Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 933
Mapp v. Ohio and, 956
Marshall, T., and, 973
Michigan v. Summers and, 1006
National Prohibition Act and, 1364 original, 1434

INDEX

- Search warrants (cont.)
 - PPA and, 1223
 - thermal imaging and, 900
 - United States v. Leon* and, 793, 1685–1686
 - United States v. Ramirez* and, 1690
 - United States v. United States District Court* and, 1695–1996
 - usefulness of, 1434
 - Wilson v. Layne* and, 1783
- Seatbelt(s)
 - law, 1497
 - as victimless crime, 1709
- Seattle Times Co. v. United States District Court for the Western District of Washington*, 1428
- SEC. See Securities and Exchange Commission
- Secession
 - compact theory and, 887
 - treason and, 1665
- Second Amendment
 - assumptions of, 143–144
 - Burger and, 205
 - collective view of, 721
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 357–358
 - Dred Scott v. Sandford* and, 721–722
 - English Bill of Rights and, 503
 - gun control and, 720–722
 - incorporation doctrine and, 804
 - Lewis v. United States* and, 1343
 - McReynolds and, 993
 - negative rights and, 144
 - NRA and, 1070–1071
 - Presser v. Illinois* and, 722, 1342
 - right to bear arms and, 1338, 1343–1349
 - Schlaflly and, 1421
 - United States v. Miller* (1939) and, 1687
- Second Continental Congress, 845
- Second Institutes* (Coke), 456
- Second Legal Tender Cases*, 465
- Second Reinstatement of Torts, The*
 - false light invasion of privacy, 574–575
 - intrusion and, 827
- Second Treatise on Government* (Locke), 462
 - emergencies and, 494
 - Jefferson and, 847
 - property ownership and, 475
- Second Vatican Council, 254–255
 - Americans United and, 57
 - Murray and, 1050
- Secondary effects doctrine, 364, 1436–1437, 1820
 - Young v. American Mini Theatres* and, 1807
- Secret Service, 415
- Secular humanism, 1619
 - public schools and, 1437–1438
- Secular purpose, 1438–1439
- Secularism
 - atheism and, 90
 - currency and, 90
 - religion of, 3
 - Warren Court and, 1756
- Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), 443
- Sedgewick, Ellery, 617
- Sedition, 36
 - Brandeis and, 176
 - Ellsworth Court and, 491
 - free speech law and, 815
 - New Deal and, 1084
 - Paine and, 1143
 - Penn and, 1781
 - sedition libel and, 644–645
 - Taylor v. Mississippi* and, 595
 - World War II and, 1800
 - Zenger and, 1814
- Sedition Act of 1798, 36–40, 68, 1450, 1766. See also Alien and Sedition Acts
 - aftermath of, 647–648
 - Chase and, 273–274
 - Cooley on, 645
 - Ellsworth Court and, 491–492
 - Federalists and, 1441
 - free speech and, 642–643, 1641
 - freedom of press and, 1205–1207
 - Hamilton and, 733
 - Madison and, 945–946
 - Marshall Court and, 968
 - Marshall, J., and, 970
 - national security and, 1072
 - noncitizens and, 1105–1106
 - in practice, 39
 - repeal of, 660
 - review of, 643
 - theory of, 38–39
 - unconstitutionality of, 39
- Sedition Act of 1918, 1280
 - Chafee and, 261
 - free speech and, 1794
 - freedom of press and, 658
 - Masses Publishing Company v. Patten* and, 979
 - repeal of, 658
 - Wilson and, 1784
- Seditious libel, 644–645, 1439–1441
 - Cooley and, 645
 - in eighteenth century, 1440
 - freedom of press and, 1202
 - Hamilton and, 734
 - Jefferson and, 733
 - Kentucky Resolves and, 887–888
 - prior restraints and, 1209
 - Schenck v. United States* and, 1420
 - Virginia Resolves and, 887–888
- Sedmia, S.P.R.L. v. Imrex Co., Inc.*, 1334–1335
- See v. City of Seattle*, 27–28
- Seeger, Daniel, 1693
- Seekers, 153
- Seemuller v. Fairfax County School Board*, 1615
- Segregation, 1441–1444. See also Desegregation
 - after World War II, 972
 - army, 418
 - Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet* and, 158
 - Brown v. Board of Education* and, 186
 - Burger and, 206
 - Burton and, 208
 - commerce clause and, 971
 - Connor and, 348
 - Corrigan v. Buckley* and, 368–369
 - Cox v. Louisiana* and, 372–373
 - de facto, 1441
 - de jure, 1441
 - Edwards v. South Carolina* and, 483
 - equal protection and, 515–516
 - Evers and, 548–549

- Frank and, 616
- Harlan, I. and, 738
- Helper on, 760
- Hughes and, 783
- Japanese internment and, 840
- Jews and, 852
- Johnson, L., and, 855
- Justice and, 878
- King and, 890
- KKK and, 897
- marches against, 958
- Marshall, T., and, 971–972
- NAACP and, 784, 1063
- NAACP v. Button* and, 1058
- Parks and, 1064
- race-based classifications and, 611
- Runyon v. McCrary* and, 281
- Shaw and, 1467
- sit-ins against, 959
- substantive due process and, 466–467
- Sweatt v. Painter* and, 616
- Voting Rights Act of 1965 and, 1729
- Warren Court and, 1753
- White, B., and, 1779
- White Court and, 1777–1778
- Seigenthaler, John, 959
- Seizures. See also Search and seizure
 - de minimus, 1446
 - definition of, 1444
 - probable cause and, 1447
 - of property, 1447
 - Warden v. Hayden* and, 1747
 - Wolf v. Colorado* and, 1790
- Sekulow, Jay, 286
- Selassie, Haile, 1262
- Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy, 426
- Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor Management Field
 - Goldberg and, 695
- Select Committee to Study Government Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities, 1519
- Selective Service. See also Draft
 - Bond and, 162
 - Rostker v. Goldberg* and, 698
 - women and, 698
- Selective Service Act of 1917, 1419, 1447–1448
 - draft card burning and, 1688
 - free speech and, 1794
 - national security and, 1074
 - Seventh Day Adventists and, 1462
 - Socialist Party and, 1419
- Selective Service Act of 1940, 1801–1802
- Selective Service Draft Law Cases*, 1447–1448, 1448, 1792, 1793
 - White Court and, 1778
- Self-defense, 1448–1449
 - Fifteenth Amendment and, 1726
 - Nineteenth Amendment and, 1728
 - spousal murder and, 974–975
- Self-fulfillment, 1449–1450
- Self-governance, 994, 1540–1541
 - civil liberties and, 1638
 - of communities, 1540
 - free speech and, 1449, 1450–1452, 1642
 - privileges and immunities and, 1230
- Self-incrimination
 - Allen v. Illinois* and, 43
 - Baltimore City Department of Social Services v. Bouknight* and, 106
 - Bible and, 128
 - bookmaking and, 960
 - Boykin v. Alabama* and, 172
 - Braswell v. United States* and, 180
 - Brewer v. Williams* and, 182
 - Brooks v. Tennessee* and, 185
 - coercion and, 794
 - compulsory registration and, 1684
 - confessions and, 920
 - corporations and, 668, 740
 - exclusionary rule and, 557–558
 - exemplars and, 558
 - Fisher v. United States* and, 589
 - Fortas and, 604
 - Frankfurter and, 618
 - Fuller Court and, 667
 - grand juries and, 668, 708
 - grand jury indictments and, 706
 - history of, 1452–1456
 - Hopt v. Utah Territory* and, 777
 - incorporation doctrine and, 618, 803
 - Lilborne and, 919, 920
 - Lilly v. Virginia* and, 920
 - Mathis v. United States* and, 981–982
 - Matthews on, 739
 - McNabb v. United States* and, 991–992
 - Michigan v. Mosley* and, 1005–1006
 - Miranda v. Arizona* and, 318, 1016
 - Miranda warnings and, 1017, 1456–1457
 - occupational tax stamps and, 960
 - police coercion and, 794
 - right to remain silent and, 710
 - Rock v. Arkansas* and, 407
 - silence and, 710
 - test oaths and, 1627
 - in twentieth century, 1017–1018
 - United States v. Kahriger* and, 1684
 - United States v. Washington* and, 1697–1698
 - Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723
 - Warren Court and, 1757–1758
- Self-realization theory, 1449
- Self-representation theory, 1457–1458
- Sell v. United States*, 1335–1336
- Sellin, Thorsten, 240
- Selling of the President, The* (McGinniss), 219
- Senate
 - ICRA and, 808
 - McCarthy and, 984
- Senate Committee on Slavery and Freedmen, 1585
- Senate Judiciary Committee, 165
- Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, 1454
- Senate Subcommittee on Internal Security, 1454
- Seneca Falls Women's Rights Convention, 65
 - women's suffrage and, 1793
- Senn v. Tile Layers Protective Union*, 175–176
- Sentencing. See also Eye for an eye
 - Apprendi v. New Jersey* and, 76
 - arbitrary, 236–237, 710
 - capital punishment and, 227, 1504–1505
 - discretion, 239
 - Eighth Amendment and, 227

INDEX

- Sentencing (cont.)
 - excessive, 1494
 - Furman v. Georgia* and, 675
 - guided discretion statutes for, 717
 - hate crime laws and, 749–750
 - juries and, 990
 - Kennedy, A., and, 886
 - life, 226
 - mandatory death, 952–953
 - mandatory minimum, 953–954
 - McGautha v. California* and, 989–990
 - mitigating factors and, 227
 - nondeath, 384–385
 - North Carolina v. Pearce* and, 1111–1112
 - plea bargaining and, 1176
 - prison population and, 1213–1214
 - proportionality of, 744
 - racial discrimination and, 228–229, 1257
 - for recidivism, 1494
 - Spaziano v. Florida* and, 1504–1505
 - victims and, 1711
- Sentencing Commission, 1459
- Sentencing guidelines, 1458–1459
 - for abuse of discretion, 1460
 - prescriptive, 1459
 - presumptive, 1459
 - voluntary, 1458–1459
- Sentencing Reform Act, 1459–1460
 - Mistretta v. United States* and, 1023–1024
- Separate but equal doctrine, 515–517, 1442
 - education and, 1541
 - Fuller Court and, 667
 - Marshall, T., and, 971
 - Plessy v. Ferguson* and, 1017, 1181
 - race-based classifications and, 611
- Separate-Baptists, 108
 - in colonial America, 526
- Separation of Church and State Now* (Dawson), 397
- Separation of powers doctrine, 1703–1705
- Separationism, 1274, 1289, 1299, 1308–1309, 1390
 - Americans United and, 56–57
 - Bible and, 127, 129
 - Bible reading and, 131–133
 - Burger Court and, 199
 - Catholic Church and, 253
 - civil religion and, 297–298
 - Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist* and, 333
 - Dawson and, 397
 - Everson v. Board of Education* and, 550, 1295, 1390
 - evolution of, 766
 - Falwell and, 575–576
 - family values movement and, 577
 - Frankfurter and, 618–619
 - freedom of religion v., 542
 - Hutchinson and, 62
 - Jefferson and, 90, 132, 766, 1309
 - Jews and, 852–853
 - Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization of California* and, 853–854
 - legislative history of, 767–768
 - legislative prayer and, 967
 - Lemon* test and, 533–535
 - Madison and, 944
 - McCullum v. Board of Education* and, 767
 - Mitchell v. Helms* and, 1024–1025
 - Murray and, 1049–1050
 - Quakers and, 1251
 - religion clauses and, 551
 - scope of, 767
- Separationist jurisprudence
 - Agostini v. Felton* and, 31
 - Aguilar v. Felton* and, 32
 - religion and, 33
- Serbian Eastern Orthodox Diocese v. Milivojevich*
 - establishment clause and, 537
- Watson v. Jones* and, 862
- Serious and imminent threat test. See Brandenburg test
- Sermon on the Mount, 58
- Serrano, Andres, 1065
- Servicemembers Legal Defense Network (SLDN), 1460–1461
 - homosexuality and, 436
- Settled doctrine, 967
- Settlement of 1689, 951
- Seven Bishops, 1667
- Seventeenth Amendment, 1275
- Seventh Amendment
 - limitations of, 144
 - trial by jury and, 1666
- Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, 47
- Seventh-Day Adventists, 119, 1469
 - accommodation and, 22
 - free exercise clause and, 625
 - religious liberty and, 1461–1462
- Sherbert v. Verner* and, 628
- Warren and, 1765
- Warren Court and, 1756
- Seward, William H., 1293, 1526
 - Thirteenth Amendment and, 1648
- Sex. See also Obscenity
 - AFLA and, 29
 - age of consent and, 1550
 - Bowen v. Kendrick* and, 167
 - Carmen Baby* and, 1255
 - criminal justice and, 1463–1465
 - discrimination, 71
 - First Amendment and, 1676
 - Hays Office and, 755
 - immigration and, 1465–1466
 - obscenity and, 1115, 1117
 - premarital, 965
 - privacy and, 1219–1220
 - states and, 1540
 - Unites States v. One Book Entitled “Ulysses”* and, 1689
 - zoning and, 1820–1821
- Sex education
 - free exercise and, 1246
 - public schools and, 1246
- Sex offenders
 - collateral consequences and, 326
 - Conn. DPS v. Doe* and, 1150–1151
 - indefinite detention of, 804
 - Megan’s Law and, 554, 997
 - mental illness and, 1001
- Sexual abuse cases
 - of foster children, 1463
 - testimony in, 976–977
- Sexual activity
 - deviant, 676
 - interracial, 1022

- Lawrence v. Texas* and, 909, 1328, 1338, 1371
- minors and, 250, 283
- in movies, 1041
- prior, 1005
- privacy and, 714
- Sexual assault
 - DNA testing and, 428, 432
 - naming of victims of, 1261–1262
 - as speech, 943
- Sexual discrimination, 71, 1412, 1501
 - Board of Directors of Rotary International v. Rotary Club of Duarte* and, 636, 1381
 - Dworkin and, 470–471
 - Ginsburg and, 686–688
 - Mill and, 1010
 - pornography as, 942
 - Santa Clara Pueblo v. Martinez* and, 808
 - traditional cultures and, 1640
- Sexual expression
 - Bethel School District v. Fraser* and, 1576
 - content-based laws and, 252
 - freedom of press and, 659–660
 - Kois v. Wisconsin* and, 894
- Sexual extortion, 778
- Sexual harassment, 71
 - Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, 301
 - Emerson and, 499
- Sexual Harassment of Working Women* (McKinnon)
 - Emerson and, 499
- Sexual orientation
 - Charitable Choice and, 423
 - discrimination and, 1409
 - employment discrimination and, 777–779
 - hate crimes and, 303, 749–751, 751–752
 - hate speech and, 752–755
 - in military, 1460
 - murders and, 1469
 - parades and, 786
 - privacy and, 1221–1222
 - in same-sex adoption, 1398
- Sexual privacy, 1416
- Sexual revolution
 - marriage after, 965
 - obscenity and, 1123
- Sexually explicit materials. See Obscenity
- Sexually transmitted diseases, 1410
- Sgro v. United States*, 1435
- Shadowing, 828
- Shadwick v. Tampa*, 1435
- Shaffer v. Heitner*, 973
- Shakespeare, William, 402
- Shakur, Tupac, 764
- Shapiro v. Kentucky Bar Ass'n*, 1235
- Shapiro v. Thompson*, 1396, 1466
 - privileges and immunities and, 1233
 - right to travel and, 801, 1354
- Share Our Wealth, 934
- Sharon S. v. Superior Court of San Diego County*, 1408
- Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei*, 461, 1467
- Shaw, Lemuel, 1467–1468
 - Inhabitants of Wilbraham v. Hampden County Commissioners* and, 799
- Shaw v. Reno*, 1278, 1279
 - Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet* and, 157
- O'Connor and, 1127
 - voting rights and, 1726
- Shays' Rebellion
 - Jefferson on, 846
 - Marshall, J., and, 969
- Sheehan, Neil, 1089
- Sheen, Fulton J., 118
- Shelby, Alan, 1690
- Sheldon v. Sill*, 866
- Shelley v. Kraemer*, 1325, 1442–1443, 1468–1469
 - Buchanan v. Warley* and, 192
 - Burton and, 208
 - Corrigan v. Buckley* and, 369
 - equal protection and, 516, 1325
 - state action doctrine and, 1524
 - Vinson Court and, 1720
- Shelter facilities, 1550
- Shelton, Robert, 1501–1502
- Shelton v. Tucker*, 18, 62
 - free exercise and, 1246
 - public schools and, 1246
- Shenandoah Baptist Church, 571
- Shenandoah v. Halbritter*, 809
- Shepard, Matthew, 1469
- "Shepherd's Rod, The" (Houteff), 1461
- Sheppard v. Maxwell*, 420
 - gag orders and, 671
- Shepperd, Sam, 631
- Shepperd v. Maxwell*, 631
- Sherbert, Adeil, 1462, 1469
- Sherbert test*, 501
- Sherbert v. Verner*, 22–23, 159, 500, 1304–1305, 1462, 1469–1471
 - Bowen v. Roy* and, 168
 - conscientious objection and, 349–350
 - Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith* and, 501
 - free exercise and, 1246
 - free exercise clause and, 119, 542, 625, 628, 939
 - Mozert v. Hawkins County Board of Education* and, 1044
 - statutory religion-based exemptions and, 560
 - Warren Court and, 1756
 - Wisconsin v. Yoder*, 1788
- Sherman Antitrust Act, 1471–1472
 - economic regulation and, 473
 - federalization of criminal law and, 581
 - freedom of association and, 635
 - Holmes on, 770
 - La Follette and, 901
 - McReynolds and, 992
 - White Court and, 1777
- Sherman, John, 1471
- Sherman, Roger, 139, 1314, 1472–1473
 - Bill of Rights and, 352, 1325
 - civil liberties and, 143
 - freedom of the press and, 360
 - personal freedom and, 140
 - quartering of troops and, 1252
 - religious tests for office holding and, 359
- Sherman v. Community Consolidated School District*, 1178, 1179
- Shield, Henry, 315
- Shield laws, 859, 1473
- Shields v. Utah Idaho Central Railroad*, 868
- Shine, G. David
 - Cohn and, 323
 - McCarthy and, 1773

INDEX

- Shocks the conscience test, 181
Souter and, 1497
Shoplifting, 1150
Shopping centers
free speech and, 1474, 1536, 1544
open-air assembly in, 1397
Shouting Fire: Civil Liberties in a Turbulent Age (Dershowitz), 416
Sibron v. New York, 1445
Sicurella v. United States, 1474–1475
Sidney, Algernon, 1357
Jefferson and, 847
Sierra Club v. Butz, 1480
Signal Corps, 984
Silard, John, 1269
Silence period of, 409
as self-incrimination, 710
Silver Nugget, 306
Silver standard currency, 189
Silverman v. United States, 1429
Silverstein, Ken, 1503
Silverthorne Lumber Company v. United States, 1598, 1799
Holmes and, 772
Simmons, William Joseph, 896
Simon & Schuster v. Members of the New York State Crime Victims Board, 252, 1494–1495 content-based speech regulation and, 361
Simopoulos v. Virginia, 1475
Simpson, Matthew, 146
Simpson, O.J., 1414
cameras in courtrooms and, 218
Dershowitz and, 306, 416
double jeopardy and, 441
jury nullification and, 869 pretrial detention and, 805
Sims v. Georgia
Crane v. Kentucky and, 375
Sincerity, 1476–1477
Singer v. Hara, 1400
Singer v. United States, 1478
Singleton v. State, 1532
Sister Souljah, 765
Sisters of Charity, 172
Sit-ins, 412, 959
Sixteenth Amendment, 479
Sixth Amendment, 144. See also Compulsory Process Clause; Confrontation Clause; Right to fair trial absolute disparity and, 872
Apodaca v. Oregon and, 73
Apprendi v. New Jersey, 76
Ballew v. Georgia and, 105
Betts v. Brady and, 125, 1350
blood samples and, 1422
Brewer v. Williams and, 182
Buchanan v. Kentucky and, 191
cameras in courtrooms and, 218, 265
civil trials and, 872
colonial charters and, 327
compulsory process clause and, 344–345 confrontation clause of, 25, 345 counsel and, 1458
Coy v. Iowa and, 374
Crane v. Kentucky and, 375 cross-examination and, 1360
Davis v. Alaska and, 396
death-qualified juries and, 932 defense evidence and, 1005
Duncan v. Louisiana and, 468, 743
eyewitness identification and, 568
freedom of expression and, 1159, 1163
Gideon v. Wainwright and, 318, 603, 682
Goldberg and, 696
Holland v. Illinois and, 769
Illinois v. Perkins and, 794
ineffective assistance of counsel and, 810–811
jailhouse informants and, 838
jury selection and, 871
jury size and, 743
jury trial right and, 875–877, 877
Kirby v. Illinois and, 892
Klopfer v. North Carolina and, 893
lawyers speaking about pending cases and, 420
Lilly v. Virginia and, 920
Marshall, T., and, 973
Maryland v. Craig and, 976–977
Massiah v. United States and, 980–981
Michigan v. Lucas and, 1005
Miranda and, 1020
Miranda v. Arizona and, 1016
Moran v. Burbine and, 1034
Motes v. United States and, 1040
Nix v. Williams and, 1097
noncitizens and, 380
Ohio v. Robinette and, 1128
peremptory challenges and, 115
Powell v. Alabama and, 1192
private police and, 1227
Reid v. Covert and, 1291
right to counsel and, 1344–1347, 1349–1351, 1625 right to trial and, 1336
states and, 772
Stevens and, 1558
Stone Court and, 1562
Taylor v. Louisiana and, 1610
United States v. Booker and, 1024
United States v. Lovasco and, 1686
victims' rights and, 1711
Warren Court and, 1757, 1759
Washington v. Texas and, 1767
Zenger and, 1815
60 Minutes, 888–889
Skeptical scrutiny test, 687
Skinner v. Oklahoma, 1478–1479
Douglas and, 447
eugenic sterilization and, 545, 1320
Griswold v. Connecticut and, 713, 1320
Stone Court and, 1562
suspect categories and, 518
Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association, 1479–1480, 1746
civil liberties and, 1636
drug testing and, 452–453
Marshall, J., and, 1636
National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab and, 1076–1077
Skolnick, Jerome, 1236
Skyjackers, 1237
Slander, 402
damages for, 404
SLAPP. See Strategic lawsuits against public participation
Slaughterhouse Cases, 74, 152, 1355, 1481–1483
Bill of Rights and, 1632

- Chase Court and, 271, 272–273
- due process incorporation and, 607
- economic rights and, 478
- Field and, 586
- Fourteenth Amendment and, 514, 1354–1355
- Hurtado v. California* and, 786
- incorporation doctrine and, 803
- penumbras and, 1153
- privileges and immunities and, 607, 1232, 1354–1355
- state action and, 606, 1354
- substantive due process and, 465
- Waite Court and, 1733
- Slave Codes, 238
- Slavery, 1483–1484. See also Abolitionism, of slavery; Fugitive Slave Act
 - AASS and, 45–46
 - abolishment of, 228
 - abolition of, 52
 - American Revolution and, 53
 - Bible and, 129
 - Calhoun and, 214
 - capital punishment and, 225, 239
 - Chase Court, 271
 - church splits and, 862
 - citizenship and, 451–452
 - civil liberties and, 1484–1487, 1542
 - civil rights after, 70
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 358–359
 - constitutions and, 138–139
 - Corrigan v. Buckley* and, 369
 - Declaration of Independence and, 402, 451
 - Douglass and, 448
 - Dred Scott v. Sandford* and, 451–452, 864
 - economic rights and, 478
 - Emancipation Proclamation and, 493–494, 924
 - family privacy and, 281
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 605
 - free speech and, 648–649
 - Garrison and, 676
 - Harlan, I. and, 738–739
 - Helper on, 759–760
 - immediatism and, 4
 - interdiction and, 390
 - Jackson, A. and, 833
 - Jefferson and, 138, 845
 - Johnson, L., and, 138
 - Kendall and, 883–884
 - Lincoln and, 922–924
 - Lovejoy and, 1486
 - Madison and, 946
 - Mann Act and, 954–955
 - marriage and, 964
 - Massachusetts and, 139
 - Mormons and, 1037
 - murder and, 1483
 - Ninth Amendment and, 1096–1097
 - Northwest Territory and, 845
 - personal liberty laws and, 1484
 - Petition Campaign and, 1154
 - Phillips, W. and, 1158
 - Plessy v. Ferguson* and, 1181
 - privileges and immunities and, 606–607, 1230
 - regulation of, 1258
 - state bills of rights and, 138–139
 - Story and, 1572
 - Sumner and, 1585
 - Thirteenth Amendment and, 1647
 - U.S. Constitution and, 353
 - Watson v. Jones* and, 1767–1768
 - white, 954–955
- Slaves
 - prisoners as, 1216
 - reading and, 1734
 - runaway, 1542
- SLDN. See Servicemembers Legal Defense Network
- Sleep deprivation, 316
- Sliding-scale test
 - of equal protection, 973
 - Hand, L. and, 1722
 - Vinson and, 1722
- Slow-moving vehicles (SMVs), 58
- Smallpox, 341
- Smilie, John, 1265
- Smith Act of 1940, 49, 68, 1415, 1454, 1487–1488, 1510
 - ACLU and, 104
 - Brandenburg v. Ohio* and, 178
 - Clark, T., and, 309
 - Cohn and, 322
 - Communist Party and, 1377
 - CPUSA and, 338, 339
 - Debs v. United States* and, 401
 - Dennis v. United States* and, 414, 654–655
 - Hand and, 737
 - HUAC and, 780
 - INA and, 983
 - national security and, 1073
 - Vinson and, 1722
 - World War II and, 1800
 - Yates v. United States* and, 110, 1807
- Smith, Adam, 1329
 - Lochner v. New York* and, 928
 - Mill and, 1010
- Smith, Al, 500
 - Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith* and, 500
 - Gitlow v. New York* and, 690
- Smith, Howard, 1488
- Smith, Hyrum, 1038
- Smith, J. Clay, Jr., 973
- Smith, James Morton, 642
- Smith, Jess, 774
- Smith, John Eldon, 228
- Smith, Joseph, Jr., 72, 1330
 - African Americans and, 1037
 - Mormons and, 1035
 - murder of, 1038
 - polygamy and, 1038
- Smith, Lamar, 548
- Smith, Ruth Proskauer, 1062
- Smith test, 1263
- Smith v. Allwright*, 1366, 1562, 1571
 - Vinson Court and, 1721
- Smith v. Bd. of Sch. Commissioners of Mobile County*
 - establishment clause and, 1619
 - evolution and, 1619
- Smith v. California*, 1488–1489
 - Black, H., and, 1634–1635
- Smith v. Daily Mail Publishing Company*, 113, 596
- Smith v. Doe*, 554
- Smith v. Goguen*, 363

INDEX

- Smith v. Maryland*, 1430, 1532
privacy and, 1220
reasonable expectation of privacy and, 882
United States v. Miller (1976), 1687
- Smith v. Organization of Foster Families for Equality and Reform*, 281, 1489–1490
- Smith v. YMCA*, 1501
- Smith, Walter P., 1731
- Smith, William, 1814
Jefferson and, 846
Zenger and, 734
- SMVs. See Slow-moving vehicles
- Snake-handling sects, 1490–1491
- SNCC. See Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee
- Snepp, Frank, 1491
- Snepp v. United States*, 311, 1491–1492
Burger Court and, 202
injunctions and, 1212
nondisclosure agreements and, 659
prior restraints and, 1076
- Snider v. Cunningham*, 697
- Snowden v. Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe*, 808
- Snyder v. Massachusetts*, 1364
- Snyder v. Murray City Corp.*, 915
- Sobell, Morton, 1378
- Social contract theory
Bryan and, 189
Locke and, 930–931
Mill and, 1010
- Social Democratic Party, 400
- Social gospel, 397
- Social groups, 872 asylum and, 89 based on race, 991 categories of, 751
exclusion of, 789
hate crime laws and, 748–751
immigration and, 773
jury selection and, 872
- Social pressure, 600–601
- Social Security
benefits, 629
Butler and, 209
Native Americans and, 168
Thomas v. Review Board and, 1686
United States v. Lee and, 1685
- Social Security Act of 1935, 393, 1269, 1373
marriage and, 965
Medicaid and, 115
- Social value
Bible and, 127
A Book Named “John Cleland’s Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure” v. Massachusetts and, 1–2
Roth test and, 835–836
- Socialist Party
clear and present danger test and, 1795
COINTELPRO and, 1518
Debs and, 399, 1281
Emerson and, 498
Gitlow v. New York and, 689–690
Mormons and, 1035
Schenck and, 1419
Schenck v. United States and, 652, 770–771
- Societal needs, personal freedom v., 100
- Society for Human Rights, 1566
gay and lesbian rights and, 676
- Society of American Artists
Comstock and, 342
- Society of American Law Teachers, 1461
- Society of Friends. See Quakers
- Society, retribution and, 1329–1330
- Socioeconomics
equal protection and, 609–610
rational purpose test and, 610
- Sociological jurisprudence, 443
- Socrates, 1451
- Sodomy, 676
Bible and, 130
Bowers v. Hardwick and, 1521
capital punishment and, 1223 criminality of, 1405
decriminalizing, 713
gay and lesbian rights and, 677, 885
Hardwick v. Bowers and, 855
homosexuality and, 1222
intrusion and, 836
Kennedy, A., and, 885
Lamda and, 905
Lawrence v. Texas and, 908, 1329, 1338, 1371, 1399–1400, 1521
obscenity and, 1116
O’Connor and, 1126
Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton and, 1148
privacy and, 1542
punishments for, 1493
right to, 436
same-sex adoption and, 1398
sexual orientation and, 1222
Uniform Code of Military Justice and, 436
White, B., and, 1779
- Sodomy laws, 1492–1493
Bowers v. Hardwick and, 168–169
Burger Court and, 199
reform of, 1493
- Soft money, 220, 1190
- Software
Internet filtering, 825
Metro-Goldwyn Mayer Studios v. Grokster and, 1001–1002 privacy, 820–821
sharing, 822–823
- Sola scriptura, 129
- Soldier of Fortune Magazine*, 659
- Soldier’s disease, 1740
- Solem v. Helm*, 1494
English Bill of Rights and, 503
Harmelin v. Michigan and, 744
three strikes laws and, 1654
- Solicitations, 829
- Solomon Amendment, 1461
- Solorio v. United States*, 1007
- Son of Sam Law, 361, 1494–1495
- Sonnier, Elmo Patrick, 1200
- Sons of Liberty
Chase and, 273
Milligan and, 551
- Sony v. Universal City Studios*, 1001–102
- Sonzinsky v. United States*, 1684
- Sorrells v. United States*, 1495
- Sound trucks, 829
- Souter, David, 1495–1498
Agostini v. Felton and, 31

- balancing and, 100
- Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet* and, 157
- Buck v. Bell* and, 193
- Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith* and, 501
- on establishment clause, 527–528
- McCreary Count, Kentucky v. American Civil Liberties Union of Kentucky* and, 146–147
- Mitchell v. Helms* and, 1025
- non-preferentialism standard and, 1109
- O'Connor and, 1126
- PAS and, 1165
- proportional punishment and, 1241
- Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia* and, 1379
- United States v. Balsys* and, 1680
- Virginia v. Black* and, 1724–1725
- Zelman v. Simmons-Harris* and, 1813
- South Africa
 - same-sex marriage and, 1403
 - Tribe and, 1668
- South America, same-sex unions in, 1404
- South Boston Allied War Veterans Council, 786
- South Carolina
 - ACLU and, 1059
 - Calhoun and, 214
 - general warrants and, 1751
 - literacy tests and, 1729
 - Padilla and, 1347
 - pregnancy in, 1322
 - privacy and, 1531
 - Protestantism in, 136
 - religion and, 1309, 1315
 - Seventh-Day Adventists and, 1462
 - Shelley v. Kraemer* and, 1469–1471
 - slavery and, 1485
 - voting in, 1729–1730
- South Carolina Exposition, The* (Calhoun), 214
- South Carolina State House, 483
- South Carolina v. Katzenbach*, 1559, 1730
- South Dakota, cruel and unusual punishment and, 1494
- South Dakota v. Opperman*, 1498, 1532
- Southeastern Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad*, 1498–1499
 - public forum doctrines and, 1243
- Southern Center for Human Rights, 1499–1500
- Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC)
 - Brown v. Board of Education* and, 959
 - Connor and, 348
 - King and, 889
- Southern Horrors: Lynch Law in All Its Phases* (Wells), 1774
- Southern Pacific Co. v. Arizona*, 1801
- Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC), 1500–1504
 - chain gangs and, 263
 - criticism of, 1503–1504
 - fundraising for, 1503–1504
- Southern Prisoners' Defense Committee. See Southern Center for Human Rights
- Southern Railway Company, 208
- Southern Ute Tribe, 807
- Southern White Knights. See Ku Klux Klan
- Southwestern College, 603
- Sovereignty. See Self-governance
- Soviet Union
 - CPUSA and, 337
 - Hiss and, 765
 - Kaufman and, 883
 - La Follette and, 904
 - Nixon, R. and, 1098
 - recognition of, 150
 - Rosenbergs and, 1377–1378
- Spain
 - judicial review and, 865
 - same-sex marriage and, 1403–1404
- Spam, 45
 - blocking, 820
 - civil liberties and, 820
- Spanish-American War
 - DeWitt and, 417
 - Harlan, I. and, 740
 - Insular Cases* and, 668
- Sparks-El v. Finley*, 1307
- Spano v. New York*, 1504
- Spano, Vincent Joseph, 1504
- Spaziano v. Florida*, 1504–1505
- Speaking Freely: A Memoir* (Hentoff), 760
- Speaking of Race, Speaking of Sex: Hate Speech, Civil Rights, and Civil Liberties* (Strossen), 1574
- Special Commission to Study and Investigate Communism and Subversive Activities and Related Matters in the Commonwealth
 - CPUSA and, 337
- Special Investigations Unit, 1090
- Special needs cases
 - checkpoints and, 275
 - search warrants and, 1433–1434
 - seizures and, 1446–1447
- Special Subcommittee on Government Information
 - press access and, 661
- Special verdict, 1203
- Speck, Richard, 240
- Specter, Arlen, 165
- Speech. See also Commercial speech; Free speech; Hate speech; Obscenity; Protected speech; Religious speech; Student speech; Symbolic speech; Vulgar speech
 - abridged, 1052
 - as attempt, 1420
 - chilling, 99
 - government funding of, 700–701
 - injunctions and, 1211
 - Internet and, 819
 - low value, 937
 - marketplace of ideas approach to, 961–962
 - Meiklejohn and, 1000
 - sexual assault as, 943
- Speech and debate clause, 352
 - Hutchinson v. Proxmire* and, 788
 - legislators, 916
- Speech codes, 220–221, 303
 - in universities, 760, 1579
- Speech regulations
 - content-based, 361–362
 - content-based v. content-neutral, 363
 - content-neutral, 362–365
 - designated public forums and, 417
 - secondary effects doctrine and, 364
 - time, place, and manner, 362–363
- Speedy trials, 1516–1518
 - clock, 80

INDEX

- Speedy trials (cont.)
United States v. Lovasco and, 1686
United States v. Marion and, 1686
 Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723
- Speiser v. Randall*, 1672
- Spence v. Bailey*, 350
- Spence v. Washington*
 content-neutral regulation and, 363
 symbolic speech and, 589–591
- Spencer, Herbert, 928
- Spencer, John, 1526
- Spengelink, John, 228
- Spermicidal gels, 1411
- Spies v. Illinois*, 649
- Spike mike, 1429
- Spinal injuries, 1551
- Spinelli v. United States*, 1435
 probable cause and, 1235
- Spirit of the Laws, The* (Montesquieu), 1032–1033, 1185
 Jefferson and, 847
- Spitzer, Robert, 721
- Spock, Benjamin, 306
- Spooner, Lysander, 1158
- Spousal consent, 1173
- Springsteen, Bruce, 59
- Spycatcher* (Wright), 639
- Spying, on citizens, 1518–1520
- Spyware, 820
- Square Deal, 903
- St. Clair, James, 306
- St. Francis Mission Boarding School, 1253
- St. John's College, 998
- St. Louis Civic League, 102
- St. Louis Observer*, 1486
 Lovejoy and, 935
- St. Louis Times*, 935
- St. Patrick's Day, 785–786
- St. Paul College of Law, 204
- St. Paul Council on Human Relations, 204
- Stafford v. Wallace*, 1601
- Stalin, Joseph
 Baldwin and, 104
 Churchill and, 150
 Communist Party and, 339
- Stalking, 1465
 laws, 778
- Stamp Act, 54, 66
 Bible and, 127
 Chase and, 273
 freedom of press and, 1203
 Mason and, 977
 Otis and, 1139
- Stamp Act Rebellion
 Franklin and, 620
 grand juries and, 705
- Standard Oil, 1471
 Long and, 934
- Standard Oil Company v. United States*
 White Court and, 1777
- Standard Zoning Establishment Act (SZE), 1817
- Standards for Criminal Justice, 228
- Standards, rules v., 100
- Standby counsel, 1458
- Standing doctrine, 1417
 federal court jurisdiction and, 867
- Fourth Amendment and, 1432
- Stanford Daily, The*, 1224
- Stanford University, 1375
 Kennedy, A., and, 884
- Stanford v. Kentucky*, 241, 386
 Kennedy, A., and, 885
 O'Connor and, 1127
- Stanley, Robert, 1228, 1521
- Stanley v. Georgia*, 1449, 1521–1522
 family values movement and, 577–578
 free speech and, 1643
 Marshall, T., and, 972
 obscenity and, 1119, 1123, 1228
Osborne v. Ohio and, 1138
Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton and, 1147
 police power and, 1186
 privacy and, 1220
United States v. 12,200 Reels of Super 8mm Film and, 1677
United States v. Reidel and, 1690–1691
United States v. Thirty-Seven Photographs and, 1677
- Stanley v. Illinois*, 279, 281
- Stanton, Edwin M., 146
 women's suffrage and, 1793
- Stanton, Elizabeth Cady, 519, 1522–1523
 Anthony and, 65
 marriage laws and, 964
 Sumner and, 1585
- Stanton, Henry B., 1522
- Staples, Harold, 1523
- Staples v. United States*, 1523–1524
- Star Chamber, 128, 506
 Lilborne and, 919–920
 obscenity and, 1122
- Star Spangled Banner* (Key), 1486
 “In God We Trust” and, 1066
- Stardust, 306
- Stare decisis, 1524
Bowers v. Hardwick and, 909
 Cardozo and, 248
 Douglas and, 443
 due process and, 459
 duty to obey court orders and, 469
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette and, 595, 1776
- Stassen, Harold, 204
- State
 abridgement, 74
 peace, 1310–1311
- State action, 1469, 1524–1525
 First Amendment jurisprudence and, 927 limitation, 605–606
- State Board of Censors, 934
- State constitutions, 1535–1536
 amendments to, 1546
 civil liberties and, 1536–1544, 1544–1547
 equal rights and, 1546
 freedom of press and, 1203–1204
 privacy and, 1546
- State Constitutions and the Protections of Individual Rights* (Brennan), 1545
- State courts, 1547
 civil liberties and, 1682
 federal courts v., 866
 Washington state, 1255
- State Department
 Hiss and, 765

- Subversive Activities Control Act and, 77
- State ex rel. Mapes v. District Court*, 1534
- State ex rel. Swann v. Pack*, 1490
- State ex. rel. Weiss v. District Board of School Dist. No. 8 of City of Edgerton*, 131, 1294
- State for Religious Freedom, 1194
- State mottos, government speech and, 702
- State of Florida v. Tommy Lee Andrews*, 430
- State of Washington, Singer v. Hara*, 406
- State Printing Board, 934
- State Street Bank & Trust v. Signature Financial Group, Inc.*, 824
- State Trials*, 646
- State University of New York (SUNY), 899
- State v. Boland*, 1532
- State v. Bullock*, 1532
- State v. Gaynor*, 907
- State v. Greene*, 319
- State v. Hodges*, 1307
- State v. Kaluna*, 1546
- State v. Limon*, 678
- State v. Mann*, 1483
- State v. Massey*, 1490
- State v. McBride*, 454
- State v. Moilen*, 68
- State v. Rothman*, 1532
- State v. Sawyer*, 1532
- State v. Tackitt*, 1532
- State v. Tanaka*, 1532
- State-assisted action test, 45
- Statements of Principles on Academic Freedom and Tenure of 1940* (AACU), 16, 1505–1506
- States
 - AEDPA and, 233–234
 - Bill of Rights and, 112, 968
 - bills of rights, 945
 - death penalty statute, 236, 245
 - debtor's prisons and, 401
 - due process and, 459–460
 - electric chair and, 486
 - ERA and, 521–522
 - establishment clause and, 491, 532–533
 - establishment of religion, 425
 - exclusionary rule and, 555
 - Federal Kidnapping Act and, 665
 - Fifth Amendment and, 618
 - First Amendment and, 73–75
 - freedom of association and, 634
 - Good Friday and, 398–399
 - grand juries and, 704
 - harmless error and, 745
 - holidays, 398–399
 - Holmes and, 772
 - judicial codes of conduct, 860
 - mandatory death sentences and, 952
 - marital rape laws in, 961
 - Megan's Law and, 997
 - miscegenation laws and, 1022–1023
 - non-funding provisions of, 152–153
 - obscenity and, 850
 - pardons and commutations and, 1146
 - police powers of, 801
 - property ownership and, 475–476
 - racial discrimination and, 826–827
 - religious conduct and, 849
 - retribution and, 1329
 - Roe v. Wade* and, 725, 1320, 1321, 1322
 - same-sex marriage and, 1399
 - school prayer and, 1196
 - sovereignty of, 844
 - speech and debate clause and, 917
 - sunshine laws and, 642
 - supremacy clause and, 1588
 - takings clause and, 667–668
 - tort law and, 402
 - welfare programs and, 1396
- States of exception, 1032
- States' rights
 - absolutism and, 27
 - Calhoun and, 214
 - Sedition Act and, 38
 - Stewart, P., and, 1559
- Stateside warrants, 1696–1697
- Status offenses, 813, 1549–1550
- Statute of limitations, 1504
- Statutes
 - common law and, 335–336
 - court injunctions v., 13
 - death penalty, 227, 228, 245
 - mandatory, 236
 - state, 17
- Staub v. Baxley*, 1663
- Stay of execution, 1550–1551
- Steagald v. United States*, 83
- Payton v. New York* and, 1151
- Steel Seizure Case. See Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer*
- Steele, James B., 306
- Steele, Richard, 1083
- Steffens, Lincoln, 903–904
- Stein v. State*, 317
- Stem cell research, 1551–1554
 - ethics of, 1553
 - politics of, 1553–1554
- Stenberg v. Carhart*, 10, 1287, 1416, 1554–1555
 - Breyer and, 183
 - Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft* and, 1174
 - Roe v. Wade* and, 1322
 - Souter and, 1497
 - Thomas and, 1650
- STEP Act. See Street Terrorism Enforcement and Prevention Act
- Stephen, Fitzjames, 1329
- Sterilization, 1320. See also Eugenic sterilization
 - Buck and, 1600
 - Buck v. Bell*, 772, 1320
 - forced, 772
 - of habitual criminals, 1478–1479
 - Skinner v. Oklahoma* and, 713, 1320
- Stern, Isaac, 603
- Steuart v. Bowles*, 1801
- Steuenberg, Frank, 394
- Steve Jackson Games, Inc. v. United States Secret Service*, 1094
- Stevens, John Paul, 1555–1559
 - Ansonia Board of Education v. Philbrook* and, 1301
 - Apprendi v. New Jersey* and, 76
 - balancing and, 100
 - Bartnicki v. Vopper* and, 113
 - Bethel School District v. Fraser* and, 124
 - Bowers v. Hardwick* and, 169
 - Burger Court and, 198
 - City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc.* and, 1318
 - on commercial speech, 293

INDEX

- Stevens, John Paul (cont.)
44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island and, 216
Gardner v. Florida and, 675
Hudson v. Palmer and, 781
Jurek v. Texas and, 866
Kyllo v. United States and, 900
Madsen v. Women's Health Center and, 949
Moore v. East Cleveland and, 1033
O'Connor and, 1126
Payton v. New York and, 1151
Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps and, 1158
Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth and, 1173
proportional punishment and, 1241
R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul and, 1271
Regents of the University of California v. Bakke and, 1284
Reno v. ACLU and, 1316
Rhode Island v. Innis and, 1331
sexually explicit materials and, 1120
United States v. Eichman and, 590
vulgar speech and, 1248
Wallace v. Jaffree and, 1029, 1737
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services and, 11, 1770
Wolman v. Walter and, 1790
Zablocki v. Redhail and, 1811
- Stevens, Robert, 1773
- Stevens, Thaddeus, 146
Thirteenth Amendment and, 1648
- Stevenson, Adlai
Goldberg and, 697
- Steward Machine Co. v. Davis*, 209
- Stewart, Iain, 1032
- Stewart, Jimmy, 775
- Stewart, Lynne, 1625
- Stewart, Maria, 648
- Stewart, Potter, 1559–1561
Abington Township School District v. Schempp and, 2
Branzburg v. Hayes and, 179
Burger Court and, 198
Chimel v. California, 284–285
Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 365
on death penalty, 245
Engel v. Vitale, 502, 1298
Furman v. Georgia, 233
Godfrey v. Georgia, 691
Gregg v. Georgia, 223, 710
on Jewish Sabbath, 852
Katz v. United States and, 882, 1433
Kingsley International Pictures Corporation v. Regents of the University of New York and, 892
Lucas v. Forty-Fourth General Assembly of Colorado and, 1276
Meiklejohn and, 1000
Monroe v. Pape and, 1031
NAACP v. Button and, 1058
New York Times v. United States and, 1090
North Carolina v. Pearce and, 1112
obscenity and, 1118, 1123
Pell v. Procunier and, 1151
Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth and, 1173
Poe v. Ullman and, 1183
prison interviews and, 1415
privacy and, 1219
Redrup v. New York and, 1282
on reporter's privilege, 664
wall of separation and, 1736
Wolman v. Walter and, 1790
Zablocki v. Redhail and, 1811
- Stewart, Raymond, 315
- Stewart, Tom, 1426
- Stewart, William, 145
Bingham and, 146
- Stimson, Henry L., 617
- Sting, 59. See also Entrapment
- Stockton, Julia, 1387
- Stockton, Richard, 1387
- Stogner v. California*
Breyer and, 183
ex post facto laws and, 554
- Stone Court, 1561–1563
- Stone, Geoffrey R., 37
Sedition Act and, 39
- Stone, Harlan Fiske, 175, 1564–1566, 1802
equal protection and, 515
Girouard v. United States and, 1142
Hirabayashi v. United States and, 839
Hughes Court and, 782
martial law and, 494
Minersville School District v. Gobitis and, 591–593, 1630
preferred position rule and, 1199, 1200 on rational basis test, 251
spying and, 1518
United States v. Carolene Products Co. and, 515, 784
- Stone, Lucy, 1522
women's suffrage and, 1793
- Stone, Oliver, 210
- Stone, Sydel, 1563
- Stone v. Graham*, 3, 90, 1314, 1438, 1439, 1563–1564
Burger and, 206
Burger Court and, 200
Lemon test and, 533, 538, 1313
Ten Commandments and, 1314
- Stone v. Powell*
exclusionary rule and, 555
habeas corpus and, 556
habeas corpus restrictions and, 728
- Stonewall riot, 677, 1566–1567
- Stoolies, 757
- Stop and frisk doctrine, 275, 1015, 1431, 1445, 1567–1570. See also Frisking; Stops
Florida v. Royer and, 598
need vs. intrusion test and, 1752
as seizure, 1627
Warren Court and, 1757
- Stop and identify statutes, 894
- Stops
intrusiveness of, 1568
seizures and, 1445–1446, 1568
- Storey, Moorfield, 1570–1571
Buchanan v. Warley and, 191
- Storrs Lectures, 248
- Storrs v. Holcomb*, 1401
- Story, Joseph, 409, 1572
establishment clause and, 532
freedom of speech and, 645
Marshall Court and, 968
personal liberty laws and, 1154
privileges and immunities and, 1231
Vidal v. Girard's Executor and, 1712
in Wilkinson v. Leland, 477
- Story of My Life, The* (Darrow), 394

- Stovall v. Denno*
eyewitness identification and, 925
mistaken eyewitness identification and, 956
- Stowe, Harriet Beecher, 7, 1486
- Straight 'Outta Compton* (NWA), 764
- Strategic lawsuits against public participation (SLAPP), 1480–1481 legislation against, 1481
- Stratton v. Watchtower*, 850
- Strauder v. West Virginia*, 225, 228
Buchanan v. Warley and, 191
jury selection and, 871
race-based classifications and, 611
- StreamCast, 1002
- Street Terrorism Enforcement and Prevention Act (STEP Act), 674–675
- Street v. New York*
fighting words and, 587
flag burning and, 589–591
Fortas and, 604
- Strength to Love* (King), 890
- Strengthening the Criminal Laws Against Terrorism, 1149
- Strickland* test, 810–811, 1345–1346
- Strickland v. Washington*, 241
ineffective assistance of counsel and, 810–811, 1346
Powell v. Alabama and, 1192
- Strict liability, 1572–1573
- Strict scrutiny test, 361
free exercise clause and, 625
gun control and, 722
RFRA, 626
RLUIPA and, 626
- Stride Towards Freedom* (King), 890
marches and, 958
- Strikes
Chavez and, 275
Clayton Act and, 1595–1596
Debs and, 399–400
extremism and, 566
Goldberg and, 694
at Pulman Palace Car Company, 1472
U.S. Constitution and, 353
- Stroman v. Colleton County School District*, 1615
- Stromberg v. California*, 48, 74
Butler and, 209
flag burning and, 590
Hughes and, 784, 1364
Hughes Court and, 782
- Strong, William, 514–515
- Strossen, Nadine, 1573–1574
pornography censorship and, 942
- Stroud v. United States*, 195
- Student activity fees
free speech and, 1574–1575
religious speech and, 1229
- Student Athlete Drug Policy, 1707
- Student groups
EAA and, 512
homosexual, 512–513
in public schools, 513
- Student newspapers, 1699
PPA and, 1224
Rosenberger v. University of Virginia and, 1699
viewpoint discrimination and, 1715
Zurcher v. Stanford Daily and, 1823
- Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), 161, 959, 1500
King and, 890
- Student speech disruptive, 1575–1576, 1577
in public schools, 1575–1579
Tinker v. Des Moines School District and, 1658–1659
- Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), 278
COINTELPRO and, 1518
- Students of the Seventh Seal, 1461–1462
- Sturges & Burn Mfg. Co. v. Beauchamp*, 1208
- Sturges v. Attorney General*, 483
- Sturges v. Crowninshield*, 968
- Subcommittee on Investigations, 984
- Subjective intentions, 1746
- Subordination, pornography and, 46
- Subpoenas
ad testificandum, 707
compulsory process clause and, 344–345
constraints on, 708 corporate documents and, 730
duces tecum, 707
electronic surveillance and, 487
grand juries and, 707–708
HUAC and, 780
journalistic sources and, 859
with notice, 487
to reporters, 1579–1580
United States v. Washington and, 1697–1698
- Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services, 269
- Substantive crimes, 1420
- Substantive due process, 457, 463–467, 608–609, 713, 928, 993, 1002–1003, 1580–1584
Allgeyer v. Louisiana and, 1633
economic rights and, 1633
Griswold v. Connecticut and, 1634
Lochner v. New York and, 1633
noneconomic, 1582
Peckham and, 1633
Pierce v. Society of Sisters and, 1171
Waite Court and, 1733
Warren Court and, 1759
Washington v. Glucksberg and, 1766
- Subversive Activities Control Act, 77
CPUSA and, 338
- Sugar Act, 54
Otis and, 1139
- Sugar Hill Gang, 764
- Suicide. See also Assisted suicide; Physician-assisted suicide
Branch Davidian Church, 1731
colonial charters and, 327
extremism and, 566
as victimless crime, 1709
- Suicide machine, 888
- Sullivan, Kathleen, 495
balancing and, 100
- Sullivan, L.B., 660, 1088
- Sulpicians, 291
- Summary View of the Rights of British America*, A (Jefferson), 845
- Summons, 589
- Sumner, Charles, 1441, 1442, 1584–1585
Brooks and, 146
Civil Rights Act of 1875 and, 300
equal protection and, 514

INDEX

- Sumner, Charles (cont.)
 - Storey and, 1571
 - Thirteenth Amendment and, 1648
- Sumner v. Sherman*
 - mandatory death sentences and, 953
- Sumptuary laws
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 358–360
 - Mason and, 358–359, 360
- Sund v. City of Wichita Falls, Texas*, 164
- Sunday closing laws, 543, 1438–1439, 1539, 1585–1587. See also
 - Blue Laws
 - Frankfurter and, 619
 - Warren Court and, 1755–1756
- Sunday mail, 1587–1588
- Sunday Times v. United Kingdom*
 - ECHR and, 638–640
- Sunset provisions, 1148
- Sunshine laws, 994
 - FOIA and, 641–642
 - freedom of press and, 662
 - government operations information and, 20
 - journalistic sources and, 859
 - Privacy Act of 1974 and, 641
- Sunstein, Cass, 1451, 1642
- Suntrust Bank v. Houghton Mifflin*, 1414
- SUNY. See State University of New York
- Supermajoritarian escalator, 494
- Supremacy clause, 41, 864, 1588–1589
 - personal liberty laws and, 1154
- Supreme Being, 1693. See also God
- Zorach v. Clauson* and, 1720
- Supreme Court
 - ACLU and, 50
 - appellate jurisdiction of, 668
 - Bush, G.H.W., and, 1287
 - Bush, G.W., and, 1323
 - civil liberties and, 1543, 1544
 - constitutionality and, 1328
 - court-packing plan for, 784, 864–865
 - on discrimination, 1278
 - first, 843–844
 - First Amendment and, 651
 - free exercise and, 1587
 - Hand and, 737
 - incorporation doctrine and, 1535
 - Jews on, 853
 - judicial review of, 958
 - jurisdiction of, 868
 - obscenity and, 1123
 - privacy and, 1218–1219
 - proportionality review and, 1242
 - public trials and, 1247
 - rape and, 1261, 1320
 - Rauh and, 1270
 - Rawls on, 1273
 - Reagan and, 1287, 1288
 - red scare response of, 1281–1282
 - religion and, 766–768
 - reproductive rights and, 1322–1324
 - retribution and, 1329
 - right to bear arms and, 1341–1342
 - Roe v. Wade* and, 8–11, 1320–1323, 1367–1369
 - Roosevelt, F., and, 1372, 1373, 1374
 - Sacco and Vanzetti and, 1396
 - Saenz v. Roe* and, 1396
 - same-sex marriage and, 1399
 - Sedition Act and, 39
 - substantive due process and, 1003
 - Sunday closing laws and, 1587
 - Washington Supreme Court and, 1255
 - Watkins and, 1270
 - Supreme Court Compendium, The*, 1416
 - Supreme Court in United States History, The* (Warren, C.), 1712
 - Supreme Court of California
 - in Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 1284
 - Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia* and, 884, 133
 - Traynor and, 884
 - Supreme Court of Canada, 46
 - Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1271, 1284
 - Supreme Court of Ohio, 1260
 - Supreme Court of Washington, 1255
 - Surveillance. See also Dogs, sniffing; Electronic surveillance;
 - Helicopter surveillance; Technology
 - CIFA and, 1520
 - by data mining, 1519
 - Eagle Eyes and, 1520
 - Florida v. Riley* and, 597
 - Homeland Security and, 1519
 - Hoover and, 775–776
 - intrusion and, 828
 - invasion of privacy and, 829
 - Kyllo v. United States* and, 899–900
 - PATRIOT Act and, 85
 - pen register, 487
 - TIPS and, 1520
- Survival Guide*, 1461
- Survival of the fittest. See Evolution
- Susan S. v. Israels*, 1534
- Suspect classification
 - compelling state interest and, 340
 - equal protection clause and, 513
 - fundamental rights and, 517–518
- Suspects
 - armed and dangerous, 1752
 - fair treatment of, 1455
 - questioning of, 1445, 1452–1453
 - unarmed, 1622
- Suspension clause, 495
- Sutherland, Arthur, 258
 - Powell v. Alabama* and, 1192
- Sutherland, George, 1141, 1595
- Stone and, 1564
 - United States v. Macintosh* and, 343
- Suttee, 396
 - Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. United States* and, 908
- Sutton, Percy, 1062
- Suyatt, Cecilia, 974
- Swaggart, Jimmy, 853–854
- Swaggart Ministries v. California Board of Equalization*, 853–854, 1629
- Swain, Robert, 1590
- Swain v. Alabama*, 114, 225, 1590
 - jury trials and, 877
 - peremptory challenges in, 873
- Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education*, 187, 1443
 - Burger and, 206
- Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg School District*, 517
- Swearinger, Dan K., 1592
- Swearinger v. United States*, 1592

Sweatt, Heman Marion, 498
Sweatt v. Painter
Brown v. Board of Education and, 186
 Emerson and, 498
 equal protection and, 516
 Frank and, 616
Plessy v. Ferguson and, 1181
 segregation and, 972
 Vinson Court and, 1720
 Swedish Code of Judicial Procedure, 686
 Sweet, Ossian
 Darrow and, 394–395
 Murphy and, 1047
 Sweezy, Paul, 498
Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 17–18 compelling state interest and, 340
 Emerson and, 498
Swift v. Tyson, 1572
 Switzerland, euthanasia and, 547
 Syllabus of Errors, 253
Symbolic Crusade (Gusfield), 1740
 Symbolic speech, 74, 1592–1594
 content-neutral regulation and, 363–364
 draft card burning and, 449–450
 establishment clause and, 531 expressive conduct v., 589–591
 flag burning and, 589–591
 NAACP v. Alabama and, 1057
 national security and, 1074
 no endorsement test and, 1103
 O'Brien test and, 450
 Spence v. Washington and, 589–591
 Texas v. Johnson and, 590
 United States v. O'Brien and, 590, 1113
 Synagogue Council of America (SCA), 852
 Syndicalism, 67–69, 1761–1762
 criminal, 178
 DeJonge v. Oregon and, 411
 hate crimes and, 303
 incorporation doctrine and, 804
 Whitney v. California and, 1780
 World War II and, 1800
 Syracuse American Legion, 582
 Syracuse University, 582
System of Freedom of Expression, The (Emerson), 498
 SZEA. See Standard Zoning Establishment Act

T

Taft Court, 1595–1601
 Taft, William Howard, 1600, 1601–1602
 antitrust and, 1472
 Carroll v. United States and, 251
 Frankfurter and, 617
 Hand and, 735–736, 737
 La Follette and, 902–903
 Long and, 934
 Olmstead v. United States and, 1129
 Stone and, 1564
 Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, 218, 1602–1603
 CPUSA and, 338
 freedom of association and, 635
 Goldberg and, 694
 Vinson and, 1722
 Taguba, Antonio, 15
Tahoe-Sierra Preservation Council, Inc. v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency
 Breyer and, 183
 economic regulation and, 474
Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, 1720
 Takings clause, 474–475, 1603–1606
 Breyer and, 183
 Douglas and, 444
 Dred Scott v. Sandford and, 1484
 Fifth Amendment and, 1582
 Fuller Court and, 667–668
 Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon and, 479
 Taliban
 Guantanamo Bay and, 715–716
 Hamdi v. Rumsfeld and, 842
 Lindh and, 790
 prisoners, 16
Tallahassee Democrat, 229
Talley v. California, 62
 Talmud, 93
Talton v. Mayes
 ICRA and, 807
 Taney Court, 1606–1607
 contract clause and, 477
 Dred Scott v. Sandford and, 790–791, 1635
 slavery and, 1487
 Taney, Roger B., 477, 1606
 Dred Scott v. Sandford and, 451, 1484
 Emancipation Proclamation and, 493
 Fugitive Slave Act and, 1589
 on gun ownership, 721–722
 judicial review and, 864
 Lincoln and, 923–924
 Tangipahoa Parish Board of Education, 377
Tanner v. Oregon Health Sciences University, 1409
 Taoism, 1619
 Tappan, Arthur, 45
 Tappan, Lewis, 45
 Targets, grand jury, 706
 Tariff Act of 1930, 1689
 Tariff of 1828, 214
 Tariff of Abominations, 832
 Tax(es)
 on advertisements, 714 on banks, 988
 Christianity and, 1309
 for clergy salary, 947–948
 deductions, 1528
 disestablishment movement and, 425–426
 Flast v. Cohen and, 596 foreign income and, 355
 free exercise and, 1685
 gambling and, 1684
 Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections and, 745–746
 Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue and, 761–762 income, 479
 investigations, 981–982
 Jehovah's Witnesses and, 1390, 1561
 on knowledge, 715 license, 599–600 on liquor, 1684
 litigation and, 596
 Loan Association v. Topeka and, 927 occupational, 960
 Otis and, 1138

INDEX

Tax(es) (cont.)

Pickering v. Board of Education and, 1166 poll, 745–746
privileges and immunities and, 1231
religion and, 108–109, 425–426, 766
for religious activities, 1423 religious deductions and, 1045–1046
religious organizations and, 23
same-sex marriage and, 1401 stamps, 960
of Tories, 53
United States v. Lee and, 629, 1685
Whiskey Rebellion and, 733

Tax exemptions

Amish and, 1685–1686
Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet and, 158
Bob Jones University v. United States and, 629
Church of Scientology and, 287, 703
of churches, 1539
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist and, 333
Follett v. Town of McCormick and, 599–600
Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue and, 761–762
House Select Committee to Investigate Tax-Exempt Foundations and, 635
Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization of California and, 853–854
religion and, 539, 1607–1608, 1629
Swaggart Ministries v. California Board of Equalization and, 1629
Texas Monthly v. Bullock and, 1628–1629 of veterans, 1673
Walz v. Tax Commission and, 767, 1628–1629, 1738–1739

Taxing and spending clause, 160

Taxpayers

establishment clause and, 1608–1610
Witters v. Department of Services and, 1789
Zelman v. Simmons-Harris and, 1812

Taylor, Charles Allen, 1270

Taylor, Harriet, 1010

Taylor, Harris F., 1448, 1792–1793

Taylor, Jasper, 1040

Taylor, John, 847

Taylor, Telford, 80

Taylor v. Illinois, 407, 1610

compulsory process clause and, 345

Michigan v. Lucas and, 1005

Taylor v. Louisiana, 1610–1611

jury selection and, 871

Taylor v. Mississippi, 595

Teachers

academic freedom and, 16–17
Ambach v. Norwick and, 44
free speech and, 18–19, 1611–1615
as government employees, 1611

Teaching Tolerance, 1500

Teague v. Lane, 208

habeas corpus restrictions and, 728

Teamsters, 769. See also Labor unions

Teapot Dome oil field, 904

Technology

anonymity and, 63
commercial speech and, 330
internet and, 818–819
invasion of privacy and, 829

monitoring, 486–489

national security and, 1074

Telecommunications, 336–337

Telecommunications Act of 1996

Cable Act of 1992 and, 211–212

CDA and, 336–337

FCC and, 579

obscenity and, 1124

Telemarketers, 829

Telephone booths, surveillance of, 1430

Telephone calls, intrusion and, 828

Telephone Consumer Protection Act, 347

Telephone records, 1430

of journalists, 1580

privacy and, 1220

United States v. Miller (1976), 1688

Telephones

harassment, 778

privacy and, 488

reasonable expectation of privacy and, 882

Television. See also Broadcasters; Cable television

Army-McCarthy Hearings and, 309

cable, 1279

cameras in courtrooms and, 218

Chandler v. Florida and, 265 closed-circuit, 976

copyright infringement and, 1001–1002

in court rooms, 662

Estes v. Texas and, 545

fairness doctrine and, 573

FBI and, 774–775

McCarthy and, 984–985

satellite, 211

violence, 1317

Temperance movement, 65, 1387, 1740

Prohibition and, 1238

Stanton and, 1522

Temporary restraining order (TRO), 1075

Cable News Network, Inc. v. Noriega and, 1076

New York Times v. United States and, 1089

Temporary visitors, noncitizens v., 40

Ten Commandments

ACLU and, 49

Americans United and, 57

Christian nation and, 343

coercion and, 1101

court displays of, 1539

DeMille and, 1620

establishment clause and, 1622

FOE and, 1620

in judicial buildings, 861

King James Bible and, 1563

Lemon test and, 533, 536, 538

Montesquieu and, 1032

no endorsement test and, 1103

O'Connor and, 1127

public buildings and, 1620–1622

in public school, 90

Stone v. Graham and, 1314, 1439, 1563

Van Orden v. Perry and, 967

Ten Commandments, The, 1620–1621

Tennessee

Butler Bill and, 1425

Rose v. Locke and, 1376

snake-handling and, 1490

- State v. Hodges* in, 1307
- Tennessee v. Garner*, 1622
- Tennessee v. Lane*, 193, 1356
 - enforcement power and, 613
 - Stevens and, 1557
- Tennessee v. Scopes*, 376
- Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA), 133
- Tenth Amendment, 459
 - compulsory vaccination and, 340
 - Federal Maternity Act of 1921 and, 1609
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803
 - Madison and, 142, 1328
 - Naim v. Naim* and, 1059
 - Sedition Act and, 38
- Tenure, academic freedom and, 16–17, 1509
- Tenure of Office Act, 146
- Term limits, 1557
- Terminer, 458
- Terminiello, Arthur, 654
- Terminiello v. Chicago*, 834
 - fighting words and, 587
 - free speech and, 1512
 - incitement of criminal activity and, 654
 - Vinson and, 1722
- Terrace v. Thompson*, 1108
- Terri's Law, 87
- Terrorism
 - ACLU and, 50
 - AEDPA and, 728
 - after 9/11, 1519
 - airport searches and, 34
 - anti-anarchy legislation and, 68–69
 - capital punishment and, 233–234
 - civil forfeiture and, 295
 - civil liberties and, 790, 1622–1627
 - compulsory vaccination and, 837
 - emergency powers and, 496
 - extremist groups and, 565–567
 - habeas corpus and, 552
 - hearsay evidence and, 758
 - lone wolf, 565–566
 - material support for, 1624
 - military law and, 1007
 - military tribunals and, 1009
 - Muslims and, 1053–1054
 - racial profiling and, 791–792
 - U.S. Constitution and, 355
 - USA PATRIOT Act and, 1148–1150
- Terrorism Information and Prevention System (TIPS), 1520
- Terry, Randall
 - FACE Act and, 633
 - Operation Rescue and, 1134
- Terry v. Adams*, 1721
- Terry v. Ohio*, 33, 1431, 1445, 1627
 - criminal profiling and, 1236
 - DWI and, 469
 - Illinois v. Wardlow* and, 794–795
 - Michigan v. Summers* and, 1006
 - Minnesota v. Dickerson* and, 1015
 - need vs. intrusion test and, 1752
 - probable cause and, 894
 - protective sweep and, 976
 - racial profiling and, 1237
 - stop and frisk and, 1567–1568
 - Warren Court and, 1757–1758
- Test and Corporation Acts, 504
 - English Toleration Act and, 504
- Test oath cases, 1627–1628
 - Warren Court and, 1756
- Testify, failure to, 710
- Testimony
 - expert, 110
 - eyewitness identification and, 567–568
 - false, 1061
 - jailhouse informants and, 838
 - previous, 1040
 - self-incrimination and, 1453–1454
 - in sexual abuse cases, 976–977
- Tet Offensive, 697
- Teterud v. Gillman*, 291
- Texas
 - executions in, 242
 - lynchings in, 1774
 - NAACP and, 1064
 - newsroom searches and, 1094
 - Plyler v. Doe* and, 1182
 - school dress regulations in, 1307
 - undocumented migrants and, 1675
- Texas Constitution
 - Lawrence v. Texas* and, 908, 1328
- Texas Department of Community Affairs v. Burdine*, 197
- Texas Department of Corrections, 878–879
- Texas Education Agency, 878
- Texas Monthly v. Bullock*, 1628–1629
 - Blackmun and, 1628–1629
 - Brennan and, 1628–1629
 - establishment clause and, 530
 - Lemon* test and, 539
 - O'Connor and, 1628–1629
 - tax exemption and, 1607
- Texas Rangers, 1732
- Texas v. Johnson*, 361
 - content-neutral regulation and, 363
 - flag burning and, 590, 1516
 - Kennedy, A., and, 885
 - O'Brien* test and, 450
 - Scalia and, 1417
 - symbolic speech and, 1593
 - United States v. O'Brien* and, 1114
 - viewpoint neutrality and, 657
- Textile Workers Union v. Lincoln Mills of Alabama*, 695
- Thalidomide, 8
- Thanatron, 1165
- Thanksgiving Day, 399
 - establishment clause and, 532
 - proclamations, 767
- Thatcher, Margaret, 1086
- Thayer, James B., 196
- Theistic creationism, 1616
- Therault, Harry, 290
- Therault v. Carlson*, 290
- Therault v. Silber*, 290, 291
- Thermal imaging, 1430
 - Kyllo v. United States* and, 899–900
 - privacy and, 1220
 - reasonable expectation of privacy and, 882
 - technology monitoring and, 488
- Thiel v. Southern Pacific Co.*
 - venire and, 871

INDEX

- Third Amendment
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 358
 - negative rights and, 144
 - quartering of troops and, 1252, 1253
- Third parties
 - file sharing and, 823
 - financial records and, 1687–1688
 - information and, 1688
 - Payton v. New York* and, 1151
 - United States v. Miller* (1976) and, 1687–1688
 - Wilson v. Layne* and, 1783
 - Zurcher v. Stanford Daily* and, 1823
- Third Reich, 494
- Thirteenth Amendment, 71, 139, 228, 1524, 1647–1649
 - Chase Court and, 272
 - Civil Rights Act of 1875 and, 300
 - Civil Rights Cases* and, 301
 - Corrigan v. Buckley* and, 368–369
 - Dred Scott v. Sandford* and, 452, 864
 - Emancipation Proclamation and, 493–494
 - Espionage Act of 1917, 652
 - extremist groups and, 564
 - federalization of criminal law and, 581
 - Fourteenth Amendment and, 605
 - Harlan, I. and, 738
 - Holmes and, 770
 - marriage laws and, 964
 - noncitizens and, 1105–1106
 - Plessy v. Ferguson* and, 1181
 - privileges and immunities and, 1231
 - Slaughterhouse Cases* and, 1482
- Thomas, Clarence, 1650–1652
 - Bowers v. Hardwick* and, 1222
 - Central Hudson* test and, 257
 - coercion test and, 540
 - on cross burning, 382
 - Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow* and, 490–491, 1177
 - ex post facto laws and, 213
 - Hamdi v. Rumsfeld* and, 731
 - Hill and, 616
 - Hill v. Colorado* and, 13
 - on incorporation, 533
 - Lawrence v. Texas* and, 909
 - Mitchell v. Helms* and, 1025
 - NAACP and, 1064
 - National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley* and, 1065
 - non-preferentialism standard and, 1110
 - Pennsylvania v. Scott* and, 1153
 - Pledge of Allegiance and, 1177
 - privileges and immunities and, 1233
 - Rosenberger v. University of Virginia* and, 1298
- Thomas Road Baptist Church, 575
- Thomas v. Collins*, 1390, 1562, 1800
- Thomas v. Review Board of Indiana*, 23, 168, 1470, 1477
 - free exercise clause and, 629
 - social security and, 1686
 - unemployment benefits and, 629
- Thomas-Hill confirmation hearings, 616
- Thompson, Karen, 1407
- Thompson v. Oklahoma*, 386
 - Eighth Amendment and, 232
- Thoreau, Henry David
 - Garrison and, 676
 - Jefferson on, 847
 - Son of Sam Law and, 361
- Thornburg v. Gingles*, 1277
- Thornburgh v. Abbott*, 1651–1652
 - prisoners and, 1217
- Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Pennsylvania Section*, 9, 1652
 - abortion and, 324
 - Colautti v. Franklin* and, 324
- Thornhill v. Alabama*
 - incitement of criminal activity and, 654
 - Murphy and, 1048
 - picketing and, 1169
- Threats
 - free speech and, 1652–1653
 - hostile environment harassment and, 778
- Three strikes law, 277, 1646, 1653–1655
 - crime reduction and, 1654
 - Lockyer v. Andrade* and, 386
 - policy considerations for, 1654–1655
 - prison population and, 1213–1214
 - proportional punishment and, 1241
- Thugs of India, 908
- Thurmond, Strom, 118
- TIA. See Total Information Awareness
- Tibbs, Delbert, 1655
- Tibbs v. Florida*, 1655
- Tiedeman, Christopher, 1187
- Tierney, Kevin, 394
- Tileston v. Ullman*, 1655–1656
 - right to medical counseling and, 712
- Tileston, Wilder, 1655
- Till, Emmet, 548
- Tillich, Paul, 410
- Tillinghast and Collins, 261
- Tillman Act of 1907, 193, 218
 - free speech in private corporations and, 632
- Tilton, Theodore, 649
- Tilton v. Richardson*, 1529, 1656–1657
 - Americans United and, 56
 - Hunt v. McNair* and, 785
- Tilton v. Roemer*, 200
- Time Film Corp. v. Chicago*, 1042
 - MPAA and, 1043
- Time, Inc. v. Firestone*, 1243
- Time, Inc. v. Hill*, 1657
 - Douglas and, 447
 - false light invasion of privacy and, 574
 - Fortas and, 604
- Time Magazine*
 - Coleman v. Thompson*, 324–325
 - Experimental College and, 998
 - on Hoover, 776
 - King and, 890
 - Murray and, 1050
- Time, place, and manner (TPM), 362–363, 1657–1658, 1664, 1821
 - First Amendment and, 818
 - intermediate scrutiny test and, 818
 - Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators' Association* and, 417
 - picketing and, 1167–1168
 - plenary power doctrine and, 1179
 - restrictions of, 1419
 - Turner Broadcasting v. F.C.C.*, 450
 - United States v. O'Brien* and, 1113

- Time shifting, 1001–1002
- Time Warner, Inc.
 - America Online and, 45
 - Natural Born Killers* and, 210
- Time-Life Corporation, 765
- Times Mirror Co. v. California*, 1800
- Timmendequas, Jesse, 997
- Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District*, 15, 163, 282, 1575–1576, 1658–1659
 - Bethel School District v. Fraser* and, 124
 - First Amendment and, 284
 - Fortas and, 604
 - Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier* and, 756
 - military law and, 1006
 - symbolic speech and, 1593
 - teacher speech and, 1613
 - Veronica School District v. Acton* and, 1707
 - Warren Court and, 1754
- TIPS. See Terrorism Information and Prevention System
- Tison v. Arizona*, 231, 241
 - proportionality and, 245
- Tithes, 1251
- Title III, discrimination and, 1659
- Title VII statute, 1659–1660
 - religious discrimination and, 422, 1299–1303
 - Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Hardison* and, 1300
- To the American People: A Report upon the Illegal Practices of the United States Department of Justice*, 261
- Tobacco
 - price fixing, 730
 - War on Drugs and, 1739
- Todd, Dolley Payne, 944
- Todd, Mary, 922
- Tokyo Rose, 1666
- Toleration Act of 1649, 143, 508
 - Cromwell and, 382
 - Glorious Revolution and, 691
- Toleration Act of 1819, 426
- Tollett v. Henderson*, 1000
- Tolowa Indians, 939
- Tolstoy, Leo, 1039
- Tony and Susan Alamo Found. v. Secretary of Labor*, 570–571, 1660–1661
- Toomer v. Witsell*, 1231
- Torcaso, Roy, 1661
- Torcaso v. Watkins*, 119, 426, 1315, 1661–1662
 - evolution and, 1619
 - free exercise clause and, 626
 - McDaniel v. Paty* and, 989
 - Mozert v. Hawkins County Board of Education* and, 1044
 - Warren Court and, 1756
- Tories
 - American Revolution and, 53–54
 - freedom of press and, 1203
 - Glorious Revolution and, 690
 - Republicans and, 36
- Tornillo, Pat, 1003
- Torts
 - damages and, 404
 - defamation and, 402
 - free speech and, 1450
 - freedom of press and, 661
 - infliction of emotional distress and, 811
 - intrusion and, 827–828
 - libel v., 661
 - Mormons and, 1036
 - negligence and, 1468
 - news-gathering, 661
 - privacy and, 827–828, 1225
- Torture. See also Coercion; Confessions
 - Abu Ghraib and, 16
 - Amnesty International and, 59, 60
 - Ashcroft and, 85
 - Brown v. Mississippi* and, 315
 - CAT and, 89
 - chain gangs and, 263
 - Chambers v. Florida* and, 263
 - CIA and, 258
 - confessions and, 1758
 - convention against, 88–89
 - Dershowitz and, 416–417
 - extremist groups and, 567
 - false confessions and, 574
 - at Guantanamo Bay, 716
 - Hopt v. Utah Territory* and, 1017
 - proportional punishment and, 1241
 - sleep deprivation, 316
 - United States v. Toscanino* and, 666
 - Ziang Sung Wan v. United States* and, 1018
- Total Information Awareness (TIA), 1519
- Totality of circumstances test, 1504
- Totten v. United States*, 311
- Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment* (Emerson), 498
- Townshend Acts, 54, 1750
 - Boston Massacre and, 166
 - Writs of Assistance Act and, 1803
- Toy, James, 1792
- TPM. See Time, place, and manner
- Tracking beacons, 488
- Trade secrets, 824
- Trademarks
 - establishment clause and, 1662–1664
 - infringement on, 1662
 - intellectual property and, 816, 823–824
- Trading with the Enemy Act of 1917
 - free speech and, 1794
 - Wilson, W., and, 1784
- Traffic stops
 - Miranda warnings and, 122–123
 - racial discrimination and, 1256
- Traffic violations, 470
- Tranquility, 828–829
- Trans Union, 569
- Trans Union v. FTC*, 570
- Trans World Airways (TWA), 1300
- Trans World Airways, Inc. v. Hardison*, 1300–1301
 - labor unions and, 1301
- Transactional immunity, 1453, 1454
- Transparency, 20
- Travel, right to, 1354–1355
 - Aptheker v. Secretary of State* and, 697
 - freedom of association and, 886–887
 - implied rights and, 801
 - Kent v. Dulles* and, 887
 - Lambert v. California* and, 905
- Traynor, Roger, 884
- Treason, 1664–1665
 - bill of attainder and, 134
 - capital punishment and, 223

INDEX

- Treason (cont.)
Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 359, 1263
death penalty and, 245
Ex parte Vallandigham and, 553
habeas corpus and, 731
Lilborne and, 920
Marshall, J., and, 970
Miranda warnings and, 102
pardons and, 1146
Poodry v. Tonawanda Band of Seneca Indians
and, 809
proportionality review and, 1242
test oaths and, 1628
World War II and, 1800
Treason clause, 1665–1666
Treasury Department
Jackson, R. and, 833
Prohibition and, 1239
Treaties, extradition, 563
*Treatise on the Constitutional Limitations Which Rest Upon the Legislative Power of the United States of the American Union,
A* (Cooley), 1186
Treatise on the Limitations of Police Power in the United States
(Tiedeman), 1187
Treaty of Versailles
La Follette and, 903
Taft and, 1601
Wilson, W., and, 1785
Trelawny, Jonathan, 1667
Trial by jury, 73
Boston Massacre trial and, 166
Boykin v. Alabama and, 172
Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 358
Crane v. Kentucky and, 375
North Carolina Constitution of 1776, 1111
Virginia Declaration of Rights and, 1723 waiving of, 1478
Trial, right to, 875–877
Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 358, 1263,
1264, 1268
Dorr v. United States and, 740
Duncan v. Louisiana, 743
incorporation doctrine and, 803
jury selection and, 871
Reid v. Covert and, 1291
Trials. See also Civil trials; Joint trials; Judicial proceedings; Right to fair trial; Speedy trials
access to, 20
adjudicating guilt and, 164
bifurcated, 227, 231–232
bill of attainder v., 135
burden of proof and, 195–197
in civil cases, 1666–1667
clothing and, 544
extradition and, 563–564
military, 551–552
multiple, 112–113, 122–123
Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart and, 1082
overseas, 354–355
postponement of, 632
press and, 1561
probate, 212
public, 1247–1248
speedy, 76, 1516–1518
state bills of rights and, 137–138
U.S. Constitution and, 352–353
venue of, 632
Tribal courts, 808–809
Tribe, Laurence, 169, 314, 1667–1668
free exercise clause and, 410
picketing and, 1168
Trickery. See Deceit
Triennial Act of 1694, 506
Glorious Revolution and, 691
Trilling, Lionel, 1051
Trimester framework, 1770
Roe v. Wade and, 1220
TRIPs, 824
TRO. See Temporary restraining order
Trop v. Dulles, 385, 1668–1669
cruel and unusual punishment clause and, 387 denationalization and, 384
expatriation and, 562
Trotskyite Socialist Workers Party, 1488
Troxel v. Granville, 279, 281
Fourteenth Amendment and, 1003
Souter and, 1497
substantive due process and, 466
Truancy, 1549
Truax v. Corrigan, 465, 1595
Taft and, 1601
Truax v. Raich
Hughes and, 783
True threat standard
group libel and, 715
Trujillo, Frank, 597
Truman, Harry S.
Americans United and, 56
Biddle and, 134
Burton and, 208
Clark, T., and, 308
classified information and, 310
Cold War and, 1377
CPUSA and, 338
Dawson and, 397
Feiner v. New York and, 582
Fortas and, 603
freedom of association and, 635
Loyalty and Security Program of, 1269 loyalty program of, 603
Taft-Hartley Act and, 1602
Vatican and, 56
Vinson and, 1721
Vinson Court and, 1718
Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer and, 835
Trumbull, Lyman
Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
Thirteenth Amendment and, 1648
Trumpet of Conscience, The (King), 890
Trusts, 634
Truth
defamation and, 404
as defense, 887
free speech and, 1450
Holmes on, 994
marketplace of ideas theory and, 962–963
Mill and, 1011
rights of accused and, 1359–1361
in sentencing, 1458
theory, 1641

Truth, Sojourner, 520
 Truth teams, 1134
 Truth-in-advertising, 1450
 Tucker, C. DeLores, 764
 Tucker, Jerry, 1270
Tucker v. Texas, 1562
 Tudor, Mary, 621
 Tuition, 1233
 Tulane University Law School, 934
 Tule Lake camp, 840
Turney v. Ohio
 Connally v. Georgia and, 347–348
 due process and, 1580
 fee system and, 799
Turner Broadcasting System v. Federal Communications Commission, 100, 1279, 1669–1670
 FCC licensing and, 663
 forced speech and, 601
 O'Brien test and, 450
 Turner, Francis, 1667
 Turner, Stansfield, 1491
Turner v. Murray, 235
Turner v. Safley, 1399, 1651, 1670–1671
 free exercise and, 1215
 Native Americans and, 1079
 O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz and, 1130, 1131
 Pell v. Procunier and, 1152
 prisoners and, 1217
 Zablocki v. Redhail and, 1811
Turner v. Williams, 668
 Turner, W. Fred, 683
Turtle Mountain Judicial Board v. Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa Indians, 808 Tushnet, Mark
 emergency powers and, 495
 on Marshall, T., 973
 Tushnet, Rebecca, 572
 TVA. See Tennessee Valley Authority
 TWA. See Trans World Airways
 Twain, Mark, 323
 Twenty-First Amendment
 California v. LaRue and, 216
 Prohibition and, 1238
 War on Drugs and, 1742
 Twenty-Fourth Amendment poll taxes and, 745–746
 on voting rights, 1359
 Twenty-Seventh Amendment, 142
 Twenty-Sixth Amendment, 581
 Twining, Albert C., 740
Twining v. State of New Jersey
 Chambers v. Florida and, 263
 due process clause and, 1018
 Frankfurter and, 618
 Fuller Court and, 667
 Harlan, I. and, 740
 incorporation doctrine and, 803
 overruling of, 740
 privileges and immunities clause and, 607
 procedural due process and, 463
 Twins, 313
Two Guys from Harrison-Allentown v. McGinley. See Sunday closing laws
 2 Live Crew, 1414
 censorship of, 765

 fair use doctrine and, 572
Two Treatises on Government (Locke), 507, 931, 1630
 Tyler, John, 214
 Tyndale, William, 128
 Tyranny
 individual liberty and, 1026
 Locke and, 931
 of majority, 1027–1028

U

UAW. See United Auto Workers
 UDHR. See Universal Declaration of Human Rights
 UFW. See United Farm Workers
 UFWOC. See United Farm Workers Organizing Committee
 Ullman, Abraham S., 1655
Ullmann v. United States, 1454
 Ullmann, William, 1454
Ulster County Court v. Allen, 1673
Ulster Gazette, 733
Ulysses (Joyce), 48
 censorship and, 304
 obscenity and, 659
 Umbilical cords, 1552
 UMW. See United Mine Workers Union
 Unalienable rights, 402. See also Natural rights
 due process and, 457–458
 Unarmed suspects, 1622
 Unborn Victims of Violence Act, 1323
Uncle Tom's Cabin (Stowe), 7, 1485, 1486
 Unconstitutional conditions, 1673–1674
 “Under God,” 259
 Underage liquor violations, 1549
 Understanding clauses, 1442
 Underwood, James Lowell, 1309
 Undocumented migrants, 1674–1676. See also Alien(s)
 education and, 41
 interdiction of, 390
 noncitizens v., 40
 Plyler v. Doe and, 1182
 Undue burden analysis, 1770
 Planned Parenthood v. Casey and, 1174
 Unemployment benefits
 Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith and, 630
 Frazee v. Illinois Department of Income Security and, 629
 Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Commission and, 629
 religion and, 629
 religious accommodation and, 23
 Thomas v. Review Board and, 629
 Unenumerated constitutional liberties
 Souter and, 1497
 UNESCO. See United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization
 Ungovernability, 1549
 Unicorn Killer, 563
 Uniform Code of Military Justice, 355
 Abu Ghraib and, 15
 sodomy and, 436
 Uniform Militia Act of 1792, 1341
 Uniform Rule of Naturalization, 294
 Uniform Trade Secrets Act, 824
 Union of Russian Workers
 Palmer and, 1144

INDEX

- Union Pacific Railway Co. v. Botsford*
privacy and, 1218
Unions. See Labor unions
Unique delay, 991
Unitarians
Baldwin and, 101
Maryland Toleration Act and, 975
United and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism. See USA
PATRIOT Act
United Auto Workers (UAW)
ERA and, 520
Rauh and, 1269, 1270
strike by, 1269
United Farm Workers (UFW), 274
United Farm Workers Organizing Committee (UFWOC), 275 United Klans of America, 1501 bankruptcy of, 1502
United Mine Workers of America v. Coronado Coal Company, 1601
United Mine Workers Union, 1270, 1390
United Nations (UN)
Anslinger and, 64
birth control and, 148
Declaration of Human Rights, 254
Goldberg and, 693, 697
High Commissioner for Human Rights, 638
Hiss and, 765
International Criminal Court, 59
United Nations Charter, 1639
United Nations Commission on Human Rights, 638
United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment (CAT), 89
Guantanamo Bay and, 716
United Nations Convention of the Rights of the Child, 1223 United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, 88
United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization
(UNESCO), 1676
Biddle and, 134
Naim v. Naim and, 1060
United Nations Human Rights Committee, 638
United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, 88
United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners
chain gangs and, 263
United Nations Subcommittee on Freedom of Information and of the Press, 1676
United Order, 1036
United Public Workers v. Mitchell
free speech and, 1361
Hatch Act and, 748
United States prison population in, 1213–1214
same-sex unions in, 1404
seditious libel in, 1440
United States Civil Service Commission v. National Association of Letter Carriers, 1515
Hatch Act and, 748
United States Code fair use and, 1414
Title 50, 449
United States ex rel Bilokumsky v. Tod, 1018
United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 460, 461, 1530
“United States is a Christian Nation, The” (Brewer), 343
United States Magazine and Democratic Review, 846–847
United States Steel, 1471
United States v. 92 Buena Vista Avenue, 1678
United States v. 12,200 Reels of Super 8mm Film, 1676–1677
United States v. Abrams, 312
United States v. Agurs, 1678–1679
Brady v. Maryland and, 173
exculpatory evidence and, 899
United States v. American Library Association, 99
Breyer and, 183
CIPA and, 660
government funding of speech and, 701
obscenity and, 1125
United States v. Amistad, 1606–1607
United States v. Armstrong, 1745 cocaine laws and, 423
United States v. Ash, 1679
Kirby v. Illinois and, 892
right to counsel and, 1344, 1697
United States v. Wade and, 1697
United States v. Awadallah, 1095
United States v. Bagley, 899
United States v. Bajakajian, 130
United States v. Ballard, 1476–1478
CNS and, 291
fallout from, 1477–1478
United States v. Balsys, 1679–1680
United States v. Bauer, 1262
United States v. Becker, 509
United States v. Belmont, 1801
United States v. Bennett, 1286, 1689
United States v. Bhagat Singh Thind, 1599
United States v. Bland, 1141
United States v. Booker, 76, 1460
Scalia and, 1417
Sixth Amendment and, 1024
Stevens and, 1558
United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 380, 1680
checkpoints and, 275–276
profiling and, 1623
United States v. Butler, 782
United States v. Calandra, 1680–1681
United States v. Carolene Products Co., 48, 250–251, 1582
Brandeis and, 175
civil liberties and, 1634
economic rights and, 479
equal protection and, 515
Footnote Four and, 617, 1635
Frankfurter and, 617
free speech and, 654
freedom of expression and, 639
Hughes and, 784
preferred position rule and, 1199–1200
Stone and, 1564
substantive due process and, 466
suspect categories and, 518
United States v. Causby, 1801
Douglas and, 444
takings clause and, 1604
United States v. Chadwick, 1751
United States v. Clapox, 51
United States v. Cohen Grocery Store, 1778
United States v. Constantine, 1684
United States v. Coplon, 736
United States v. Crews, 568

- United States v. Cruikshank*, 1342, 1681–1682
Patterson v. Colorado and, 740
substantive due process and, 464
Waite Court and, 1733
- United States v. Curtiss-Wright Corp.*, 311
- United States v. Darby Lumber Company*, 1565
- United States v. Davis*, 33
- United States v. Dionisio*, 1682
grand jury indictments and, 705–706
- United States v. Doremus*, 1684
drugs and, 1741
- United States v. Drayton*, 1444
- United States v. Dunn*, 1745
- United States v. E.C. Knight*, 1471–1472
Taft Court and, 1595
- United States v. Edge Broadcasting* lotteries and, 1708
- United States v. Edwards*, 98
- United States v. Eichman*, 1516, 1682. See also Flag burning
content-neutral regulation and, 363
Flag Protection Act of 1989 and, 590
- United States v. O'Brien* and, 1114
viewpoint neutrality and, 657
- United States v. Emerson*, 1343
English Bill of Rights and, 503
NRA and, 1071
- United States v. Fanfan*, 1460
- United States v. Gillette*, 1470
- United States v. Grace*, 1243
- United States v. Grimaud*, 1683
- United States v. Hammer*, 230
- United States v. Harvey*, 884
- United States v. Havens*, 1683–1684 impeachment exception and, 556
- United States v. Hubbell*
grand jury indictments and, 706
- United States v. Hudson and Goodwin*, 888, 1441
freedom of press and, 1207
Marshall Court and, 968
- United States v. Inadi*, 25
compulsory process clause and, 344
- United States v. James Daniel Good Real Property et al.*, 213
- United States v. Janis*
exclusionary rule and, 555
Powell and, 1195
- United States v. Jin Fuey Moy*, 1741, 1744
- United States v. Kahriger*, 1684
Marchetti v. United States and, 960
- United States v. Karo*, 882
- United States v. Katz*
Fourth Amendment and, 486
- United States v. Kauten*, 1477
- United States v. Kennerley*
obscenity and, 1116
United States v. One Book Entitled “Ulysses” and, 1688–1689
- United States v. Klein*, 867
- United States v. Knight Co.*
police power and, 1185
- United States v. Knotts*, 882
- United States v. Koch*, 455
- United States v. Lanza*, 440
- United States v. Lara*, 441
- United States v. Lee*, 23, 58, 159, 539, 1470, 1684–1685
Bowen v. Roy and, 168
free exercise clause, 629
- United States v. Lefkowitz*, 209
- United States v. Leon*, 1685–1686
good faith exception and, 555–556
Powell, Lewis, and, 1195
search warrants and, 793
- United States v. Levine*
obscenity and, 1116
- United States v. Lopez*, 33
commerce clause and, 827
- United States v. Lovasco*, 1686
- United States v. Lovett*, 1686–1687
- United States v. Macintosh*
Butler and, 209
Christian nation and, 343
conscientious objection and, 349
Hughes and, 784, 1142
United States v. Schwimmer and, 1141, 1692–1693
- United States v. Mara*, 1682
- United States v. Marchetti*, 1076
- United States v. Marion*, 1686
- United States v. Martinez-Fuerte*, 380, 1444, 1446
checkpoints and, 806
Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz and, 1004
profiling and, 1623
- United States v. Martinez-Salazar*, 115
- United States v. McIntosh*, 409
- United States v. McVeigh*, 1428
- United States v. Miller*, 1430
gun control and, 722, 1343
McReynolds and, 993
reasonable expectation of privacy and, 882
- United States v. Miller* (1939), 1687
- United States v. Miller* (1976), 1687–1688
- United States v. Mississippi Valley Generating Co.*, 128
- United States v. Monsanto*, 1745
- United States v. Morrison*, 435 commerce clause and, 827
enforcement power and, 613
- United States v. National Committee for Impeachment*, 219
- United States v. National Treasury Employees Union*, 1514
Urofsky v. Gillmore and, 1700–1701
- United States v. Nelson*, 1343
- United States v. Nixon*, 311
Burger and, 205
compulsory process clause and, 345
- United States v. Noriega*, 1076
- United States v. Oakland Cannabis Buyers’ Co-Op*, 1745
- United States v. O'Brien*, 111, 449, 1113–1114, 1318, 1516, 1688
City of Erie v. Pap’s A.M. and, 523
content-neutral regulation and, 363–364 formula of, 1114–1115
intermediate scrutiny test and, 818
military law and, 1007
national security and, 1074
symbolic speech and, 590, 1593
Turner Broadcasting System v. Federal Communications Commission and, 1670
Warren Court and, 1754
Young v. American Mini Theatres and, 1808
zoning and, 1821
- United States v. One Book Entitled “Ulysses,”* 1688–1689
obscenity and, 1116
sexual expression and, 659
- United States v. One Package of Japanese Pessaries*, 147
- United States v. Orito*, 1677

INDEX

- United States v. Ortiz*, 380
United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 858
United States v. Pink, 1801
United States v. Place, 882
United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group, 1689–1690 cable companies and, 663
 obscenity and, 1124
United States v. Progressive, 1212
United States v. Ramirez, 1690
United States v. Rector, etc. of the Church of the Holy Trinity, 288
United States v. Reidel, 1677, 1690–1691
United States v. Reynolds, 72, 311 criminal surety laws and, 1649
 Holmes and, 770
 White Court and, 1777
United States v. Robinson, 1691–1692
United States v. Ross, 1804
United States v. Salerno, 97, 1419, 1745
 Bail Reform Act of 1984 and, 98
 pretrial detention and, 805
 preventative detention and, 1208
United States v. Sanchez, 1684
United States v. Santana, 83
United States v. Scheffer, 407
United States v. Schoon, 1692
United States v. Schwimmer, 1692–1693
 Butler and, 209
 pacifists and, 1141
 Taft Court and, 1599
United States v. Seeger, 349–350, 1477, 1693–1694
 Clark, T., and, 309
United States v. Sokolow, 1237
United States v. Southwestern Cable Co., 1669
United States v. Stanley, 149
United States v. Tateo, 1694
United States v. Texas, 878
United States v. The Progressive, Inc., 1694
 prior restraints and, 1075
United States v. Thirty-Seven Photographs, 1676, 1677–1678
 United States v. Reidel and, 1690–1691
United States v. Toscanino
 Ker-Firshie rule and, 666
United States v. United Mine Workers, 1390–1391
 duty to obey court orders and, 469
United States v. United States District Court, 1519, 1695–1996
United States v. Ursery, 442
United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 355, 380–381, 1696–1697
United States v. Virginia (VMI)
 equal protection clause and, 687
 gender and, 518
 Ginsburg and, 687
United States v. Wade, 1697
 eyewitness identification and, 568, 925
 Kirby v. Illinois and, 892
 Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 and, 1132
 right to counsel and, 1344
 United States v. Ash and, 1679
 Warren Court and, 1759
 White, B., and, 1779
United States v. Wallace, 345
United States v. Washington, 1697–1698
United States v. Watson, 81, 1698
 warrantless arrests and, 82
United States v. Weaver, 1746
United States v. White, 121
 reasonable expectation of privacy and, 882
United States v. Worrall, 274
 United Steelworkers of America, 1270
 Goldberg and, 693
United Steelworkers v. Weber, 206
 Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR), 59, 307, 1274, 1639, 1640
 data privacy and, 1223
 freedom of expression and, 637, 638, 1676
 Prejean and, 1201
 Universal Military Training and Service Act of 1948
 conscientious objection and, 349–350, 1693
 United States v. O'Brien and, 1516
 United States v. Seeger and, 1693–1694
 Universal Negro Improvement Association, 1262 Universities
 academic freedom and, 16–17
 as designated public forums, 1699 hate speech codes in, 220–221, 1579
 political correctness and, 1188–1189
 public forum doctrines and, 1229, 1244, 1698–1700 religion in public, 1297–1299
 religious speech and, 1229 speech codes in, 303, 760
 tuition for, 1233
 University of Wisconsin v. Southworth and, 1700
 viewpoint discrimination and, 1715
 University of Alabama Law School, 855
 University of California, Berkeley, 996
 University of California, Davis, 1284
 University of California, Santa Barbara, 19
 University of Chicago, 1374
 Bork and, 165
 Clark, R., and, 305
 Freund and, 658
 University of Iowa, 1390
 University of Leicester, 430
 University of Michigan, 1285 admissions policy, 19
 affirmative action and, 688, 886
 Darrow and, 394
 hate speech codes and, 220–221
 Kamisar and, 881
 Kevorkian and, 888
 University of Michigan Law School, 1047
 University of Minnesota
 Burger and, 204
 Butler and, 209
 Kamisar and, 881
 University of Mississippi, 548
 University of Missouri School of Journalism, 934
 University of New Hampshire, 17–18
 University of Pennsylvania, 1326, 1364–1365
 Amsterdam and, 60
 University of Southern California, 276–277
 University of Texas
 Clark, R., and, 305
 Clark, T., and, 308
 University of Texas School of Law
 Emerson and, 498
 Justice and, 878
 University of Virginia (UVA), 1298. See also Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia
 Experimental College and, 998
 School of Law, 992

- separationism and, 767
- University of Wisconsin
 - Frank and, 615
 - hate speech codes and, 220–221
 - La Follette and, 902
 - Meiklejohn and, 998
 - stem cell research and, 1552
- University of Wisconsin v. Southworth*, 1700
- Unmarried couples, 576
 - birth control and, 148
- Unnecessary delay, 952, 991
 - Mallory v. United States* and, 1018
- Unprotected speech
 - categories of, 252
 - factual context and, 762
- Updegraph v. Commonwealth*, 343
- Urantia Foundation v. Maaherra*, 366
- Urgent Deficiency Appropriation Act of 1943, 1686–1687
- Urinalysis See Drug testing
- Urofsky v. Gillmore*, 19–20, 1700–1701
 - academic freedom and, 1508
- U.S. Army
 - public forum doctrines and, 1244
 - spying by, 1519
- U.S. Census Bureau, 90
- U.S. Coast Guard, 390
- U.S. Code, 336
- U.S. Constitution, 351–354
 - abolitionism and, 7
 - amendments to, 141–142
 - Article III of, 866–867
 - Article VI, 41, 1314–1315
 - Bible and, 127
 - Bill of Rights and, 139, 945
 - bills of attainder and, 134
 - Breyer and, 184
 - Burger and, 204
 - Calder v. Bull* and, 212–213
 - California and, 1546
 - civil liberties and, 1536
 - copyright protection and, 484
 - corruption of blood and, 369
 - courts and, 1635
 - criticisms of, 139–140
 - double jeopardy clause of, 438–439
 - Douglas and, 444
 - economic rights in, 475–480
 - emergency powers and, 495
 - English tradition and, 505
 - ex post facto laws and, 140, 553–554
 - federalization of criminal law and, 580–581
 - felon disenfranchisement and, 584
 - forced speech and, 601
 - Franklin and, 621
 - full faith and credit clause of, 406
 - general warrants and, 678
 - Hamilton and, 732
 - Harlan, I. and, 738
 - harmless error and, 745
 - interpretation of, 1415
 - judicial review and, 863–864
 - jurisdiction of, 353–354
 - mandatory death sentences and, 952–953
 - Maryland, 137
 - Mason and, 358–360
 - Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641 and, 979
 - Meese and, 997
 - military tribunals and, 1008
 - Minersville School District v. Gobitis* and, 593
 - Montesquieu and, 1031–1032
 - overseas, 354–355
 - political parties and, 36
 - privacy and, 1431
 - property ownership and, 476–477
 - ratification of, 360
 - religion and, 352, 1330
 - religious tests for officeholding and, 140, 426, 1315
 - Rhode Island and, 1546
 - slave trade provision of, 358–359
 - speech and debate clause, 352
 - Vermont and, 135
 - victims' rights and, 1711
 - zoning and, 1817
- U.S. Customs Bureau, 48
- U.S. Flag Code, 1178
- U.S. Forest Service
 - AIRFA and, 51
 - Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association* and, 939
- U.S. Information Agency, 323
- U.S. Marshals Service
 - Clark, R., and, 306
 - Ruby Ridge shootout and, 565, 1385–1386
- U.S. Postal Service
 - Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp.* and, 160–161
 - Comstock Act and, 1054
 - Comstock and, 341
 - as nonpublic forums, 1245
 - World War I and, 353
- U.S. Postal Service v. Greenburgh Civic Association*
 - public forum doctrines and, 1244
- U.S. Sentencing Committee, 1458–1459
 - Breyer and, 183
- U.S. Term Limits v. Thornton*, 1557
- USA PATRIOT Act, 1148–1159, 1435, 1519, 1623, 1625, 1626
 - ACLU and, 50
 - Ashcroft and, 85
 - civil forfeiture and, 295
 - common law and, 336
 - criticism of, 790
 - data privacy and, 1222
 - detentions under, 791–792
 - Dred Scott v. Sandford* and, 790
 - emergency powers and, 496
 - extremist groups and, 567
 - FCRA and, 570
 - FISA and, 1149
 - freedom of press and, 662
 - immigration statutory scheme and, 789–790
 - INA and, 983
 - indefinite detention and, 805
 - internet privacy and, 821
 - Muslims and, 1053–1054
 - national security and, 1071, 1074
 - privacy and, 347
 - War on Terror and, 1094
- Use of force
 - AUMF and, 1520
 - Fourth Amendment and, 1622

INDEX

- Use of force (cont.)
 - in rape, 1464
 - in self-defense, 1448
 - with unarmed suspects, 1622
- Utah
 - Alien Land Law in, 1108
 - antipolygamy laws and, 72
 - same-sex adoption and, 1399
- Utilitarianism, 1272
- Utilitarianism* (Mill), 1010
- Utilitarianism, in punishment, 1645
- Utilities, 257
- Utility poles
 - as public forums, 1663
- UVA. See University of Virginia

- V

- Vaccination, compulsory, 86, 341, 772
 - Jacobson v. Massachusetts* and, 836–837
- Vacco v. Quill*, 86–87, 1767
 - equal protection clause and, 547
 - O'Connor and, 1127
 - physician-assisted suicide and, 389
 - Tribe and, 1668
- VAEHA. See Voting Accessibility for the Elderly and Handicapped Act (VAEHA)
- Vagrancy. See also Indigents
 - laws, 1703
 - Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville* and, 1145
 - Prohibition and, 1239
 - as victimless crime, 1709
 - Void-for-vagueness doctrine and, 1725
- Vagueness doctrine, 1705–1706. See also Void-for-vagueness doctrine
 - in criminal statutes, 1703–1705
 - in Kolender v. Lawson, 894
 - Lanzetta v. New Jersey* and, 907
 - Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville* and, 1145
 - privileges and immunities and, 1231
 - sexually explicit materials and, 1120
 - vagrancy laws and, 1703
- Valenti, Jack, 1042
- Valentine v. Chrestensen*, 1706
 - commercial speech and, 329–330, 1364
 - low value speech and, 937
- Valentine's Day massacre, 720
- Valeo, Francis, 193–194
- Vallandigham, Clement, 552
 - free speech and, 649
 - Lincoln and, 646
- Valley Forge College v. Americans United*, 1609
- Valley Hospital Association v. Mat-Su Coalition for Choice*, 1533
- Van Buren, Martin, 1037
- Van Dam, Rip, 1814
- Van Devanter, Willis, 1564
 - White Court and, 1777
- Van Orden v. Perry*
 - ADL and, 69
 - Breyer and, 1621–1622
 - coercion test and, 540
 - O'Connor and, 1127
 - Stone v. Graham* and, 1564
 - Ten Commandments and, 967, 1621
- Vance v. Terranzas*, 562–563
- Vance v. Universal Amusement Co., Inc.*, 1706–1707
- Vanderbilt University, 992
- Vanhorne's Lessee v. Dorrance*
 - economic rights and, 477
 - eminent domain and, 1603
- Vanzetti, Bartolomeo, 1395–1396. See also Sacco and Vanzetti trial
 - Baldwin and, 103
- Vatican
 - Council, 26
 - Dawson and, 397
 - Truman and, 56
- Vaughn, Stephen, 1041
- V.C. v. M.J.B.*, 1408
- VCRs, 1001
- Veazie Bank v. Fenno*, 1684
- Vehicles. See also Automobile searches
 - frisk of, 1570
 - inventory of, 1498
 - New York v. Belton* and, 1091
 - Ohio v. Robinette* and, 1128
 - privacy and, 1751
 - racial profiling and, 1237–1238
 - search and seizure and, 1539–1540
 - search warrants and, 1433, 1751
- Veil of secrecy, grand juries and, 706
- Venire
 - composition of, 871–872
 - discrimination, 872
 - jury trial right and, 876
 - race and, 877
- VENONA project, 265
 - Hiss and, 765
- Verbal communication, 1437
- Verduo-Urquidez, Rene Martin, 1696
- Vermont
 - Civil Union Act and, 1402
 - constitution of, 135
 - Petition Campaign and, 1155
 - proportional punishment and, 1241
 - same-sex marriage and, 1401–1402
 - same-sex partners and, 1408
 - slavery and, 53
 - statehood of, 142
- Vermont Civil Union Act, 1408
- Vernonia School District 47J v. Acton*, 430, 1707–1708
 - Board of Education v. Earls* and, 156
 - Breyer and, 183
 - drug testing and, 453, 1746
- Veterans Administration, 1270
- Veto, legislative, 797
 - Kennedy, A., and, 884
- Viagra, 1323
- Vice
 - commercial speech and, 1708
 - United States v. Kahriger* and, 1684
- Vices of the Political System of the United States* (Madison), 944
- Victim assistance, 1710–1711
- Victim impact statements, 1708–1709
 - capital punishment and, 1709
- Victimless crimes, 1709–1710
- Victim's Bill of Rights, 1540
- Victims Compensation Board, 1494
- Victims of Crime Act of 1994, 1149
- Victims' rights, 1710–1712

- Victims' Rights Movement, 1708, 1710
 - successes of, 1711
- Victorian Age, 26
- Vidal v. Girard's Executors*, 342, 1712–1713
- Video games, 1713
- Video Privacy Protection Act (VPPA), 346, 1713–1714
- Videotaping, false confessions and, 574
- Viereck v. United States*, 1800
- Vieth v. Jubelirer*, 1417
- Vietnam War
 - ACLU and, 50
 - Aptheker and, 77
 - Bond v. Floyd* and, 161
 - Clark, R., and, 306
 - communism and, 338
 - conscientious objection and, 349–350, 1143
 - demonstrators against, 1636
 - draft and, 449–450
 - draft card burning and, 1688
 - drugs and, 1743
 - expressive conduct and, 1162–1163
 - fighting words and, 587
 - FOIA and, 641
 - Fortas and, 604
 - freedom of expression and, 1162–1163
 - Goldberg and, 697
 - Herbert and, 760
 - injunctions and, 1212
 - media access in, 995
 - military chaplains and, 268
 - national security and, 1074
 - New York Times v. United States* and, 1088, 1695
 - Nixon, R. and, 1098
 - protests, 48, 362–364, 756, 927
 - school protests of, 1575–1576
 - Stewart, P., and, 1560
 - Tinker v. Des Moines School District* and, 1658–1659
 - United States v. O'Brien* and, 1113–1114, 1516
 - Warren Court and, 1754
 - wiretapping and, 856
- Viewpoint discrimination, 1574
 - in free speech cases, 1714–1717
 - National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley* and, 1065
 - University of Wisconsin v. Southworth* and, 1700
- Viewpoint neutrality, 656–657
 - test, 1574, 1715
- Vignera v. New York*, 1456
- Viktora, Robert, 1271
- Village of Euclid v. Ambler Realty Company*
 - Butler and, 209
 - economic rights and, 479
 - takings clause and, 1605
- Villiard, Oswald Garrison, 1063
- Vineville Presbyterian Church, 857
- Vinson Court, 1718–1721
 - Brown v. Board of Education* and, 516–517
- Vinson, Fred M., 1718, 1721–1722
 - American Communication Association v. Douds* and, 51
 - death of, 186, 309, 517
 - Dennis v. United States* and, 414, 1511
 - Shelley v. Kraemer* and, 516
 - Sweatt v. Painter* and, 516
- Vinson v. Superior Court*, 1534
- Violence
 - after Brady Bill, 722
 - anti-abortion protests and, 634
 - extremist groups and, 564
 - free speech and, 1509–1513
 - gender-motivated, 434–435
 - guns and, 720
 - hate speech and, 754–755
 - Hays Office and, 755
 - Islam and, 1053
 - KKK and, 896–897
 - media liability and, 996
 - pornography and, 942
 - religion and, 1295
 - retribution and, 1329–1330
 - sexual, 942
 - television, 1317
 - Watts v. United States* and, 1769
- Violence Against Women Act of 1994, 71, 435
 - commerce clause and, 827
 - NOW and, 1068
- Violence Against Women: Civil Rights for Women Act, 435
- Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act, 721
- Violent expression, 1509–1510
- Virgil v. School Board of Columbia County, Florida*, 163
- Virgin Islands v. Edinborough*
 - Bible and, 128
- Virginia
 - Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 541, 1263, 1264, 1266–1267, 1339
 - freedom of press and, 1204
 - general warrants and, 1751
 - “In God We Trust” and, 1067
 - literacy tests and, 1729
 - NAACP and, 1064
 - NAACP v. Button* and, 1058
 - Naim v. Naim* and, 1059
 - religion and, 1538
 - same-sex partners and, 1409
 - self-governance and, 1540
 - snake-handling and, 1491
 - voting in, 1729–1730
- Virginia Assessment Controversy, 766
- Virginia Charter of 1606, 1722–1723
- Virginia Company Charter, 326
- Virginia Constitution, 508, 1311
 - Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections* and, 746
 - ratification of, 978
- Virginia Convention of 1776
 - Madison and, 943
- Virginia Declaration of Rights, 108, 387, 1310, 1723–1724
 - due process and, 456–457
 - general warrants and, 678
 - Madison and, 526, 944
 - Mason and, 977–978
 - slavery and, 138
- Virginia House of Burgesses
 - Jefferson and, 845
 - Madison and, 947
 - Mason and, 977
- Virginia House of Delegates
 - Jefferson and, 845
 - Marshall, J., and, 970
- Virginia Military Institute, 1299
- Virginia Plan, 944
- Virginia Ratifying Convention, 541
 - Madison and, 944

INDEX

- Virginia Report
 - Jefferson and, 846
 - Madison and, 946
- Virginia Resolutions of 1798, 887–888
 - Jefferson and, 846
 - Madison and, 945–946
 - Marshall Court and, 968
- Virginia State Bar, 186
- Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc.*, 114, 161, 330–331, 1643, 1724
 - Burger Court and, 201
 - commercial speech and, 257, 329
 - low value speech and, 937
 - professional advertising and, 1235
- Virginia State Crime Lab, 429
- “Virginia Statute for Religious Liberty” (Jefferson), 526, 623, 1107, 1755
 - establishment clause and, 550
 - Jefferson and, 526, 623, 1331
 - Madison and, 943, 944
 - “Memorial and Remonstrance” and, 947
- Virginia v. Black*, 1513, 1724–1725
 - cross burning and, 382–383
 - group libel and, 715
 - threats and, 1653
 - viewpoint discrimination and, 1716
 - Watts v. United States* and, 1769
- Virtual child pornography. See Child pornography
- Virtual private networks (VPNs), 823
- Visas. See also Diversity Immigrant Visa Program
 - categories, 427 (See also Diversity Immigrant Visa Program)
 - Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha* and, 797
 - INA and, 796–797, 983
 - noncitizens and, 1105–1106
 - undocumented migrants and, 1674–1675
- Vladeck, David, 331
- Voice exemplars, 558–559
- Voice over Internet Protocol (VOIP), 211–212
- Void-for-vagueness doctrine, 1611, 1703, 1705, 1725
 - City of Chicago v. Morales* and, 674–675
 - National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley* and, 1065
- VOIP. See Voice over Internet Protocol
- Voir dire, 871–874
 - challenges for cause in, 873
 - freedom of press and, 632
 - Hopt v. Utah Territory* and, 777
 - invidious prejudice in, 873
 - peremptory challenges in, 873–874
- Volpe, Justin, 154
- Volpp, Leti, 791
- Volstead Act, 1598
 - prisons and, 1239
 - Prohibition and, 1238
- Volte-face, 1582
- Voluntariness standard, 992
 - Miranda warnings and, 1020
- Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 and, 1132
- Voluntary guidelines, for sentencing, 1458–1459
- von Bülow, Claus, 306, 416
- Vonnegut, Kurt, 1501
- Voodoo & Hoodoo* (Haskins), 164
- Voorhis, Jerry, 1098
- Voter registration lists
 - Davis v. Beason* and, 396–397
 - jury source lists v., 871–872
 - polygamy and, 396–397
- Voters
 - property requirements for, 1540
 - taxpayer requirements for, 1540
- Voting Accessibility for the Elderly and Handicapped Act (VAEHA), 1356
- Voting rights, 1725–1729. See also Reapportionment
 - ADA and, 1356
 - African Americans and, 890, 1257
 - Aristotle and, 1638
 - constitutional protection of, 1356–1357
 - for disabled people, 1356
 - for elderly, 1356
 - felon disenfranchisement and, 583
 - felony convictions and, 1257
 - Fifteenth Amendment on, 1358, 1726
 - Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections* and, 745–746
 - HAVA and, 1356
 - judicial review of, 1728–1729
 - loss of, 384
 - NAACP and, 1063, 1064
 - Nineteenth Amendment on, 1359
 - O'Connor and, 1127
 - privilege v., 1358
 - racial discrimination and, 959
 - Reynolds v. Sims* and, 746
 - Twenty-fourth Amendment on, 1359
- Voting Rights Act of 1965, 1729–1730, 1764
 - ADL and, 70
 - Civil Rights Act of 1964 and, 300–301
 - Clark, R., and, 306
 - disabled people and, 1356
 - enforcement power and, 613
 - felon disenfranchisement and, 583
 - King and, 890
 - march on Washington and, 959
 - reapportionment and, 1275
- Voting Rights Project, 50
- VPNs. See Virtual private networks
- VPPA. See Video Privacy Protection Act
- Vulgar speech
 - Burger Court and, 201
 - captive audiences and, 247
 - free speech and, 1248–1249

W

- Waco standoff
 - extremist groups and, 565
 - FBI and, 1317
 - Reno and, 1317
- Wages, 1541. See also Minimum wage
 - Nineteenth Amendment and, 1727
- Wagner Act, 30, 1602, 1800
 - freedom of association and, 635
 - New Deal and, 1083
 - NLRB and, 1066
- Wainwright v. Sykes*, 728
- Wainwright v. Witt*, 191
- Waite Court, 1732–1733
- Waite, Morrison
 - Grant and, 1732
 - Reynolds v. United States* and, 627, 1185
- Waiting periods, for welfare programs, 1396, 1466
- Walerga Assembly Center, 840

- Walker, David, 1734–1735
 Walker, Matilda, 273
 Walker, Stephen A., 288
Walker v. Birmingham collateral bar rule and, 1210–1211
 duty to obey court orders and, 469
 injunctions and, 1210
Walker v. Ohio, 212
 Walking while black, 1446
 Wall of separation, 987, 1735–1736
 non-preferentialism standard and, 1109
 Warren Court and, 1755
 Wallace, George C., 1443
 Wallace, Henry, 1269
 Wallace, Mike, 760
Wallace v. Jaffree, 3, 89, 90, 409, 533, 1736–1738
 endorsement test and, 539, 938
 establishment clause and, 530
 free exercise and, 1246
 Lemon test and, 533, 538
 moments of silence statutes and, 1029
 non-preferentialism standard and, 1109
 public schools and, 1246
 school prayer and, 1197
 separationism and, 767–768
 wall of separation and, 1736
Wallach v. Riswick, 369
 Walling, William English, 1063
 Wal-Mart
 Central Hudson test and, 331 labor practices and, 331–332
 NC–17 rating and, 1043
 Walnut Street Presbyterian Church, 862
Watson v. Jones and, 1767
 Walt Disney Company, 484
 Walz, Frederick, 1738
Walz v. Tax Commission, 1607, 1738–1739
 Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist
 and, 333
 establishment clause and, 529
 evolution and, 1617
 Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue and, 762
 Lemon test and, 534
 separationism and, 767
 tax exemptions and, 1628–1629
 Walzer, Michael, 294
 War
 civil liberties in, 84
 crimes, 760
 declaration of, 354
 emergency powers during, 923
 Enemy Alien Act of 1798 and, 790 executive powers during, 731
 First Amendment and, 646–647, 946
 with France, 887
 free speech during, 262 government during, 552
 indefinite detention and, 805
 just, criteria, 1274
 military chaplains and, 268
 religion and, 1274
 War Department
 DeWitt and, 418
 Japanese internment and, 841–842
 Wilson, W., and, 1785
 War Industries Board, 1798
 War Mobilization and Reconversion, 1718
 War of 1812
 freedom of press and, 1207
 military chaplains and, 268
 War on Drugs, 452, 1739–1747
 African Americans and, 1256, 1257
 civil forfeiture and, 295
 criminal profiling and, 1237
 War on Terror and, 1744
 War on Terrorism, 1520, 1636
 airport searches and, 33–34
 Federalists and, 37
 government operations information and, 21
 indefinite detention and, 804–805
 military law and, 1007
 9/11 and, 1094–1095
 racial profiling and, 791
 War on Drugs and, 1744
War on the Bill of Rights and the Gathering Resistance, The (Hentoff), 760
 War Powers Acts, 1801
 War Relocation Authority
 emergency powers and, 496
 Endo v. United States and, 840
 Japanese internment and, 839
 WAR. See White Aryan Resistance
 Ward, Nathaniel, 978
Ward v. Illinois, 1119
Ward v. Monroeville, 799
Ward v. Rock Against Racism
 content-neutral regulation and, 363
 intermediate scrutiny test and, 818
 Marshall, T., and, 972
 National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley and, 1065
 public forum doctrines and, 1244 speech regulations and, 417
 time, place, and manner test and, 1657
 United States v. O'Brien and, 1113
Ward v. Texas, 316
Warden, Md. Penitentiary v. Hayden, 171, 1747
Ware v. Hylton
 Chase and, 274
 Ellsworth Court and, 492
 Ware traders, 823
Warner v. City of Boca Raton, 1549
 Warrant clause IV, 1747–1751
 Warrants. See also Arrest warrants; Search warrants automobile exception for, 1751
 FISA and, 1624
 general, 678
 newsroom searches and, 1093
 open fields and, 1133
 Payton v. New York and, 1151
 plain view and, 1171
 presumption, 1433
 probable cause and, 1234
 Prohibition and, 1239
 rubber stamping of, 1686 search, 1429
 stateside, 1696
 United States v. Watson and, 1698
 USA PATRIOT Act and, 1149
 Vinson Court and, 1720
 Warden v. Hayden and, 1747

INDEX

- Warren, Charles, 1712
- Warren Court, 1753–1761
- Burger Court v., 198
 - civil rights and, 1544
 - coerced confessions and, 317
 - compelling purpose test and, 610
 - criminal profiling and, 1236
 - enforcement power and, 613
 - Fay v. Noia* and, 325
 - felon disenfranchisement and, 583
 - First Amendment and, 1560
 - Freund and, 665
 - Goldberg and, 696
 - great dissenter of, 741
 - habeas corpus and, 233–234
 - Harlan, II, and, 741–742
 - on HUAC, 1270
 - judicial review and, 865
 - obscenity and, 1118
 - Rehnquist Court and, 1286–1287
 - victims' rights and, 1710
- Warren, E. Walpole, 288
- Warren, Earl, 1761–1765
- appointment of, 309
 - Baker v. Carr* and, 1275
 - Bill of Rights and, 1633
 - Bond v. Floyd* and, 162
 - Brennan and, 1765
 - Brown v. Board of Education* and, 186, 517
 - Burger and, 204
 - confessions and, 1455
 - Gideon v. Wainwright* and, 1016
 - “In God We Trust” and, 1067
 - Kennedy, A., and, 884
 - law enforcement procedures and, 317–318
 - Marshall, T., and, 972
 - Miranda v. Arizona* and, 317–318, 1019
 - Miranda warning and, 1017
 - Naim v. Naim* and, 1060
 - nomination of, 517
 - obscenity and, 1117, 1123
 - Peterson v. Greenville* and, 826–827
 - Poe v. Ullman* and, 712
 - preferred position rule and, 1199
 - privacy and, 1219
 - public figures and, 1242–1243
 - retirement of, 604
 - Reynolds v. Sims* and, 1276
 - Roth* test and, 836
 - Roth v. United States* and, 2, 1382–1383
 - United States v. O'Brien* and, 449
- Warren, Mercy Otis, 53–54, 1315
- Warren, Robert, 1788
- Warren, Samuel D.
- Brandeis and, 176
 - privacy and, 1218, 1590–1592
- Wartime legislation, 1765–1766
- Wartime Prohibition Act, 1238
- Washington, Booker T., 1774
- La Follette and, 901
- Washington, Bushrod
- Ellsworth Court and, 491
 - privileges and immunities and, 1231
 - on right to travel, 1355
- Washington Constitution, 929–930
- Washington, D.C.
- Petition Campaign and, 1155
 - slavery and, 1486
- Washington, Earl, Jr., 429
- Washington, George, 6, 1339, 1414
- Bache and, 95–96
 - Bank of the United States and, 732
 - Ellsworth Court and, 491
 - Jay Court and, 843
 - Marshall, J., and, 969
 - Mason and, 977
 - McCulloch v. Maryland* and, 988
 - military chaplains and, 268
 - pardons and commutations and, 1145
 - People v. Croswell* and, 733
 - political parties and, 36
 - Thanksgiving and, 532
- Washington Post*, 1026
- Washington, state of
- Alien Land Law in, 1107
 - free speech and, 1536
 - privacy and, 1531
 - Rabe v. Washington* and, 1255
 - same-sex marriage and, 1404
 - search and seizure in, 1532
 - Supreme Court, 1255
 - Washington v. Glucksberg* and, 1766
- Washington University, 1389
- Baldwin and, 102
 - Freund and, 664
- Washington v. Davis*, 114
- race-based classifications and, 611
 - racial discrimination and, 986
- Washington v. Glucksberg*, 86–87, 1583, 1766–1767
- Breyer and, 183
 - euthanasia and, 547
 - O'Connor and, 1127
 - ODWDA and, 1137
 - PAS and, 1165
 - physician-assisted suicide and, 389, 888
 - Souter and, 1497
- Washington v. Texas*, 407, 1428, 1767
- compulsory process clause and, 345
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803
 - Taylor v. Illinois* and, 1610
 - Webb v. Texas* and, 1769
- Watergate Prosecution Force, 182
- Watergate scandal, 1090
- ACLU and, 50
 - Bork and, 165
 - campaign financing and, 219
 - CIA and, 258
 - duty to obey court orders and, 469
 - FECA and, 194
 - FOIA and, 641
 - Hoover and, 776
 - Mitchell and, 1025–1026
 - Nixon, R. and, 1099–1100
 - pardons and commutations and, 1145–1146
 - press and, 1354
 - privacy and, 346
 - White, B., and, 1779
- Waters v. Churchill*, 421
- Waterville College, 935
- Watkins, Clayton K., 1661

- Watkins, John, 1270
- Watkins v. United States*, 110
- HUAC and, 780
- Warren and, 1764
- Watson v. Jones*, 1767–1769
- church property and, 857
- establishment clause and, 537
- property disputes and, 862
- Watts v. Indiana*, 316
- threats and, 1653
- Watts v. United States*, 1769
- President and, 1512–1513
- Ways and Means Committee, 901
- Ways of Love*, 858
- Wayte v. United States*, 423
- We Hold These Truths: Catholic Reflections on the American Proposition* (Murray), 1050
- Wealth of Nations* (Smith), 928
- Wealth redistribution, 479
- Weapons. See Guns
- Weaver, Randy, 1385–1386
- Weaver v. Palmer Bros. Co.*, 209
- Weaver, Vicki, 1385–1386
- Webb v. City of Republic*, 371
- Webb v. O'Brien*, 1108
- Webb v. Texas*, 1769
- Washington v. Texas* and, 1767
- Webb v. United States*, 1741
- Webster, Daniel
- education and, 1525
- Phillips, W. and, 1158
- Vidal v. Girard's Executor* and, 1712
- Webster v. Reproductive Health Services*, 10, 1770–1771
- abortion and, 673
- Beal v. Doe* and, 116
- Colautti v. Franklin* and, 324
- establishment clause and, 11–12
- Lemon test and, 534
- Maher v. Roe* and, 951
- NARAL and, 1062
- Planned Parenthood v. Casey* and, 1175
- Roe v. Wade* and, 1320, 1322, 1367–1369
- Wechsler, Herbert, 842
- Weddington, Sarah, 987, 1771–1772
- Wedge Strategy, 378
- Weekly*, 342
- Weeks v. United States*, 91, 284, 1772, 1799
- exclusionary rule and, 555, 772, 957
- Wolf v. Colorado* and, 1790
- Weems, Charlie, 1427
- Weems, Paul, 1772
- Weems v. United States*, 236, 1772
- corporal punishment and, 384
- English Bill of Rights and, 503
- proportionality standard and, 668
- three strikes laws and, 1654
- Weiman v. Updegraff*, 1612
- Weiner, Lee, 898
- Weinglass, Leonard, 278
- Weisberger v. Weisenfeld*, 687
- Weisman, Deborah, 911
- Welch, Joseph, 1772–1773
- McCarthy and, 985
- Welch, Robert, 854
- “Welcome to Monkey House” (Vonnegut), 1501
- Welfare programs
- AFDC and, 692
- Charitable Choice and, 269–271
- coerced confessions and, 940
- Dandridge v. Williams* and, 393
- Goldberg v. Kelly* and, 692–693
- LSC and, 913
- privileges and immunities and, 1233
- residency requirements for, 1396
- Shapiro v. Thompson* and, 1466
- states and, 1396
- waiting periods for, 1396
- Wyman v. James* and, 1804
- Welfare reform, 172–173
- Well-pleaded complaint rule, 867
- Wells, N. Douglas, 973
- Wells-Barnett, Ida Bell, 1773–1774
- NAACP and, 1063
- Welsh, Elliott, II, 350
- Welsh, Robert, 323
- Welsh v. United States*, 350, 1477
- evolution and, 1619
- United States v. Seeger* and, 1693
- White, B., and, 1693
- Weltanschauung, 1618
- Wesberry v. Sanders*, 1275
- West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish*, 1581
- economic regulation and, 474
- Stone and, 1565
- West Coast Hotel v. Parrish*, 928
- West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette*, 48, 222, 282, 445, 501, 1575, 1775–1776, 1802
- Bible and, 126
- Covington and, 372
- Douglas and, 445
- flag saluting and, 591, 593–596, 1365, 1630
- forced speech and, 600
- Frankfurter and, 619, 1365
- freedom of conscience and, 782
- freedom of religion and, 802, 1364
- freedom of speech and, 656
- government speech and, 702
- Intellectual individualism and, 601
- Jackson, R. and, 834, 1630
- Jehovah's Witnesses and, 849, 1364–1365
- Minersville School District v. Gabis* and, 1775
- penumbras and, 1153
- Pledge of Allegiance and, 1177, 1179
- Prince v. Massachusetts* and, 1208
- Roberts, O., in, 1364
- Stone and, 1565
- Stone Court and, 1561
- Westover v. United States*, 1456
- Westside Board of Education v. Mergen*, 907
- Weyl, Walter, 736
- Whalen v. Roe*, 1583
- What Does America Mean?* (Meiklejohn), 999
- “What Every Girl Should Know” (Sanger), 1410
- Where Do We Go From Here: Chaos or Community?* (King), 890
- Whigs
- Glorious Revolution and, 690
- grand juries and, 704
- Harlan, I. and, 738
- Kendall and, 883

INDEX

- While Circle League of America, 116
- Whiskey Rebellion
 - Chase and, 274
 - Hamilton and, 733
 - pardons and commutations and, 1145
- Whiskey Rebels, 95
- Whistleblowers, 1776–1777
- White Aryan Resistance (WAR), 1502
- White, Byron, 1778–1779
 - Board of Education v. Allen* and, 155
 - Bram v. United States* and, 1017
 - Branzburg v. Hayes* and, 179
 - Buckley v. Valeo* and, 194
 - City of Los Angeles v. Lyons* and, 935
 - City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc.* and, 1318–1319
 - Coker v. Georgia* and, 323
 - Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Regan* and, 335
 - Connick v. Myers* and, 702
 - Corporation of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos* and, 367
 - on cross burning, 382–383, 1271
 - Delaware v. Prouse* and, 412
 - Duncan v. Louisiana* and, 468
 - Furman v. Georgia* and, 233
 - Griswold v. Connecticut* and, 713
 - Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier* and, 757
 - Herbert v. Lando* and, 761
 - Jackson v. Denno* and, 831
 - Kennedy, A., and, 696
 - McLaughlin v. Florida* and, 991
 - New York Times Co. v. Sullivan* and, 405
 - New York Times v. United States* and, 1090
 - NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago* and, 1100
 - obscenity and, 1119
 - Osborne v. Ohio* and, 1138
 - overbreadth doctrine and, 1140
 - Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps* and, 1158
 - Plyler v. Doe* and, 1182
 - Pope v. Illinois* and, 1191
 - proportional punishment and, 1241
 - on proportionality, 245
 - Red Lion Broadcasting Co., Inc. v. FCC* and, 1279–1280
 - Regents of the University of California v. Bakke* and, 1284
 - sexual orientation and, 1222
 - United States v. O'Brien* and, 1114
 - Wallace v. Jaffree* and, 1737
 - Webster v. Reproductive Health Services* and, 1770
 - Welsh v. United States* and, 1693
 - Wolman v. Walter* and, 1790
- White Court, 1777–1778
- White, Edward, 1448
- White, Ellen G., 1461
- White, Ellen Harmon, 1461
- White, G. Edward, 1763
- White House Faith-Based & Community Initiatives
 - Charitable Choice and, 269
- White Slave Traffic Act. See Mann Act
- White supremacists, 565–566. See also White Aryan Resistance
 - Southern Poverty Law Center and, 1500
 - United States v. Cruikshank* and, 1681–1682
- White, Thomas, 1667
- White v. Davis*, 1534
- White v. Samsung Electronics*
 - Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co.* and, 1812
- White v. Texas*, 316
 - Marshall, T., and, 971
- Whitehill, Robert, 1265
- Whitehill v. Elkins*, 18
- Whites. See Caucasians
- White-Smith v. Apollo Company*
 - Metro-Goldwyn Mayer Studios v. Grokster* and, 1001
- Whitewater investigation
 - Clinton, B., and, 706–707
- Whitman, Walt
 - Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville* and, 1145
- Whitney, Charlotte Anita, 175, 1597, 1762
 - Whitney v. California* and, 1780
- Whitney v. California*, 68, 312, 1510, 1779–1780
 - Brandeis and, 175, 1560, 1597, 1642
 - clear and present danger test and, 654
 - Emerson and, 498
 - First Amendment protection and, 771
 - free speech and, 1642
 - Meiklejohn and, 999
 - national security and, 1073
 - New York ex rel. Bryant v. Zimmerman* and, 1087
 - overturning of, 178
 - Vinson and, 414, 1722
- Whittaker Chambers-Alger Hiss hearings, 1098
- Whittaker, Charles Evans
 - White, B., and, 1779
- Whittlesey, Elisha
 - Giddings and, 681
- WHO. See World Health Organization
- Whren v. United States*, 1746
 - DWI and, 470
 - Ohio v. Robinette* and, 1128
 - racial profiling and, 1237
- Why We Can't Wait* (King), 890
- Wiccans
 - Department of Defense and, 268
 - legislative prayer and, 915
- Wichita Falls Public Library, 164
- Wickard v. Filburn*, 1359
- Wickersham Commission, 1184, 1455. See also National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement
 - Chafee and, 261
- Widmar v. Vincent*, 417
 - Burger and, 206
 - Burger Court and, 200
 - EAA and, 512
 - equal access and, 535
 - establishment clause and, 700
 - Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District* and, 907
 - public forum doctrines and, 1229, 1244
 - religious speech and, 1229
 - viewpoint discrimination and, 1715
- Wieman v. Updegraff*, 17, 1358
- Wife-beating. See Domestic violence
- Wiggins v. Smith*, 810–811
- Wilbur v. Mahan*, 1613
- Wilkerson v. Utah*, 223
- Wilkes, John, 1749
- Wilkes v. Wood*, 1749
- Wilkins, J. Harvey, 1701
- Wilkinson v. Leland*, 477
- Wilkinson v. Utah, 384

- William of Orange. See Orange, William of
- Williams College
Field and, 585
- Williams, Edward Bennett
McCarthy and, 985
- Williams, Eugene, 1427
- Williams, Ian, 306
Clark, R., and, 307
- Williams, R.G., 1485
- Williams, Robert F., 1545
- Williams, Roger, 61–62, 107, 327, 1309, 1781–1783
attacks on, 531
banishment of, 564
“Bloody Tenent, The” and, 153–154 conversion of, 153
free exercise and, 622
Providence Plantations and, 525
Puritans and, 1250
wall of separation and, 1735
- Williams, Terry v. Taylor*, 233–234
- Williams v. Florida*, 105, 407
Harlan, II, and, 743
incorporation doctrine and, 803
Michigan v. Lucas and, 1005
- Williamson, Hugh
civil trials and, 359
ex post facto laws and, 359
- Williamson v. Lee Optical*
rational purpose test and, 610
- Willie, Robert, 1201
- Willke, Jack
Operation Rescue and, 1133–1134
- Willkie, Wendell, 1084
- Wilson, James, 140–141
Bill of Rights and, 144, 1326
civil liberties and, 143
Civil Rights Act of 1866 and, 299
Constitutional Convention of 1787 and, 1264, 1265, 1268
Ellsworth Court and, 491
ex post facto laws and, 359
free speech laws and, 815
Jay Court and, 843
- Wilson v. Arkansas*, 1333
- Wilson v. Layne*, 1783
- Wilson v. Schillinger*, 1262
- Wilson v. United States*
right to counsel and, 1017
- Wilson, Woodrow, 1447, 1783–1785, 1792
Abrams v. United States and, 13
Brandeis and, 173
Bryan and, 189
civil liberties and, 1372–1374
La Follette and, 903
McReynolds and, 992–993
Roosevelt, F., and, 134, 1372–1374
Sherman Act and, 1472
Taft and, 1601
women’s suffrage and, 1793
World War I and, 1372–1374
- Windmar v. Vincent*, 1298
- Winship, Samuel, 813
- Winters v. New York*, 1123
- Winthrop, James, 1265–1266
- Winthrop, John, 298
free exercise and, 622
- Massachusetts Bay Colony and, 978
- Puritans and, 1249
- Wiretapping, 488, 1269. See also Electronic surveillance; Technology
Bartnicki v. Vopper and, 113
Brandeis and, 177
of CPUSA, 339
electronic surveillance and, 487
Fourth Amendment and, 123, 177
Hoffa v. United States and, 769
Holmes on, 772
Hoover and, 775–776
Internet privacy and, 821
interrogation and, 980–981
intrusion and, 828
Johnson, L., and, 856
Katz v. United States and, 882, 1519
of King, 306, 776
laws about, 1785–1787
On Lee v. United States, 445
Nixon, R. and, 1099
Olmstead v. United States and, 1129
Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 and, 1132
privacy and, 1429
Prohibition and, 1239
reasonable expectation of privacy and, 882
Right of Privacy Act and, 856
statutes, 6
United States v. Coplon and, 736
United States v. Dionisio and, 1682
- Wirth, Tim, 328
- Wisconsin
bias crime law, 1271
constitution, 1294
Good Friday and, 398–399
personal liberty laws and, 1154
Supreme Court, 1294, 1333
- Wisconsin Idea, 902
- Wisconsin Supreme Court
Bible reading and, 131
- Wisconsin v. Constantineau*
procedural due process and, 609
- Wisconsin v. Miller*, 58
- Wisconsin v. Mitchell*, 1271, 1787
penalty enhancement and, 750
- Wisconsin v. Yoder*, 23, 58, 1283, 1470, 1548, 1693, 1787–1789
Bowen v. Roy and, 168
Burger and, 205
Burger Court and, 200
education and, 1586
free exercise clause and, 542, 625, 628
McDaniel v. Paty and, 989
Mozert v. Hawkins County Board of Education and, 1044
- Wise, Stephen, J., 852
- Witchcraft, 564
- Witherspoon v. Illinois*, 240
capital sentencing and, 932
- Withholding of removal, 89
- Withrow v. Larkin*
medical licensing and, 800
- Witnesses. See also Expert witnesses; Eyewitness identification civil contempt, 707 detention, 804–805
due process and, 459
eyewitness identification lineups and, 925
grand juries and, 708

INDEX

- Witnesses (cont.)
 - material, 459, 981
 - procedural due process and, 463
 - protection of, 1247
 - public trials and, 1247
 - right to confront, 374
 - Taylor v. Illinois* and, 1610
 - treason and, 1665–1666
 - Webb v. Texas* and, 1769
- Witte, John, 527
 - establishment clause and, 528
 - free exercise clause and, 625
- Witters, Larry, 1789
- Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind*, 1528, 1789–1798, 1791
 - Burger Court and, 200
 - equal access and, 535
 - Mitchell v. Helms* and, 1024
- Wobblies. See Industrial Workers of the World
- Wolcott, Oliver, 1326
- Wolf Packing Co. v. Court of Industrial Relations*, 465
- Wolf v. Colorado*, 181, 1790
 - Frankfurter and, 618
 - incorporation doctrine and, 803
 - procedural due process and, 463
 - Vinson Court and, 1757
- Wolff v. McDonnell*
 - Burger Court and, 202
 - prison discipline and, 800
- Wolff v. Rice*, 1195
- Wolfgang, Marvin, 1257
- Wolfson, Louis, 604
- Wolman v. Walter*, 1527, 1790–1792
 - Burger Court and, 199
 - Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Regan* and, 335
- Woman Rebel, The* (Sanger), 1410
- Woman's Christian Temperance Union, 256
- Woman's Peace Party, 256
- "Woman's World" (Catt), 256
- Women
 - AASS and, 46
 - American Revolution and, 53
 - anti-slavery and, 1156
 - Bradwell v. Illinois* and, 273
 - domestic violence and, 433–435
 - equal protection clause and, 520
 - immigration and, 1465
 - Jaycees and, 304, 1363
 - joint ownership by, 1541
 - in juries, 855, 871, 1539, 1610
 - Mann Act and, 954
 - middle scrutiny test and, 612–613
 - in military, 855
 - minimum wage for, 479
 - Nineteenth Amendment and, 1727
 - as offenders, 1463–1464
 - pornography and, 943, 1120–1121
 - property rights and, 434
 - Selective Service and, 698
 - self-defense and, 1449
 - sexual expression and, 1574
 - suffrage and, 1522
 - Taylor v. Louisiana* and, 1610
 - as victims, 1464–1465
 - victims' rights and, 1710
 - voting rights and, 1725
- Women of the Ku Klux Klan, 896
- Women's Equity Action League, 1068
- Women's groups, 755
- Women's Organization for National Prohibition Reform, 1239
- Women's Party, 1794
- Women's rights
 - ACLU and, 50
 - First Amendment and, 1574
 - Hutchinson and, 62
 - Mill and, 1010–1011
 - NOW and, 1068–1069
 - Powell, Lewis, and, 1194
 - privacy and, 1225
 - Roe v. Wade* and, 1220
 - Schlaflly and, 1421
 - Stanton and, 1522
 - Weddington and, 1771
- Women's Rights Convention, 520
- Women's rights movement, 1400
 - marriage after, 965
- Women's Rights Project, 50
- Women's State Temperance Society, 65
- Women's suffrage
 - Anthony and, 65
 - Bryan and, 189
 - Catt and, 256
 - early, 53
 - La Follette and, 901
 - Nineteenth Amendment and, 520
 - Wilson, W., and, 1784
 - World War I and, 1793–1794
 - Wyoming and, 1541
- Wong Sun, 1792
- Wong Sun v. United States*, 1792
 - illegal search and seizure and, 557
- Wong Wing v. United States*, 460
- Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath*, 600
- Wood, Gordon S., 55
- Woodby v. Immigration and Naturalization Service*, 41
- Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly*, 649
- Woodhull, Victoria
 - Comstock and, 342
 - free love and, 649
- Woodruff Manifesto, 72
- Woodruff, Wilford, 72
- Woodsmen of the World, 896
- Woodson v. North Carolina*, 223, 241, 385
 - cruel and unusual punishment in, 231–232
- Woodstock College, 1049
- Woodworth, George, 101
 - Baldus study and, 986
- Wooley v. Maynard*, 1067
 - government speech and, 702
 - West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette* and, 656
- Woolsey, John M., 1689
 - obscenity and, 1116
 - in United States v. One Book Called "Ulysses," 659
- Woolworth's, 412
- Wooton, Paul, 774
- Worcester v. Georgia*, 1589
 - Marshall, J., and, 970
- Worcester v. Georgia*, 807
- Wordsworth, William, 1011

- Work ethic, 1740
- Worker's rights, 1395, 1541
- Workplace
 - free speech in, 1507–1508
 - harassment, 303–304, 777–779
 - religion in, 1299–1303
- Works Progress Administration (WPA)
 - Hatch Act and, 748
 - HUAC and, 780
- World Health Organization (WHO), 759
- World Trade Center, 1623
 - terrorism and, 1622
 - War on Terror and, 1094
- World Trade Organization (WTO), 824
- World War I
 - anti-war protestors, 261
 - Baldwin and, 102
 - civil liberties in, 1792–1799
 - clear and present danger test and, 311
 - Communist Party and, 339
 - conspiracy and, 351
 - Debs and, 400
 - Debs v. United States* and, 401
 - DeWitt and, 417–418
 - emergency powers and, 496
 - Espionage Act and, 1419
 - Espionage and Sedition Acts and, 1636
 - free speech and, 1794
 - Hoover and, 774
 - incitement of criminal activity and, 651–653
 - La Follette and, 903
 - Masses Publishing Company v. Patten* and, 979
 - Meiklejohn and, 998
 - military chaplains and, 268
 - Murphy and, 1047
 - national security and, 1072
 - NCLB and, 47
 - opposition to, 1395
 - pacifists and, 1141
 - Palmer and, 1144
 - pornography and, 1117
 - Progressive movement and, 240
 - red scare and, 566, 1280–1282, 1798
 - Socialist Party and, 1419
 - U.S. Postal Service and, 353
 - Wilson, W., and, 1374, 1784
- World War II
 - ACLU and, 49
 - Alien Registration Act of 1940 and, 68
 - alien registration during, 1530
 - Catholic Church and, 253
 - Chinese Exclusion Act and, 260
 - civil liberties in, 1800–1803
 - Communist Party and, 339
 - DeWitt and, 417–418
 - Douglas and, 445
 - drugs and, 1742
 - emergency powers and, 495–496
 - equal protection and, 515–516
 - Evers and, 548
 - Ex parte Milligan* and, 552
 - flag saluting and, 592
 - freedom of expression and, 637
 - habeas corpus suspension and, 352
 - Hoover and, 775
 - incitement of criminal activity and, 654–655
 - Japan and, 1269
 - Japanese Americans during, 791
 - Manhattan Project and, 1377
 - marriage after, 965
 - McCarthy and, 984
 - military chaplains and, 268
 - military law and, 1007
 - Murphy and, 1048
 - Nuremberg Trials and, 354
 - OSS and, 257
 - Philippines and, 1269
 - Rauh and, 1269
 - red scare and, 566
 - Roosevelt, F., and, 1372–1374
 - Rutledge, W., and, 1390
 - segregation after, 972
 - Stone Court and, 1561, 1562
 - Tokyo Rose and, 1666
 - Vinson Court and, 1719
- World Wide Web, 818–819. See also Internet
- Worldwide Church of God (WWCG), 366, 1300
- Worldwide Church of God v. Philadelphia Church of God*, 366
- Worth, Daniel, 1485
- WPA. See Works Progress Administration
- Wright, Andy, 1427
- Wright, Frances
 - free love and, 649
 - free speech and, 648
- Wright, Hamilton, 1741, 1742
- Wright, Peter, 639–640
- Wright, Roy, 1427
- Wright v. Houston Independent School District*, 1619
- Wright, Wade, 1427
- Writs of assistance, 54
 - probable cause and, 1234
- Writs of Assistance Act, 1803–1804
- WTO. See World Trade Organization
- WWCG. See Worldwide Church of God
- Wyatt v. Stickney*, 855
- Wylie, Chambers, 356
- Wylie, Hugh, 1587
- Wyman v. James*, 1804
- Wynehamer v. People*
 - due process and, 1580
 - economic rights and, 477
 - substantive due process and, 464
- Wyoming
 - Alien Land Law in, 1107–1108
 - homosexuality and, 1469
 - women's suffrage and, 1541, 1793
- Wyoming v. Houghton*, 1804–1805
 - Breyer and, 183
- Wythe, George, 969
- Wyzanski, Charles E., 735

X

- X, Malcolm, 1495
 - Kunstler and, 306, 898
 - Son of Sam Law and, 361
- Xenophobia, 36–37
 - Palmer and, 1144
- XYZ Affair, 37
 - Ellsworth Court and, 491
 - Marshall, J., and, 970

INDEX

Y

Yablonski, Jock, 1270
 Yahweh, 1035
Yakus v. United States, 1391, 1801
 Yale College
 Calhoun and, 214
Yale Law and Policy Review
 Emerson and, 499
Yale Law Journal
 ERA and, 521
 fair use doctrine and, 572
 Fortas and, 603
 Yale Law School
 Bork and, 165
 Douglas and, 443
 Emerson and, 497
 Fortas and, 603
 Frank and, 615
 Griffiths and, 812
 Kunstler and, 898
 Rostow and, 258
 Yale University, 1374
 Griswold v. Connecticut and, 712
 Yalta Conference, 765
 Yamashita, Tomoyuki, 1390
Yamataya v. Fisher
 due process and, 460
Yang v. Sturner, 93
 Yarmulkes
 Goldman v. Weinberger and, 852
 in military, 1007
 Yasui, Minoru, 839
 litigation of, 841–842
Yasui v. United States, 839–840
Yates v. United States, 68, 110, 1807
 Burks v. United States and, 858
 Clark, T., and, 309
 freedom of association and, 635
 Harlan, II, and, 741
 national security and, 1073
 Smith Act and, 1488
 Yee, Johnny, 1792
 Yellow dog contracts
 Adair v. United States and, 465
 Coppage v. Kansas and, 465
 White Court and, 1777
 Yellow fever, 1387
Yick Wo v. Hopkins discriminatory prosecution in, 423
 equal protection clause and, 228
 Fourteenth Amendment, 515
 Yippies, 898
 YMCA. See Young Men's Christian Association
 Yoder, Jonas, 1787
 Yoo, John Choon, 1096
 Young, Brigham, 72, 1330
 Mormons and, 1038
 polygamy and, 396
 Young Earth creationism, 1616
Young Lawyer for the New Deal: An Insider's Memoir of the Roosevelt Years (Emerson), 498
 Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), 1592
 Comstock and, 341
 Young Republicans, 204

Young v. American Mini-Theatres, 1318, 1418, 1436, 1807–1808, 1820
 content-neutral regulation and, 364
 Stevens and, 1556
 viewpoint discrimination and, 1714
 zoning laws and, 669, 1121
Youngberg v. Romeo, 282
 Younge, Samuel, 161
 Younger abstention, 1809
 Younger, Evelle, 1809
Younger v. Harris, 1808–1809
 good faith exception and, 868
 Youngs Drug Productions Corporation, 160–161
Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 495 executive powers and, 731
 Jackson, R. and, 835
 Vinson Court and, 1720
 Yousef, Ramzi, 1622
 Youth International Party, 278
 Yurok Indians, 939
 Yutzy, Adin, 1787
 YWCA, 520

Z

Zablocki v. Redhail, 1479, 1811–1812
Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co., 77, 1812
Zadvydas v. Davis, 460, 1530
 Breyer and, 183
 material witnesses and, 981
Zant v. Stephens, 237
 Zaps, 26
Zellman v. Simmons-Harris, 31–32, 167, 422, 1298, 1416, 1528, 1812–1814
 ADL and, 69
 Americans United and, 57
 Breyer and, 183
 Charitable Choice and, 270
 Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist and, 334 government funding and, 542
 Locke v. Davey and, 929
 Mueller v. Allen and, 1045–1046
 non-funding provisions and, 153
 O'Connor and, 1127
 school vouchers and, 1424
 Souter and, 1496
 Witters v. Department of Services and, 1789
 Wolman v. Walter and, 1791
 Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District and, 1817
 Zenger, John Peter, 644, 705, 1440, 1814–1816
 Bishop's Case and, 1667
 free speech law and, 815
 freedom of press and, 1202, 1207
 Hamilton and, 734
 jury nullification and, 869
 national security and, 1072
 Zeno, James, 940
 Zeran, Ken, 45
Zeran v. America Online, 45
Ziang Sung Wan v. United States, 1018
 Zimbalist, Efrem, Jr., 775
 Zion, 1035
 Z.J. Gifts, 926

Zobrest, James, 1816

Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District, 31, 1416, 1527, 1528, 1816–1817

Wolman v. Walter and, 1791

Zoning

definition of, 1817

entertainment and, 1418

free speech and, 1821

obscenity and, 1121

religion and, 1817–1820

RLUIPA and, 630–631

Schad v. Mt. Ephraim and, 1418–1419

secondary effects doctrine and, 1436

sex and, 1820–1821

SLAPP and, 1480

Stevens and, 1556

Sutherland, G. and, 1596

Taft Court and, 1595

Zoning laws

Bell Terre v. Boraas and, 120–121

City of Littleton v. Z.J. Gifts D4, LLC and, 926

nudity and, 111

RLUIPA and, 630–631

sexually explicit movies and, 669

Zorach v. Clauson, 343, 356, 1293, 1822–1823

Frankfurter and, 618

no endorsement test and, 1103

Torcaso v. Watkins and, 1662

Vinson Court and, 1719–1720

Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 1823

Burger Court and, 202

journalistic sources and, 859

newsroom searches and, 1093

PPA and, 1223

Zwicker, Ralph, 1773

Cohn and, 323

Reference / Law

 Routledge
Taylor & Francis Group
an informa business www.taylorandfrancisgroup.com

270 Madison Avenue
New York, NY 10016
2 Park Square, Milton Park
Abingdon, Oxon OX14 4RN, UK

Printed in the U.S.A. • Cover design: Elise Weinger

